did not think that education disqualified young men for action; but he did think that they might be penned up until they were disqualified. No military leader ever had such commanders to fight his battles as those of Bonaparte: yet he went on a different principle. He selected them from his army, and it was by his judicious selections that he gained many of his victories. He did not plead for ignorance; but he repeated that our system was for the education of the rich, and not equally for all classes. He did not reproach the rich for endeavoring to ensure to their sons a scientific education; but it was a reproach to the country that these favors were not more equally dispensed. All our experience has been adverse to the system of scientific education for military men. Washington and Jackson surpassed, in their achievements, all our commanders, and theirs were not scientific conquests. The latter, at the battle of New Orleans, did not depend upon his military education. He was among his men, giving a good example, and sharing their dangers. He did not take a safe position, and send off orders to be performed by his scientific officers. But, with him, planning and executing went hand in hand; and I say, said Mr. S., that the victory achieved by him at New Orleans was never surpassed by Napoleon. To return to the Naval School, it appeared unnecessary, because there was education on board already. The midshipmen are instructed in all the necessary branches, and are thoroughly examined in mathematics, and other branches of science, before they are received. Their instructors are the chaplains of the ships. The President appoints these chaplains, and yet the gentlemen say, that education has been so much neglected, that a Naval Academy is wanted, although the chaplains must have much leisure to devote to the duty of education. They are the proper men for this task. If they are not, it is the fault of the Senate. And if they neglected to send good men into the Navy, in this capacity, would they do any better if a Naval Academy were established? As to accomplishments, said Mr. S., I am willing that our naval officers should become accomplished, as far as was proper and compatible with their line of life. But he did not wish to harbor a host of idlers, who would do neither themselves nor the country service. If we look at the list of cadets at West Point, how many of them go into the army? I have said, observed Mr. S., to parents who have applied to have their sons placed there: Why do you not educate your children at home? They have answered that it was more easily done at West Point. As to the project now before us, I say, that the water is the element for the Navy. Do not bring your naval officers on land. If their present education is not sufficiently attended to on board, the fault can be amended. If the President does not do his duty—if he nominates a blockhead to fill the office of chaplain, it is his

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Naval Academy.

[SENATE.]

fault, and he is responsible for it. I know of very few who go to West Point for any other purpose but to finish their education, and it will be the same in a Naval Academy. They obtained at West Point every accomplishment, with the exception of dancing; and he had understood that a dancing-master was much wanted, who would doubtless improve the young gentlemen very essentially in their knowledge of tactics. In conclusion, Mr. S. said, that he approved of the other provisions of this bill; but, for the Naval School, which was here proposed to the Senate, in a vague manner, without details, he could not vote. If this portion of the bill were retained, he should not vote for the bill, which he should otherwise be disposed to do.

Mr. MACON said he felt bound to say something in relation to this bill. The Naval School now proposed was one of the steps which the Government was taking towards a state of things which he dreaded. About appropriations, said Mr. M., I shall say nothing; because you all know my conduct. I ask, is this Academy wanted at this time? And I ask it because the Chairman of the Committee on Finance says the revenue is short; and if it is not necessary at this time, it had better be let alone. It was said that it was but a small sum that was required; but it was in this way that our revenue was taken from us, drop by drop. I would ask one question in relation to this law. Have our naval officers ever shown a want of knowledge in the science of their profession? If not, where is the peculiar necessity, at this time, of providing an establishment for their education? Battles are generally won by the exercise of coolness and good sound common sense. I have no idea that an elaborate education is required to make a man fight a successful battle. The greatest fool I ever knew was the greatest classical scholar. In support of this position, if the Senate will indulge me, I will relate a story, the truth of which can be vouched for: When Governor Tryon was in office in North Carolina, his wife was said to have rather more knowledge—of human nature, at any rate—than her husband. He took two young men into his office to study the law—one was from Rhode Island, and the other from Virginia. Mrs. Tryon, in conversation with these young men, asked them about the great men in their States. Well, they told her over all the men who had great characters for classical learning; but she said she had heard of Colonel Caswell and—[the name escaped the Reporter.] Oh, said they, these are merely men of common education; they have no science and no learning: in fact, they are ignorant men; and one began life as a constable, and the other as a clerk in a parish church. One of these men had distinguished himself in battle, and both were skilful commanders. There were two other men, said Mr. M., who were never beaten by the enemy, who had no pretensions to education, and, in fact, had no great need of it. But I forget the end of my story. Well, it happened that these two persons came to Governor Tryon's house, and, at dinner, Mrs. Tryon sat between them, and kept them in conversation. After they had gone, she said to the two young men, "I thought you told me that those gentlemen were uneducated. I find it quite otherwise." The two students maintained that what they had said was true, and she concluded the conversation by saying, "that God had educated those individuals, and done it better than it could have been done by any college in the world." Mr. M. doubted whether the greatest man in the country would have been improved by education. He might have been made greater in the fixing of periods and the framing of sentences; but he would not have been made greater in mind, by all the books in the world. The rounding off a period is not the most perfect sign of greatness. Such a perfection would have made Patrick Henry less great than he was. His genius would have been trammelled by classical study. So it was with Franklin. His want of education probably made him the greater man. It has been said that the old women beat the doctors; and I think it applies to other pursuits as well as that of medicine. One thing he was very much opposed to; and that was, the Executive discretion—which was introduced into this bill, as well as most others. New things were continually brought forward; and it seemed to him that the Navy was to tote all the rest through—I say tote, as it is a word which is understood in the Southern States. I don't think of the Navy as others do. I do not believe that any Navy was ever built for defence. It is intended for conquest; and I don't wish to conquer other nations. We have gone far enough in acquiring territory. We began with Louisiana, and the Western people were satisfied with its purchase. Next we acquired Florida; and now we want Cuba. As to preparing for war in peace, I don't believe in the propriety of the system. The moment we get through one war, we prepare for another; and when people are ready for it, they are sure always to fight. Now, in relation to the supposed necessity of educating naval officers for their profession, I am not one who thinks it in any way necessary. And, on this point, let me say, that most of the great naval commanders have been uneducated. De Ruyter was a cabin boy, and rose to command and conquer by dint of that thing of which I have been speaking, which God gives to people. In this way of preparing for war in time of peace, you have nothing to support a war with when it comes, and the country is inundated with paper money. We talk about the example of England. But I do not wish our imitation of that nation to go too far. Look at her condition. With a fine country, she is overrun with paupers. She has to keep up her army and navy, and support her poor. The people of this country are taxed hard enough now. They want no more expenditures to increase the taxes. But we are told that this college is to cost nothing, or next to nothing: for the gentleman from South Carolina says there is to be no extra expense. Well, sir, it is always so. When we begin any expense, it is very small—very trifling—but as we go on, these things grow with our growth, and strengthen with our strength. And I think that, if this provision is adopted, there is not one here who knows any thing of the sum which this school will cost. It is a very easy way to get rid of the responsibility of legislating, by leaving the details to Executive discretion. But there were many things in relation to this establishment, if it were to be authorized by Congress, which ought to be looked to. It ought to be decided who the cadets should be, who went there. And if they go, they ought first to be sent to sea, to discover whether they have a gift for the profession—for I am a great believer in gifts—and believe that not only poets, but heroes are born to their trade. I say, said Mr. M., that the cadets at this projected institution will be, as they are at West Point, the sons of rich men exclusively, or nearly so. Well, sir, what will you do with all these restless spirits, after you have taught them the trade of arms? Can you expect to keep the country at peace, when it is full of soldiers? Don't you see that these men must have fighting to do, to keep them from doing mischief? I had a list of the sons of the dignitaries of the empire who were at West Point; and I should really be afraid to show it. Is this the way to seek out military talents? to take the son of every great man, and leave obscure abilities to lie idle? It is a bad system. I believe there is talent in the country for every emergency—and I believe we shall never have better officers in the line, than we had in the Revolution, when education for the military service could not be had. You must appoint officers that your men will follow—men that can command their soldiers. Courage, after all, is the requisite quality—and of that we have a great plenty. Courage is like cider, it is good for nothing until it works; and true courage never begins to work until it comes near the enemy. A man may be very good at planning, and in the sciences, and yet not good for fighting. We are told, that this education for the Navy, is to cost nothing—and that the establishment is to do great good without any expense. These are very fair promises—but, does anybody believe that they will hold out? Did we ever count the cost of any plan—or stop at any increase? We are always advancing in expense. We have just raised the salary of the Postmaster General to $6,000, although he had enough before. I recollect when Gideon Granger was in the office, it was proposed to raise it. A gentleman from Pennsylvania asked if the salary was enough for the office, and the duty. It was answered, yes—but it was not enough for the man. "Well, then," rejoined the gentleman from Pennsylvania, "let him resign, and we will get another." They had within a few years created a Board of Navy Commissioners, which was to be a saving also; but it turned out that they got good fat salaries, and so will the professors of your Naval School. They won't work for nothing. Formerly two men were sufficient for doorkeepers, &c., to the two Houses; but now there is a regiment. I recollect, said Mr. M., and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) remembers it too, when the clerks, in the offices of Congress at Philadelphia, had to work at night. Now we decrease the labor, and increase their numbers and their salaries. Our greatest misfortune was, during the war, that we had no men of experience. It was said, that some of the officers were too old, and had forgot what they once knew. Then there were the young men who had no experience, and between them we were found very deficient. The gentleman from Maryland says, that the cadets at West Point are all poor men's sons. I would ask the gentleman whether these poor people had no rich kin, or whether their ancestors were not rich; because the rich always have the preference, and are taken first. I shall go, said Mr. M., no farther. These are my thoughts on the establishment of a Naval School, and as nobody had previously expressed them, I thought it my duty to do so.

Mr. HAYNE said he rose with no other purpose than to correct the gentleman from North Carolina. I did not say, as the gentleman supposes, that the establishment of a Naval School would require no extra expense. I said merely, that, with regard to the pupils, there would be no extra expense, because, as they are now in the service, they would receive the pay only which they would receive were there no Academy. But there will be an additional expense for professors and teachers. The bill proposes that the President of the United States shall form a plan for the institution, to be submitted to Congress at the next session. The details were, therefore, not now before the Senate, and the whole matter would be before them next year. There was another misapprehension in the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina. He supposes that there was no deficiency in our officers. In this he was mistaken. It was that deficiency which suggested the idea of a Naval Academy. The gentleman from Maryland had correctly stated, that many of our midshipmen were found deficient in mathematical knowledge, and it was because they had no advantages for the attainment of the science. It was said by his friend from North Carolina, that some men came from the hand of their Creator, great, in despite of the absence of education—that God made them great. This was true; and such minds usually broke through the trammels of their condition, and became distinguished by the mere force of genius. But what shall we do with the large mass of minds of a common

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Ohio Turnpike.

[SENATE.]

order, unendowed with these great natural qualities? Their humbler talents must be turned to serviceable account: for splendid talents are not sufficiently abundant to supply the ranks of any profession. If we agree in this, then education is important. If we refer to military matters, we ought to consult military men: if to naval affairs, we ought to ask the opinions of our naval heroes—and they believe that the plan now proposed is the best, for the interests both of the service and the country.

Mr. MACOON said, in reply, that he was convinced of the fact that there was no deficiency in the officers of the Navy. He had been told by an officer of the Navy, many years ago, that Congress was ruining the Navy. He said there were officers called Congress officers, who were appointed without the proper qualifications, and that circumstance gave rise to the regulation that midshipmen should not be promoted until they had been examined.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, and decided in the negative.

SATURDAY, February 17.

Ohio Turnpike.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the bill to authorize the United States to subscribe for stock in the Columbus and Sandusky Turnpike Company, was taken up.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, was opposed to the project. If no other person would raise a voice against this system, he should consider it his duty to do so. They had given the States land, and he thought it might be proper to give again: but the Government ought to keep out of these pernicious co-partnerships. They had subscribed for canal and road stock in many instances, for no other purpose than to assist the companies to complete their works, not to share any profit; and, after having paid their share of the expenses, then they sold out their stock for a song, and left the companies to reap the benefit. Congress was fast becoming a finished stock-jobber; falling into every project that was set afloat, and it was not improbable that the next that would be known, the United States would be deeply engaged in the Woollen Manufacture. They had already engaged in banking, and were speculating largely in bank stock—and Heaven only knew what they would engage in next. He was an enemy to these schemes, and he would repeat it—give land if you will, no matter if you give ten sections on each side of the road; but keep out of these profitless partnerships.

Mr. MACOON remarked, that he saw in his seat a gentleman, who, he believed, was one of the first settlers of Tennessee, and also one who knew something of the first settlement of Kentucky. That country was well settled before the war: and how was it settled? The United States made no roads for the people: but, somehow or other, they got along without them. How was Pennsylvania settled? and, indeed, how were all new States settled at first? Why, they had to work their own way, and do as well as they could. It was a new thing to him, this making of roads; and, he thought it going a step too far, and anticipating prosperity. Indeed, every thing seemed to him to have changed, of late years, in respect to the new States, and certainly, he thought, not for the better.

Mr. BERBIEN said that, as he understood the bill at present, this was a donation to the State of Ohio, of a quantity of land, the value of which had not been stated to the Senate. He wished to inquire the value of the land which it was now proposed to give away; and, also, what security Congress had, that it would be applied to the objects contemplated? Until these items of information were obtained, the Senate were legislating in the dark, and were granting to the State of Ohio a parcel of land, without any guarantee that it would be devoted to aid the construction of the road in question.

Mr. HENDRICKS remarked, that this was said to be a donation; but he considered it to have been given in the same manner as the land in aid of the canals; and that the United States would gain a benefit from it, in the enhancement of the value of the contiguous lands. In this case, two sections deep of land were given on the west side of the road, while all the land on the eastern side was the property, still, of the United States. As to the lands, they were mostly wild lands, and, he believed, they were in the market at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents. This was all the information he could give; but he would refer the gentleman to the petition of the Legislature of Ohio, which was on the Secretary's table. In regard to the guarantee which Congress would have for the proper application of these lands, it existed in the good faith of the State of Ohio, which, he thought, might be considered sufficient. It would also be observed, that the land was granted expressly for the purpose of aiding the road, and it could not be applied otherwise. As to the time of making the road, he saw no objection to limiting the State in that respect.

Mr. CHANDLER said that the project was, in his view, altogether inexpedient and improper. The State of Ohio contained a population of 800,000 souls, and yet they asked for assistance to make a road; and demanded of Congress to give two sections of land, to what distance they were not told. Besides, in making this grant, the company was not restricted from taxing the people and the Government, by tolls, although Congress was to make the road for them. He thought the people of Ohio were able to make their own roads; and, under this opinion, he should move to lay the bill upon the table. He, however, withdrew his motion.

Mr. MACOON said, that the State of Ohio, he knew, could not tax the public lands for five years after they were sold; and gentlemen talked of this, as if it were a great hardship. But it always appeared to him to be a benefit to the State, rather than an injury. It would do the State, he thought, very little good to tax people when they had first settled in a wild country, and when they had nothing to pay taxes with. It was supposed that the State ought to wait until they had scraped a little something together, before they began to tax them; and not lay a tax on poor people in the woods, who had as much as they could do to keep body and soul together. The exemption from taxation for five years, seemed to him to have been of great benefit to the State of Ohio, as it had brought in people to settle, and in that way increased the population.

After a continuation of the debate by Messrs. WOODBURY, HARRISON, CHANDLER, JOHNSON of Kentucky, SMITH of Maryland, HOLMES, and RUGGLES, the amendment was adopted, 19 to 15; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, March 1.

The United States, Georgia, and the Creek Indians.

Mr. BENTON, from the Select Committee on the Message of the President of the United States, of the 5th February, in relation to the differences between the United States and Georgia, made a long report; which was read.

The report concludes with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, respectfully, requested to continue his exertions to obtain from the Creek Indians a relinquishment of any claim to lands within the limits of Georgia.

FRIDAY, March 2.

The resolution accompanying the report of the Select Committee on the Georgia difficulties, was taken up, and agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT then said that he rose in pursuance of a notice given yesterday, and having offered the Senators his best wishes for a safe and happy return to their homes, retired from the chair.

Mr. BELL, from the committee to wait on the President, reported that he had no further communication to make to the Senate.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned, sine die.

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Emigration of Indians.

[H. OF R.]

NINETEENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 4, 1826.

At twelve o'clock the House was called to order, by Hon. JOHN W. TAYLOR, of New York, Speaker of the House. The roll being called over by the Clerk of the House, (MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, Esq.,) one hundred and seventy-eight Representatives and three Delegates answered to their names.

The usual message having been interchanged with the Senate, a committee was ordered to be appointed, jointly with a committee on the part of the Senate of the United States, to wait on the President, and announce to him the organization of the two Houses.

TUESDAY, December 5.

Mr. LATHROP, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses were in session, and ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make, reported that they had attended to the duty assigned them, and that the President had replied that he would send a communication to both Houses this day at twelve o'clock.

A Message, with accompanying documents, was then received from the President, by the hands of Mr. JOHN ADAMS, his private secretary, and was read at the Clerk's table. [For Message, see Senate Proceedings, p. 266.]

On motion of Mr. LATHROP, the Message and documents were referred to a Committee of the whole House, on the state of the Union, and six thousand copies ordered to be printed, for the use of the members.

MONDAY, December 18.

Emigration of Indians.

A resolution laid on the table by Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, on the 15th instant, was taken up, and read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House any information in his department, not heretofore communicated, in relation to the disposition of the several Indian tribes, within the United States, to emigrate west of the Mississippi; and whether there are any obstacles to their removal, known to the department; and, if so, his opinion as to the method best calculated to overcome them; and whether the teachers of schools now in operation among them, are favorable to the policy of their removal; and whether, in the event of an appropriation being made to defray the expense of such removal and settlement, there are any reasons to authorize the belief that they will co-operate in the measure."

Mr. VINTON moved to amend, by adding the following:

"Also, any information showing the progress any of said tribes have made in civilization, and particularly in the art of agriculture; what tribes have manifested a disposition to emigrate, and what, if any, are unwilling to do so, and their objections against the measure: whether they are acquainted with the nature and situation of the country to which they are to be removed; and to what particular district or districts of country west of the Mississippi, they ought, in his opinion, to be removed; whether they are willing to abandon the chase, and depend, for their subsistence, upon the pursuit of agriculture, and the arts of civilized life; whether they have been made clearly to understand the nature and form of the Government proposed to be instituted over them; whether the chiefs, head-men, and people, of the tribes, are willing to dissolve their existing political relations; whether they are willing the United States should create a Government over, and make laws for them; whether they are willing to change the tenure of their lands, and hold them in severalty; whether the tribes west of the Mississippi are willing the Indians in the States and Territories should be concentrated in their country; whether they are advised of the intentions and objects of the Government, and are also willing to come into its measures; whether there is good reason to believe the Indians now in the States and Territories will, upon removal, be able to provide for themselves the means of subsistence, without the aid of the Government; the probable annual expense of the necessary supplies of food, and the number of years such aid would be required; the probable annual expense of educating their children, and of the assistance and instruction necessary to be given them in agriculture and the arts; with an estimate of the probable annual expense of the Government proposed to be instituted over them, and of the military force necessary for the preservation of peace and the execution of the laws."

Mr. McLEAN was as desirous of obtaining every kind of information, having the remotest bearing on this subject, as any gentleman in the House; nor was it his wish to impede the inquiry asked by the gentleman from Ohio: at the same time, he would greatly prefer having the propositions of the gentleman, now proposed as an amendment, made the subject of an original and independent resolution. The gentleman could not but be aware, and so must the House be, generally, that much, nay, the far greater part, of the information desired is not in possession of the Department, and, of course, cannot be communicated. As to many of the points, every gentleman in the House was, probably, as well informed as the Department; they certainly possessed the same opportunity to become so. The resolution, as originally presented, contained sufficient inquiry to put Congress in possession of all that was necessary to enable them to judge whether any, and what, legislation was requisite. The gentleman from Ohio calls for a general history of the country, and of the Indian tribes; the military force required to guard it, and the total expense of gathering, preserving, and maintaining the tribes, when removed. There was, surely, no need of appending an inquiry of this extent to the simple proposition he had offered to the House. He, therefore, hoped the gentleman would consent to withdraw the amendment, and let the original resolution be passed by the House.

Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, thought that the propositions included in the amendment, were so numerous and so diversified, that the House could scarcely be in a state of preparation to vote upon them at this time. The subject would, ere long, come officially before the House, when they would be called to act on it with deliberation. The amendment was calculated to draw on a discussion, in which the merits of the general question would unavoidably be mixed up. He wished to avoid that discussion; and he, therefore, moved to lay the amendment, for the present, upon the table.

The Chair decided that this course would not be in order; if the amendment was laid on the table, the original resolution must be also.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, the resolution of Mr. McLEAN, with Mr. VINTON's amendment thereto, were both laid on the table.

Quapaw Indians.

The resolution laid on the table by Mr. VINTON, on the 15th instant, was taken up and read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the instructions to the commissioners for negotiating with the Quapaw nation of Indians the treaty of the 15th November, 1824; also, any correspondence or other information in the possession of the War Department, touching the present condition of said nation of Indians; and the measures, if any, that have been taken to alleviate their distresses."

Mr. VINTON then went somewhat at large into a statement of what he understood (mainly from the public prints) to be the present distressed condition of the Quapaw tribe, who were in pressing need of food, and in danger, many of them, of perishing, if aid was not speedily administered. In reply to a remark, that a call like that he had offered was unprecedented, he referred to an inquiry, very similar, ordered by the House last session, in regard to the Florida Indians; and of such importance was that inquiry, that the information it elicited, had resulted in the appropriation of $20,000 for the relief of that unhappy tribe, and had doubtless saved many of them from an untimely grave. It was possible that the present inquiry, if agreed to by the House, might issue in a similar desirable result.

Mr. CONWAY, of Arkansas, said, that the gentleman from Ohio was certainly premature in censuring the officers of Government, in Arkansas, before he knows that they have transcended their powers, or violated the instructions which they may have received from the Government, in relation to the Quapaw Indians. The treaty to which the gentleman refers (said Mr. C.) was made by the Secretary of the Territory, while acting as Governor—was ratified by the proper authorities, and an appropriation was made by Congress to carry it into effect. That appropriation, and instructions to apply it to the object for which it was intended, were placed in the hands of Governor Izard, and I presume, the provisions purchased for the use of the Quapaws, last Summer, were paid for out of that sum. What the instructions to the Commissioner (Mr. Crittenden) have to do with the sufferings of the Quapaws, I cannot conceive. His conduct was approved of by the Government, and I have never heard of his being censured in any other quarter. The Governor, too, has, I have no doubt, discharged his duties faithfully; and I must beg the gentleman from Ohio to suspend the sentence which he seems disposed to pass upon those officers, until his call is answered, when he will find that there is nothing in their conduct to disapprove. With these remarks in defence of the officers implicated, I am willing for the resolution to pass.

Mr. COOK said, in explanation, that he had not the least intention to prevent the inquiry as to the sufferings of these Indians, and their need of relief; but the resolution covered much wider grounds; it called for the President's instructions, given two years since, to the Commissioners appointed to negotiate the treaty. For this he could see no possible necessity;

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Encroachment on Choctaw Lands.

[H. OF R.]

the treaty had been executed; if the gentleman would modify his resolution, so as to omit this part of it, he would willingly vote for all the residue. As to providing relief for these Indians, if required, no one would be more ready than himself to vote for it.

Mr. C. moved to strike out the clause which went to ask for these instructions, and the motion prevailed—ayes 64, noes 44.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to by the House.

WEDNESDAY, December 20.

Encroachment on Choctaw Lands.

A resolution moved by Mr. HAILL, yesterday, and laid on the table for consideration, was taken up, and read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House any information in his possession, as to the number of white persons who have encroached upon the lands granted to the Choctaw nation of Indians, in Arkansas, in lieu of a part of their lands ceded to the United States on this side of the Mississippi; and also to state to this House, whether the Indians have remonstrated against this encroachment, to the Department of War, and whether the Indians consider their lands west of the Mississippi River, as granted to them for ever."

Mr. CONWAY moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word Resolved, and inserting as follows:

"That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House any information in his possession, as to the number of white persons living on the Choctaw lands in Arkansas, the period at which said persons settled on such lands, whether before or subsequent to the treaty made with said Indians, at Doak's Stand, in 1820; the extent of the improvements made by said settlers prior to said treaty; the quantity of land claimed by the Choctaws west of the Mississippi; and how much of said land lies in Arkansas, the number of the Choctaws living on said land; and whether the Choctaws in the State of Mississippi have, at any time, manifested a desire to emigrate to their western lands; and, if so, what has prevented their removal: and, also, to communicate to this House a copy of an order issued by the Secretary of War, on the 15th December, 1818, in relation to settlers on the lands now claimed by the Choctaws, west of the Mississippi; and any remonstrance which the Choctaws may have made in relation to the encroachments of the whites upon their lands."

Mr. HAILL objected to the amendment, as a substitute for his resolution. Distinct inquiries, he said, were sought for in his resolution, that were not embraced in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas. He wished his resolution to pass in its present shape. It was with reluctance he appeared before the House to sustain the resolution now under consideration. But the interest of the State he had the honor to represent, imperiously demanded that he should vindicate its rights. Mr. H. stated, he had no disposition to interfere with the people of Arkansas, further than duty imposed the necessity upon him. The subjects of inquiry embraced in the resolution (said he) are calculated to awaken public attention, and ought to elicit the feelings of this House. It is rumored that the whites have encroached upon the Choctaw lands in Arkansas; information is sought for on this subject. The Government should interfere to protect the Indians from further encroachment. It may be asked, What has the State of Mississippi to do in the affairs of Arkansas? What right has she to interfere in this business? The answer is plain, and will clearly convince every unprejudiced person that these encroachments militate against her rights. The removal of the Indians from her chartered limits is retarded. The persons lately authorized to hold treaties with the Indians within her limits, I understand, have failed to make a purchase. I am unable to discover the causes that produced this failure—a failure deeply regretted by every citizen of that State. It must, therefore, be evident to this House, that any encroachment upon the Choctaw lands, west of the river Mississippi, must be calculated to retard the removal of those Indians. A country was given to these Indians as an equivalent for the cession of their lands to the United States, on this side of the Mississippi River. That country was pointed out to them by Generals Jackson and Hinds as desirable, and one that they could guarantee to them forever by treaty. If a treaty has been entered into with these Indians, it ought to be fulfilled. If a covenant has been entered into, it ought to be religiously kept. Treaties between nations ought to be sacred. Nothing, said Mr. H., will add so great a glory to this Republic, as an inviolable fidelity in our engagements with the Indians. Sir, said Mr. H., it is the policy of this Government to concentrate, as fast as she can, her white population; to remove the Indian tribes, for their preservation, west of the Mississippi, and to establish some form of government over them. But can the General Government expect that the Indians, within the chartered limits of the State of Mississippi, will remove west of the river Mississippi, unless they are convinced that the country already assigned them will be guaranteed, and that they will be protected from intrusion? If these encroachments are permitted, the Indians will be fastened upon us without the hope of removal. If they are encroached upon on the west bank, and a surrender of the lands which have been granted to them demanded by the United States; if, instead of meeting with protection, they meet with aggression; they will never remove. They will never abandon their possessions on this side of the Mississippi. Who will sow, if another is to come and reap the harvest? What could influence any man to emigrate, if he is told his residence will be temporary, and that another will inevitably dispossess him of his right? These things have had their influence with the Indians, and no doubt many have been deterred from removing to the West. Mr. H. stated, in conclusion, that no State suffered so much inconvenience from Indian tribes, within their chartered limits, as the State of Mississippi. Any causes, whatever, that operate to retard the removal of these Indians, and prevent the acquisition of their lands, are injurious to her prosperity and advancement.

Mr. CONWAY said he offered this amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi, not for the purpose of defeating his object in making the call, but for the purpose of gaining information on some points not named in the original resolution. It is true, as the gentleman states, that the State of Mississippi is interested in this subject; for it was at the instance of the Delegation in Congress from that State, that a tract of country, west of the Mississippi, as large, he believed, as the State of Mississippi itself, was ceded to the Choctaws by the treaty of 1820. On the lands ceded by that treaty, there were settled prior to the treaty, by the implied permission of the late President of the United States, as well as he could recollect, about three hundred and seventy-five families, who certainly were not trespassers upon the rights of the Choctaws; because they settled on the lands previous to the treaty. When it was made known to the people of Arkansas that the treaty of 1820 ceded lands to the Indians, inhabited by our citizens, they petitioned the President of the United States to repurchase those lands; and an appropriation was made by Congress to enable him to comply with their wishes. In the negotiation with the Indians, it was found that they were willing to sell only a part of the lands; leaving, he believed, about four and a half millions of acres of Indian lands still in the Territory, on which there are two or three thousand citizens, who were ordered by the Secretary of War to leave the lands; but who, by permission of the Indians, continue to occupy their improvements. The Indians allowed them to remain as tenants, saying that, when they moved over to their lands, they should want corn, and the people of Arkansas could make it for them. There is, at this time, before the Committee on the Public Lands, a subject connected with this, upon which the committee wants information, and which information is called for by the proposed amendment. After this explanation of my object, in proposing the amendment, (said Mr. C.,) I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will accept of it as a modification of his own resolution. The people of Arkansas have no desire to violate the treaty with the Choctaws. They occupied the country before it belonged to those Indians, and have not, since the treaty was made, to my knowledge, encroached upon the Indians.

Mr. HAYL finally modified his resolution, by appending thereto the amendment proposed by Mr. CONWAY.

Mr. WOODE then proposed to amend that part of the modified resolution, which consisted of the part originally proposed by Mr. CONWAY, by inserting after the words, "What has prevented their removal," the words, "and whether they are at this time willing to emigrate." This amendment was agreed to.

And the resolution, as thus modified and amended, was adopted by the House.

Georgia Militia Claims.

Mr. VANCE, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, acting under the order of the committee, moved to discharge that committee from the further consideration of the subject of the Georgia Militia Claims, and to refer it to a Select Committee.

Mr. DRAYTON moved to amend the motion by substituting the Committee of Claims for a Select Committee.

Mr. WEBSTER asked for the reasons which had induced the Military Committee to direct such a motion to be made.

Mr. VANCE replied, that the main reason was, that the subject of those claims was not one of which that committee properly had cognizance. When this matter had been referred to them, at a former session, the committee made the same objection; but the inquiry had been, nevertheless, put upon them, in express violation, as he apprehended, of a standing rule of the House, which rule he would send to the Chair, that it might be read at the Clerk's table. The rule is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to take into consideration all subjects relating to the Military Establishment and public defence, which may be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon; and also to report, from time to time, such measures as may contribute to economy and accountability in the said establishment."

Mr. FORSYTH hoped that the motion would not prevail, but that the House would insist on the Military Committee's taking cognizance of this subject, and reporting on it to the House. At the last session, an honorable colleague of his had moved that the claims might be referred to a Select Committee; but his motion had been refused, and on the express ground, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, in his place, (Mr. McCoy,) that there was more weight and importance attached to the report of a Standing Committee of the House than to that of a Select Committee. Reports of Select Committees were almost always in favor of the measure which was referred to them—their friends being usually placed on such committees. At the last Congress this subject had been referred to the Military Committee; and so, too, at the last session of the present Congress, he hoped it would take the same direction. All that the members from Georgia desired, was a fair and impartial report—such as might satisfy the mind of every member.

On the question of reference, a desultory debate arose, in which Messrs. VANCE, DRAYTON, and HOUSTON, advocated the motion to discharge the Military Committee, and Messrs. WESTER, MCCOY, WHITTLESSEY, and FORSYTH, took the opposite side.

DECEMBER, 1836.]

Memory of Deceased Members.

[H. OF R.]

The members of the Committee on Military Affairs insisted that the question on which the decision of the claim rested, was not of a military, but rather of a legal character. It was, in fact, simply this: whether the services in question were rendered in fulfilment of the Convention of 1803, between the United States and the State of Georgia, or not. If they were, that State had no right to come to the United States for remuneration; if they were not, she had. The history was given of the several references of this subject in the House, from 1803, to the present time—the discussion of it in 1806 and 1816, and for the last eight or ten years. In order to report upon it understandingly, a mass of documents must be examined, extending back to the year 1794—a task more suited to a Chancellor than to a plain committee of military men. The consideration of such a subject was plainly excluded from the standing rule of the House specifying the duties of the Military Committee. This was not a subject which “related to the Military Establishment of the United States, or to the public defence;” its decision would neither advance nor retard the interests of either. Its happening to be a claim in which military officers were interested, did not give a military character to the nature of the claim itself; it was a question of right—a question of law, and of the construction of public instruments, rather than of military matters. It was, in all respects, a fit substitute for the Committee of Claims, or rather for the Committee on the Judiciary.

On the other side, it was contended that it was competent to the House to send a particular subject to any committee it might think proper, and that such act superseded the standing rule, and gave the committee full power, whatever the rule might say. That similar claims had been committed to the Military Committee, and they were in the habit of reporting on them; and, as an instance, the Massachusetts claims were quoted. That committee had had this subject three different times before them, and must be well acquainted with the facts and principles involved in it. The Committee of Claims were already overburdened, &c.

The question was first put on discharging the Committee on Military Affairs, and was decided in the negative. So the subject was continued with the Military Committee.

THURSDAY, December 21.

Memory of Deceased Members.

Mr. METCALFE, of Kentucky, observed that he had risen to offer a resolution, which he would have offered at a much earlier period of the session, but that he, with others of his colleagues, had been under the impression that it was not customary for this House to adopt this testimonial of respect for such of its members as departed this life during the recess. Upon inquiry, however, he had ascertained that custom did, in some instances, sanction the measure: of that custom he begged leave to avail himself. Mr. M. said that, in submitting the resolution which he then had the honor to do, for the consideration of the House, it was not his intention to trespass on its time or attention, by an attempted eulogy on the character of his late distinguished colleague and much respected friend, then no more. Were he, with all the advantages of the most ample preparation, to make such an attempt, he was well aware of the entire inadequacy of his powers to do even partial justice to an individual, whose exalted public and private worth so justly ranked him among the most meritorious of his countrymen. Unprepared, then, as I am, (said Mr. M.,) and unfitted for such a task, and doubting the propriety of such an indulgence here, I will decline any attempt to bring into view, and exhibit before you, the peculiarly bright and useful traits of character of that eminently worthy and talented patriot, whose voice in behalf of his country so lately gained him the attention and high respect of the Members of this House. Let it be sufficient, that, though the dust of ROBERT P. HENRY now sleeps with that of his fathers, he still lives in the hearts of thousands and tens of thousands of his countrymen—of all, and greatly more than all, of those who, like me, had the pleasure of knowing him personally; and that I respectfully ask the Members of this House to concur with me in this humble, this last tribute of respect to his memory.

On motion of Mr. M. it was then

Resolved, unanimously, That the Members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of Robert P. Henry, deceased, late a Member of this House, from the State of Kentucky, by wearing crape on the left arm for one month.

Mr. MOHATTON then addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I offer a resolution to the House, similar to the one just offered, expressive of the respect of the Members of this body for the memory of Colonel JAMES JOHNSON, late one of the Representatives of Kentucky. He was no ordinary man. His amiable manners, his mild and benevolent disposition, his sound sense, and untiring devotion to his legislative duties while here, has made a lasting impression on all who knew him. In peace, he was a good citizen; in war, a brave and efficient soldier. At the battle of the river Thames, it was his fortune to obtain, by his courage and good conduct, a fame as durable as time itself. He is now gone. All that is left is the recollection of his virtues. His remains are in the silent grave; but patriotism and all the manly virtues linger at its verge, and pay the tribute of a tear to his departed worth.

[Mr. METCALFE explained the reason why he had not included his late colleague, and most estimable friend, in the resolution which he had offered, and in the remarks which he had made in relation to R. P. HENRY. It was because of the opinion which, he understood, had been expressed, that a resolution in reference to Col. JAMES JOHNSON would come more appropriately from his respectable successor. It would have afforded him great pleasure to accept his name in the resolution, and include him in the remarks which he had made, if that course had been advisable or proper. That not being the case, he should be happy to vote for the proposition in the form of a separate resolution.]

On motion of Mr. MOH. it was then

Resolved, unanimously, That the Members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of James Johnson, deceased, late a Member of this House, from the State of Kentucky, by wearing crape on the left arm for one month.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, it was also Resolved, unanimously, That the Members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of Henry P. Wilson, deceased, late a member of this House, from the State of Pennsylvania, by wearing crape on the left arm for one month.

TUESDAY, December 26.

Western Armory.

Mr. McHATTON moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to appoint three Commissioners to survey and examine the Horse-Shoe Bend, upon Licking River, in the county of Pendleton, in the State of Kentucky; and if, upon such survey and examination, the same shall be found suitable, to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be erected, at the Horse-Shoe Bend aforesaid, a National Armory, similar to those already erected at Springfield and Harper's Ferry: that they report the same to the Secretary of War, who shall, early at the next session of Congress, report the same to this House."

The House determined to consider the resolution.

Mr. McHATTON, in support of his motion, said, it was a subject in which his constituents felt a deep interest. I am, Mr Speaker, (said Mr. MOH.), little accustomed to public speaking, in a deliberative body; but I hope I shall be allowed the privilege of explaining the great and important objects I have in view in the resolution I have called up. It is to arm, when necessity requires it, the militia, which is the natural safeguard of our liberties. You have, already, in part, acted upon the principles which I, sir, wish to see extended: you have established an Armory at Springfield, from which, if occasion requires it, you may arm the militia of the North and East: a similar establishment at Harper's Ferry, Virginia, guarantees to the Middle and Southern States a supply of arms when necessary; and, it seems pretty generally agreed, that a like work is required to the West. The only difficulty is, the spot where it is to be established. During the late war, the difficulty of procuring arms was greater than that of obtaining soldiers: indeed, it will not soon be forgotten, that, at New Orleans, the American troops were partly without arms, and had to obtain from the inhabitants of that city, their fowling pieces. Let us, in future, have it in our power to arm our citizens, upon all emergencies. My predecessor, Col. James Johnson, introduced a resolution to establish an Armory upon the Western waters, at a place called the Horse-Shoe Bend, upon Licking River, in Pendleton county, Kentucky; and I will here state, that his knowledge of water works, together with his mechanical genius, entitled his opinions, upon subjects of that character, to great respect. He was brave and magnanimous on the field of battle: with the choicest troops of Kentucky, himself their commander, he made a charge upon the British lines, at the memorable battle of the Thames, and immortalized himself no less by his bravery, than by his humanity to the conquered invincibles of Europe. With the same indefatigable industry, and unremitting attention, he advocated, in the Congress of the United States, the establishment of an Armory at that place; and, sir, I hesitate, and doubt my own abilities to do this subject justice, when I reflect that almost the last intelligible words he was heard to utter, upon his death-bed, were, to have an Armory upon Licking. He had this matter at heart, and felt the importance of it, for the benefit and protection of the West. Yes, Mr. Speaker; when we reflect upon the situation of the soldiers under the command of General Jackson, at the battle of New Orleans, where part of the troops lacked arms to protect the city—when "booty and beauty" was the watch-word of the enemy, then it was that we saw our want of an Armory in the Western country; and, although we now have peace, our rights may be again invaded, and you may find it absolutely necessary to have an Armory established somewhere in the West. And, inasmuch as the God of Nature regulates the atmosphere for the health of the inhabitants, and the good of the body politic, so it seems to me that nature designed that spot, namely, the Horse-Shoe Bend, for the proposed purpose. That site is most eligibly situated: with almost three hundred acres of level land within the Bend; with deep ravines inside of said Bend, running south and north, until within one hundred yards of uniting, precisely at the place where the canal must be dug. Independent of that, there is a rich fertile bottom, on both sides of the river, well adapted for cultivation, and a more salubrious country never fell to the lot of man. There are hills heavily timbered; and, in the bowels of the earth, in the vicinity, stone coal and iron ore is to be had; with the advantages of the navigation of the said river, only twenty-six miles to the Ohio, and last, only eight miles to the same river. There is, also, the advantage of navigation, by the Ohio,

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Western Armory.

[H. OF R.]

to New Orleans, and the anticipated benefits of the Ohio Canal, towards Canada and the Lakes; and, if it become necessary to guard either of these points, we have the advantage of those streams. It is, also, situated near the frontiers of three States, Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana, where materials can be had on as good terms, and of as good quality, as at any other place in the United States, and labor is as cheap. All these considerations give Kentucky a claim to a National Armory at this favorable site. What is Kentucky, and what are her claims? She is the daughter of the old and patriotic State of Virginia. She did not tarnish the reputation of her mother, in the late war, but acquitted herself with honor, and gained laurels as imperishable as time itself. Then, as our parent State, Virginia, has been first served, we hope she will be kind to her legitimate daughter, Kentucky, and extend the parental hand of friendship to our State, who stands, I hope, second to none in the Union, for her patriotism and valor. Let some attention, therefore, be given to her claims, and, inasmuch as she has been a dutiful child, let not merit go unrewarded. Has Kentucky been nursed? No, sir; she was never rocked in the cradle of ease, but on the other hand, in the cradle of danger and difficulty. In her infancy, she encountered the savage, drove him from the forest, and that, too, with the loss of many brave citizens. And now, she asks for an Armory upon her waters, in which all the people of these United States will be equally benefited. If she has an eligible site, will she be denied? I hope not. And, Mr. Speaker, were you, or any member of this honorable body, to visit the spot, you would, in my opinion, agree with me, that nature formed it for the express purpose. My predecessor had it levelled and surveyed, by Mr. Macarty, an accurate mathematician; and the county surveyor for Scott county, Mr. John Ewing, at my request, a few days before I left home, examined the situation, and both agree in the general opinion that it possesses prominent advantages. Therefore, all I ask of the House, and which I think they will grant me, is to have Engineers appointed to examine it; and I ask this favor in my own name, in the name of my constituents, and in the name of the good people of these United States.

Mr. MOLL here added sundry observations on the topographical situation of the place; and concluded by again urging the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COCKE observed, in reply, that many of the gentleman's observations were at war with the language of his resolution: the one referring the subject to a committee of this House, the other giving it in charge of the Secretary of War. It never was the intention of Government to erect more than one Armory in the West; and, by the resolution, as it now stood, all other situations which might lay a claim, as suitable, for the Armory, are humbled, at the feet of this "Horse-shoe Bend."

Mr. McHATTON said it had been his intention to modify his resolution, so as to obviate this objection. He begged to assure the gentleman from Tennessee, and all others, that he had no wish for exclusive rights: his constituents did not seek them: they only wished that equal justice should be done to all. He had no objections to any other examinations that gentleman might propose, or any other gentleman. He only desired to be placed on a footing of equality. He accordingly modified his resolution, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of War to employ one or more skilful engineers to examine the Horse-Shoe Bend, on Licking River, in Pendleton county, in the State of Kentucky, and to report on the fitness of that place as a site for a National Armory, similar to the Armories of the United States at Springfield and Harper's Ferry.

Mr. COCKE then said, that many remarks he had intended to make, were superseded by the modification which the gentleman had now made. He also had every disposition to accommodate the wishes of others, on this subject. It was for the interest of the Union at large, that every spot, having pretensions to be made the site of such an establishment, should be fully and impartially examined. As to the complaint of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the Engineers had not extended their examination far enough, it was, unquestionably, well founded. The same complaints had been made elsewhere. A large section of the country which he had himself the honor to represent, was in precisely the same situation. Application had, again and again, been made to the War Department, to have a survey made of east Tennessee and the western part of Virginia, with a view to this subject; but it has not yet been done. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman would take in good part an amendment which he should now move, viz., to insert in the resolution he had offered, the words, "and also the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers, as far as the falls of the latter."

Mr. McHATTON accepted this as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. MARBLE then moved a further amendment, in the following words:

"Also the site on the Narrows, at Harpeth, (as suggested by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee,) on the Cumberland River."

Mr. M. said the Legislature of Tennessee had offered as a gratuity to the United States, some ten or twenty thousand acres of land, around the spot that body desired to be made the site of the contemplated Armory; land abounding with every requisite to fit it for such a use. She offered more mines, more wood, more water, more mechanic power, than any of her competitors; and if so, he asked that her claim might be attended to. For himself, he had never yet been called a beggar, nor should he now place himself in such an attitude before the House.

What he asked, and all he asked, was justice merely.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, observed, that the resolution to which these various amendments were proposed, had come very unexpectedly into the House, and some members were possibly taken by surprise. He believed there were several who wished to present to the House the arguments in favor of sites in their respective districts: in order to afford to gentlemen so situated some further opportunity to prepare themselves, he moved that the resolution and amendments lie for the present upon the table.

The motion prevailed, and they were laid on the table accordingly.

Free Negroes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to inquire whether there be in force, in the said District, any law which authorizes the imprisonment of any free man of color, being a citizen of any of the United States, and his sale, as an unclaimed slave, for jail fees and other charges; and, if so, to inquire into the expediency of repealing the same.

Mr. WARD said he was impelled no less by a sense of duty than by an obligation to obey the instructions of the citizens of the county of West Chester, which composed a part of the district he had the honor to represent. It will be recollected, sir, (said he,) that Gilbert Horton, a free man of color, and a citizen of that county and of the State of New York, was imprisoned some time during the last summer, in this city, under an old law of the State of Maryland, and was advertised, and would have been sold as a slave to pay his jail fees, under that law, (which it seems now forms a part of the code of this District,) but for the prompt interference of the citizens of that county, at whose solicitation it became the subject of a correspondence between the Executive of the United States and the Executive of the State of New York. I hold it, sir, to be the duty of every Representative on this floor, to guard and protect the rights of the citizens of this Union, so far as those rights may come within the authority delegated to Congress by the constitution, and therefore do not deem it necessary to apologize for bringing this subject under the consideration of this House; but from the members individually, I crave their indulgence whilst I offer the few observations which force themselves on my mind. Whatever the law is, and wherever its origin, it could only have been intended to apply to fugitive slaves; any other application of it would be at variance with the sacred constitution of the land, and void in itself. That it is unconstitutional, is virtually, if not expressly declared by the 8d article and 2d section of the Constitution of the United States, by which it will be seen that a free citizen cannot, without a trial, and without the allegation of a crime, be condemned to servitude for life. The section referred to provides that "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trials shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

The 4th, 5th, and 6th articles of the amendments of that charter, define more particularly the absolute rights of persons, and secure to every free citizen, whatever may be his complexion, the right of personal security, personal liberty, and private property. These articles declare as follows:

"ART. 4. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

"ART. 5. No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

"ART. 6. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial Jury of the State or District wherein the crime shall have been committed, which District shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

And, sir, by the fourth article and second section of the same instrument, it will be seen that this law is also in violation of State Rights. The words of the constitution, are: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

I might add, that the continuance of such a law in that portion of the nation especially confided to the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, would be no less impolitic than adverse to the motives which conceded this jurisdiction. It was certainly never intended, that the little space of ten miles square should be the grave of rights, so clearly defined by the constitution; and it could still less have been expected, that the wisdom of Congress would have suffered a law, so unjust in its operation, to have stained the records of her courts.

That its continuance would be impolitic, is proved by its repeal by the very State which enacted it, and might be easily exemplified, in supposing the State of New York wills, as a retaliatory measure, to refuse to surrender fugitive slaves from the District. For, sir, the violation of a right is the same, whether made in the face of law, or under the sanction or color of a law violating the Magna Charta of the nation.

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Free Negroes in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

The law, sir, is unjust, because the imprisonment was not for a crime nor for a debt; and, the mere circumstance of his not being claimed as a slave, could not strip the free man of color of his privileges as a citizen of the free and independent State of New York, and create a debt to which no free act of his had contributed. But, sir, were it otherwise, and could a demand be raised against him by the arbitrary turn of the jailer's key, I ask, and I ask it emphatically, what civilized country, in this enlightened age, permits the sale of the person of the debtor, to satisfy the rapacity of the creditor? None.

Is a free citizen, then, because his color happens to be dark, to be less protected by the laws than the poor debtor, in the fangs of a merciless creditor?

Is he to be deprived of the privilege of visiting your capital, lest some tip staff should plunge him into a dungeon, to speculate on his liberties, or to bind him to the car of slavery? Would not such a system equally place in jeopardy the privileges of the East Indian and of the citizens of many nations in amity with this, as the poor sun-stricken outcasts of Africa? Shall we longer suffer this unconstitutional, this disgraceful offspring of policy, long since repudiated by the enlightened and honorable State of Maryland, to cling, as an excrescence, on the code of this our District?

The jurisprudence of this District, sir, ought to be exhibited to this country and to the world without a stain; its object should be, not to oppress, but to vindicate the rights of freemen; and, if there is a spot on earth where those rights should be held sacred, that place is the District of Columbia.

I hope, sir, that this House will adopt the resolution, and that it will, at an early day, command the serious attention of the committee.

Mr. HALE moved that the resolution be laid on the table and printed.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. FOSTER said, that he had listened with attention to the address of the gentleman from New York, and, if the position taken by him was a correct one, there could be no need of the inquiry proposed by his resolution. He had set out with declaring that no such law as that referred to is constitutional. If so, the law was of course without obligation, and the inquiry respecting it unnecessary. Any law made in violation of the constitution was nugatory. The constitution itself, so long as it endures, is a sufficient protection for the State of New York and of every other State. Why, then, urge an inquiry on a subject of this peculiar character, which would lead only to irritating, painful, and useless discussion? While he was up, he would take the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the extraordinary doctrine which had been advanced in this House this morning, and which had, for some time past, been advocated in various parts of the country; that a Governor of one State of the Union may rightfully be called upon to protect the citizens of that State when in other States. This doctrine, he said, was novel. What had the State of New York to do with the law in question, or any decisions under it, more than any other State of the Union? Was any thing to be found in the constitution giving to the Executive of one State a right to interfere in the transactions within another State? It was true, he might go as far as to demand the restoration of a fugitive who had taken refuge within another State, but no farther. It was the very design of the constitution to prevent the necessity of such interference. It erects courts and constitutes the law. It is itself the lex scripta, for the protection of all. This is the proper recourse of any who have suffered wrong. He hoped this subject would be regulated, as it should be, when the House came to consider that part of the President's Message which recommends a revision of the laws of this District, with a reference to introducing the Penitentiary system. It was a proper subject for the investigation of a committee of this House, and, for one, he sincerely hoped that such committee would probe the laws of the District to the bottom, and, if they contained any thing cruel or oppressive, that it might be exposed and remedied. So far as any amelioration in those laws were needed, he hoped it would be made, and that no injustice would be suffered to remain: but in the meanwhile he trusted they should not be vexed with an examination, in this hall, in relation to persons under peculiar circumstances coming into those States where slavery was tolerated, as, from the very nature of the case, it could not lead to any good result, but would excite much unpleasant feeling, which would be better avoided.

Mr. HAMILTON rose to address the Chair; when

The Speaker arrested the farther discussion of the resolution, the hour allotted by the rule of the House to the consideration of resolutions having passed.

WEDNESDAY, December 27.

The resolution offered by Mr. WARD, of New York, yesterday, was again taken up.

Mr. HAMILTON said that he did not know that the House or himself had any occasion to regret that he did not yesterday obtain the floor, when the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD,] was under discussion, as that gentleman had been pleased to preface his resolution with a series of remarks, which, at least, in this stage of the inquiry, he thought both gratuitous and inflammatory, and were calculated to have led to an excitement to which he did not then desire to contribute, nor would now provoke. He was, therefore, not disposed to oppose the passage of the resolution: for, if there had been any oppression in this District to any individual, contrary to law, he, for one, was willing that it should be exposed.

He would, therefore, refrain from now discussing the questions involved in the resolution, as it seemed to him more appropriate to do so when the Committee on the District of Columbia should report on the resolution itself, should they discover the evil complained of by the gentleman, or adopt all his views as to its remedy. With this feeling, he said, he would not stop to expose the fallacy of that part of the gentleman's argument which he presumed was technically to be considered its argumentatæ portion; nor could he trespass on the patience of the House by indulging in any criticism on the rhetorical part of his discourse, because he presumed that all the poetry and philanthropy of this was served up for the instruction and entertainment of the Representatives of twelve slave-holding States and territories in that House. He would not, therefore, be so ungrateful as to reject what might have been intended as a "compliment of the season." But he trusted the gentleman would pardon him for assuring him that, whenever he was desirous of gratifying them with the pathos of a certain ballad, entitled "the sun-stricken outcasts of Africa," he might save himself some trouble, by finding at his hands in the Della Crusca Album of some boarding-school miss, much prettier verses than these. But, sir, said he, let this pass. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Whenever the Committee on the District of Columbia report, I may have some more suitable occasion afforded me of applying some of the philanthropic oratory of the gentleman of New York to the great State he has the honor to represent, either as matter of curious speculation, or one of practical utility.

Mr. MINER then offered several resolutions as an amendment to the resolution of Mr. WARD, the object of which was, that the committee should also inquire into the expediency of the gradual abolition of slavery in this District. Mr. M. said, that he was induced to offer these resolutions by way of amendment, not by any momentary excitement of feeling, but from a deliberate sense of duty.

The Speaker decided that the resolutions were not admissible as an amendment, being in themselves distinct and independent resolutions, which had no connection with that under consideration by the House. They would be in order, if offered as separate resolutions, and at the proper time. He ordered them, however, to be read by the clerk, for the information of the House.

Mr. BRENT objected to their being read at all, unless read for the purpose of consideration by the House. If the consideration was out of order, so must the reading be also.

Mr. MINER then said, he had supposed that, as they related to the same general subject as the resolution before the House, they might have been added to it, and all considered together: but as this was not the case, he had no wish to violate the order of the House, and would withdraw the resolutions.

They were accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. LETCHER said, from the hasty examination which he had given to the resolution now before the House, he had no hesitation in expressing his opinion that there was no sort of necessity for its reference to a committee. He did not think it presented a fit subject of legislation. It is not alleged that there is any law in existence in this District in relation to free men of color, which ought to be repealed or modified; but it is asserted, by the mover of the resolution, that, if any statute does exist, under which Gilbert Horton has been injured or oppressed, that it is unconstitutional and void. The case, then, of the individual mentioned in the resolution, is one for the courts, not for this House. His redress at law is full and complete, and to the proper tribunal let him appeal, and have his remedy. Believing this resolution may, by possibility, bring up a delicate subject, and by its discussion, produce unnecessary excitement, I move to lay it upon the table.

The question being put on Mr. LETCHER'S motion, it was negatived, ayes 64, noes 90. So the House refused to lay Mr. WARD'S resolution on the table.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, that he was led to the conclusion that no such law existed in the District of Columbia, as the resolution referred to. Abuses, no doubt, might have happened under the law which did exist, and he thought it very probable they had. The law in the District declared, (and it was in this respect not different from the law which was to be found in every slave-holding State, and in some States not slave-holding,) that persons of color found loitering without employment, and supposed to be runaway slaves, might be apprehended and imprisoned. It was under this law, he presumed, that the individual to whose case the gentleman from New York alluded, had been taken up. He was found within the District without any evidence of his freedom, and he was taken up, and imprisoned till such evidence could be obtained. It was obtained from the State of New York, and he was immediately set at liberty. Such he believed to have been the state of the facts, and he thought the statement ought to be made for the information of the House. If any amendment in the laws of this District was needed, or if any abuses had taken place, (points he would not undertake to decide,) the object aimed at by the gentleman from New York could as well be attained by directing a committee to revise those laws, and report such alterations to this House as they might deem expedient and proper. But the discussion of the subject, as presented by the gentleman's resolution, was calculated to rouse feelings and produce an excitement which it would be difficult to repress. He deprecated such a state of feeling: he had no wish to see the Missouri question brought back into this House. If the laws needed amendment, let them be amended; but let not the House go on in the supposition that certain laws existed which were nowhere to be found. With these views, Mr. W. moved to amend the resolution by striking out, after the word "Resolved," and inserting, "That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws in force in said District," upon the subject of apprehending and confining in jail fugitive slaves.

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Free Negroes in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. DORSEY said, there is a law authorizing a free person of color, arrested as a runaway, and as such committed, to be sold for his prison fees, and the reward allowed by law to those who arrest such persons. It was the law of Maryland, and, as such, was adopted as the law of the District, for Washington county. Among the very earliest laws of Maryland, when manumission of slaves was not permitted, it was enacted, in 1715, that negroes, who should be arrested as runaways, should be committed to the custody of the sheriff of the county; that those who arrested such persons should receive, as a reward for so doing, the sum of 200 pounds of tobacco, and that the county courts should dispose of those who should be arrested, and if free, if they could not pay the reward and fees to the jailer, then they should be sold into bondage, to discharge those expenses incidental to their arrest. In 1719, the power vested in the county courts under the act of 1715, was transferred to the sheriff. The principle assumed in this act of legislation, predicated upon the then existing state of society, was, that all persons of color were presumed to be slaves. In 1791, the Legislature prescribed a rule of conduct for the sheriff, directing the notice to be given by the sheriff, of the commitment of runaways. Somewhere about the year 1786 or '8, the Legislature passed a law legalizing manumission; yet the same principle of presumption, that all persons of color were slaves until the contrary appeared, regulated the decisions of the law officers of the State, till 1810, when Judge Scott decided that he would discharge all persons brought before him as runaways, unless they were proved to be such. This decision, and the ill-directed efforts of certain societies, impelled by the purest motives, produced an apprehension that this kind of property was very insecure, and the Legislature, in 1810, passed a law in conformity to the principle of presumption existing before then, against the person of color, and directing the judge to commit unless he should be satisfied that the negro was entitled to his freedom. The progress of emancipation was astonishing; the State became crowded with a free black population, and the Legislature varied its law, and adapted it to the altered condition of its population: for, in 1817, they provided that if no owner should claim the negro committed, that then the jailer should carry him before a judge, who, if he was not satisfied that he was free, then he should remand him for a certain time; and if not claimed in that time, that then the judge should order him to be discharged, and his fees to be taxed on the county, thus displaying a commendable vigilance for the slave-holder, and the cause of humanity, so far as the existing state of society would permit; and although I come from a slave-holding district, I can see no inconvenience in referring this inquiry to a committee.

Mr. WOODS said, the course proposed by the resolution was usual and proper. When a member wished to turn the attention of any of the committees of the House to any subject which he deemed important, the ordinary course was for him to offer a resolution proposing that such a committee inquire into that subject. This was the mode every day pursued, and why not take the same course in the present case? After the committee shall have made the examination, stated by the resolution, they will report what are the facts: if such a law does exist, they will say so; and if not, they will say so. We find that different opinions exist about the matter among the members of this House: then let a committee investigate, and tell us what the truth is.

The resolution might, and probably would, have passed without a word of remark or opposition; but the mover chose to accompany it with some remarks which he deemed pertinent to the subject. This he had a perfect right to do, and it was not censurable: but the House had been told that the remarks were of an inflammatory character. For himself, he could not think so. If the gentleman from New York approached a magazine with a lighted candle, it certainly became him to look to his steps, and to tread with caution: but if other gentlemen, those who were nearest to the magazine, and who stood round it, to guard it, should themselves elicit sparks, who had they to blame if an explosion should happen? He could see nothing improper in the resolution, or in the remarks which had accompanied it, and he hoped it would pass.

Mr. WRIGHT said, that, if he correctly understood the resolution which had been offered by the gentleman from New York, he was in favor of that resolution, and opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE here interposed, and said, that he might, possibly, save the gentleman from Ohio some trouble by informing him, that he was willing now to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT then expressed his hope that the resolution would be adopted by the House. All it proposed was, to inquire whether a law did or did not exist, within the District of Columbia, by which an officer was empowered to apprehend (not a slave, but) a free man; and, if such a law actually does exist, whether it ought not to be amended. Would any gentleman say that this was not a subject of deep interest? Of interest, not only to the District, but to the whole Union? He believed there was not a gentleman on that floor who would deny this: and, if so, why should not the House proceed in the inquiry? They had been told that the inquiry was of an irritating character, and calculated to excite angry discussion. But why should this be so? What was there in this subject to produce so much excitement? If some gentlemen chose to lash themselves into excitement with regard to it, was that a reason why the House should not proceed in so reasonable and proper an inquiry? Has not the House a perfect right to inquire into the subject, and to legislate upon it? It became them to inquire and to act. The excitement about which gentlemen talked, was no reason why inquiry was to be arrested. It was the duty of the House to proceed in its duty with calmness, and not to be prevented from performing it by the excited feelings of any. The observations of the gentleman from New York had been characterized as inflammatory; for his own part he felt no such effect from them: he could not perceive what there was in them to inflame any body: they were such as naturally grew out of the subject of the resolution. He hoped the committee would be directed to make the inquiry; and, if the evil complained of did exist, he hoped they would point it out, together with its proper remedy.

Mr. POWELL (from the Committee on the District of Columbia) said he was at a loss to see how any excitement could grow out of the resolution, in its present shape: there was surely no necessity for any warmth of feeling, or any protracted discussion. For his own part, he believed there was no direct opposition to the resolution. He had not heard any gentleman attempt to maintain that the resolution ought not to pass; nor did he think there was a single person who was of that opinion. For himself, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, he should vote for the resolution; and, if it passed, he was prepared to give his earnest attention to the duty it enjoined.

Mr. BRENT said he was sorry he was not of the same opinion with the gentleman who had just taken his seat. But he could not, and would not, vote for the resolution as it now stood. It was calculated only to excite angry debate and irritated feelings. Even the gentleman from Ohio, who professed to see nothing of this kind in it, had himself exhibited signs of that very feeling. If the gentleman who had introduced the resolution, would consent so to modify it as to omit the words "being a citizen of any of the States," he would then vote for it; because he should consider the most objectionable part of it as removed.

Mr. WARD expressed his willingness to accept of such a modification; and the resolution was modified accordingly.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he was sorry the gentleman from New York had accepted the modification. He thought the resolution, as it now stood, decidedly more exceptionable than it could be regarded as it was originally presented. He was perfectly willing, for his own part, to extend to the citizens of all the States, whatever might be their color, any and every privilege to which such citizens are entitled. Whether any particular description of persons are "citizens of the United States," might be a question; but, when the Representative of a State alleges on this floor, that the liberty of a citizen of that State has been violated by the laws of a district over which Congress holds exclusive jurisdiction, it is the undoubted and sacred right of the person so claiming to be a citizen, to be heard through his Representative. The proposed inquiry ought, therefore, to be instituted upon principles of the most obvious justice; for he wished it to be distinctly understood, that, while he should vindicate, with firmness, all the rights which he represented, whenever or however they might be assailed, he was for according to every other member, in its fullest extent, the same constitutional privilege. For his own part, he viewed this as a question not at all calculated to excite the sensibility of the Representatives from the slave-holding States. They certainly do not claim, by any special prerogative, to be the advocates of slavery wherever it may exist. On the contrary, if it shall appear that the laws of the District of Columbia have been made the instrument of oppression, committed on a person claiming to be a citizen of New York—and he was free to declare his impression that each State had a right to determine for itself who should enjoy that privilege—then has an outrage been committed which the Representatives from the South and North are equally bound to discountenance; and if we would avoid the imputation of giving our sanction to the obnoxious proceeding, the law, by which it was authorized, should be promptly repealed. Without anticipating any ultimate questions to which the inquiry might lead, he would conclude with the remark that, if any privilege of a citizen of New York has been violated through the laws or tribunals of this District, this body is bound, by every principle of policy, justice, and humanity, to afford its protection, and apply the necessary remedy.

Mr. BRENT said he was sorry to differ from the gentleman from South Carolina: he was equally anxious with that gentleman to see the subject fully investigated. But, in order to avoid that part of the subject which was calculated to produce irritation, he had suggested the amendment. The mover had said, in the speech with which he accompanied his resolution, that a certain colored free man had been imprisoned, and afterwards sold to pay his prison fees. Mr. B. wished to limit the inquiry to this point alone, and not to set the committee to decide whether a free man of color was "a citizen of the United States." That was the question he aimed to avoid: because he knew it would inevitably produce much excitement in a part, at least, of the House.

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Free Negroes in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MINER said he rose especially to reply to a remark made by several gentlemen, seeming to imply that this matter ought not to be discussed, because it created so much excitement and irritation. Such, certainly, was the effect, and Mr. M. regretted that it was so. The whole interests of the District are confided to our exclusive jurisdiction. No power but that of the General Government could operate. Slavery existed within the District, and the subject must be regulated by Congress. It was not only our right but our duty. It was impossible to do this intelligently without inquiry and free discussion. This was felt to be a subject of delicacy; no one felt this more sensibly (Mr. M. said) than himself. It is always painful to excite unpleasant feelings; such was never his wish; and it was matter of regret with him when, in the performance of duty, such was ever the consequence. In his opinion, every subject that it was our duty to regulate and legislate upon, ought to be considered proper to be introduced here, and freely discussed, without exciting pain or passion. We have the same absolute control over this subject here that the States have within the limits of their respective sovereignties, and it was equally our duty to exercise it. It was in fact the case, that, owing to the painful excitement growing out of any motion on the subject of slavery here, it had been utterly neglected. Gentlemen from neither section of the Union liked to take any step in relation to it: the consequence was, that there had been no amelioration of the laws growing out of the system of slavery here, for the thirty years the District had been under the jurisdiction of the General Government. In other States, improvements had been made: their codes had been meliorated: here, from the cause alluded to, they had been entirely neglected, and all the corruptions growing out of that neglect, and the cupidity of those who looked only to their private interest, were severely felt. From a paper in his hand, which he stated to be official, Mr. M. read an account of the persons imprisoned in the jail, as follows:

Runaway negroes committed to the Jail of Washington County, District of Columbia, from the 1st day of December, 1823, to November 30th, 1824, included,	52
For safe-keeping, by their masters, from December 1st, 1823, to November 30th, 1824,	81
Runaway negroes committed from December 1st, 1824, to November 30th, 1825,	58
For safe-keeping, by their masters, from December 1st, 1824, to November 30th, 1825,	124
Fifteen of the above, that were committed as runaways, proved to be free; and one of them sold for his jail fees and other expenses.

White and black criminals: the following number committed for offences, from December 1st, 1823, to November 30th, 1824, 125
And about the same number for the year following.

[Signed by the Jailer.]

Of the eighty-one, and one hundred and twenty-four, in jail for safe keeping, he observed, that he understood they were placed there for sale: that the Federal prisons, and their keepers, were extensively used for the purpose of carrying on the domestic slave trade. I presume that gentlemen have no proper idea of the situation of this matter; if they had, it would seem as if the sentiment must be general, that Legislative interference is proper. Last Winter, said Mr. M., I went through the cells of the prison, and I will mention an instance of its occupation that was presented to me. There was a woman in a cell, with three children, one an infant, all for sale. I was afterwards informed that she was the wife of a free man, who had had by her nine children. As they grew to an age to be profitable in market, the children were sold; now the woman had arrived at a time of life to be no longer valuable as a breeder, she and her children were separated from her husband, and sent to your prison for sale: your officer who keeps it, being employed as the agent. Another instance was stated to him yesterday, in a way that seemed entitled to credit: that a free colored man was taken up under the law and imprisoned. Ignorant, poor, friendless, he found it difficult to prove his freedom, and lay in jail in so miserable a situation that his legs were so frozen that, when liberated, he had to walk on his knees, being a cripple for life. He mentioned these circumstances to show that evils existed of a nature and to an extent which gentlemen were not probably apprised of, and which he was sure they would not approve. In addition to all this, Mr. M. said, that there were places in the District, by some called Pens, where the slave dealers gather together gangs of slaves, and then fasten them by a long chain, running between the pairs, and to this they are handcuffed, right and left, and so driven off, ten, twenty, and thirty, in a drove. The number passing the bridge in a year, was said to have amounted to hundreds. It was, in truth, the case that, owing to the total neglect of this subject by the only power having authority to remedy the evils, this had become the headquarters of the domestic slave trade. And, that the House might see the impression its enormities had made upon others, he read a resolution offered by Mr. Randolph, in March, 1816.

"On motion of Mr. Randolph,

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the existence of an inhuman and illegal traffic in slaves carried on in and through the District of Columbia; and to report whether any, and what, measures are necessary for putting a stop to the same."

A few days after, the committee had leave to send for persons and papers. Depositions were afterwards laid upon the table, taken by the committee, but he had searched in the clerk's office for them without effect. All would go to show that the whole subject of slavery within the District needed our interference, and ought to be discussed with freedom and good temper. In relation to the particular resolution of the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. WARD,) Mr. M. thought it properly drawn, a fit subject for inquiry, and more especially so, as, from the paper he (Mr. M.) had read, it appeared that, of fifty-eight committed as runaways, fifteen had proved themselves free, and one been sold for his jail fees. Injustice certainly resulted from the law as it stands, and he thought it right the committee should inquire into the subject.

Mr. DORSEY expressed much regret that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania had indulged himself in bringing forward the narrative he had just submitted to the House: because it might lead, elsewhere, to the idea that some ulterior measure was intended: that the gentleman was moving this House to take measures to prevent the internal trade in slaves within the United States. Such an idea was well calculated to produce excitement and alarm in the slave-holding States. He, therefore, suggested an amendment to the resolution, making it generally propose an inquiry into the expediency of amending existing laws. There was, he said, no need for a committee to inquire whether such a law existed: He would read to the House the law referred to. (Here Mr. D. read the law.) He had no doubt that every gentleman would cheerfully consent that this law ought to be modified; and if such was the object, it might be arrived at by a better mode than the resolution proposed. The indications of excitement were already perceptible in the House—and he was sorry to say that the remarks and statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not been calculated to allay it.

Mr. BRADLEY could not but consider the question, which was intended to be presented to the House, as a very simple one. It was not now put to them to say whether the laws of the District, on the subject, originally passed by Maryland, ought to be altered into conformity with the present laws of that State; it was not even this; but simply, whether a committee should inquire into the expediency of such alteration. It would be recollected, too, that the committee by whom the inquiry was proposed to be made, was one appointed specially to watch over the interests of the District. Mr. B. said he believed it was not usual to enter into such extended debate on mere resolutions of inquiry; and he saw no occasion for it in this instance. He hoped the resolution would pass without further amendment, more especially as no gentleman would be committed by the vote as to any ulterior proceedings.

Mr. DORSEY said, as he had been requested to withdraw his amendment, he would consent to do so.

Mr. FORSYTH was not disposed to object to an inquiry; yet, he must think that the form in which the resolution was presented, and the remarks by which it was accompanied, were calculated to produce excitement. Several gentlemen who had addressed the House this morning, appeared to be of opinion that there ought to be no irritation on this subject, in whatever form presented: a single moment's reflection would be sufficient to show that this was a very great mistake. On this subject, Mr. F. said, there is in the United States a radical difference of opinion. The gentleman from New York, and others, claim, as a matter of right, that black persons, held to be citizens of the United States, in the State of New York, should enjoy in every other State the same privilege. The whole of the Southern delegation deny this claim. We hold (said he) that we have the right to exclude free people of color, to eject them, and to limit their privileges, when we admit them to reside among us. We know that there has been a considerable discussion on this head, arising from one of the States excluding sailors of a foreign country (admissible under treaty stipulations) under its general law concerning persons of color, and confining such persons in prison when this law has been contravened by them. On a question like this, intimately connected with the safety of a large portion of this country, discussion must necessarily produce excitement; especially when the case of Gilbert Horton, with all its attendant circumstances, had been brought into view. Mr. F. said he was not disposed to be excited, and he had no objection to any proper inquiry on this subject. But, when the gentleman told the House that the constitution gave protection to this individual: that the constitution gives to the States, respectively, the power of regulating the subject: he afforded the strongest argument against his own proposition; because, if he was right in this position, there was no sort of occasion for the inquiry which he proposed. Mr. F. said he was perfectly willing to enter into the question, Is it expedient that the laws of this District shall be altered, or is it not? But the gentleman had no right to institute this inquiry at the moment of fulminating accusations of a violation of the constitution, against which the Judiciary would afford sufficient protection. If the gentleman admitted that the laws of the District on this subject were constitutional, Mr. F. was perfectly willing to inquire into the expediency of altering them, and he hoped the committee would report such alterations in them as the state of society might justify or require.

Mr. FLOYD said he did not mean, although he had some objection to the shape of the resolution, and the mode of its presentation, to oppose its passage. He was sorry that the subject had produced so much conversation. It must be equally interesting to gentlemen from every State, that freemen, of whatever color, wrongfully imprisoned, should be set at liberty. Is there a law in operation within this District which authorizes the imprisonment of such? If so, every one would agree that it ought to be repealed. Mr. F. said he would step forward to guard the rights of such a man as soon as any other: he hoped it was not the peculiar duty of any one to take this charge upon his philanthropy. If a man, imprisoned within this District, had his feet frost-bitten, it was his misfortune: the courts would, doubtless, regulate the conduct of their jail-keepers. But the House ought not to be too much affected by this case: for, Mr. F. said, he had, in his time, known a white man, once influential and respected, frost-bitten during imprisonment for debt: and he personally knew, during his observation of the practice of the hospital in Philadelphia, in his younger days, that the root of the diseases of four-fifths of all the persons who went into that asylum was poverty—misfortune. Poverty, in any country, is attended by many ills; and not by more here than elsewhere. And as to all that stuff about approaching a magazine with a candle—where is the magazine? There is none that I know of. Mr. F. made a few further observations, expressive of his readiness, which he believed was common to all, to protect and ameliorate the condition of every class of people in the District of Columbia, from the mayor to the most humble individual. All he desired was, that it should be done in a way not to interfere with the rights of some States, under the plea of protecting the rights of other States.

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Isthmus of Panama.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MARTINDALE then moved to add to the resolution the following amendment:

"And be instructed to report to this House an abstract of all laws in force in the District of Columbia, in anywise affecting the liberty of the person; and whether any, and what, portions of said laws have been repealed or modified by the Legislatures of the States of Maryland or Virginia."

Which motion he accompanied with a few remarks of explanation.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. POWELL, who thought it imposed an unnecessary labor on the Committee of the District of Columbia; and the question being taken, it was negatived.

The question was then taken on the original resolution of Mr. WARD, and carried by a large majority.

THURSDAY, December 28.

Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. REED moved the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a line of communication from some port or place in the United States, across the Isthmus of Panama, to some port or ports on the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. REED said, that it would be remembered that the subject to which he was now desirous to call the attention of the House, had been presented for their consideration by the report of the Secretary of the Navy, the last year, which accompanied the President's Message. I did, (said he,) during the last session, offer a resolution, which passed this House, of similar import with the one now under consideration. The Committee on Naval Affairs did not find time to report upon the subject during the last session.

As that resolution was misunderstood by some, presuming a canal or railway was contemplated, I deem it expedient to offer a few words in explanation of my views upon the subject.

We have a considerable naval force in the Pacific Ocean. That force will not be diminished, but may be increased, so long as we may have a navy, and foreign commerce. How important is it to communicate instructions to, and receive despatches from, our squadron there. Look at their situation—the vast extent of country they visit, the different nations they visit bordering upon that extended coast, subject to changes, and perhaps revolutions. Look, also, to the islands with whom we have intercourse, inhabited by savages. No portion of our navy needs instruction so much or so often, and yet we cannot give and receive information from that squadron in less time than eight months. By the contemplated route, information may be carried from one of our ports, across the Isthmus of Panama, to Lima, and receive an answer, in about three months, less than half the time required in the circuitous route around Cape Horn, saving a voyage of more than ten thousand miles. It would afford means of sending and receiving despatches from our Ministers and Agents in the South American Republics. It would afford great facilities to our commerce in that ocean—commerce already considerable, and which is increasing, and will continue to increase. Our commerce, and the various interests inseparably connected with it, require all the facilities which the Government can afford. It would afford important advantages to our whale fishery. We have in that ocean a hundred whale ships, the greater part from my own neighborhood and district. These ships have two thousand men on board, and their voyages continue for three years. I acknowledge it would be gratifying and useful to afford an opportunity to these men to advise their friends and those interested, of their success or misfortune. It would afford to all who might be situated in that distant ocean, an opportunity to send to, and receive letters from, their friends.

I am fully convinced that the proposed communication is highly important in every relation. I hope its importance, especially as the expense of carrying it into effect is very inconsiderable, may receive the early attention of the committee.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Roads in the Territory of Michigan.

On motion of Mr. WING, Delegate from Michigan, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDIOT in the chair, on the bill to "authorize the laying out and opening certain roads in the Territory of Michigan."

The several blanks in the bill were filled, one with 1,500 dollars, for surveys, and two others with 12,000 and 25,000 dollars, for opening the several roads mentioned in the bill.

Mr. VANCE explained the situation of the roads referred to, and their aspect on the military defence of that territory; that from Detroit to the river St. Clair, being intended for the purpose of throwing troops, in time of war, into the Upper Lake country, should the British fortify and hold the water communication; that from Detroit to the Saganaw Bay, led into the heart of the Chippewa country; that from the same place to Chicago, into the heart of the country of the Pattawatamie and Miami Indians. Both these would give access to the enemy in case of an Indian war.

The bill was then reported as amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

FRIDAY, December 29.

Internal Improvement.

Mr. RIVES moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the annual appropriation heretofore made for defraying the expense of such surveys of routes for roads and canals as may be directed by the Executive, and of substituting therefor, distinct and specific appropriations for surveying such routes only as shall be authorized by Congress.

The resolution being read—

Mr. RIVES said, that, in presenting the resolution just read, it might be proper for him briefly to state the general reasons which led him to believe that the inquiry proposed by it was such a one as was fit to be entertained by this House. It would be recollected that, during the first session of the Eighteenth Congress, after a protracted and elaborate discussion of the abstract constitutional question, a law was passed, authorizing the President to cause surveys to be made of such routes for roads and canals as "he might deem to be of national importance," and making an appropriation of 80,000 dollars for the purpose of carrying the objects of that act into effect. During the second session of the same Congress, an appropriation was introduced into the General Military Appropriation Bill, of another sum of 28,000 dollars, for "making surveys, and carrying on the operations of the Board of Engineers, in relation to Internal Improvements;" and a similar appropriation was again inserted in the Military Appropriation Bill of last year, of 50,000 dollars, for "defraying the expenses incidental to examinations and surveys, preparatory to, and in aid of, the formation of roads and canals." It will be perceived, from the recital I have given of the two last acts of Congress, that they are silent as to the authority by which the subjects for these surveys were to be designated; but they were, probably, intended at the time, and have been since acted upon by the Executive, as continuing in the President the same discretionary authority which was originally vested in him by the act of 1824. It has so happened, that the propriety of transferring to the Executive Department this large discretionary power over the public money, has never received the separate consideration, or explicit sanction of this House. In 1824, it was merged in the constitutional question respecting the power of Congress to act upon the subject of internal improvements, which was the sole ground of debate on that occasion; and in 1825 and 1826, from the position it occupied in the General Military Appropriation Bill, it was overshadowed and lost sight of amid the variety of other objects with which it was surrounded. I cannot help believing, said Mr. R., that, when this subject shall engage the serious deliberation of this House, it will be found that we have fallen into a gross departure from the true genius of our Government and the sound maxims of republican policy. The control of the public money, and the designation of the objects upon which it should be expended, are among the highest trusts confided to the legislative authority of the Union; and, to assign the performance of these trusts to any other hands than our own, is an unwarrantable and dangerous delegation of our powers. This delegation, in the present instance, is the less excusable, because the duty we assign to the President, is one to which we are entirely competent ourselves. It is admitted by all the friends of internal improvements, under the auspices of the General Government, that, in their legitimate scope, they are confined exclusively to objects of a pervading national character. These objects cannot be very numerous, and, if they were so, surely we who come from the various divisions of the Confederacy, and are presumed to be acquainted with the mutual connection and dependence of the several parts, are as well qualified to determine what objects are of general interest to the whole, as any individual, however elevated his station, or justly entitled to respect his opinions may be. Among the many salutary counsels delivered by our great political reformer, (I allude, said Mr. R., to Mr. Jefferson,) there was none more earnestly and frequently inculcated by him than that of "appropriating specific sums for every specific purpose susceptible of definition." The objects embraced in a national system of internal improvement, are surely capable of being defined; and I trust we shall avail ourselves of the occasion, now presented by the recurrence of our annual appropriations, to return to sound principles from which we have inconsiderately gone astray. There is,

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Internal Improvement.

[H. OF R.]

besides, said Mr. R. an obvious incongruity in our present mode of proceeding upon this subject. The power of surveying routes for roads and canals is assigned to one department of the Government, while the power of constructing them is retained by another. In consequence of a difference of opinion between the two departments, it may, and no doubt will happen, that the President will cause routes to be surveyed, which Congress may not consider of sufficient importance to justify an application of the national resources for their construction, and thus a useless expenditure of the public treasure, to a large amount, may be incurred, and at a time, too, when we are reminded, from the highest authority, "of the necessity of abiding by the maxims of the most vigilant economy." But the most serious objection to this system of legislation remains to be noticed. It is its tendency to destroy the true balance of the constitution—to increase, dangerously to increase, the influence of one department of the Government at the expense of another—to strengthen that arm of the public authority which is already sufficiently powerful—and to make gratuitous additions, by legislative concession, to that mass of patronage secured to the Executive by the provisions of the constitution, and which the legislative authority has no power to reduce. It was not my object, said Mr. R., to dwell on any of these topics. I have barely adverted to them, for the purpose of showing that there are considerations involved in the inquiry I have proposed, of the deepest import to the sound administration of the Government, and in order to attract to them the deliberate attention of the House, and of the committee to which the subject is submitted. If it should become necessary, in the farther progress of the measure, I will endeavor to develop my views of this subject, in all its bearings, more fully to the House.

Mr. BARTLETT said he was happy the attention of the House had been called to the general subject of the manner in which appropriations are made by this House. A resolution had been lying, for some days, on his table, which, from that reluctance he ever felt to trouble the House, he had forborne to offer, the object of which was nearly allied to that of the gentleman from Virginia—but it covered more ground and went farther than this. He was persuaded that, on examination, it would be found, that there is not a Government on earth, where public money is appropriated as it is in ours. Estimates are sent to us from the departments, in a shape, which he did not say was improper, (as he did not doubt the talent of the officers concerned,) but which, to many, was certainly not clearly intelligible. These communications were usually referred to very able committees, but no committee is justly expected to be acquainted with all the various departments of information embraced, especially in the annual report of the Treasury, and which are derived from a great variety of sources. The duty of the Committee of Ways and Means does not demand that its members should be familiar with all these particulars, since its appropriate duty is no more than to point out the manner in which the resources, to be appropriated by the House, shall be best applied. But, as things now operate, the power of appropriation resides, practically, in the Heads of Departments, whilst the responsibility of the appropriating power rests on this House. The departments are in the habit of asking for specific sums as in part payment for such and such objects—while the whole amount, which the several objects require, is never stated, and nobody knows how great it may be. The complaint was frequent, that the communications are unintelligible, especially to new members, and, indeed, to old members too, unless they will take the labor of extensive and tedious investigation of documents. He, therefore, offered the following amendment, which, he hoped, would be accepted by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, as a modification of his own.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring, that, hereafter, all estimates of appropriations for the operations of the different Departments of the Government, when the same are to be applied to the construction of works of a permanent character, shall be accompanied with a general description of the work proposed, with an estimate of the entire cost for its completion, and, from year to year, with a statement of the sums expended, and the balance which will be required.

Resolved, also, That the same committee inquire into the expediency of making provision, by an amendment of the rules of the House, or otherwise, that, hereafter, the estimates for Military service and defences shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs—the estimates for Indian expenditures to the Committee on Indian Affairs—the estimates from the Navy Department, to the Committee on Naval Affairs—and the estimates for the Public Buildings, to the Committee on the Public Buildings; and, that the several committees shall make report upon the same, before any bill, making appropriations for the purposes of such estimates, shall be considered by the House.

It was proper, Mr. B. said, that, in public, as much as in private concerns, when any undertaking was entered upon, to sit down first, and count the cost. The effect of the resolution would enable the House to do this. The committees of the House can then pronounce with confidence on the propriety of making the appropriations asked; and the power of appropriation will then be, where it ought to be, with the responsibility. He had not the least intention of reflecting on the Heads of Departments; he knew their entire competency to the discharge of their arduous duties. He did not reflect on the men, but on the system—on the mode of business pursued. The result of such a plan often was, that an object, which had been recommended by one of these officers, and in part, appropriated for, was disapproved by his successor in office; and thus the House pulled down what it had built up, and the public money was uselessly squandered.

Mr. RIVES replied, that it did not appear to him, from having heard the resolution of the honorable gentleman read, that its tenor and intention were at all parallel with the views he had in offering his own. It contained no reference to the surveys made for works of internal improvement—no allusion whatever to the subject of roads and canals, or if to them, in general terms, not to the expenses of the preliminary steps which led to their adoption, nor to the discretionary power of authorizing those expenses and controlling them.

The subject to which his own resolution had reference, stood, he thought, in a peculiar situation; in no law ever passed by Congress, was so wide a discretionary power intrusted to the Executive. A gross sum, and a very large one, was put into his hands, for the purpose of having such roads and canals surveyed as he might judge promotive of the national advantage. But was not the House as competent as the President of the United States to judge which of the various objects proposed would promote that object? Where was the need of reposing this immense discretionary power in the hands of the President? He thought the House should retain it in their own hands: that a gross sum ought not to be given; but that specific appropriations ought to be made, wherever practicable, for these preliminary surveys, as well as for any subsequent stage of the several works. He saw much to approve in the gentleman's resolution, but he must pardon him if he declined accepting it as a modification of his own. As a separate and independent resolution, if offered by that gentleman, he would cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. BARTLETT then observed, that, as the two resolutions had a general reference to the same subject, and as there was a possibility that the objects of both might be embraced by uniting the two; with this hope, he would move that the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, together with his own, as an amendment, be laid on the table and printed.

The motion prevailed, and the resolutions were laid on the table accordingly.

(On a subsequent day Mr. BARTLETT withdrew his motion to amend, and the resolution of Mr. RIVES was agreed to.)

A Memorial of the Vice President of the United States.

The Speaker laid before the House the following communication from JOHN C. CALHOUN, Vice President of the United States, viz:

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives:

Sir: You will please to lay before the House, over which you preside, the enclosed communication addressed to that body.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the Honorable the Members of the House of Representatives:

An imperious sense of duty, and a sacred regard to the honor of the station which I occupy, compel me to approach your body in its high character of grand inquest of the nation.

Charges have been made against me of the most serious nature, and which, if true, ought to degrade me from the high station in which I have been placed by the choice of my fellow-citizens, and to consign my name to perpetual infamy.

In claiming the investigation of the House, I am sensible, that, under our free and happy institutions, the conduct of public servants is a fair subject of the closest scrutiny and the freest remarks, and that a firm and faithful discharge of duty affords, ordinarily, ample protection against political attacks; but when such attacks assume the character of impeachable offences, and become, in some degree, official, by being placed among the public records, an officer thus assailed, however base the instrument used, if conscious of innocence, can look for refuge only to the Hall of the immediate Representatives of the people. It is thus I find myself most unexpectedly placed.

On Wednesday morning last, it was for the first time intimated to me, that charges of a very serious nature against me were lodged in one of the Executive Departments: during the day, rumors from several quarters to the same effect reached me; but the first certain information of their character, was received yesterday morning, through one of the newspapers of the District. It appears, from its statement, that I am accused of the sordid and infamous crime of participating in the profits of a contract formed with the Government, through the Department of War, while I was intrusted with the discharge of its duties, and that the accusation has been officially presented as the basis of an official act of the War Department, and consequently to be placed among its records, as a lasting stigma on my character.

Conscious of my entire innocence in this and every other public act, and that I have ever been incapable, in the performance of duty, of being influenced by any other motive than a sacred regard to the public interest, and resolved, as far as human effort can extend, to leave an untarnished reputation to posterity, I challenge the freest investigation of the House, as the only means effectually to repel this premeditated attack to prostrate me, by destroying forever my character.

J. C. CALHOUN,

Vice President of the United States.

WASHINGTON, 29th Dec. 1828.

Mr. FLOYD said, that such was the rapid succession of members in this House, that there were but few now present who were members of it, when the contract, referred to in the Vice President's letter, had been a subject of examination on this floor. He was then a member, and would say, that he had paid particular attention to this contract, and, in some points of view, it had met his disapprobation and censure. He could say, farther, and the old members could bear him out in the assertion, that he was seen in opposition to many of the measures of the War Department, during the time

JANUARY, 1827.]

Relief to the Suffering Greeks.

[H. OF R.]

the present Vice President presided over it, and frequently thought them too bold, and not sufficiently economical; but he had never seen any thing to impeach the integrity of that gentleman, nor did he now see any thing to impair the opinion which he had always entertained of his character. But a charge is now made against him, and I approve (said Mr. F.) the manner in which he has met it, by a prompt demand for an investigation on this floor. I believe it to be a calumny—I regret, exceedingly regret, that a charge of such a nature, upon such foundation, should be brought against an officer so high in public office, and I may add, so high in public favor; and I will lend my efforts to an examination of the charge, and the suppression of the calumny.

We have fallen on evil times, when such a man has to answer such a charge—but, much as it may concern him, I consider it also as concerning the country itself, and the form of Government under which we live. The honor of our public officers, is ours as well as theirs. A stain upon their official conduct is an injury to the Government which they administer; and, while ready to proceed against them for misconduct, when, unhappily, cause may exist for so doing, it is our duty to see that unfounded charges shall be exposed and detected. Difference of opinion upon the economy, the propriety, the wisdom of public measures, is one thing; but to attack the official rectitude of an officer is another. In such attacks, if unjust or unfounded, we attack our Republican form of Government; we give joy and triumph to all its enemies; we weaken its claim to respectability, and hasten its downfall. We should recollect that we are closely watched by all the enemies of free Government in Europe. Since the fall of the great Napoleon, a Minister of the Legation has almost proposed to turn the fifteen hundred thousand bayonets of Europe against the liberty of the United States. Such audacious projects will be encouraged by every thing that brings odium upon our institutions; and nothing could bring more odium upon them than to show that our public men are corrupt. This calumny against the second officer of our Government, mean and despicable as it may be, will fly to Europe, and be reprinted there. Then let the refutation press upon its heels and destroy it. I rejoice that the Vice President has met the calumny as he has done. He demands an investigation on this floor. Let it be granted to him, and let justice be done. Mr. F. concluded, by moving that the communication of the Vice President be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. COOKE said, it would be recollected by a number of the members of the House, present, that the contract out of which the present application grew, was brought to the notice of the House on his call. When this Rip Rap contract, as it is called, was laid before the House, I examined it (said Mr. C.) with the greatest scrutiny, and with the closest application; and I take this occasion to declare, that I did not discover the most trivial circumstance going to show that the then Secretary of War was in the remotest degree improperly concerned in it. This contract was examined by me, not once only, but four different times, and it is just that I should make this early disclosure, that I entertain not the remotest suspicion of impropriety against that officer in the transaction. I shall most readily vote for the investigation, said Mr. C., but not with the view of satisfying my mind on the subject.

The question then being put on Mr. FLOYD's motion, it was agreed to, with scarcely a dissenting voice. A committee of seven members was ordered: and,

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the committee were empowered to send for persons and papers. And then the House adjourned to Tuesday.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 2.

Relief to the Suffering Greeks.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare and bring in a bill making an appropriation of $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the President, in the purchase and transportation of provisions for the suffering inhabitants of Greece.

Mr. LIVINGSTON spoke to the following effect: Having passed the first day of the year in the festivities analogous to the season, in the enjoyment of present happiness, the retrospect of past prosperity, and the pleasing anticipation of a continuance of the blessings of peace and plenty, let us dedicate the second to an act of general charity—not forbidden by our constitution—infringing the rights of no other nation, and highly honorable to our own.

I have before me a letter written by an honorable member of this House, containing a picture of distress that cannot fail to touch the heart of any one who reads it. The evidence it contains comes from a Greek, high in office and reputation. He endeavors to give an idea of the poverty and destitute state of his nation, "to whom," he says, "the foe has left no agriculture, no commerce, no arts." Out off from all the usual means of subsistence, to the horrors of war are added the desolation of famine; war, in its most savage, remorseless state; famine, with the expectation of pestilence, its usual attendant—they are suffering this in the holiest of causes, and doing honor to the cause, by the courage, constancy, and unyielding spirit with which they support it.

If the stern dictates of national duty prevent our affording more effectual assistance, we have the satisfaction of knowing that, in this, at least, no civilized nation can, with justice, tax us with a breach of neutrality. It is not proposed to give a subsidy to the nation, or to supply them with the means of carrying on the war, but to clothe the naked, to feed the hungry, to comfort the despairing—to do that which a civilized enemy would himself do. Women and children are the objects of this relief. The commerce in provisions is not contraband; our citizens may supply them, and why not the Government? And we are not without precedent to support it. The inhabitants of St. Domingo, driven from their country by a destructive insurrection, took refuge here, were hospitably received by our citizens, and generously supported from the National Treasury. A similar provision was made for the exiles from Cuba. These cases settle the constitutional question. The one I am about to mention is equally conclusive, but applies particularly to show that we have not thought the duties of humanity, in a similar instance, inconsistent with those of neutrality. In the year 1812, a dreadful calamity occurred in the province of Venezuela, then at war with Spain, or, as that power called it, in rebellion—the principal city of the province was overwhelmed by an earthquake. The United States immediately directed the very sum proposed by this resolution, to be laid out in supplies and sent to these sufferers; yet Spain never complained that this was a breach of neutrality; the nations of Europe never considered it as an act inconsistent with the laws of nations—and so far from losing, we certainly acquired national reputation. Now, sir, compare these cases with that under consideration. In the St. Domingo and Cuba cases, the sufferers belonged to a rich and powerful nation, whose duties for their relief might seem to supersede our interference. In that of Venezuela the destruction was principally that of the buildings in the cities—the country, its agriculture, its arts, its resources, remained untouched.

In Greece, on the contrary, we have one general picture of horror and desolation—theirs is the reverse of our happy state—their ploughshares are turned into swords—their pruning hooks into spears. The olives of Attica are rooted up; the harvests of the Peloponnesus laid waste; the vines of Samos are destroyed; their commerce and arts are annihilated; and no one circumstance that the strongest imagination could create is wanting to complete the picture of their misery. Is it possible that any but the strongest, the most insurmountable obstacles, can prevent our relieving such distress, when we have the means? I think it has been shown that neither our constitution nor our neutrality stand in our way. Will our constituents disavow us? We should insult them by the doubt. Will they who use the superfluous wealth with which they are blessed in the doubtful enterprise of converting the heathen of the East and West to the truth of Christianity, object to the certain relief of thousands of their Christian brethren from pestilence and famine! The preservation of Christians is surely as meritorious as it can be to multiply them by conversion.

I do not appeal to the sympathies of the House for the cause in which all these miseries are suffered. It is not necessary, for I am persuaded that no man who hears me, feels differently from myself; and, if it were necessary, I have not talents for the task; but there are men in this assembly, (and I implore the aid of their talents and eloquence,) who, in such a cause, would carry the minds of all who heard them, to the conclusions favorable to the great cause of humanity and national honor which I plead. For myself, without the talent to persuade, I trust to the simple statement that here is a whole nation, professing the faith in which we believe, asserting the liberty for which we have contended, and which we enjoy: contending for them against a merciless and powerful enemy, with a courage not equalled, certainly not surpassed, in the heroic ages of their ancestors: that they are suffering not only the evils of the most savage warfare, but nakedness, famine, and want of every description; that they call upon us for aid, and that we have the means to afford it. The will, I trust, is not wanting. I shall not waste the time of the House by anticipating objections: should any be offered, I will endeavor to answer them.

Mr. McDUFFRIS said he hoped that the House, before it agreed to the resolution just offered for its adoption, would first satisfy itself as to the effect which the measure proposed would have on the relations of this country with the belligerent powers. If the gentleman from Louisiana would satisfy him that, by the adoption of the resolution, the United States would not be made a party to the existing war between Greece and Turkey—that it would maintain our neutrality honestly and fairly—his only objection to it would be removed, and he would go with the gentleman heart and hand; all the feelings of his nature would urge him to give such a proposition his zealous support; and he was satisfied, for his part, that there existed no constitutional difficulties in the way. But, while it became the United States ever to act with magnanimity, and a regard to the dictates of humane feeling, it became the Government no less to act with openness, with directness, and with integrity, towards all nations. He was convinced that, according to the Law of Nations, the act proposed by the resolution of the honorable gentleman from Louisiana would, as an appropriation of money to the aid of the Greeks, be a direct violation of the neutrality of this country, and would, in fact, be an act of war. If the nation is to do any thing to aid the Greeks in their struggle, let us not vote this paltry sum of fifty thousand dollars, which may be squandered unprofitably, but let us put in motion the whole Navy of the United States in the cause. Let us act openly, and, if we are to do any thing, let us act effectually, upon a scale which becomes the national character.

Mr. LIVINGSTON was gratified to find that the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFRIS) had no other objection to the resolution but that he thinks it would be contrary to our neutral rights, because Mr. L. thought he might be satisfied upon that head, and then he should count on his support.

JANUARY, 1837.]

Relief to the Suffering Greeks.

[H. or R.]

If this were a grant of money, provisions, or other means of carrying on the war, (said Mr. L.), it might be considered as a subsidy voluntarily offered, and of course inconsistent with our neutrality; but it is a supply to the necessities in the nation at large: and what must be convincing of its consistency with the laws of neutrality, is this: provisions are not contraband of war, except when going to a besieged place. The trade in them to Greece at large, is as lawful to our merchants now, as it could be if they were at peace. If the enemy of Greece should interrupt this trade by the capture of our merchant vessels, it would be a breach of our rights, and, if persevered in, a cause of war. This Government would be under the obligation of protecting its citizens in their lawful commerce. Now, would it not be a solecism to say, that the Turks have a right to consider us as parties in the war for the same acts which, if denied to our citizens, we should have a right to enforce by war? There cannot be two laws on this subject—one for the Government, another for its citizens. Either the Turks have a right to seize and confiscate any merchantman bound to a port in Greece, which is not blockaded, or they have no right to complain of the Government for sending the same supplies; but the right to carry provisions by neutral individuals to a belligerent, is one that has always been contended for by our Government, and has never been contested but in times of acknowledged irregularity and lawless force. Therefore, the same right exists in the neutral nation itself. This reasoning must have prevailed in the case of Venezuela. They, at the time we sent them provisions, were at war with Spain; and although, at that time, it was the strong case of insurrectionary war—a rebellion, as it was called by Spain—yet our humane interference, so far from being complained of as a breach of neutrality, or an improper interference between Spain and her insurgent Colonies, was then considered, and will be considered in history, as a measure honorable to the character of the country.

The gentleman from South Carolina thinks we should go farther—I understood him to mean if this is intended as a hostile measure. I agree with him that, if we intended to enter as a party in the contest, this would not be enough. But I do not propose it with that intent. I am as adverse as any member can be to advise any act, either unjust in itself, or that may give just cause of offence to any nation. Yet, if any case can exist that would justify a departure from the strict line of neutrality, it is the present. Would to God, sir, that we could render more effectual aid in this glorious struggle—would to God that, instead of purchasing one of the frigates intended for the deliverance of this distressed people, we could have furnished the means for the departure of both. As it is, we have chained the LIBERATOR to our wharves, but have sent them the HOPKINS to support them under their cruel calamities. May the name be ominous of future success and final triumph to their holy cause.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of discussing the feeling and interesting subject which the gentleman from Louisiana had brought to their view with so much enthusiasm, but for the mere purpose of expressing his regret that, on a question which his colleague (Mr. McDUFFIE) had very fairly put, as one involving the neutral relations of the country, the gentleman from Louisiana had not given his resolution the usual direction, by submitting a motion that it should be printed, and, for the present, laid on the table. The House, under the gush of the gentleman's eloquence, ought not now to be precipitated into a premature (which might in the end be a disastrous) decision.

He would, however, before he took his seat, in responding to the generous sentiments which the gentleman had expressed in favor of a gallant and suffering race, observe, that he thought his friend from Louisiana had not displayed his usual acuteness in replying to his colleague, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) by insisting that the neutrality of the country could not be endangered, if the provisions were sent to the people of Greece, and not to its Government. He would ask that gentleman, whether this was not a distinction without a difference? in a word, whether the people of Greece were not fighting against the Turks? and whether, if provisions were sent out to Greece by this Government, he would limit the donation to the wretched and forlorn women and children, who were, perhaps, at this moment, seeking a temporary refuge amidst those mouldering columns and porticos of departed greatness, which once made their country the wonder and delight of the world, without permitting the gallant soldiery, by whom their wrongs were to be avenged, to participate in one morsel of the bounty of this Government?

He thought too, the gentleman from Louisiana had been equally unfortunate in his distinction between provisions and munitions of war, by urging, in reply to his colleague, that the sending of the former to Greece, would be not contraband, and therefore, no invasion of neutrality. To this he could only say, that there were circumstances under which an aid by provisions might be the most efficient succor a belligerent could receive; and it was surely not necessary for him to remind the gentleman from Louisiana, that one of the most philosophical and enlightened writers on the Art of War, had long since said that food is one of the most material of its sinews. Whether we can, therefore, invigorate the nerves of the Grecian warrior by this aid, was a question far too important and delicate in its relations, to be decided without either past notice or even present deliberation.

He would frankly say, that, if, under the sympathy and excitement of such a theme, wrought by the fervid eloquence of the gentleman, he could be induced to vote for his proposition, and one man, calling himself an American, and endeared to him by the relations of a countryman, should suffer in a foreign land from the bowstring of the Turk, for one he would confess that such a vote would hereafter never be a subject of comfort or congratulation to himself. To give the House, however, time to weigh the import of the gentleman's resolution, he would move that it lie on the table and be printed.

The motion prevailed, and the resolution was accordingly laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 4.

Food for the Florida Indians.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the removal of the Florida Indians.

Mr. WHITE said, in introducing the resolution which he had the honor to submit, he was aware of the departure it proposed from the established policy of the Government, in regard to the Indian tribes within our boundaries, and of the deep necessity for such a change, whether we consult the interest of the Government itself, or the miserable remnants of the aborigines of this continent. It is a fact, too notorious to be questioned on this floor, that the appearance of negotiation with the Indian tribes for a cession of their land, was only a solemn farce, the forms of a contract, in which there is neither the justice of an equal, nor the magnanimity of a superior. The United States have, by statute, disfranchised every nation of Indians within their boundaries, by declaring they shall not alienate their lands to any other power; and if they had followed up the system, after denying their sovereignty in this explicit act of legislation, and adopted some plan for the security and civilization of that unfortunate race, it would have saved them from final extermination, and prevented the frontier settlements from being stained with the blood of our citizens. They deny them the right of dominion over their lands, and yet negotiate with them with all the formality of equal and independent sovereigns. The time has arrived when the United States, from the considerations of policy, and the dictates of humanity, should subject them to their absolute control, and dispose of them in such a manner as may be best calculated for their preservation and support. Whatever, said Mr. W., may be the general plan which the wisdom of the Executive and Congress may adopt, it is my peculiar duty to submit, for the consideration of this House, the inquiry which this resolution proposes, and the remedy must either be applied, or the Indians subjected to absolute starvation. Indeed, they have been subsisting, for the last twelve months, on the bounty of the Government, and the plunder and robbery of my constituents. To relieve them from this situation, this course was suggested at the last session of Congress, and having failed, an application was made to the Secretary of War for the appointment of Commissioners for the purpose of seeing what could be done by the usual expedient of negotiation. That having failed, the crisis has at last arrived, whether the people of Florida must support the Indians, in a state of starvation, or be massacred for refusal. The issue is fairly made up, and the work of murder having been begun by the Indians, of women and children, the scene that I predicted last Winter is now exhibited. The people of that country are driven, in defence of their homes, their wives, and children, to take up arms; and those who survive their just indignation, must be removed to some other quarter, or perish.

During the last session of Congress, in the discussions on this subject, it was emphatically, and rather reproachfully, asked, what brought these people to their present abject and miserable condition? I answer, that the inhabitants of Florida had no instrumentality in it. It was the Government itself, by a decision most unexpected and extraordinary. The Indians, as a nation, had surrendered all title to the country, in a treaty with the Spanish Government, in 1784, and were tenants at will of that Government, having no permanency of habitation, or specified limits, but extending in detached bodies, from the St. John's to Pensacola—a tract of country 850 miles in extent, and occupied by several broken tribes and fugitive Creeks, who had fled to that territory for an asylum during the Creek war. Spain ceded the Floridas to the United States without any reference to their title, which had been before extinguished, in absolute dominion and full property; and the United States being thus possessed, were fully authorized to remove the Indians where and when they pleased. All these facts were communicated to the Government, and laid before Congress, in 1823. So early as December, 1822, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, alleging these facts, and vindicating the right of the United States to pursue that course, and the many considerations for such a disposition of them. It was obvious that the United States would not surrender such a country to a few thousand Indians, widely scattered along our sea-coast—the acquisition and advantages of which to the United States, had been the prominent consideration in the negotiation of the treaty with Spain. The Government were then informed, in that letter, that the Indians, even in the possession of this immense tract of country, from the scarcity of game, had been reduced to great extremities, and that it would be impossible that they could be continued. The danger of their acting as pioneers, for conducting an enemy into the interior, the necessity of an efficient population on our southern border, the repugnance of the whites to settle in that vicinity, and the consequent injury in the sale of the public lands, were all urged as auxiliary causes for their removal—at the same time and before, when General Jackson was Governor of Florida, he urged the same cause—all of which was submitted to Congress. The Indians expected to be removed. The fugitive Creeks were preparing to go back to their nation, when, to our astonishment, instructions were issued for holding a treaty, and a formal cession of that which they had not, and never would have pretended to, was to be made to the United States, who covenanted to surrender them four millions thirty-two thousand acres of land, with the privilege of extending the northern boundary to an undefined extent, besides large stipends. The Government alone, then, with a knowledge of all these facts, are responsible for their present situation; and they have been reminded from time to time, by petition, resolution, correspondence, and remonstrance, of the fatal policy. The President of the United States asked of Congress an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars to retrieve their sufferings, and to remove them. It passed the Senate, and was denied here, under a pretext of humanity, and the reluctance of removing them to more northern latitudes. Sir, it must be notorious to every one not entirely ignorant of the Indian character, that they cannot live within their present assigned limits. There is no game; their habits are averse to the cultivation of the soil. When they attempt any thing of that sort, it is in the article of corn—that will not grow there. By this miserable policy, the Indians have been placed in a region suited only to the cultivation of Sugar, Sea Island Cotton, and all the tropical fruits, of the cultivation of which they have not the most remote idea, when there are large districts of country, west of the Mississippi, abounding in game, and suited to their habits of life, and the only cultivation with which they are familiar. No one who is unacquainted with the facts can form any idea of the injuries and losses to which the United States have been exposed by the continuance of the Indians in this territory. The large sugar planters are unwilling to come into the country; their capital is unemployed, the prices of land are depreciated, agriculture checked, emigration stopped; land, purchased by speculators, for the want of competition; the inhabitants robbed, and now murdered. These are the evils of which we complain, and which I have been endeavoring to remedy by my feeble exertions since I had the honor of a seat here. If any gentleman supposes the Indian can ever be made to cultivate the sugar cane, the olive, vine, or orange, he has a strong conception of his character. It will be a greater revolution than all your arts of civilization has ever yet been able to accomplish. There is but one remedy, and that is the one now proposed. It is the interest of the Government, their right, and it is, above all, the only one that will satisfy the higher calls of justice and humanity. To the west of the Mississippi there are extensive forests, where the Indians can indulge in habits congenial with their nature and inclinations, where, from their remote situation, they will not be intruded upon, or involved in unavoidable collisions. They will not be in a situation to furnish facilities to an enemy upon an exposed frontier, in time of war, or to murder our wives and children, in time of peace. I believe that for ten thousand dollars, in 1822, the Indians might have been removed, the Creeks driven back to their nation, and the Seminoles taken anywhere that the Government would direct. The present arrangement has cost the United States near two hundred thousand dollars, four millions thirty-two thousand acres of land, and the blood of many unoffending women and children, in all probability, before this time; and they are in a worse condition now than they were at that time.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. W. concluded with a hope that the resolution would pass, and that some speedy and efficient measures would be adopted.

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

Mr. BURGESS moved to postpone the order of the day preceding the bills he had before named, and to consider these bills. The motion prevailed; and the House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDIOT in the chair, on the bill for the relief of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary war.

Mr. BURGESS said: Although many things have already been said concerning the subject now before the Committee of the whole House, yet, because, since that time, it was referred to the Committee on Military Pensions, and now comes up on their report, some explanation of that report may, at this time, be expected. I stand before you, sir, for the purpose of attempting to make that explanation. Every thing connected with the Revolutionary war is interesting to the people of this country; but nothing is so deeply interesting as the venerable survivors of that Army which conducted that war, in the camp and in the field. It is not from any powers at my command, of placing before you the concerns of these men, but from their moral qualities, and the peculiar relations existing between them and our country, that I now hope for your candor, your patience, and attention; and, notwithstanding their cause may be hopeless, in the hands of such an advocate, yet must it, I am persuaded, be perfectly secure, before such a tribunal.

It will be recollected that this subject came into this Congress at its first session, in consequence of the President's Message, and of a petition from the survivors of those officers of the Revolutionary Army who continued in service until the close of the war. The petition was referred to a select committee, and so much of the President's Message as related to this subject, to the Committee on Military Pensions. In the course of debate on the bills respectively reported by these committees, a recommitment, with instructions, was moved—and they were both, with instructions, recommitted; the result of that recommitment is the report of the Committee on Military Pensions, made in pursuance of those instructions, and stating "the number of those who served in the Revolutionary war, for whom provision ought to be made by law, the amount necessary to make such provision, and the manner in which it should be made." This report is now before this committee, and a complete explanation renders it necessary to divide those for whom, according to this report, provision ought to be made by law, into two classes. The first comprehends all the survivors of those officers, who continued in service till the close of the war, supposed to be four hundred, together with the surviving widows of such of those officers as have died since that time, supposed to be three hundred and forty-seven.

The amount necessary to make provision for this class, is, in this report, stated at $1,000,000. The manner in which this provision ought to be made, is therein proposed and detailed, giving to such officers 800,000 dollars, to be distributed to them according to their rank and pay, while in service, in a stock bearing a yearly interest of five per cent. payable quarterly, and redeemable at the pleasure of the nation. The amount of 200,000 dollars, provided for the widows of this class, is applied to their relief, by paying to each of them out of it, one hundred dollars a year, in quarterly payments. This fund is to be annually charged with these payments, and the balance annually credited with interest, at five per cent. It is calculated that this fund, so managed, will make provision for these venerable matrons during the remainder of their lives. The balance, if any then remain, will fall to the Treasury of the United States.

The second class comprehends all the survivors of those who, in the Revolutionary war, were engaged in the land or naval service of the United States during the continued term of nine months or upwards, being regular troops, either of, or not of the line, and not being pensioners of the United States, or of any one of them. It also comprehends all the surviving widows of such as served in manner as aforesaid, and who were also not on any roll of pensioners. The number of men of this class, for whom provision ought to be made by law, is stated by the report, and stated on the authority of facts drawn from the Department of War. The number of the army now alive, (not including the officers of the first class,) is not more than 18,500; of these, 500 are regular troops, not of the line, and served from one to three years. On the continental establishment are 1,500, who served nine months or upwards; 2,000 who served one year or upwards;

3,000 who served two years or upwards; and 11,500 who served three years or upwards. The number now on the pension list is 12,985. The number, therefore, not on the list of pensioners, who served in the Revolutionary war, of this class, for whom provision ought to be made by law, is 5,515. It is stated in the report, and the statement is made from calculations, that the number of widows of this class is about 4,729. The amount necessary to make provision for this class, is in the report stated at $2,000,000. The manner of making this provision, is similar to the manner of making that for those of the other class. It consists in creating $1,200,000 of five per cent. stocks, and distributing them according to rank and duration of time in service, to this last remnant of the Revolutionary army; and, in appropriating $800,000 to the creation of a fund, out of which to pay annuities of $30 each to the surviving widows, of such of this class of the army as have now passed beyond the reach of national munificence. You, therefore, have, sir, in this report, according to the instructions, the probable number of those who ought to be provided for by law; the amount of that provision, and the manner of making it. The reasons inducing your committee to make this report, involve many considerations. This committee had in view the character of the army; the nature of their service; their compensation.

It may, by some, be deemed a waste of time to speak of the character of an army which fills so large a space in the history of the last century. It is not so considered by those who wish to place the whole of this subject under one view, and to make one more attempt to redeem their country from any imputation of injustice or illiberality towards this army. Besides, it was not forgotten that in this House it had been said, the resolutions for enlarged pay, and pensions for life, were extorted from Congress by a spirit of mutiny in the army, and made merely to appease that spirit, and save the country from its consequences. Although all who know the facts must know that none of the relations of verisimilitude exist between those facts, and these assertions; yet, because what we are doing to-day will become a part of the history of that army, and of our country, I would not permit that history to pass into the hands of the children of future generations, with one page where such assertions found, for one moment, shelter under silence, or stood an instant unrefuted by the recorded truth. The character of this army, sir, has stood unimpeached, while the greatest men on earth have been calumniated. That "slander which doth belie all corners of the world," had not belied this army. General Washington, in his letter to Congress, dated March 18th, 1783, gives this high testimonial to their glorious character: "I am," says this illustrious man, "pleading the cause of an army which has done and suffered more than any other

JANUARY, 1827.]

Removal of Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

[H. OF R.]

army ever did, in the defence of the rights and liberties of human nature."

Mr. BUREKS moved to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert an entirely new bill.

Before any question was taken on this motion, Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, moved that the committee rise, report progress, and have leave to sit again.

The motion prevailed.

FRIDAY, January 5.

Navy Yard at Philadelphia.

Mr. BARTLETT, from the Naval Committee, reported the following joint resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to request the Government of the State of Pennsylvania to cede to the United States jurisdiction over such lands as are owned by the United States, and improved for public purposes, at the Navy Yard near Philadelphia."

This resolution was twice read.

Mr. BARTLETT, in reporting this resolution, said, that the object of it was to put this Navy Yard on the same footing with other similar establishments of the United States. The ground covered by it had been subjected to taxes under the authority of the State of Pennsylvania. On investigation, it appeared that no right had been acquired by the United States to jurisdiction over it; and the Secretary of the Navy has not felt himself authorized to apply for the cession without previous authorization by Congress. Upon this state of things this resolution was founded.

Mr. WURTS took this opportunity to explain his view of this subject. At the last session of Congress, many gentlemen had thought this property had been subjected to a State tax by the authority of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania. This was not the fact, because there was no direct State land tax in Pennsylvania. But it had been subjected to county rates. The county officers had no right to omit these lands in their assessment, until they should be exempted by the State authority from taxation. This had not been asked by the Government of the United States: if it had been, it would not have been refused. If now asked, he presumed the State would assent to the request, as it had done to a former request in reference to streets running through the yard. The resolution now before the House was in a different spirit, and of a different character from that before the House at the last session, on the same subject, and he saw no reason to oppose its passage.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed.

Discriminating Duties on Swedish Vessels.

Mr. TOMLINSON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to exempt Swedish and Norwegian vessels, and the merchandise imported therein, from the payment of discriminating duties of tonnage and impost, for a limited time, and for other purposes.

The bill having received two readings—

Mr. TOMLINSON remarked, that, before making a motion which he intended to make with the view of giving a direction to the bill which would enable him to bring it to the consideration of the House at an early day, he would take leave briefly to explain the necessity of promptly passing the bill.

Mr. T. proceeded to state that, on the 25th of September last, the commercial treaty between the United States and the King of Sweden and Norway, of the 4th of September, 1816, expired. By that treaty American vessels, their cargoes, of American produce, were entitled and exempted from the payment of discriminating duties of tonnage and impost in the Swedish ports and vessels; and their cargoes, belonging to the subjects of the King of Sweden, were entitled to a like exemption in the ports of the United States. The Chargé d'Affaires of the King of Sweden, at Washington, on the 26th of September last, officially announced to our Government, that the King of Sweden had determined to observe the stipulations of the treaty, on his part, although the same had expired. Swedish vessels have recently arrived in the ports of the United States, and been subjected, by the existing laws, to the payment of the discriminating duties, which had been suspended by the treaty.

The course to be pursued by the Government of the United States is plain. It ought to reciprocate the frank and friendly conduct of the King of Sweden, and to exempt Swedish and Norwegian vessels and their cargoes, the produce of Sweden and Norway, arriving in the ports of the United States, from the payment of discriminating duties for a limited time. This time, said he, need not be long; for the expectation may be justly entertained, that the negotiation pending between the two Governments will speedily terminate in the renewal of the expired treaty. This Government, too, ought promptly to refund or remit any discriminating duties that may have been paid or secured to be paid, under any such circumstances.

The bill, on motion of Mr. T., was then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

SATURDAY, January 6.

Removal of Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

Mr. HAILE moved the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to aid the removal of such Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians as may be disposed to emigrate west of the Mississippi.

2. Resolved, That the same committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of reimbursing to such of the missionaries as may accompany the said Indians in their removal, the money expended by them in the erection of buildings, to aid them in the erection of other buildings for schools.

In support of the first resolution, Mr. HAILE observed that it must be well known to the House, that, to make further appropriations for the purpose of obtaining land from the Indians, by treaty, was perfectly useless. It was so, because the Indians are completely under the control of white men, whose interest is adverse to such cession. The object embraced in the resolution was important not to Mississippi alone, but to all States similarly circumstanced in relation to the Indian tribes. It was the interest of all such States that every facility should be given for the removal of this population to the west of the Mississippi; and they would have emigrated long since, if there had been any appropriation for the purpose of aiding them in their removal. But they were ignorant of the country through which they had to pass, and they never would cross the swamps and go to the place assigned for their future abode, unless some steps were taken to encourage and assist them. [Mr. H. here read the following extract from the report of the Secretary of War on this subject: "Many of the Indians (Choctaws) are disposed to emigrate, but are so ignorant of the route, or the means by which they can reach the contemplated settlement, that they are deterred from making an effort; but, with an active, intelligent conductor, who could inform them where, and how, they could obtain such aids as the Government will furnish them on the route, many would, in my opinion, soon set out for a country so much better adapted to their wants and habits than where they now are."] The object of the second resolution he stated to be, to reimburse the missionaries now among the Chickasaws and Choctaws for the value of the school-houses they have erected, and which must, in case of removal, be abandoned. He considered it politic in Government to conciliate these missionaries, as no measure could succeed among the Indians if these persons exerted their influence to oppose it. He considered it as highly important that the missionaries should accompany the tribes in their removal, as their presence and influence on the other side of the Mississippi might operate to prevent bloodshed among the different tribes.

Mr. COOKS (Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs) said, that if his friend from Mississippi had paid attention to a bill which had, at the last session, been reported by the committee to which he belonged, and had been reprinted the present session, he felt persuaded he would not have offered this resolution. He would find, on examining that bill, that it went much farther than the resolution—including in its provisions all the Indians who were to remove, and securing whatever was requisite to effect their removal. Should that bill pass, the whole object of the resolution would be obtained; but, if not, then it would be inexpedient and improper to make a distinction between the Indians of Mississippi and those in other States quite as anxious to get rid of them. If the resolution should be adopted, its only effect would be to give the Committee on Indian Affairs the trouble of stating, in a written report, the same things in substance as he had now stated verbally.

Mr. HAILE disclaimed all intention to embarrass that committee; but the State he had the honor to represent was peculiarly situated—two-thirds of its chartered limits were occupied by Indians, and one of the largest counties in the State was separated by their interposition from the rest of the settled portion of the country; hence, great inconvenience arose, especially with respect to absconding debtors, taxable land, &c. It might be true that the bill covered all the objects of the resolution; but it included other provisions which might cause its rejection, and to which the resolution would not be exposed. Similar laws had passed Congress for the benefit of other States; yet Mississippi had waited with patience, and had never been clamorous for her rights, &c.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, inquired whether it was in order to propose to do by resolution what had already been done in a bill, reported by the very committee named in the resolution.

The Chair decided that, if the resolution contained no matter different from the bill, it would not be in order; but he believed that part of it in relation to reimbursing the missionaries for their school-houses was not in the bill. The resolution was, therefore, not out of order.

Mr. McLEAN then moved to lay it upon the table, which prevailed, and the resolution was laid on the table accordingly.

[On a subsequent day the resolutions were agreed to.]

Exportation of Free People of Color.

Mr. WEEKS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee be appointed by this House, to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the transportation of such free people of color as may wish to be sent to the colony at Liberia.

Mr. WEEKS said it was not his intention, at the moment of offering a subject of this nature for the consideration of this honorable body, to attempt entering into the merits of the proposition, because he would wish it to remain for consideration; but, with the indulgence of the House, he would state, in as condensed a manner as possible, two reasons that had influenced his mind, with the hope that it might induce every member of Congress to examine well the subject. In Maryland, said he, the State which I have the honor in part to represent, it has been found impracticable to extend to this unhappy part of our community, equal rights as criminals, in the blessings even of penitentiary confinement. At first we did, until it was found that, in a few more years, a building

JANUARY, 1827.]

Appointments of Chargés des Affaires.

[H. OF R.]

covering ten or twelve acres would not, perhaps, contain them. Banishment, therefore, has been substituted, and, although furnished with a copy of the record, they have no security for future liberty: on the contrary, they are purchased and carried to a distance; and it is verily believed that they are no sooner beyond the confines of the State, than they are robbed of that evidence, and carried into slavery for life. Regretted, as this must be, by all men of feeling, there is no remedy, it would seem, left; so that, in truth, whilst we are endeavoring to prevent the slave trade being any longer carried on by American citizens abroad, we are, in fact, carrying it on at home. Another reason is, sir, that now, satisfied of their degraded situation, a large number of the free blacks of Maryland have memorialized the citizens of Baltimore on the subject, making a strong appeal to their best feelings of charity and justice; inviting assistance sufficient only to wait them to the land of their forefathers—to the young colony at Liberia, where they expect to be able, as humble instruments in the hands of the Great I AM, to cause the wilderness to rejoice, and the heathen become the worshippers of the living God. They have reminded us of our ancestors, when forced by persecution to emigrate to this country—then a savage wilderness; now the Paradise of the world. And shall we not endeavor to do something to meet this call; thereby aiding in the very object, perhaps, which was intended to be produced, when our forefathers were persuaded to bring them here? For I never can consent, sir, to view it in any other light, believing, as I do, that the right of property of this sort of purchase with our money, has been recognized under every dispensation from God to man. It is the justice and humanity of the act, sir, that influences my conduct, and not a belief that there is any thing like a mine that may be blown up with a match—

Mr. W. was here interrupted by Mr. WEBSTER, who made a point of order: inquiring if it was in order to discuss a resolution, when the person who offered it himself expressed his intention to move that it lie on the table—a motion to lay any proposition upon the table not being debatable.

After some explanations by the Chair,

Mr. WEBSTER demanded that the previous question of consideration be taken.

The question was accordingly taken, "Will the House now consider the resolution?" And it was decided in the negative by a large majority.

So, for the present, the subject passed off.

TUESDAY, January 9.

Appointments of Chargés des Affaires.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. BLAIR yesterday and laid upon the table, was called up and read:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House whether any, and if any, what number of Chargés des Affaires have been appointed since the 1st day of January, 1826, without the advice and consent of the Senate; and whether, in any case, such appointment has been made after notice had been given of the intention of a Minister abroad to return, and after his successor had been appointed; also, by what authority, and what length of time did said temporary appointment continue, what the duties to be discharged and what the compensation paid."

Mr. BRENT having inquired of the gentleman from Tennessee what was his precise object in moving this call—

Mr. BLAIR stated the grounds on which he had brought this motion; but the position of the reporter prevented his hearing him as distinctly as he could wish. Mr. B. was understood to say, that he had been informed, that, in one case at least, our Ministers abroad had appointed Chargés des Affaires to succeed them, who had received not only the salary annexed to that office, but also the outfit. He had looked in vain into the constitution and the laws for any authority in any foreign Minister, to make such appointment; and, if the fact was as he supposed, the public money had been paid to a person not authorized to receive it. As the Representative of a portion of this Union, he said he felt it to be his duty to raise his voice against such appointments, and against such expenditure of the public money. He wished, therefore, to have the facts authentically before him.

Mr. FORSYTH (Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations) said, it had been the constant practice of the Government, for many years, to have persons charged with their affairs with foreign nations, when the Minister of the United States either died at his post, or was temporarily absent. The persons charged with our affairs in such cases, were sometimes designated beforehand by the Government, anticipating the necessity of having them, or left by the Minister when the Government had no opportunity of giving its directions. A moment's reflection would satisfy the gentleman from Tennessee that the public interests required these trusts to be confided. The person charged temporarily with our affairs abroad, generally the Secretary of Legation, was usually allowed compensation for these services, in addition to his pay as Secretary of Legation—paid, Mr. F. presumed, out of the contingent fund of foreign intercourse. Mr. F. knew nothing of the facts to which the gentleman from Tennessee alluded, and certainly was not opposed to the inquiry he proposed. If there had been any thing wrong, it ought to be known, and the error corrected or exposed.

Mr. EVERETT said he should not oppose the call proposed by the resolution. On the contrary, the amendment which he should suggest to the resolution would go to make it more comprehensive, by striking out the limitation which it proposed as to the time of the inquiry.

He moved then to strike out the first day of January, 1826, and insert in lieu thereof the fourth day of March, 1789, so that the whole practice of the Government should be brought to the view of this House, and an opportunity given to members to make up their opinions understandingly.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the idea which some seemed to entertain, that diplomatic appointments are regulated by statute, was entirely erroneous. He thought that matter had been fully understood in this House, whatever errors of opinion on the subject might exist out of it. The power of appointing foreign Ministers was given by the constitution to the Executive—to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The office exists by the laws of nations: the constitution prescribes the mode of appointing to it. The practice, Mr. W. said, had uniformly been, as the gentleman from Georgia had stated it. On the death of a Minister, the Secretary of Legation attached to the mission, becomes ipso facto the Chargé des Affaires. Mr. W. did not know that any great inconvenience resulted from the exercise of this power by our Ministers, when about to leave their stations; and still less in the case of a Secretary of Legation becoming Chargé des Affaires by the death of a Minister—that being an opportunity for serving their friends, which he imagined our Ministers abroad do not very much covet. Mr. W. thought the answer to the inquiry would be too voluminous, by its embracing an account of what duties these persons have discharged: and he suggested to the gentleman the propriety of striking out that part of the resolution; in which shape he should have no objection to it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, since the gentleman from Tennessee had consented to accept the modification proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) he cared very little whether the resolution passed or not. It had become so extensive, that the object of it would be defeated. Mr. B. said he had understood the gentleman from Tennessee to make a distinct charge—if he did not, Mr. B. wished him to say so—that not only had a Minister of the United States abroad appointed a Chargé des Affaires on his leaving the station, (which appointment Mr. B. admitted was necessary and proper,) but that that Chargé, besides receiving the salary attached to that office, during the time he held it, had received an outfit. He knew not whether he was correct in this impression; but, if he was wrong, he hoped the gentleman would correct him. But, if the gentleman had received such information as this, and the information was true, no practice whatever could make it a correct proceeding. Previous practice might justify the appointment of a Chargé des Affaires, and the allowance of a salary to him; but it could never justify an expenditure from the contingent fund for allowing him an outfit, in addition to the salary. This distinct fact had been proposed to be inquired into; but, by the amendment moved by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and accepted by the gentleman from Tennessee, that single point would be smothered under a mass of documents, which, if received within any reasonable time, would be entirely useless. Mr. B. added another remark: If the salary of our Ministers abroad was so low as to make it necessary for them to return to the country, annually, to receive an outfit to enable them to appear in a manner becoming our Representatives at foreign Governments, that salary ought to be increased. If it was not so, the practice of changing our Ministers abroad every year, could not be justified. It was a practice which must be essentially injurious to the interests of the country: for, if a negotiation was opened abroad, the Minister often returned before it was completed, leaving the matter unsettled, greatly to the detriment of our interest. Mr. B. concluded by saying, that he had no particular objection to the resolution: but he suggested to the gentleman from Tennessee, whether, clogged as it now was, he had not better abandon the resolution altogether, and on another day bring in a new resolution, confined to the object which he had specially in view.

Mr. WEBSTER said, notwithstanding the solemn denial of the gentleman from Georgia, it is as true as it was before he rose, that there is no statute or law of Congress prescribing what number of public Ministers or other diplomatic agents, should be appointed, or to what courts, or on what occasions they should be sent. He (Mr. W.) had said, and now repeated, that a Minister was a national functionary, known to the law of nations; the office had its origin, and derived its character from that law. The constitution recognized the office, as existing in the intercourse of nations, and vested the appointment of the officer in the President and Senate. It belonged to the Executive to decide on what occasions Public Ministers should be appointed, and to what courts, and to decide on their number. He did not say now, whether all this might, or might not, be regulated by law. He spoke only to the fact. It was not so regulated nor ever had been. The only law on the subject was that which limited the power of the President as to the amount of salary allowed to these officers. Here Congress had set bounds. In all other respects the subject rested in Executive discretion. He was at issue with the gentleman from Georgia on a plain matter of fact, an inquiry as to what the statute contained. He had said, and he repeated, that there was no other statute provision except that which limited the compensation. If there were any other, the gentleman from Georgia could easily turn to it; and he particularly invited him to point it out. If he should not do so, his solemn denial of what he had said, that was, that no particular mission or ministerial appointment, was made in pursuance of any statute, would still not shake the truth of that proposition.

Mr. POWELL said, that, whenever there was

JANUARY, 1827.

Land Claims in Ohio.

[H. OF R.]

a suggestion of abuse of power by the Executive, he thought it became the duty of this House to sustain any inquiry into such abuse, which was proposed. If the Executive has abused his power it ought to be known, and if proved, to undergo the reprobation of this House. If, however, he has strictly discharged his duty, it was due to him that the House should institute the inquiry, to relieve him from unjust imputation. He hoped, therefore, that the resolution would be allowed to pass in the shape which it had assumed.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that he wished it to be understood, that he was perfectly willing to vote for the resolution as now amended: his only objection, was its violation, in his opinion, of the spirit of the rules of the House.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, as amended, as decided in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, January 10.

Land Claims in Ohio.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOFFMAN in the chair, on the bill "providing for the relinquishment of certain claims to lands sold by the United States in the State of Ohio."

[This bill, which refers to the gore of land lying between what are known as Ludlow's and Roberts' lines, had twice passed the House at former sessions, but was lost in the Senate for want of time to act upon it. As the bill is one of local interest merely, a succinct statement of the grounds of controversy, with a few of the leading arguments on each side only, are given.]

When Virginia ceded to the United States the great body of her Western lands, among other conditions of the cession was one for satisfying out of those lands the claims of a certain body of her militia under General Clarke; and if certain tracts south of the Ohio River should prove insufficient for this object, then an additional tract was set apart on the north side of that river. The case contemplated, occurred. The lands south of the Ohio were insufficient, and the tract on the north of it was to be appropriated. This tract had the river Ohio on the south, the Scioto on the east, the Little Miami on the west, and on the north a line running from the source of one of these rivers to the source of the other. The United States Surveyor's name was Ludlow; he traced the Little Miami to its source; and, as the Scioto lay far east, he naturally concluded that its source would be east of the source of the Miami. He accordingly commenced at the source of the Miami, and ran a random line in such a direction as he supposed would bring him out near the head waters of the Scioto; but when this line had been run as far as to meet the Indian boundary, the Indians met the party, and prevented their proceeding any farther. So that Ludlow's line never reached the Scioto at all. It being, however, the only authority, was taken for the true line, and the United States went on to sell the public lands west of it up to this line. On farther examination, however, it was found that the Scioto River wound round about, towards the west, in such a manner as to pass entirely the head waters of the Little Miami, and to have its source some distance west of the source of that river. A new line was now run from one source to the other; and the divergence of these two lines, (the first false and supposititious, the latter correct and the true line,) left a gore of land which the United States had partly sold to settlers, but which was now found to be within the reserve for Virginia Military Warrants. Warrants were accordingly laid upon various parts of it, some of which had been occupied and improved by persons who had title from the United States. A suit was instituted, to try the question, and the United States Supreme Court having decided one of these in favor of the warrant holder, it is manifest that the Government must either satisfy the other warrant holders, or let them go on to eject the settlers, and then reimburse the latter. The bill proposed to pay the warrant holders the appraised value of their several lots as in a state of nature, and for this purpose, appropriated about 60,000 dollars.]

The bill was strenuously resisted by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, and as warmly defended by Mr. VINTON, of the same State. Messrs. COCKE, WEBSTER, VANCE, LIVINGSTON, MERCER, and WRIGHT, also engaged incidentally in the debate.

Mr. THOMPSON's argument was in substance the following:—That the bill was based on a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon an agreed case, in which all the facts were not before it, and in which one main fact, viz: the validity of Roberts' line, was assumed. He strongly insinuated that there had been intrigue and management in procuring the agreed case. By an act of Congress, in 1807, no Virginia warrant was to be valid, if located on lands of the United States already surveyed and entered, but the location of the warrant of General McArthur (the party mainly to receive the benefits of the bill) was not made till 1810, and was, therefore, void by that law. The Supreme Court, however, assumed that it had been made before 1807. A part of the lands to be affected by the bill are in litigation at this time, and the only decision which has been had, is against the warrant holder. A new trial was awarded to General McArthur, however, through the indulgence of the Court. He affirmed that neither of the two lines is accurate. It was difficult to make it so, as, both rivers take their rise in a marshy country, full of ponds, where two streams often arise from the same pond, and run in different directions. But, in the agreed case, Roberts' line was taken as the true line, and the court decided on this supposition. The Government of the United States, through courtesy, desired the co-operation of Virginia, to satisfy all, of her disposition in good faith to fulfil the objects of the grant. Now, Virginia never gave any act of assent to Roberts' line. It is true, the agreed case was made under orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, but that officer had no authority to agree away any of the United States lands: and Congress is now asked, in effect, to buy up a set of claims which are litigated, and have once been decided against. Those suits ought first to be settled on a full investigation of all the evidence.

Mr. VINTON's reply was, in substance, as follows:—That a precisely similar bill had already twice passed the House, after a full argument. There had been three different reports of the Committee on Public Lands, in relation to this case, all which agreed, and in which the committees were unanimous. The objections had all been twice discussed, and overruled. But his colleague had exhibited some feeling, and had made insinuations which rendered a statement of facts necessary. Mr. V. here gave a detailed history of the whole case, with the date of the several public acts in relation to it. He repelled the insinuations of Mr. T. in relation to the management used by General McArthur, in the suit referred to. In that case the United States had ordered the District Attorney to make the United States a party in the suit. It had taken the defence into its own hands, and the suit was decided against the Government, and in favor of the plaintiff warrant holder.

The agreement in the case about Roberts' line, was the Government's own, and ought of course to bind the Government. Virginia did accede to the correctness of Roberts' line, and founded a claim upon its survey. The only question on which a doubt could rest, was, whether the act of 1807 did, or did not, forbid the location of Virginia warrants on lands sold by the United States; and the Supreme Court, by an argument which he deemed irrefragable, had decided that it was only intended to quiet claims as existing between different Virginia warrant holders. That decision, at all events, puts the question at rest.

As for the suit in the Inferior Court of Ohio, if it proved any thing, it proved that that court deemed McArthur's claim to be valid. In the first verdict, it was decided against him, but because the court forbade his patent to be brought before the jury, and instructed the jury to bring the verdict, the very next day, on rightly understanding the case, they granted a new trial, on the ground that the jury had been mis-directed by the court. But let that decision be ever so good, the Supreme Court of the nation has decided otherwise, and its decision must stand.

If the bill is refused, the warrant holders will proceed and eject the United States settlers; and they, holding title from the United States, must be remunerated, not only for the naked value of the land, as in a state of nature, but for their valuable improvements also; and, instead of sixty thousand dollars, the Government must pay, in the end, several hundred thousand.

Mr. WEBSTER summed up the case in one question, which he addressed to the Committee on the Public Lands, viz: whether the title of these Virginia claimants has been fairly tried and fairly settled? If it had, the bill was certainly expedient and necessary; nor could Government be too early in quieting the fears of those who had purchased from it, and now found them invalid.

Mr. LIVINGSTON doubted if the validity of Roberts' line had ever been established by judicial decision. In the case submitted to the Supreme Court, its validity was not brought into discussion; and though the decision of the court might operate as an estopper in that particular suit, it extended no farther. He did not know if the accuracy of the line had ever been questioned. It appeared from the statements of gentlemen, that the United States Commissioners, and those of Virginia, agreed as to the sources of the rivers—and this line run between them. If that is the true line, there could be no question as to the expediency of the bill. He wished, however, to know what assurance the Government had that this appraisalment would be acquiesced in, and the appropriation accepted by the claimants? Had there been any negotiation with them on the subject? If not, how was the appraisalment of the United States Commissioners obligatory on them, and after receiving the sum in the bill, what hindered their still proceeding against the United States settlers?

Mr. MERCER made some observations, which were imperfectly heard. Their general tenor was, that Virginia had never questioned Roberts' line. McArthur stepped into the shoes of Virginia, (having purchased her warrants,) and if his claim was good, it was obviously just to satisfy it, and save the settlers from disturbance.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said he had been engaged during the discussion, in the performance of duties assigned him by the House in another part of the building, and had not heard what had been advanced on either side. On coming into the House a moment since, he had been informed that his colleague (Mr. THOMPSON) had imputed to him improper motives or conduct in his connection with the agreed facts in the case of the Lessee of Doddridge vs Thompson & Wright, decided by the Supreme Court. I will take it kindly of my colleague, (Mr. W. said,) if he will now repeat what he did say in relation to that agreed case, and my agency in it.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, rose, and said he had not intended to cast any imputation upon his colleague, (Mr. WRIGHT,) in relation to that case. All he meant to say, was, that the committee had no evidence that the agreed case was made under the direction of the Government, and if there was such evidence, that neither the Government nor the Attorney could agree away the facts in controversy, nor make an agreement in that case which could be considered as affecting any other case, or any thing beyond the land claimed in that suit.

JANUARY, 1837.]

Revolutionary Pensioners.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed. When the ejectment suit was brought by Doddridge against Thompson, I was the District Attorney of the United States in Ohio. I did not suppose it pertained to my ordinary official duties to appear to, or defend the suit. Thompson did not appear. I was instructed by the then Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. Meigs, to appear to the suit on account of the interest of the United States in the question, and so conduct it as to bring it for decision to the Supreme Court of the United States. Under their instructions, and the advice of the Circuit Judge, my name was inserted in the case as defendant, representing the interest of the United States. The maps, papers, and documents, which, on my part, were carried into the agreed case, were furnished from the Land Office. No trial was had in Ohio. Judgment was taken there for the defendants, pro forma, and the case removed by the plaintiff to the Supreme Court here. I had no interest in the case, nor other agency than under the direction of the Land Office.

Not having heard the discussion to-day, I am at a loss to understand how it could bear on the question to inquire, whether the agreement extended beyond the case in which it was made? But if, as my colleague seems to suppose, it has been urged, that the facts agreed in the case referred to, embraced all the lands lying between Ludlow's and Roberts' lines, he is certainly correct in supposing the agreement did not extend, and could not be extended so far. In the nature of things, an agreed state of facts, in a cause pending, would be limited and confined to that case, and could not be relied on to conclude any one in another case. But if the argument was, as I should suppose it probable, that, if the legal principles settled by the court in the case of Doddridge vs. Thompson and Wright, were the same as arose in other cases, the decision settling those principles would be applicable to those other cases when they should arise, and be held conclusive upon the Government and individuals, then the argument is certainly correct.

I have no design to engage in the discussion of the question before the committee, and only rose to make the statement and explanation I have.

Mr. COOKE produced a report made to the Senate on this same subject, which he wished read at the Clerk's table.

Mr. WEBSTER opposed this measure as a violation of order. The gentleman might read it, but the House could not, as such, order the reading of a report, any more than of a speech, made in a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature.

Mr. VANCE said that that document was not the report of the Land Committee, but was drawn up by one of its members, who wished to have it adopted as such, but that the committee being equally divided, one of its members, (Mr. VAN DYKE,) being indisposed and unable to attend, who had formerly been in favor of this bill, the document was printed at the request of the member who drew it up, and not by authority of the committee.

Mr. VANCE, (in whose district the land in question lies,) wishing to give a further statement of the facts of the case, with which he said he was fully acquainted, moved that the committee rise.

It rose accordingly, and having reported progress, had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 11.

Free Blacks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, which was directed to inquire whether there be in force in said District, any law which authorizes the imprisonment of any free man of color, and his sale as an unclaimed slave, for jail fees and other charges, made a report upon the subject, in which the case of Gilbert Houghton, the free man of color from New York, is stated.

Mr. POWELL accompanied his report by the following bill:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever any person shall be apprehended or committed in the City of Washington, or Georgetown, or in the county of Washington, as a runaway, and it should appear, upon examination, that the said person is entitled to his or her freedom, the jail fees and other legal expenses of such apprehension or commitment shall be chargeable upon the corporations of the said towns, or county aforesaid, as the case may be, and be collected and paid over in the same manner as other public charges.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act of the State of Maryland, passed in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifteen, entitled 'An act relating to servants and slaves,' and now in force in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, as authorizes the commitment and sale of free persons of color, for prison fees and other charges of apprehension, upon suspicion of their being runaways, shall be, and the same is, hereby, repealed."

This bill was made the order of the day for to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 12.

Revolutionary Pensioners.

Mr. WORTHINGTON submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, who are now on the pension roll, in consequence of wounds received in the Revolutionary War, not amounting to a total disability, the same amount of pension as is allowed to persons of the aforesaid ranks laboring under disability of the highest degree.

Mr. WORTHINGTON said, that, with the permission of the House, he would briefly state the reasons which had induced him to submit the resolution under consideration.

It will be seen by its phraseology, said he, that it is confined exclusively to the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, who were disabled by wounds in the severe and arduous conflict of the Revolution, and to such of them only as are now on the pension roll. The pensions allowed to the commissioned officers may be sufficient for their decent support; but this is not the case with the description of persons embraced by the resolution. By the act of 1816, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, laboring under the highest degree of disability, are allowed eight dollars a month, and for disabilities of a less degree than the highest, a sum proportionably less. Under this provision, while some receive eight dollars per month, others receive less, according to the degree of disability. Now, the object of the resolution is to put them all on an equality, by allowing them eight dollars a month. At the time of the passage of the act of 1816, this scale of allowance might have been proper, but after the lapse of ten years, when old age and wounds combined, amount to a total disability, the reasons for graduating their pensions no longer exist. Under the act of 1816, the War Department does not consider old age a disability; and, although a soldier may be unable to procure subsistence, by manual labor, in consequence of wounds and old age combined, yet he is allowed only according to the degree of disability under which he originally labored in consequence of wounds alone. But, sir, independent of these calculations, I am impelled by other considerations to mete to these war-worn soldiers, these "remnants of an age gone by," the most liberal allowance. If any class of citizens deserve the munificence of the Government more than another, it is the one we are now considering. It was not for mercenary views, nor in pursuit of a criminal ambition, they arrayed themselves under the military standard. No, sir; it was under the sacred banner of liberty and independence they bared their bosoms to the fury of the storm. No, sir; it was in the noble cause of liberty against slavery, of freemen against tyrants, that these men of the old Roman stamp so profusely poured out their blood, and fearlessly encountered sufferings and dangers almost incredible to the generation of the present day. These men, who entered the "imminent deadly breach," who endured misery in all its shapes, are now languishing in penury, and their subsistence is made to depend upon an arithmetical calculation as to the degree of disability under which they originally labored. I am as much opposed, said Mr. W., to the extension of the pension system, as any member of this House; but the resolution contemplates an increase only of pension to the living and maimed monuments of their country's emancipation; to men to whom you and I, Mr. Speaker, and all of us, are so deeply indebted for our civil, religious, and political liberty—in a word, for all our happiness: for, without these blessings, the world is a great "waste, where nought but fiends and tempests howl." Sir, it is to these men, laboring under wounds, scarcely yet cicatrized, and bending to the earth under a superincumbent weight of infirmity and years, that I would open the national purse, and gladden thereby their last days, by this new evidence of our gratitude.

My resolution is emphatically in favor of the common soldier, and to him I wish the attention of the committee to be directed. I hope, with this view, the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. McCOR hoped that, before the House took any step to increase either the number or the amount of pensions, that they would have the whole case before them. Much of the graduated pension to which the resolution referred, was drawn by persons in wealthy circumstances, who did not need this addition to their income—and as for those poorer, the House may be sure that they would relinquish the graduated pension, and accept the eight dollars per month, if they could show that they came within the provision of the law which granted it. This entire subject, Mr. McC. said, had been thoroughly examined in 1820, when the law amendatory of the first pension law was passed, and was then well understood.

Mr. WORTHINGTON replied, that he had offered the resolution, because those who now received the graduated pension, had represented it as proper, and had applied to have the law thus altered.

Mr. LITTLE observed, that the resolution did not confine itself to those alone who were included within the act of 1816, but extended to many others. It included those who had not been on the Continental establishment, as well as those who had. He thought a distinction between these classes ought not to be made, and he should vote for the resolution.

The resolution was then agreed to by the House.

Preservation of Live-Oak Timber.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the more effectual preservation of the live-oak timber on the public lands; and further, to inquire into the expediency of forming plantations for the rearing of live-oak for the future supply of that timber for the Navy of the United States.

Mr. WHITE said he was induced to invite the attention of Congress to this subject, from a conviction that it was one of much more importance than was generally imagined. He was sensible that there were but two ways by which the Government of the United States could protect itself against the destruction of all that valuable timber, and the consequent embarrassments it would produce to the nation. The one was by a speedy adjustment of all the private claims derived from foreign Governments in Louisiana and Florida, and some more effectual provisions for the preservation of this timber on the public lands, after the private is separated from the public lands; and the other is by forming plantations for the supply of it for future emergencies when that on the public domain shall be destroyed. The live-oak, said Mr. W., is believed only to be found, at least in any quantity, along the sea-coast of the United States, south of latitude 34. It is the most valuable wood used in ship building, being nearly equal to the teak in durability and strength, and much superior in buoyancy. For timbers of ships of war, it is universally admitted to be the most valuable. The British Government is so sensible of this, that I am credibly informed, that they have actually at this moment agents engaged in the Southern States and in Florida, in purchasing and shipping live oak to England, cut to moulds in the shape of knees, heart-hooks, stern-posts, &c. Acts of Congress have been repeatedly passed, for the preservation of this valuable wood, but there can be no doubt the quantity is rapidly diminishing, even in Florida, which appears to be its favorite region. A wise policy, that does not confine its views to the present moment, but looks to the future, requires of us not only an attention to the immediate and passing interests of the day, but also to lay the foundations of future benefits of our country. An English gentleman, Evelyn, is now considered one of the greatest benefactors of the English nation, for having, a century ago, suggested and executed an extensive plantation of the English Navy oak, and, if rightly informed, these plantations now form a part of the permanent policy of that great nation.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Preservation of Live-Oak Timber.

[H. OF R.]

The growth of live-oak is extremely rapid; being an evergreen, it is scarcely ever interrupted; at twenty-five years of age it becomes sufficiently large for most purposes of ship building. It grows everywhere in our light sandy soil, and all that would be necessary, after transplanting, would be to keep the fires out of the tract selected for the purpose. That this is no visionary idea, I will mention that the suggestion was thrown out by one of the most practical and experienced officers of our Navy, the President of the Navy Board, on his visit to Florida, and it will not be thought trivial, when it is known that the late Emperor of Russia ordered his agent to send him two barrels of the live-oak acorns, for the purpose of attempting plantations in the southern part of his dominions. One hundred acres would contain two thousand trees, which might be planted near the Navy Yard at Pensacola. The land reserved at that place for the Navy Yard abounds with young trees, and the ridge in the rear of the yard seems to be peculiarly adapted to such plantations. As the country is now situated, with unadjusted titles covering large bodies of land, some good, and others vicious, those who wish to cut the timber can do so, and plead a pretended title, which shields them from punishment because it is filed for decision either before the commissioners, or is referred by them to Congress, where experience, melancholy experience proves, they are laid up for years, honest and dishonest claims all rejected, not by any decision, but by delay, and a failure to examine them. As the subject has been introduced to the consideration of Congress by the President, and has been referred to committees in both Houses, we may confidently hope that the public faith of the nation will be redeemed by the confirmation of valid claims, and that the public domain will be ascertained by the approval of the good, and the prompt rejection of vicious and fraudulent claims, and when that "consummation, most devoutly to be wished," has been accomplished, some decisive and energetic measures can be proposed and executed for the preservation of the public timber; and in the mean time, an experiment can be made without expense on the reserves for the Navy Yard at Pensacola, for the plantation and cultivation of the live-oak.

Mr. INGHAM said that he considered the House as indebted to the gentleman from Florida, for bringing the subject to its notice; but he was satisfied that a matter of so much importance could not have been neglected by the Executive, and that some measures had, doubtless, been taken in respect to it. He, therefore, moved to amend the resolution, as follows:

"And, also, inform this House whether any, and if any, what, measures have been taken for the preservation of the same."

Mr. COOKE agreed in the importance of preserving this valuable timber; but believed that there was already a law upon the subject; and it would not be very becoming in the House to inquire of any Department what was the law of the land on this, or any other subject. All private individuals were supposed, and bound, to know the law—much more the members of the Legislature itself.

Mr. INGHAM said, in reply, that his amendment did not propose to inquire whether any law existed, but what measures had been taken, by any authority whatever, on this subject.

Mr. WHITE explained. The law does exist; but it requires that the timber districts to be guarded must be made known by proclamation, and the lands he referred to had not been proclaimed. They were not recognized as public lands, because there were claimants who professed to hold title to them; and though it was probable that these titles would turn out to be vicious, yet, in the meanwhile, these claims prevented the lands from being treated as public, and from three to four hundred persons were upon them, constantly, engaged in cutting the timber. When questioned, or called to an account, they shielded themselves under their claims.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

MONDAY, January 15.

Polar Expedition.

Mr. WORTHINGTON said, that he was requested to present the memorial of a number of respectable citizens, inhabiting the western part of Maryland. He would state, in a few words, the objects of the memorialists.

At this enlightened period, when Great Britain, France, and Russia, were pushing their nautical and inland discoveries in every direction, this nation, notwithstanding its advantageous position on the globe, its immense resources, and the skill of its seamen, looked on with folded arms, and without in the least participating in their spirited enterprises. But the memorialists invite particularly, the attention of Congress to a thorough exploration of our northwest coast, and to an expedition to be fitted out to extend our knowledge of the frozen region of the Antarctic Circle. The first of these propositions, Mr. W. presumed, was predicated on the Message of the President at the late session of Congress; and the second, on the recent theories of Captain Symmes and others on concentric spheres, and the concavity of the earth. The exploration of the northwest coast, the memorialists considered, said Mr. W., an important object. Whilst other nations are acquiring fame by their discoveries, and perpetuating the names of their great men, by calling the discovered countries after them, we could boast of nothing in this field, but were indebted almost exclusively, for a knowledge of our own continent, to the genius and enterprise of foreigners. On the second proposition, said Mr. W., the memorialists, no doubt, conceived the recent theory of an aperture at the poles, and the concavity of the earth, not more difficult of belief to the present age, and would meet with less resistance, than the systems of Copernicus and others encountered, from the bigotry and persecution of the clergy, and the influence of Aristotle in the schools.

A polar basin is becoming familiar to the learned; and the same degree of heat at the poles, as at the equator, when the sun is at the solstitial points, is an idea long since entertained. It is probable these facts have given birth to the recent theories I have mentioned; and, as navigators have sailed as far north as eighty-two degrees, and some say, eighty-four, the memorialists wish the expedition fitted out by the Government, after exploring our own coast, to proceed to the south, as no navigator has been able to penetrate in that direction, farther than, he believed, for he spoke from recollection, seventy-two degrees. On looking over the memorial, he said, he perceived the names of gentlemen of great respectability, and of considerable scientific attainments, and he, therefore, conceived it due to them, to offer the few observations he had submitted.

The petition was received and committed.

Indian Land Titles in Arkansas.

Mr. CONWAY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the Choctaw title to lands, in the Territory of Arkansas.

Mr. HAILE said, that he did not know that he should be willing to oppose a resolution of this character; but a bill was about to be called up by the Committee on Indian Affairs, which provided for the gradual removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi, with the effect of which, he thought the resolution calculated to interfere. If the Indians, whom it is the purpose of Government to remove from the eastern side of the river, shall see that any part of the Territory proposed as their abode on the west side of it, are already about to be sold by the United States, the effect will be to fix their determination not to remove, but to remain in their present settlements. The resolution, he thought, was calculated to occasion to the Committee on Indian Affairs trouble that was unnecessary. No doubt, it was interesting to the people of Arkansas, that the Indian title to lands on the west of the river should be extinguished; but it was the interest and the wish of the Government that they should be removed thither—it ought, therefore, to do nothing, and to sanction nothing, which might have a tendency to fix the Indians on the east side of the river, where they believed their possessions were secure, by rendering insecure the prospect of possession to the west. He moved, therefore, to lay the resolution on the table, but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. CONWAY, who said he had no intention or wish to produce the smallest embarrassment. He knew, and the gentleman from Mississippi well knew, that there were many white persons who had settled on the lands in question, before they were set apart—and if the Indian title to these lands could be extinguished, the land can then be sold without impediment. The bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs covered the entire subject, and he was desirous that, when that bill would come up for discussion in Committee of the Whole, the committee might have the whole subject in its possession; he wished this as an advantage to the cause of the bill, and not as an impediment to its passage.

Mr. HAILE insisted on the ground he had before taken, and renewed his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was negatived, and then the resolution was agreed to by the House.

WEDNESDAY, January 17.

Tariff of Duties on Woollen Goods.

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole

JANUARY, 1827.]

Duties on Wool and Woollens.

[H. OF R.]

on the state of the Union, Mr. BUCHANAN in the chair, and took up the bill "for the alteration of the acts imposing duties on imports."

Mr. MALLARY said he would present a view of the subject, which had been pressed upon the consideration of Congress by memorials from different parts of the United States. It involved the interests of thousands, and to a vast amount. These memorialists were from the agricultural as well as from the manufacturing interests, representing their condition, and asking most earnestly the interposition of Government in their favor. Without further preface, he would advance to the subject. In the first place, he would endeavor to ascertain the interest depending upon the present question. He would not be minute in details, yet would explain the general calculations which have led to the result to which he had arrived. He had no doubt, from the information given to the committee, that the amount of capital invested in the woollen manufacture, could not be less than forty millions of dollars. He had taken pains to obtain, as far as practicable, certain facts, in preference to a dependence on general opinions or estimates. When particular facts were obtained, they became data upon which a result might be produced with sufficient certainty. It appeared, from actual examination, that, east of the Connecticut River, in Massachusetts, excepting one or two establishments west, the capital actually invested, was upwards of five millions and a half of dollars. Berkshire is said to have a million. It was probable from this, that the whole in manufactures, was at least eight millions. From all information that could be obtained from all other quarters of the Union, the capital thus stated was one-fifth of all the remainder. Forty millions might be considered the amount in the United States. Gentlemen can judge for themselves. We can thus arrive at sufficient certainty for all practical purposes. This capital of eight millions employs twelve thousand persons, making six thousand at least now engaged in the woollen trade of the United States. This is the manufacturing interest.

Next he would present, in the same manner, the value of the agricultural interest. In the first place, he would consider the flocks of the United States. Many had estimated the number of sheep at fifteen millions. In 1825, the number in the State of New York was ascertained to be 3,496,000. Now he considered that it might be four millions. Considering the great numbers in New England, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and West Virginia, he might take the number in New York as one-fourth; this would give sixteen millions in the United States. Gentlemen could form their own estimate. The number mentioned might be too high or too low. It was sufficient to answer the great object in view. He considered that ten millions were added from the demands of the woollen manufactures by the manufacturing institutions of the country. In estimating the value, it was to be considered that the manufacturer had been the cause of adding to the value of the flocks of the country. It has been a great object among the rulers of the most enlightened nations of Europe, to secure to themselves the best blood of that valuable race of animals. It was worthy of the attention of the most distinguished and intelligent citizens of this nation. We know that immense pains have been taken to improve it here. The best of the Saxony and Spanish breeds had been introduced, at great expense, by the most patriotic individuals of this country. Mr. M. then estimated the ten millions at two dollars each, and considered it a low estimate, if any encouragement existed for the raw material. This would make the value of flocks in the United States dependent upon the manufacturer to the amount of twenty millions of dollars.

By exact returns from establishments having 5,688,000 dollars capital, it appears they consume 5,985,000 lbs. of wool. 40,000,000 dollars would require above 40,000,000 lbs. of the raw material. But suppose it only 30,000,000 lbs. this would, at 85 cents per lb., be above 10,000,000 dollars. Next, Mr. M. estimated the landed interest devoted to the use of flocks in the United States, dependent on the manufacturer. He allowed four to the acre. This would require 2,500,000: at eight dollars per acre, this would be 20,000,000 dollars. He had taken pains to ascertain the value of land in different States, thus used. Taking New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, he thought the value he had estimated not too high. Gentlemen could correct him if in error. The result was, that the agricultural interest had at least 40,000,000 dollars involved in the question of protecting the domestic manufacturing interest. The capital of both interests, then, amounted to 80,000,000 dollars.

Mr. M. said he would next advert to the advantages of wool-growing to this country. It gave a value to hills and mountains: remote sections of the nation, now removed from navigable rivers and good roads, would be rendered valuable. Nothing else could be produced that would pay transportation to market. No article could be produced so valuable as wool, in proportion to its weight. Those portions of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia, which are of little value for grain, would become profitable—valuable, could this great staple have a market. Some of the best flocks in the United States are in Western Virginia. It has already found its way to New York and Boston, and found a valuable market.

As it regards the other great employments of the nation, it does not interfere. All our markets are now filled to overflowing with agricultural products. So much of capital as has been stated, is added to the landed interest. So much for that great interest immediately dependent for its principal value on manufactures!

Allow me now, said Mr. MALLARY, to show how much other branches of agriculture are interested. He asked the candid attention of gentlemen from the Middle and Southern States—he would ask the farmers in the House, to notice the statements he was about to make—he thought it deserving of consideration, however gentlemen might differ as to the conclusion which he might draw. It is ascertained, as one fact, that, in one manufactory, where 260 persons are employed, above 800 barrels of flour were consumed in the year 1826. This was obtained from New York, and Petersburg, Va., and intermediate ports. Again: There were imported into Boston in 1826, 281,000 barrels; of this, 72,177 were exported, leaving 209,704 for consumption. Mr. M. said he had taken much pains to ascertain the quantity imported into other ports of New England. Gentlemen well informed, those concerned in the trade, had estimated that the quantity imported into Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, could not be less than three times more than was imported into Boston. Providence afforded a vast market. A great amount ascended the Connecticut River, into the centre of Massachusetts. Mr. M. said he had estimated that twice as much was imported into all the remainder of New England as was into Boston. This would give 629,000 barrels for domestic use in that section of the Union. Gentlemen will decide whether this estimate is over-rated. The value at $5 50 per barrel, amounts to 3,480,000 dollars. Mr. M. said he requested gentlemen to notice from whence this supply was derived. He then produced a statement, from whence it appeared that 119,202 barrels were received from Baltimore, 91,000 from Virginia. This he asked gentlemen to notice. The remainder was from New York, Philadelphia, and the rest of the coast. Deducting the average amount from Boston, would leave 71,000 barrels of Virginia flour for New England, now imported into the single port of Boston. If this is one-third, New England consumes of Virginia flour 213,000 barrels—worth over a million of dollars. These are facts well worthy of consideration by the farmers of Virginia. How was this amount of agricultural produce obtained? By what means was payment made? He said he would leave the answer to be made by every gentleman for himself.

Again: There was imported into Boston, in the month of December last, 80,000 bushels of corn from the Southern and Middle States. In proportion to the estimate for flour, the amount would be almost beyond relief. Gentlemen, from the facts stated, will make their own deductions. Now, said Mr. M., examine the exports of flour to Europe. They will be found not to exceed, in 1825, 56,675 barrels. New England consumes, as we have seen, 629,000. We exported, in 1825, to all parts of the world, 813,000, and in 1826, 853,000 barrels. Again: In 1825, we exported to the British West Indies, 114,000 bbls.; to Cuba, 109,000; and to Brazil, 134,000. These foreign exportations we considered as of wonderful importance. We send now and then a cargo of flour to Valparaiso and Lima. The arrival—the price—high or low, is reported through the nation, as if its fate was involved. But the steady, silent, valuable market of New England, attracts no public attention. Annihilate this great market, said Mr. M., and the immense quantity there consumed, to the quantity which would be left, let the effects which would certainly follow, be experienced by the farmer of Virginia and Maryland, it would seem that conviction must take place, that the New England market was of immense advantage. Destroy the manufacturing interest, and conviction of this would press on the farmer with irresistible force. The means of the North to purchase would at once cease, and the people would provide for themselves in a different way.

Allow me to make a remark as applicable to our own policy. We have, on one occasion, at least, been carried away by these doctrines of free trade. We have held out proffers of reciprocity in trade and navigation: Why? The world knows. We have attained that skill in navigation, that we can meet any nation on the ocean. We now very boldly offer reciprocity. This is brought too often to bear on other interests. Why do we offer reciprocity in navigation? Because we are confident that we can successfully meet any other nation. But suppose the navigation of other nations was crowding our ports—that our ships were useless in our harbors—should we then be so warm advocates of reciprocity in navigation? Why not, on the present emergency, allow British ships to bring from England here, pass on to the West Indies, return with cargoes, and then return to England again? It may be cheaper! My answer is ready. I would protect our navigation, because a foreign rival has attempted to arrest its prosperity. The interest and reputation of our country demands it. The same protection should be equally afforded to all the great interests of the nation. This is the same reason that protection should be given to the fabric you wear, as to the vessel that is used to bring to us the articles of use. Then, sir, said Mr. M., let us protect all the great interests of the country that promote our independence, our safety, our prosperity—navigation, commerce, manufactures, and agriculture.

In conformity to these views, Mr. M. said he would present a few remarks, as to the particular provisions of the bill. It was believed it would give additional security to the manufacturer, and be perfectly compatible with the best interests of the nation.

The first minimum in the bill is placed at forty cents the square yard. On narrow cloths, which cost thirty cents the running yard, a duty is now levied of $7\frac{1}{4}$ cents. A square yard, at the same rate, 10 cents. At a minimum forty cents the square yard, this will be $13\frac{3}{4}$ cents: the difference about $3\frac{1}{4}$ on the square yard. It is thought this calculation is correct. Gentlemen will examine for themselves. Flannels, at twenty-five cents per running yard at present, pay a duty of $8\frac{3}{4}$ cents. Square yard $18\frac{3}{4}$ cents. Difference, $2\frac{1}{4}$ cents. Whatever may be the extra cost, we may be well assured that the manufacturing establishments of the country are now ready, in the shortest period, to supply the market.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Duties on Wool and Woollens.

[H. OF R.]

Narrow cloths, costing about $1 75, will come under the operation of the minimum of $2 50. It will operate as the price descends. The effect will be a heavy duty on the lowest. Not a greater duty, however, than was imposed on cottons, with reference to the average price of the fabric. On this point, Mr. M. said he was not precise. It embraced a fabric that could be at once produced. The raw material on hand; machinery idle; activity infused into that now in operation; would soon fill the market at the lowest price, if the manufacturer be sure that the foreigner would not inundate the market, under the influence of the "tactics" of the foreign trade. Feeling confident that such would be the result, he was decidedly and firmly of the opinion that the provision would be beneficial to the country.

The minimum of four dollars would reach another class equally entitled to protection, and could be produced and afforded at fair and reasonable rates. The duty would be applied as far as it reached, and it was thought it would make a proper average as far as regarded the fabric in general. As far as the bill went, it would tend to give stability to the manufacture, prevent, in a good degree, the frauds now practised, and, above all, give a solid protection. It was true, precision could not be attained, but no danger could be apprehended. As it regarded the additional and progressive duty on wool, Mr. M. observed that it might be considered as in violation of the maxim that a raw material ought not to be taxed by a manufacturing nation. England, it was true, had reduced the duty of sixpence sterling per pound, to one penny. But we must bear in mind, with that duty she imported wool to a great amount.

In 1821,	16,605,000 lbs. weight.
1822,	19,058,000 "
1823,	19,366,000 "
1824,	22,558,000 "

It is evident that England cannot produce the quantity, nor can she the quality of wool demanded by her manufacturers. It may also be remarked that she commands the ocean. She is secure of supply. The United States are differently placed. They can supply the raw material to any extent. The best wool can be grown. The safety of the manufacturer requires that the raw material should be produced at home. In case of war or hostile policy, her dependence on a foreign supply would at once be her ruin. To produce it at home, as was before remarked, is so much addition to the value of the farming interest, and no detriment in any other. The supply can be, will be, furnished. By adding to the duty, the farmer will have confidence in the market, will fear no hostile attempts from abroad, and will rapidly add to his flocks.

As to the last section which provides for a duty on wool imported on the skin, Mr. M. said that such wool had been admitted free of charge. Such a permission was not intended by any laws. It had been done. Difference of opinion had existed on the subject; it seemed to be proper that a provision for imposing a duty should be made.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said it was not his purpose to reply to the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. MALLARY,) but that he rose merely to move that the committee rise. When the proper time arrived for vindicating the principles of free trade, he trusted that he should be able to prove that they were of American, and not of British origin—that they were best suited to our condition and institutions—and that we treated British principles as we did British manufactures: we adopted them when it was for our interest to do so, and we rejected them when it was not. In moving for the committee to rise, it was not with any view of addressing the committee to-morrow; it was, that, when the motion should be again made to go into Committee of the whole House on this bill, the House should refuse at least for two or three weeks, till gentlemen had an opportunity of informing themselves as to the true character of the bill—he should be more gratified, if the House should refuse to do so altogether.

Mr. C. said he would now merely state the reasons why he was unwilling this morning to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take this bill into consideration. He conceived the bill to be of the highest importance—it was certainly one of the most important measures, in relation to our tariff, that had ever been proposed. It was reported on the 10th instant—printed but four days since, without any report whatever, and it proposed substantially, to prohibit, with very few exceptions, the mass of woollen manufactures. Yet, notwithstanding its importance, and this rapid progress of the bill, the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures had deemed it proper to call our attention to this important measure, when the members (with the exception of the committee to which he belonged) were utterly ignorant of the effect of the bill—and before there had been time to receive any information of its practical operation even from the City of New York. He confessed himself ignorant of the effect of the bill in detail, and had hoped that the chairman of the committee would have given that precise information which was required, in proposing so important a measure.

The gentleman had given us much valuable information. He had told us how many sheep we had in the country, and how many millions we had invested in the manufacture of woollens; how much we had exported, and how much we had imported; what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, &c., &c. He thanked the gentleman for his able speech, and valuable statistical information; but, with all deference to the gentleman from Vermont, he had not given us the very information which we most wanted—he had not touched the very point about which we wished to be informed—he had not told us how much it was proposed to increase the duty on woollen manufactures. Mr. C. said he did not pretend thoroughly to understand the provisions of the bill, but he would call the attention of the committee to one part of it. [Mr. C. here read from the bill, part of a section, which provided, that all woollens of over forty cents, and under two dollars and fifty cents value in the foreign country, should be deemed to have cost two dollars and fifty cents, upon which valuation the duty should be charged.] The effect of this provision would be to multiply the duty every time the value was multiplied; and an article of the value of forty-one cents the square yard, being valued at two dollars and fifty cents, would pay six times the duty of thirty-three and one-third per cent. ad calorem: in short, under this disguise, it would be charged with a duty of two hundred per cent. The gentleman from Vermont might, perhaps, understand this provision of the bill; but he believed very few members were aware that under it almost the entire mass of woollen manufactures consumed in the country would be prohibited—absolutely prohibited. It would not touch manufactures of a fine quality; but it would touch that large amount of woollen manufactures consumed by the laborers, the mechanics, the farmers, and the mariners of the country—nay, by the great mass of the people of the United States in every section of the country—except, indeed, those 60,000 or 70,000 persons, who, by the account of the gentleman from Vermont, were engaged in the manufacture of woollens. The bill would fall heavily upon the consumers of woollens throughout the United States.

It was not, however, Mr. C. said, his intention to enter upon the merits of the bill. He was merely stating a few reasons why it was not expedient, at this time, to consider this question. It was not a time to tamper with our tariff when our revenue was declining. Besides, gentlemen must be perfectly aware that it would be impossible to touch this subject without reviving the whole question of our tariff. It was not to be expected that we should be called upon to pass this prohibitory act for the benefit of the woollen manufacturers of New England, without calling forth applications, equally well-founded, from other branches of industry in other quarters of the country. There would be quite as much reason for Pennsylvania to ask for an increase of the duty on bar iron; and were he a Representative from Pennsylvania, upon the principle of "reciprocity of injuries"—if this prohibition of woollens were persisted in by New England, he would propose doubling the duty on bar iron—there was full as much reason, if there was any at all in either, in the one as in the other proposition. Gentlemen must be also aware, that, if this question was once opened, we should go from one article to another, as we did on a former occasion; from woollen manufactures to bar iron; from bar iron to cotton bagging; and as we were then, we should be again, three weeks, as it was said by a gentleman on that occasion, travelling from Dundee to Inverness, and from Inverness to Dundee. He thought we had had quite enough of that, and that this was not a time to revive the question.

In short, said Mr. C., the question is simply this:—Our woollen manufacturers find themselves in a paralyzed condition, with a large stock of their manufactures on hand. This branch of industry is precisely in the same condition that we find, and shall always find, every other branch of industry in the country, after a reaction of trade. It is not only the condition of the woollen manufacturer, and of every other branch of industry in our country, but of every branch of industry, at this moment, in every country of the commercial world. Our woollen manufacturers have increased the capital employed in their business from 10, as they themselves say, to 50 millions—they have speculated largely and unwisely; and suddenly and unexpectedly find themselves with an immense stock of woollen manufactures on their hands, which, under the shield of a monopoly, under this general prohibition they now ask for, they would have an opportunity to dispose of without loss to them, but at the expense of their country. Is not every branch of industry in our country in the same paralyzed state? Might not the representatives of every branch of industry make the same statement as to its prostrated condition! Might not the representatives of the agricultural portion of our country, tell you that the farmer has one, perhaps two, crops of wheat on his hands unsold, and solicit our aid to relieve him from the losses arising from a stagnation of trade? But, Mr. C. said, he rose not to engage generally in the debate. If the House should determine seriously to consider this question, with a declining revenue, and at this session, he should be prepared to vindicate the principles of free trade, which he had always advocated. He hoped it would not be considered at all. But, at all events, he hoped gentlemen would at least give the House time enough to understand a bill which proposed to prohibit the importation of woollens generally. He moved that the committee now rise.

The motion prevailed, and the committee rose accordingly.

THURSDAY, January 18.

The Sedition Law.

Mr. HAMILTON, who had yesterday made an

JANUARY, 1837.]

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

[H. OF R.]

unsuccessful attempt to have the resolutions considered which he had offered on the 2d January, and who had then given notice that he would call them up again this morning, and ask for the yeas and nays on the question of consideration, called them up accordingly. The resolutions were read, in the following words:

"Whereas a law commonly known by the name of the Sedition Law, was passed by Congress, in 1798, which in its principles was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and in its enactments an invasion of the liberty of the press: And, whereas divers persons were indicted, convicted, and suffered in pecuniary penalties under this law—

"Be it resolved, That it is incompatible with the character of the Government of the United States to have its Treasury enriched with the fruits of a violation of the spirit and letter of its constitution.

"Be it therefore resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to report a bill to this House, which shall make ample provision for refunding, with lawful interest, to all persons who may have suffered in pecuniary penalties under the said law, of July 14, 1798, commonly called the Sedition Law, but entitled 'An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,' the amounts which they may have paid to the respective marshals of the district courts empowered to levy and receive the said fines; and, in case of the death, or absence from the United States, of any of the said parties, then to their legal representatives, or to such person or persons as may be duly authorized to receive the same."

The question on consideration was put by the Chair, and was decided by yeas and nays, 72 to 80.

So the House refused now to consider the resolutions.

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

Mr. MINER moved the following joint resolution, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, That a sum, not exceeding ten thousand dollars, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money, not otherwise appropriated, in the Treasury, to be expended, under the direction of the President of the United States, to purchase food, clothing, and other articles of indispensable necessity, for the relief of the unfortunate sufferers by the destructive fire at Alexandria.

Mr. M. said that it was known to all the House that the City of Alexandria was at this moment burning, and that a considerable portion of it would, from appearance, be consumed. What was the extent of the desolation he could not now know; but it was but too certain that there must be, ere night, many houseless and homeless families, whose situation required immediate relief. He had, therefore, introduced the resolution with a view to meet their distressing condition as speedily as possible.

Mr. DWIGHT suggested to the honorable mover, whether it would not be better to withdraw the resolution for the present, until the extent of the injury should be more fully ascertain. The House, when it was in possession of all the facts, could better apportion their relief to the case.

Mr. MINER declined complying with the suggestion of his friend from Massachusetts, and moved for the second reading of the resolution.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, hoped the gentleman would not press the second reading, but would consent to withdraw the resolution. It was certainly premature, and the mode of making the appropriation objectionable.

The Chair suggested, that this mode of appropriation was very unusual—but would order the second reading, if the gentleman insisted.

Mr. MINER now consented that the resolution should lie on the table.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 19.

Sufferers at Alexandria.

The joint resolution of Mr. MINER, proposing to appropriate a sum of money, not exceeding $10,000, for the purchase of necessities for the relief of the inhabitants of Alexandria destituted by the fire of yesterday, coming up for consideration—

Mr. MINER moved that it be referred to the Standing Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, moved to alter the resolution by striking out ten (thousand) and inserting fifteen.

The Chair pronounced the motion not now in order.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, inquired of the Chair whether, should the resolution be referred to the Committee on the District, they would be restricted by the terms of the resolution; as he thought the sum of $10,000 too small, and also thought the money ought to be placed under the control of the Mayor of Alexandria, rather than the President of the United States.

The Speaker replied, that the committee would not be so restricted, but might report a bill in such form as they judged most expedient.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested the necessity of promptitude in whatever was done—and asked whether it would not be better at once to refer the resolution to a Committee of the Whole.

The Chair decided that this would not be in order.

Mr. POWELL (Chairman of the Committee on the District) said, that if the subject was referred to that committee, they should report a bill in blank, leaving the sum to be inserted by the House.

Mr. MINER stated that he had had a conversation with gentlemen of the House on the subject, and had proposed the present course in consequence of that conversation.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had just understood, from a member of the Committee on the District, that if the subject was referred to them, they were prepared to report a bill this day.

Mr. BURGESS said he was as willing to grant the relief proposed as any gentleman in this Hall, and he had no doubts on the constitutionality of the act. This impression, however, rested solely on the fact, that the city to be relieved was within the District, over which Congress had exclusive jurisdiction. Without the limits of that District, he should not view such a relief as constitutional: and it was for this reason that he was in favor of referring the resolution to that committee of the House which has peculiar charge of matters relating to that District alone.

The question of reference was then put and carried.

Mr. BURGESS then moved that the committee have leave to sit during the sitting of the House. The motion was negatived, (as not being necessary.) And, immediately,

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee on the District, reported the following bill:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of ——— dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of the indigent sufferers by the destructive fire in the City of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to be distributed under the direction of the Mayor and Common Council of the City of Alexandria, for the immediate relief of such class of sufferers, and for no other purpose."

The bill was read twice, and made the order of the day for this day.

After disposing of some other business—

Mr. POWELL moved that all the orders of the day which precede the bill for the relief of the distressed inhabitants of Alexandria be postponed, and that that bill be now considered.

The motion prevailed; and the House went into Committee of the Whole. Mr. FINDLAY, of Ohio, in the chair, upon that bill.

Mr. POWELL sent to the Clerk's table a letter from William Stabler, an inhabitant of Alexandria, (for whose respectability and truth Mr. P. pledged himself to the House,) giving a succinct statement of the extent of loss suffered from the conflagration, and the amount that would be required to relieve the sufferings of those who had lost their homes. This letter stated the number of houses destroyed at between sixty and seventy, and the sum needed by the indigent portion of the sufferers, for their immediate relief, by food and clothing, at $20,000.

Mr. P. said that he had been an eye-witness of the awful desolation, but would not attempt a description, to which he felt inadequate. One thing was evident to all who knew the circumstances of the case; the loss had fallen principally upon that class of persons whose little all consisted in the implements of their trades, and in their personal industry. The object of the bill was not to make up to any the losses they had sustained, but merely to relieve personal distress and suffering. He then moved to fill the blank in the bill with $20,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURGESS said, that, in order to render it evident to all, that this appropriation was made only because the city distressed lay within the District, he would move to prefix to the bill the following preamble:

"Whereas, by the original provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and by the cession of the District of Columbia to them, in virtue thereof, this Congress is vested with the sole and entire legislative power in and over said District; and whereas it is competent to, and the duty of, all sovereign states, holding and exercising such power, in all cases of sudden, great, and unavoidable calamities, to relieve, by legislative acts, the people suffering under such calamities; and whereas, on the 18th day of January instant, a great and extensive fire did break out in the city of Alexandria, within said District, and destroyed a great part thereof, thereby devastating the property of the opulent, consuming the means of the less wealthy, and suddenly, in this inclement season of the year, depriving many of shelter and subsistence: Therefore, Be it enacted, &c."

Mr. POWELL observed that it was, if in order, at least very unusual to admit a preamble to any bill passed by this House; and, in the present case, he could see no necessity for it, because the bill itself expressly stated that it was for the relief of citizens of Alexandria, "in the District of Columbia." These last words had been introduced for the very end proposed by the gentleman's preamble. The bill could not, in this form, be urged as a precedent for grants out of the District, and he therefore hoped the motion for a preamble would not be pressed.

Mr. BURGESS said he was fully satisfied, not only that the House had power under the constitution, but, that they were in duty bound to pass the bill. But he was desirous it should appear, not merely that this was done for a city "in the District of Columbia," but because that city was within the District, so that sufferers might not be coming to this House for relief whenever any calamity happened in any part of the country. He well knew it was not usual to introduce preambles to bills; but this was an unusual case, and it might be proper to mark it as such. If the House shall pass the bill, it will have settled the constitutional question, and it will be proper that a preamble should explain the reason of the act. If, however, in the opinion of the friends of this measure, the proposal of a preamble will operate to embarrass the bill, he was willing to withdraw it.

Some dissent being expressed, Mr. BURGESS withdrew his motion, and the committee rose and reported the bill.

Mr. HERRICK, of Maine, said, as he intended to occupy the floor but a few minutes, he supposed that, in accordance with common practice, he must consume a little time in announce-

JANUARY, 1827.]

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

[H. or R.]

ing to the House, "I do not rise to make a speech."

I certainly, said he, have a high respect for the philanthropic motives on which this bill is founded, and have not come to a determination to vote against it. My sympathies are strongly excited. But while this bill was under the consideration of the Committee of the Whole, which I supposed to be the usage, I thought I beheld the figure of a man, whom I have never seen, but of whom I have heard considerable, and said something—a suffering constituent, by the name of Isaac Pool—which addressed me, in a voice probably not sufficiently audible to be heard by other gentlemen, but being specially directed to me, I distinctly heard him. His speech was as follows:

"I was, some few years since, while in the pursuit of my usual avocation, that of a shipmaster, captured, with the vessel and crew, then under my command. A prize crew was put on board. A few days afterwards, I succeeded in recapturing the vessel, and making prisoners of the pirates, and brought them into a port of the United States, and delivered them to the proper authorities. I was recognized, in a heavy sum, to appear against them as a witness, and kept under recognizance for two years, whereby I was deprived of the privilege of pursuing my usual avocation, that 'on which I lived,' and my family reduced to as great distress as those for whose relief this bill is intended. I applied to Congress for relief, but instead of bread I received a stone. My case was admitted to be a hard one, but it was said not to be harder than others had to submit to, and that, to grant me relief, would be 'opening a door,' and 'establishing a dangerous precedent.' But I am unable to see why it would be opening a wider door, or establishing a more dangerous precedent, to relieve distress incurred by acts of pirates and Governments, than that incurred by an act of Providence. Other places are equally liable to the distresses of conflagration as Alexandria; and must I, who, by acts of piracy and the Government of my country, have been, with my family, reduced to penury and want, be compelled to contribute a mite to their relief, in every article of comfort which I may be obliged to purchase and pay for by that kind of manual labor into which you have arbitrarily thrown me? If so, let me next time be 'tried by fire.' Be just before you are generous."

Here ended the speech of the spectre—and here ends my speech.

Mr. F. JOHNSON said it was always with reluctance that he rose to address the House, and more especially on the present occasion, in which was enlisted the best feelings and sympathies of the heart, in favor of a suffering and afflicted people. But, believing, as he did, that Congress possessed no power to vote away the public money, except for public purposes, he felt himself constrained to oppose the bill. He said he felt as much for the sufferers as any gentleman in the House, and was as willing to contribute his mite out of his private funds as any other; that the bill proposed a mere gift or gratuity, and not an ordinary act of legislation in the District; that the power of Congress to dispose of the public funds was limited, in his estimation; that Congress had no constitutional right to apply the public money but to public uses, and in consideration of public services. This was an affair altogether of charity to individuals, upon neither of those grounds; that the citizens of every other town in the Union, who should meet with a like calamity, had precisely the same claims upon the charity of the House. He could not vote for the bill.

Mr. BRENT said that he regretted much to find an opposition to the passage of this bill, as he hoped it would have passed by a unanimous vote. I cannot agree to the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) who opposes this bill upon constitutional grounds. I did not expect, said Mr B., to meet with cold constitutional objections upon a subject like the present, calculated to excite the warmest and tenderest feelings of the heart. This objection is not tenable. When was it ever contended before, that Congress had not the power embraced in this bill? Sir, the Government has often gone beyond the principles of this bill, and we never heard of constitutional doubts. As far as laws have established precedents, we have enough of them to guide us. May I be permitted to refer the gentleman (Mr. JOHNSON) and this House to the acts extending relief to the refugees from St. Domingo, to the sufferers of Caraccas from an earthquake, to the relief given to those who lost their property by the earthquake of 1812, at New Madrid, on the Mississippi, and to the appropriation made last year, of $20,000, to relieve the starving situation of the Creek Indians. These precedents extend beyond the principles embraced in this bill; for they not only extend to the States of this Confederacy, but to foreign countries. And shall it now be triumphantly said, that Congress cannot assist the unfortunate of the District of Columbia, over which it alone has jurisdiction? I hope not. I trust that this objection will not arrest the benevolent feelings which have prompted this measure, which will be so gratifying to our constituents, and that one voice only will be heard, and that voice be in favor of the bill, and that immediate assistance will be given to the unfortunate sufferers.

Mr. MCCOY knew very well, he said, that precedents could be produced for almost any thing. But the House was not governed by them, however numerous. It must act according to its convictions of propriety. For himself, he was sorry that he was constrained to vote against the bill. He felt, he believed, as strong sympathy with those who had been deprived of their homes at such a season, as any of those gentlemen who advocated the bill. The gentlemen professed to derive their authority from that clause of the constitution which gives Congress exclusive power of legislation over the District of Columbia; but a good rule should work both ways. He admitted that Congress, as the Legislature of the States, might tax the people committed to their care, for the benefit of sufferers, if it thought proper; but not that it might tax the States for the exclusive benefit of this District. He could not consent that Congress should make a donation in this District which it would refuse in any of the States. He was aware that some gentlemen thought Congress might apply the public money to any object they thought proper; but he was of a very different opinion. He had no doubt that the distress, in this case, was very great; but he would rather see a subscription paper handing about the House, than hear gentlemen advocating such a bill. In the one case, he would go as far as any, but he was opposed to disposing of the public money for such purposes. He did not believe that the General Government was ever established for such an end, and if it began, there was no limit to the demands that might be made upon its charity. As to the amount of the appropriation, he had no objections. He thought the sum as small as could, with any propriety, be given. But to the principle he objected altogether.

Mr. NEWTON called for the reading of the act appropriating $50,000 for the purpose of sending provisions for the relief of the people of Caraccas, in South America, when suffering from earthquakes and consequent famine. The act of 1812 was read accordingly.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Virginia, rose to address the House. He had never been called upon to discharge a public duty, in which his judgment and feelings were more directly opposed, than in the present instance. No man upon that floor sympathized more sincerely and more deeply in the recent calamity which had overspread a portion of the District, than he did, and no one would more willingly contribute as an individual to give relief and succor to the unhappy sufferers over whom desolation had spread its ravages. The measure of this relief, he said, would be only limited by his ability to give. He would pour out freely his individual funds, as far as he could, to heal the broken heart, and administer consolation to these unhappy sufferers. But he had other and higher duties to perform, than the indulgence of his sympathies. He could not, as a Representative upon this floor, permit his judgment to yield to his sympathies, and himself to be hurried by a gust of generous and noble feeling into the exercise of a dangerous and unconstitutional power. The power, Mr. S. said, which must be sustained by the House before this bill could pass, was, in his view, one of gigantic and alarming extent, and might be hereafter resorted to as a most dangerous precedent. It went to the extent of unlimited sovereignty in the General Government over the District of Columbia, and to the right of appropriating the national funds, for any and every purpose, unrestrained and unlimited but by the discretion of Congress. These powers he could never admit. He was forced, therefore, to resist them, upon this occasion, or to renounce, forever, all those principles and opinions which he had heretofore cherished and held sacred, and upon which he had heretofore acted. Thus situated, he had no choice to make, and, painful as it was, he must vote against the bill.

Mr. CARSON said, that, under the state of feeling in which he now was, he found it impossible to remain silent. If he had not repaired to the scene of distress, and witnessed it with his own eyes, he might perhaps have been in a situation coldly to reflect on his constitutional duty; but, as it was, he felt equally unable and indisposed to go into any nice discussions on that subject. He was not a lawyer, and his opinions, if ever so decided, were not to be relied on where nice legal distinctions were involved. But he felt, whether from sympathy or some other cause, strongly impelled to vote in favor of this bill. When he had last night returned from the smoking ruins of Alexandria, and had laid him down at night upon his bed, he could not but reflect on the situation of many of his fellow-beings, who had the night before slept in security, and this night had not where to lay their heads, who had that very morning risen in comfortable, perhaps affluent circumstances, and at night found themselves without a dollar in the world. He had seen beautiful edifices, equal, some of them, to almost any in this metropolis, tumbling into ruins: he had seen delicate females, as well bred, and as well dressed, as were anywhere to be found, throwing themselves into the ranks, and handing water till their hands were stiffened with ice, and their limbs with the cold, and who refused to retire from their post, though repeatedly urged to do so. After witnessing a scene of suffering and distress like this, he was unable to refuse his assent to the bill. He had listened with attention to the objections urged. If inclined to pin his faith on the sleeve of any man, he would choose the gentleman from Virginia, on his right (Mr. STEVENSON)—but he could not in this instance coincide with him in sentiment. He had asked for a distinction between the District of Columbia and other territories under the control of the General Government. Mr. C. would answer the inquiry by observing, that all the territories had delegates to represent their wishes, and to take charge of their interests on this floor; but the people of the District of Columbia had none to represent them but the Representatives of the people at large. The latter, therefore, had the strongest claim upon the care and liberality of the House. Alexandria, that was in this case the sufferer, had already lost much by the operation of the Federal Constitution. She had lost her wealth and her commercial standing. Under the General Government, this city had sprung up by her side, as a powerful and successful rival. She was already sinking, when the fire of yesterday had given almost a death-blow. In such circumstances, could the House think of refusing to the wretched sufferers such a sum as twenty thousand dollars? a sum scarce sufficient to purchase beds for all who were without any.

JANUARY, 1837.]

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. AROHEE would obtrude for a very short time on the attention of the House. He had been not unwilling, conceding to the rapid progress desired for it by its friends, to have given a silent vote on the bill. This the course of the debate, however, had now rendered impossible. He should vote for the bill—yield it his cordial support—but not on the grounds which had been stated, and especially by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. BRENT.) If those were to be considered as the real grounds of its vindication, his reprobation of the measure would be infinitely more cordial than his support; as the duty he owed to the constitution, superseded any claim, however imperative, which could be founded on the office of humanity. He owed it, therefore, to his political principles, and to his personal consistency, to explain the real grounds on which his support was rendered. That this Government possessed authority to appropriate the resources of the Union at discretion, he utterly denied. He protested against it as a doctrine which involved in its plain results the absolute subversion of all the limitations of the constitution. With an unrestricted authority as respected the application of money, the idea of circumscription to the objects and scope of this authority, was illusory and null. There might be limitations as respected the amount, but not the sphere. This would spread everywhere—be as illimitable as the wind. This Government had not control over all objects which the State Governments controlled. This would be inconsistent with the very nature and name of a Federative system, which was set up for particular specific purposes only, as every one acknowledged. These purposes, it might be said, were not susceptible of accurate and unquestioned ascertainment. Admit this to be so, yet there were lines which it was impossible, without a gross abuse of reason and deviation from fair conduct, to transcend. Functions could not be inferred as appropriated to the specific authority, which the State and constituent authorities were competent, without question, to discharge with equal or greater facility and advantage for themselves. This would be outraging an acknowledged principle in relation to individuals and political depositories. Governments were more jealous of their authority than individuals. The State Governments did not require an auxiliary; there was not a new and further authority, a twenty-fifth government, to exercise the function of disbursement of the public money. This, surely, the State Governments were competent to do for themselves, and the function was not, therefore, to be considered as transferred generally, for all purposes, without reserve, without restraint. This was no conclusion of metaphysical subtlety, but of common understanding. As to the precedent which had been mentioned, how was precedent to operate on a question of constitution? Its operation was on opinion and judgment, not principle and conscience. No man's opinion could bind another's principles. Precedents operated in judicial tribunals because the object of this judication was to obtain uniformity of decision. In a legislative jurisdiction, they had no binding operation, because the purpose in these was not so much to fix as to vary decision, till it was supposed to have attained correctness, and even to conform to the perpetual fluctuations of opinion. Precedents, then, in these jurisdictions, were nothing as regarded their authority. The precedents relied on in the present instance, would be of no force even in courts: for the point which was now presented had not, as Mr. H. believed, been made; and it was the rule of courts, in this respect, that the question in dispute must have been agitated, to give to the decision the character of precedent. The argument from precedent proved nothing, therefore, in this case, if it could do so in any of the same kind. The right to give the money which was now asked from our humanity, was not dependent, Mr. A. said, on any such unwarranted doctrine as this he had been examining. If it were, he would be behind no man in renouncing and in denouncing, instead of acceding to it. We had no power to bestow the money of the Union, on all objects and occasions, at our discretion, however strong the appeal these objects and occasions might address to us. We could only bestow this money for the clearly defined objects of the Union. It was not that the preservation and good order and prosperity of this District, as of the territories or other places in which Congress exercise exclusive jurisdiction, was one of the clearly defined objects of the Union, committed to the Government, in the due advancement of which its interest was unquestioned—even this ground was not essential to vindicate the appropriation which was now proposed. But we were a Legislature for the District as well as for the Union. Our larger functions did not exclude and swallow up, and annihilate the less. If it were a paramount, it was not an absorbing function. But, as the Legislature of the District, our power to sustain and to burthen must be correlative. We might tax without any other limit than discretion. We had a power not only as large, but larger, and though not unbounded, yet less bounded, than that of any State Government within its limits. Could our power be of this character, to take the money of the people of the District, and yet the power be denied us to return to them the whole or any portion of it, to advance them in prosperity—to sustain them in affliction? What sort of a mockery was it to talk of a Government without such a reciprocity of power, and that, too, in the heart and bosom of a community of freemen? Nobody denied our power to tax; nor that we did tax the District in precisely the same way in which we did every other portion of the country—all our taxation might be said to be derived from indirect sources at present. A friend near him, Mr. A. said, suggested that the direct tax had operated here as well as elsewhere. Was this power to tax, a mere office of spoliation, without a faculty to expend the fruits on the subjects of it? It was not the money of the Union, but their own money, which he claimed the right to expend on their occasions or necessities. If we had not this power in relation to them, who had? Were they an outlawed race, disfranchised of all beneficial exercise of political authority—accessible to its burthens—precluded from any sustaining visitation of its influence? This could not be in reason, any more than justice or humanity.

The case, Mr. A. said, was one addressing the strongest appeal to sympathy and feeling. It addressed, however, yet a stronger principle—the obligation to extend protecting care to those who were committed to our control by the constitution. The concession we were asked to make, so far from violating any constitutional or other principle, would be made not to sympathy, but duty.

Mr. STORRS said, that the question which had been well asked by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. AROHER,) involved an answer to all the arguments which had been offered against the bill. Where is the supreme legislative power over this territory of ten miles square vested—and in whom? He hoped that some one of those who opposed the measure would answer this question distinctly and fully: for, to deny that this general power is vested in Congress, either assumes or must lead to the conclusion, that, in the District of Columbia, there is no civil government at all. Until this question is satisfactorily answered, there seemed to him to be no doubt of the constitutionality of the bill. Mr. S. said, that he considered the doubt which had been started, to have been settled too long, and on too many occasions, to admit of question at this day. We have incorporated in this District a host of banks, and yet no very loud alarm was sounded on the creation of these incorporations; or, if any one had then doubted our right to create them, the question has been given up long ago. He begged leave to ask under which of the enumerated powers, and which of them was proposed to be carried into effect by these measures? But this is a mere fragment of what has been done. Congress have created incorporations for bridges, and imposed tolls for the benefit of private companies. They have authorized canals, and imposed tolls on the navigation of them; and, on numerous subjects of strictly internal and domestic regulation, have uniformly exercised all the powers of a local Legislature for all municipal purposes, and continue this legislation at every session, without question of its constitutionality. These bills, exacting tolls and taxes at these canals and bridges, received the sanction of the Executive at different times, and from some of whom we might have had reason to expect an objection, if a serious or plausible doubt could have been supported against them. The bill for establishing tolls on the Cumberland road, within the boundaries of some of the States, was met quite promptly with an Executive veto, but he did not recollect that the constitution or rights of the States had ever been considered to be in any danger from the numberless acts of a municipal character, adopted in our legislation over this District. The constitution has so unequivocally and plainly expressed the extent of the power of Congress over it, that the very letter of it scarcely admitted, in his opinion, of a question. As to the exercise of political authority over the States, our powers were enumerated and specific; but, when the constitution speaks of the District of Columbia, it grants to Congress the power of exclusive legislation in all cases whatever. There is no limitation or restriction. We are the Legislature of the States in the powers enumerated as to them; but as to this District, we are the supreme legislative power. The very phrase, "the power to legislate in all cases whatever," is the precise definition itself of the supreme political power of a State. Our power here is absolute, uncontrollable, and unrestricted. It is, indeed, exercised more broadly than the States themselves have done over their own people. We have even taxed this District without its consent, and without even the form of representation. We are sovereign here for all purposes, and have the same discretion that the State Legislatures may exercise in their own Governments. An idea had been started in the debate, which he thought had misled the opponents of the bill. It was asked, if we could take the money collected from the people, or belonging to the United States, and expend it in this District? It was a sufficient answer to this to say, that the public Treasury receives from this District, through the custom house at Alexandria, a share of the public revenue, and it might be as conclusive an answer as the argument itself assumes, to ask, in reply, if we have the right to take the money collected here, and expend it anywhere else! The truth is, that the receipts of the Treasury is the revenue of the Government, not in its character of a legislative power as to the States, or the enumerated powers, but as the Legislature also of this District. The difference of the extent of its powers over the one or the other creates no distinct character in its revenues. We hold no share of the money in the Treasury as the money of the States, and another in our character as the Legislature of this District. It is the common fund of the Government, no matter from whence it came. He had never thought that, in the exercise of any power whatever, for any public object, we were to look first for the purpose of finding out from whence our revenue comes, before we venture to dispose of it.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

[H. OF R.]

It is not received to be paid back again to the very persons or States who contribute it. He had heard that we had the power to make roads and canals in the territories, because the public lands in those territories belonged to the United States, and paid a revenue when sold, but he was not a believer in this doctrine, though he had no doubt of the power of Congress to construct roads or canals in its own territories, if it was thought best to do so. He considered the grant of this fund, now proposed to be given for the relief of the sufferers at Alexandria, as a question of mere discretion, and as completely within the constitutional power of Congress as the right of the Legislature of one of the States in respect to one of its own cities; and was unwilling to protract the hour of their relief by prolonging the debate. He did not think that the question had any relation whatever to the power over the subject of internal improvement in the States, either under the power of appropriation, from whence some had derived it, or as incident to any of the powers enumerated in the constitution. That question must be settled, if it is not already so, on grounds altogether distinct from those which support this bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said it was not his intention to prolong the debate. He was too sensible that he owed an apology to the spirit of humanity, for every word he uttered: for, while the debate was progressing, those for whom the charity was designed, were perishing. He respected the scruples of gentlemen who entertained constitutional doubts—he, also, was anxious to act upon constitutional principles—but this was not the time, nor the occasion, to fight the battles of the constitution. Even if he doubted, he would at once cast his doubts aside, and extend relief to his suffering fellow-citizens. He confessed he was, in this instance, actuated by an impulse, such as he should feel on seeing a fellow-creature about to perish amidst the waves—he should plunge in to save him, regardless of the consequences. Upon a proper occasion, he should be ready to defend the constitution. Whenever it is attacked—whenever a dangerous enemy appears, then would the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. STEVENSON,) and himself, be found side by side, defending the principles of the constitution; but this was not such an occasion. What were the circumstances? In the coldest winter we have seen for many years—in the coldest night we almost ever felt, part of a town within sight of us, and within our own jurisdiction, is laid desolate, and in ashes; and our fellow-citizens, houseless and destitute, ask us for relief; it was not a time to stop to examine our constitutional doubts. He trusted that the citadel of the constitution would never be assaulted; but, if it ever should, God grant, said Mr. C., it may never be surrendered to an enemy more formidable or dangerous than charity. But, in this case, it is not endangered—we have the power—we are protected by the shield of the constitution—let us march promptly to save our countrymen, who are at this moment perishing from cold and from want.

Mr. HAMILTON said that he really thought the question free from all difficulty, in relation to the constitutional power of the House to pass the proposed appropriation.

The authority of "exclusive legislation," given by the constitution to Congress within the "ten miles square," could fairly embrace all the exercise of power necessary for the measure. This power of "exclusive legislation" was given without an enumeration of any branches of authority in the grant, which were intended to be excepted, and it was certainly designed that Congress should exercise such municipal functions as belonged to the social condition of the people over whom exclusive legislation was to be exerted. It was by virtue of this, that we laid out streets, constructed highways, and appropriated money for pavements, within the City of Washington; and, if all these things could be done within the City of Washington, they can, with equal authority, be done in Alexandria, which is within the ten miles square. Is not relief in cases of such a distressing calamity as the one we have witnessed, an exercise of authority belonging to the ordinary municipal functions? And if we can go into the street and construct pavements within the District, for the convenience of its community, can we not exercise the same power of appropriation to subserve a more eminent convenience, if not an absolute necessity?

He respected the patriotic feelings and enlightened opinions of his friends from Virginia on most of the subjects of constitutional power which they discussed in that House; but he regretted that they had retarded the progress of a measure to which he did not think their doctrines applied. With them he was prepared to put a negative on the unlimited power of appropriating money on the part of the General Government, as he conceived this one of the largest stretches of authority that could be assumed. To give to any Government the power to spend money without restriction, was to give them the power to do what they pleased; it was the great lever, physical and moral, by which, in civilized society, almost any thing could be moved. Nor was it an answer to this to say that it was harmless, if the whole power was exhausted by the mere act of appropriation, and if Congress assumed no subordinate power consequent on the expenditure of the money. It ought in reply to be remembered, that the act of appropriation may in itself carry with it all the consequences of power in the effect to be accomplished, which would render subsequent legislation a mere matter of regulation as to the modification of that large mass of power which the appropriation of the public money had already created.

With these views, he had always considered the arguments of Mr. Monroe, (as highly as he respected the opinions of this venerable patriot,) as more open to objection than many of the sources from which the authority to construct works of internal improvement had been derived. With this sentiment it was unnecessary for him to say that he concurred with his friend from Virginia, (Mr. STREVENSON,) that the charitable donations to the people of Caraccas, after the memorable earthquake which had desolated their country, and to the refugees from San Domingo, were appropriations made without constitutional power; and are therefore not precedents entitled to authority. But it will be recollected that we were not empowered to exercise "exclusive legislation" over the territory of Caraccas, or over the inhabitants of San Domingo; that the conservation of the peace, safety, and well-being of those communities were not confided to our care. In one word, sir, it seems to me susceptible of demonstration, that the power of appropriating the public money, within this District, for this District, is an inseparable incident "to exclusive legislation" over it.

H. of R.]

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

[JANUARY, 1837.]

But it may be asked, what are the limitations to the exercise of this power within the District of Columbia? which brought him to a point in the argument where he would notice a most unwarrantable assumption of authority, which the gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) had set up for Congress within the ten miles square. If he understood that gentleman, he had said, that "exclusive legislation" implied the absolute and uncontrollable power of Congress to do in the District whatever in its sovereign power it might think proper to do. That it was a grant of authority without any limitation whatsoever, either express or implied. Sir, this is the most dangerous doctrine that can be avowed; it justifies the power to erect an absolute despotism here, if the great securities of the constitution are merged in the power of "exclusive legislation." From that gentleman's argument, it would follow, that Congress could suspend the writ of habeas corpus in their discretion, in time of peace, or do any act of unlimited dominion, here to operate. And that the "ten miles square" could be made the arena of any mischievous or arbitrary experiments in legislation, that might suit our caprice.

Widely different is my view of the power which Congress exercises within the District. "Exclusive legislation" implies nothing more than the absence of State legislation, which followed from the fact of the cession of the territory of Virginia and Maryland; but that this cession was taken, not only with all the securities to the people of the District, which the Constitution of the United States gives to the people of the several States, but that all the rights and immunities of property, whatsoever, which they had as citizens of Virginia and Maryland, are preserved to them inviolate on their part. That the cession was made to, and taken by, the United States, in regard to all the pre-existing rights of property; and any other view would sustain the position, that the States of Maryland and Virginia had the power, by a transfer of a part of their population, to a new Government, to deprive them of any one of the cardinal rights which they possessed before, as citizens of Virginia and Maryland.

This appropriation interferes with none of these rights; it is an ordinary function of municipal power, and I shall vote for it, because it is to be exercised in a manner that meets the best feelings of my own heart.

Mr. CAMPBELL having no scruples as to the power of the House to pass the bill, thought it his duty to raise his voice in behalf of the distressed sufferers whom it was intended to relieve. Mr. C., in reply to the gentleman who had urged the constitutional objection, quoted the constitution in that clause which gives to Congress exclusive power of legislation for the District. And he then inquired, whether, under this clause, it would not be competent to the House to enact a system of poor laws for the District? And, if it was, whether the House could not, with equal propriety, make such appropriations as the system might render necessary? He thought it was a natural and necessary consequence; and if it might appropriate for the poor of the District at large, why not for those suddenly made poor by an act of Providence? He was astonished at the attempt to establish a distinction between the right to appropriate for the District of Columbia, and for the Union. He could see none. Did gentlemen propose that there should be a separate Treasury to receive the collection made at the custom house in Alexandria, from that which received those at all other ports, and from which alone separate appropriations were to be made for the District? When any calamity happened, to relieve which, the ordinary means of the inhabitants of the District are inadequate, it constituted a case which called loudly for the interposition of Congress. He considered the present as such a case, and should cheerfully vote for the bill.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, thought there was no constitutional question involved in the case. He was one who had always held, with his friends from Virginia, to the strict interpretation of the constitution, and who admitted with caution any thing like constructive powers in the General Government; but this he held to be no such case as called up that question. He thought the position taken by his colleague, (Mr. STORRS,) was not fairly exposed to the construction of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON.) When his colleague maintained that the General Government was absolute within the District of Columbia, he meant, of course, that it was absolute within the limits of the constitution, and no farther. The same allegiance which the inhabitants had owed to their State Legislatures, was by the cession of territory transferred to the General Government, and that Government was absolute over them, to the same extent as their own Legislatures would have been. Every nation, Mr. W. said, was bound to support its own poor. This obligation, which was universal throughout the world, was also universal in each nation, so far as the entire mass of its poor was concerned; and was only broken down and divided among subordinate parts of the nation, for the sake of greater convenience in administering the support—the principle was not changed, nor the force of the obligation at all weakened. It was always binding, as a duty of humanity. When a providential act was sudden and calamitous beyond the ordinary power of the District to meet and provide for it, Congress must do it, and had the clear right to do so. Does it not build prisons and hospitals for the District, because the means of the population are inadequate to these works? They are given on the principle of protection—so is the bill. It is at once constitutional, a duty of protection, and it is an act of humanity, common to every Christian jurisdiction in the world.

JANUARY, 1837.]

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

[H. or R.]

Mr. F. JOHNSON said he should not have risen again, had he not been called on by several gentlemen, in their remarks, to say whether Congress had not the sovereign and exclusive right of legislation over this District. He said he admitted the right in the fullest extent claimed, and he believed it might extend even to the case intimated by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) as having been alluded to by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRE,) that Congress had the power to regulate all the municipal concerns of the District, to regulate descents, and the transfer of property, real and personal, and all other things that any State Government could do within the limits of its territories; that Congress was bounded, in their legislation over this District, only by the Constitution of the United States. But, he said, admitting all this, it proved nothing in favor of the right to pass this bill. He said, if he could show that Congress could do a like act for any other place out of the District, it would seem to prove that the power to do this act was not derived from, or grew out of, the fact of exclusive legislation over the District; and gentlemen in favor of the bill admit, if the power to give this money does not arise out of the right of exclusive legislation, that they have it not. Well, sir, what is the bill? Does it contain any thing more than a mere simple gift or donation to the sufferers by fire in Alexandria? Is there any thing in the Constitution of the United States, or of the States, that would prevent the citizens of Savannah, who had suffered a much severer loss, or Charleston, or New York, from receiving a donation from Congress? Are they not just as free to receive the gifts of Congress as the people of Alexandria? What hinders them? Congress cannot interfere in the legislation of the States. The people of Charleston or Savannah could not receive a code of descents or conveyances from Congress. But there is nothing to prevent their receiving its bounty. This bill is altogether an affair of charity; all the citizens of the United States have the same power to receive, and all have the same right to claim it. It would, therefore, seem clear, that any town had the same right to receive, as the town of Alexandria, the donations of Congress; and hence the power to give does not arise out of the fact of exclusive legislative jurisdiction. It cannot be said that the City of Alexandria, and the county in which it is situated, have no power to regulate its police, to collect taxes, and provide for the poor, as well as the cities and counties in the States. What then is it that prevents Congress from administering to the relief of sufferers by fire, everywhere? Because the constitution confines the appropriation of the public money to public purposes. The pavement in this city, alluded to by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) as a precedent to warrant the passage of this bill, was done as a public work. That was the pretence—and, as to the erecting a light-house, and custom house, in Alexandria, mentioned by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRE,) as a precedent for this case—they were for public uses, to facilitate commerce, and to collect and secure the public revenues. Would Congress have the right to appropriate money to pave the streets of New York, or any other place? Could their authority be intruded there to make streets, unless it was in the promotion of some national work? But the people of New York could receive a donation as well as the people of Alexandria; but the right of Congress to give, is the question.

This bill contains a mere gift of money, expressly of charity, without reference to public uses, or public services—just precisely such a gift as might be made to any other people, in or out of this nation. If Congress has the right to give away the public money for charitable purposes, there is no limit in the constitution to whom or where it shall go. And, it is just as constitutional to give it to one person as another. I am for adhering to the constitution, and appropriating public money only for public purposes, or in consideration of public services. When we depart from this, we have no guides but our passions, and our discretions—and, however great my sympathies may be for the sufferers of Alexandria, my duty, as a Representative upon this floor, forbids, according to my views of the constitution, my voting for this bill; nor, indeed, did I ever admire that sort of magnanimity, that would give away that which belonged to others, and not ourselves. I am willing to contribute to the relief of these unfortunate and distressed people out of my own, but not out of the public Treasury.

Mr. RIVES said it was with great reluctance he rose at this stage of a protracted discussion;

H. OF R.]

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

[JANUARY, 1827.]

but he felt it his duty to add a few words to what had been said by others, in denial of the power proposed to be exercised by this bill. It appeared to him that a pervading fallacy ran through the whole of the arguments in favor of the bill. Our attention had been directed, for the derivation of our power upon this subject, to a part of the constitution, which, he thought, had no appropriate relation to it. This was not a question of exclusive legislation, properly so called, over the District of Columbia, but it was a question respecting a grant of the national funds. The bill, upon its very face, is an appropriation of so much of the public money for a particular purpose. Now, whence do we derive our power of raising and applying the public money? It is from that clause of the constitution, which authorizes Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c., to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." According to the broadest construction which had ever been put upon this clause, it justified no appropriation of the public money, but for some purpose connected with the common defence and general welfare of the Union. For his own part, said Mr. R., he had always thought that these general terms were limited and defined by the subsequent enumeration of specific powers granted to Congress, and that we could not legitimately vote away the public money, but in execution of some of the powers so granted. But, even taking for our guide the most liberal construction which has ever been suggested, can it be pretended that the object of this bill, the relief of the unfortunate inhabitants of Alexandria, (for whom he felt as much sympathy, and was willing to evince it, with his own means, as far as any gentleman,) is, in any manner, connected with the payment of the debts, or providing for the common defence and general welfare of the Union? No, sir, it is purely an act of private charity, which we undertake to perform at the public expense, instead of our own.

If an application of the public money, like this, can be covered under the power of exclusive legislation for the District of Columbia, the constitution has, in vain, sought to fix a practical limit to our powers over the public purse. My friend and colleague, who now sits near me, and who has advocated the passage of this bill, denies the power of Congress to appropriate the public money to the establishment of a National University. Gentlemen, who think with him and me, deny, also, the power of Congress to establish National Observatories, or to bestow gratuitous pensions; because we believe that the power of this Government to grant the public money is limited to those objects only, for which we are authorized to provide, in the direct exercise of our specific powers.

But what becomes of this limitation, if the latitude now claimed for the power of exclusive legislation over this District, be conceded? We have only to draw these objects within the enchanted circle of the District, to establish the University and the Observatory here, to assemble the corps of Pensioners here, and all difficulty vanishes. Upon this principle we may exhaust the whole treasury of the nation, here, in the endowment of eleemosynary institutions, or whatever other scheme may please the fancy of the sovereign Legislature of the District of Columbia! We may thus enact a system of poor laws for every State in the Union, upon condition only that the paupers shall come here to partake of the national bounty.

Mr. HALE now demanded that the question be taken by yeas and nays, and it was so ordered by the House.

Mr. DRAYTON said, that, although the bill had undergone a great deal of discussion, which the House had shown a strong disposition to terminate, yet, as the subject embraced in it is deeply interesting to the feelings, and involves in its consideration a constitutional question, I will, said Mr. D., briefly submit the views which I take, as to the power of the House to make the appropriation prescribed for in the bill. I am not, said Mr. D., and never have been, favorable to what is usually termed an enlarged interpretation of the constitution. I think the acts which it warrants, must be derived either from express power contained in it, or they must be necessary for the purpose of carrying into execution a power expressly granted. The doctrine which has by many been contended for, that Congress may pass all laws which they deem necessary for the general welfare, I disclaim. If they have such a power it would be difficult to say what power they have not. I contend for no more than I have stated: and if, within those principles, Congress cannot pass this bill, I admit that it cannot, constitutionally, become a law.

Amidst the powers given to Congress, some are general, and some are particular. Some are unconditional, some are limited. Where a power which is general and unconditional is granted, the only limitation which can be annexed to it, is the discretion of the Legislature. I will illustrate the distinction between these two species of grants, by referring to one or two clauses of the constitution. In the 8th section of the 1st Article, Congress is empowered to provide and maintain a Navy. Under this authority, they may exercise every act necessary for the arming, equipping, and manning a fleet; the number, the size of the vessels, the pay of the officers and of the men; in short, any thing requisite for the purposes of a war, in all its branches, is within the power of Congress, and the extent to which they choose to exercise their powers upon this subject, is only to be regulated by their judgment and discretion. Congress, says the constitution, may lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to this extent their power would be unlimited, were it not for the specifications of the objects for which alone these taxes, &c., could be levied, and to which alone, when levied, they could be applied; they must be levied for the purposes of paying the debts and providing for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. I might cite many other instances of general and of limited powers, but these two will be sufficient to exemplify the distinction I have mentioned. If Congress possesses an unlimited and unconditional power to legislate for the District of Columbia, it unavoidably follows, that they possess the power of passing this bill. The constitution vests in Congress "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," over the District of Columbia. Having the power to legislate in all cases, they may pass a law appropriating money, and according to the principle I have referred to, that they have the power to carry into execution the powers expressly vested in them, they may raise the funds to carry this appropriation into effect. Under the constitution, the only qualification annexed to this exclusive power of legislation, is, that it shall be confined to the District; and the appropriation contemplated by this bill is confined to the District.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Sufferers by Fire at Alexandria.

[H. OF R.]

It has been said, that, admitting to the full extent the power to legislate for Columbia, and the consequent right to appropriate money for its use, yet that the money appropriated must be obtained by tax upon its inhabitants; because Congress can only appropriate money by virtue of some authority derived from the constitution, and no part of that instrument permits the appropriation of money to relieve the distresses of individuals. My reply to this argument is, that it is contrary to the letter of the constitution, and the construction of the powers granted in it, which I have stated, and which are admitted by its most rigid expounders. The power is given without limitation; it can therefore only be limited by discretion: the power to pass the law is expressly given: the power to carry it into execution must necessarily follow. These powers are nowhere limited by a provision, that the moneys to be appropriated for the District shall be raised by taxing its inhabitants; to couple this unlimited authority, therefore, with such a provision, would be to convert by construction, a great and unqualified power into a particular and limited one. And the spirit and letter of the constitution are as much violated, by taking away from it a power which has been directly granted to it, as by adding to it a power with which it has never been invested. I feel confident that the position which I have assumed, that, if Congress possesses the power to legislate in all cases for the District of Columbia, it has the power to appropriate money to carry its legislative acts into execution, will not be contested. If Congress have this general power of legislation, it cannot be confined as to the amount which it may appropriate: it may, from some important consideration, appropriate an amount for the District, greater than could be raised within it by taxation; if, then, in such cases, Congress could not raise money from other sources, then this constitutional paradox would result, that Congress had the exclusive power to legislate for Columbia, but had not the power of carrying its legislative acts into execution.

Mr. MARVIN was in favor of the bill. It was true, that Congress possessed only delegated powers; the rest were reserved to the States, or to the people. The power of the General Government was not sovereign, but that of the States was so. The Legislature of a State had power to legislate for the general welfare, and to provide for the relief of a general or public calamity; but for the people of the District of Columbia, what power was reserved? None. They had no sovereignty: no Legislature. The power to appropriate money and to levy taxes, is given to the General Government for certain purposes, and not reserved to the people. But gentlemen argue, that this is not to be applied in the case of the District. But surely Congress is sovereign over this District, and may exercise its power of appropriating money here, for here it has exclusive legislation. The constitution has erected the District, and has made its inhabitants little better than servants, as to their political power; and now, is it said, that Congress is to exercise no paternal care over them? Have they no Government to look to? Are they placed beyond the pale of relief in any case? Are the citizens of the District citizens of no country? Surely they are American citizens, and may look, as well as others, to their Government for succor. We have clearly the power to relieve them, both constitutionally and physically; and, if so, we are bound to exercise it, and to relieve them now.

The question was now loudly called for in all parts of the House; and, having been taken by yeas and nays, the votes, on ordering the bill to a third reading, stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander of Tennessee, Archer, Bailey, Badger, Barbour of Virginia, Barney, Baylies, Beecher, Brent, Bryan, Buchanan, Burleigh, Burges, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carson, Cassidy, Cocke, Davis, Dorsey, Drayton, Dwight, Eastman, Everett, Findlay of Ohio, Forsyth, Forward, Fossdick, Garnsey, Garnett, Garrison, Govan, Gurley, Hamilton, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hayden, Haynes, Hobart, Holcombe, Holmes, Houston, Hugunin, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Isaacs, Jennings of Indiana, Johnson of New York, Kittera, Lathrop, Lawrence, Locke, Marable, Markell, Markley, Marvin of New York, Mattocks, McDuffie, McKean, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Ohio, Meach, Mercer, Miller of New York, Miner, Jas. S. Mitchell, Mitchell of Maryland, Mitchell of Tennessee, Moore of Kentucky, Newton, Orr, Owen, Pearce, Plumer, Powell, Reed, Rose, Ross, Sands, Scott, Shannon, Sill, Sprague, Stevenson of Pennsylvania, Stewart, Storrs, Strong, Swan, Taylor of Virginia, Test, Thompson of Ohio, Tucker of New Jersey, Van Horn, Van Rensselaer, Verplanck, Vinton, Wales, Ward, Webster, Weems, Whipple, White, Whittlesey, Wickliffe, James Wilson, Wolf, Wood of New York, Woods of Ohio, Wurts—109.

NAYS.—Messrs. Addams of Pennsylvania, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Alston, Anderson, Angel, Armstrong, Ashley, Baldwin, Barringer, Bassett, Blair, Boon, Cary, Claiborne, Conner, Crowninshield, Crump, Davenport, Deitz, Edwards of North Carolina, Estill, Findlay of Pennsylvania, Haile, Harvey, Healy, Henry, Herrick, Hines, Hoffman, Ingham, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Krebs, Kremer, Lecompte, Letcher, Long, Martindale, McCoy, McHatton, McManus, McNeill, Merriwether, Metcalfe, Miller of Pennsylvania, John Mitchell, Mitchell of South Carolina, Moore of Alabama, O'Brien, Polk, Ripley, Rives, Saunders, Sloane, Smith, Stevenson of Virginia, Tallafarro, Trezvant, Tucker of South Carolina, Whittemore, Williams, Wilson of South Carolina, Wilson of Ohio, Wright, Young—67.

The bill having been subsequently engrossed, was then read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

MONDAY, January 22.

Duties on Wool and Woollens.

The House now resumed the unfinished business of Thursday, being the motion of Mr. BUCHANAN to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, from the further consideration of the bill proposing certain minimum duties on woollen goods.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, I should have waived the privilege which is usually extended by the courtesy of the House to the mover of a proposition, of closing the debate, if it were not for a single circumstance. I did not hear the remark of my friend from Virginia (Mr. MERCER) on Thursday last, which imputed ignorance of his duty to a former Chairman of the Committee of Domestic Manufactures, who was a member of this House from the State which I have, in part, the honor to represent. For what cause has this charge been made against that gentleman? It is not because he was ignorant either of our foreign or our domestic trade: not because he was unacquainted with the countries from which foreign iron was imported, and its cost, both to the foreign and to the domestic manufacturer; but simply because he had forgotten, or, perhaps, never had known, the name of an obscure town in Wales, from which that article was imported. I must confess I do not remember the name myself. The gentlemen around me now inform me it is Cardiff. The truth is, that gentleman had enjoyed singular good fortune during the short period which he remained in Congress; but not better than he deserved. To him, more than to any other individual in this nation, are we indebted for the tariff of 1824—a tariff which has been so mild and so gradual in its operation, as not to have burdened the community, and yet so powerful as to have generally afforded efficient protection to our domestic industry. It was a tariff of protection, not of prohibition. That gentleman had labored upon it incessantly for the whole of two sessions; and yet we are now called upon, during the few remaining weeks of this session, to mature, to pass a new bill upon this subject. Gentlemen, although they have not directly charged me with inconsistency, yet such a charge is fairly to be implied from their remarks. Can any person really believe that, because I supported protection in 1824, I am bound to advocate prohibition in 1827? Did my course then, compel me now, in order to be consistent, to vote for any crude and undigested measure which may be proposed, merely because it is called a tariff? Certainly not. This bill, should it become a law, will effectually prohibit the importation of nearly all the woollen goods in common use, whose value, at the place of exportation, shall not exceed three dollars and fifty cents per yard. It embraces peculiarly within its grasp, those articles worn by the poor and middle classes of society. Its provisions extend far beyond the request of the woollen manufacturers. They have not alleged that the duty of thirty-three and one third per cent. was insufficient for their protection; but they complain, and I believe with justice, that British manufacturers and British agents fraudulently evade the payment of this duty. What, then, is the proper remedy? A measure which would prevent the fraud, and give fair effect to the tariff of 1824. Instead of that, we are now presented with a bill which closes the door altogether against foreign competition. This is the application of salivation and blistering to cure the headache. The remedy is entirely too violent for the disease. If the bill had proposed a moderate minimum, and had made a small addition to the ad valorem duty, it should have received my support. In its present shape, however, I could not vote for it, even if it embraced a provision to impose additional duties on the importation of foreign spirits and of hemp. Sir, said Mr. B., I wish to put the question seriously to every member within the sound of my voice, whether they believe it possible to mature and pass a proper bill upon the subject during the present session? If the House should make the attempt, I feel positive that my course will be proved to be correct. After wasting much precious time in the discussion, and after dividing the friends of domestic manufactures themselves, the bill will eventually be postponed until the next session. I am sorry that I am compelled to make these observations, but self-preservation is the first law of nature. As a Representative of Pennsylvania, as a friend to the tariff, and feeling a deep interest in its popularity, I can never look on with indifference at the passage of a bill which will at once prohibit the importation of foreign woollens; much less can I do so when that bill contains no provisions calculated to protect the suffering domestic industry of my own State.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that it was not his purpose, at the present time, to go into a discussion of the policy of the measure proposed by the bill under consideration; he would therefore endeavor to confine himself strictly to the question before the House, which was substantially whether our decision on the proposed increase of duty on woollens, ought not to be postponed. For voting in the affirmative he had many reasons, besides his strong and unreserved opposition, generally, to any increase of the impost, let it come up in any shape it might. But to the passage of the bill at the present time there are solid objections. In the first place, the whole country, excepting those who are to benefit by the monopoly, will be taken by surprise, by the imposition of an unexpected and grievous tax, at a period when three-fourths of its industry is suffering and depressed. No anticipation can have been formed of the blow which is meditated: for, although it is perfectly true, that several memorials have been presented from the woollen manufacturers and wool growers this session, asking for the bounty of this prohibition, yet an expectation has generally been cherished, that we would not act on a partial interest, from a partial view of the great interests of the country. That this impression prevailed, he would only appeal to the correspondence from this city, which had appeared in the different prints in various quarters of the country. If a contrary apprehension had been entertained, your tables would have groaned under the weight of the remonstrances which would have been sent here from all quarters against this cruel and unjust measure. Under this false security, even the commercial jealousy of the great emporium of our Union, New York, has not been awakened, or we should have had the most copious intelligence poured in upon us from that city, demonstrating the pernicious tendency of the step you are about to take.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Duties on Wool and Woollens.

[H. OF R.]

Have we any information as to its operation on the revenue? Has the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures condescended to enlighten us on this subject, beyond his mere surmises and conjectures? Has he obtained any estimates from the Treasury? Has he, in one word, the sanction of the officer at the head of that Department, for a measure which is to operate a decided prohibition on the import of one class of woollen fabrics, and that class principally worn by the poor, who can least bear the burden? No, sir; but he has gone on as if these considerations were unworthy of being taken into account. After the passage of the tariff of 1824, the people, at least from that section of the country from which I came, supposed that they were to have a respite and repose for several years, from the agitations of this vexatious and disgusting topic. They knew that it had terminated in a compromise, the chief expense of which they had to bear, but, like the traveller stopped by a footpad on Hounslow Heath, who is willing to compound to get off with his shirt and waistcoat, even with the loss of his coat and watch, they were suffering and content. But it seems that this blessed compromise has not brought peace and security, and we are again to be thrown into commotion and combat.

A gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. BARTLETT) remarked, when the subject was before the House a few days since, that it ought not to produce any excitement; and connected it with an allusion for which, as he received your just rebuke, I shall abstain from saying any thing in regard to the wit and delicacy in which that allusion was conceived and expressed. Not calculated to produce excitement! Did not the tariff of 1824 produce excitement? Did it not shake this Union to its centre? Did not the people in those quarters where your injustice was most felt, boldly challenge you to produce the warrant for your authority in travelling one inch beyond revenue in the imposition of your duties? And when, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, you talked of encouraging domestic manufactures, did they not point to that part of the proceedings of the Convention which formed this constitution, in which the power to promote and encourage the useful arts, &c., by bounties, was expressly refused to you? Did they not tell you that the rights of property of one part of the community were invaded by an iniquitous taxation, for the benefit of a smaller part? Sir, the just philosophy of Burke, in regard to the people of England, is true as it respects their descendants. That the notion of liberty is not a pure abstraction; it attaches and adheres to something tangible, and susceptible of sensation; that, as personal rights were secure in that country, the vigilance of this sentiment was directed to property and taxation. And let me tell you that, in this country, it exists with an intensity which will always be felt whenever you attempt injustice in your burdens.

Mr. BURGESS said he had risen to state what was the real question before the House; for, after all that he had heard, this seemed to be necessary. The true and only object of the bill was to give to the manufacturers of woollen goods the protection that was intended for them by the act of 1824; but which they had failed to receive, owing to the evasions of that act. He could not conceive how so simple an object as this came to be connected with the ratiocinations of Mr. Burke, with the progress of the caravans in Upper Asia, the achievements of the heroes of Hounslow Heath, and a variety of other subjects which appeared to dance and gambol through the imaginations of some gentlemen. The discussion of the bill involved a mere calculation on the value of property, and was no more calculated to produce any excitement, than a common sum in reduction or subtraction. He could not conceive what there was in the locality of these manufactures—what there was in the fact, that that locality happened to lie between certain parallels of northern latitude, to make gentlemen delight to say that the question involved in this bill was so very serious—that it was highly dangerous—in a word, that it was a monstrous question. If other gentlemen chose to bring in bar iron, and pig iron, and a variety of other articles which seemed familiar to the imaginations of some gentlemen, he could not help it—the Committee on Manufactures could not help it—it was not their project, and they were not justly answerable for objections which did not belong to the bill as they reported it. The manufacturers of woollen goods had presented the subject of the bill in various memorials laid before the House; and the question was, whether the House was to postpone for a whole year the consideration of the subject, because certain gentlemen, not authorized by their constituents to do so, had suggested that other branches of manufacture were suffering in the same manner? Was the House to wait a whole year for grievances? Gentlemen had referred to our great commercial emporium. Was the House to be told that that great city did not understand her own interests? Or would it be pretended that the merchants of New York were not apprised of the steps which had been taken in this matter? Yet, although sixty or seventy hours were sufficient to take to them the knowledge of our proceedings and to bring back the declaration of their will, not a memorial or a remonstrance had been received from that city in opposition to this measure. To such a remonstrance, Mr. B. said, he should ever listen with the highest respect, as he was well aware, not only of the wealth, but of the intelligence which prevailed in that city. But he could not, for one, believe that, on a subject like this, the merchants of New York were asleep; and if it was indeed true, that the interests of commerce would suffer so materially from the passage of this bill, they would have let the House hear from them long before. He spoke of the merchants at large, for he believed that a better knowledge of the principles of political economy was to be found throughout the country generally, than among a few importing merchants, who looked only to their own immediate profit. The effects of such a measure were not to be estimated from any sudden consequences it might at first occasion. In all progressive systems, you must allow at least 20 years for their practical development; and if, in that time, they shall not have injured, but, on the contrary, benefited the country, their true character is to be estimated accordingly.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Virginia, said that he did not intend to enter, at this time, into a general discussion of the important principles embraced by this bill. He rose simply to state, in a very few words, why he should vote for the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the subject. The question before the House, Mr. S. considered, was one rather of expediency than of principle. The motion had been submitted, with the single view of ascertaining distinctly whether the House were prepared to discuss, at this session, "the principles and policy of the tariff." This was the only question now to be decided. If gentlemen were determined to enter upon the discussion of the subject, and to persevere to a final result, he admitted they ought to vote against the motion, and to retain the bill in the committee; if, on the contrary, the House thought with him, that it could not be fully and fairly discussed and acted on at the present session, he hoped the motion would prevail; that the committee would be discharged, and the bill laid upon the table for the remainder of the session. Did gentlemen seriously believe that there was any probability of our legislating, at this time, fully and fairly upon the subject? Was there a member upon the floor who imagined that the single interests of the woollen manufacturers, which was alone embraced by the present bill, would, or could be considered, apart from the other branches of national industry, and the great interests of the country? Did they believe that the Representatives of those portions of the Union whose interests were more immediately and more deeply affected by the provisions of this bill, would sit silent, and consent to its passage, without vindicating the interests of their constituents, and demanding a general discussion of the whole subject? It was not to be expected. This bill, Mr. S. said, disguise it as you will, is most obnoxious and unjust. It was infinitely more so than the one of 1824, under which the southern and southwestern country were now bleeding at every pore. Could gentlemen hope to drive on by detachment, this protecting duty policy, to the utter ruin of the other interests of the country, and expect no opposition? It was impossible! It was in vain to preach up conciliation, if this fatal policy, this political colossus, which is to overshadow and reduce a portion of us to beggary, is to be persevered in and adhered to. It must beget division and hatred, and interrupt the harmony and peace of the Union.

Sir, do gentlemen believe that a subject of this character, one which, two years ago, agitated so deeply the whole country, and roused into action all its rival interests—a subject which affects not only the commerce and political economy of the country, but the liberty of property itself, and the very principles of the Government—will be permitted to pass without full and free discussion, and the strongest resistance? Are we again to have the scenes which divided and distracted us in 1824? Do we not know that, after eight weeks' discussion, the present tariff passed this House by only a few votes? That upon the great question of the woollens, the House was equally divided, (I believe 93 and 93,) and that at last it was settled by compromise and concession between the two Houses? Have we time, and are the House prepared for this state of things at the present session? He thought not. Was it not injurious too, Mr. S. said, to attempt to discuss it, unless we intended acting finally upon the subject? Would it not be productive of serious mischief to the commercial interests? He appealed to his friend from New York, on his left, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) so deeply versed in commercial knowledge, and whose opinions commanded so justly the high commendation of the House, to know if the discussion of this subject, even for a week, would not produce speculations to the amount of many millions of dollars? Was it right to hazard such consequences? Did it comport with the dignity and justice of the House, and with a fair course of legislation? He thought not. Would it not be better, Mr. S. asked, if a revision of the tariff is deemed necessary, and demanded by the manufacturers, to let it rest until the next session; to bring then fairly before Congress the whole subject of free trade and national industry, and let the next Congress, just from the bosom of the people, discuss and settle the question. Such a course Mr. S. thought much the more desirable. He presumed it was with this view his friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) offered his resolution the other day. It was calculated to heal, rather than inflame, our differences, and would be the means of bringing to the ultimate decision of the question, the high sanction of calm, deliberate, and dignified legislation. He hoped, therefore, the motion would prevail; that the committee would be discharged, and the bill laid upon the table, not again to be called up during the present session. It was due to the nation, and to the House, that this should be done; and he appealed to the friends and enemies of the bill to unite in this course.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Duties on Wool and Woollens.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, said, after so much remark upon the bill reported by the Committee on Domestic Manufactures, he might, perhaps, as a member of that committee, be allowed to say a few words in explanation of his opinion of the bill, and of his views in voting against the motion made by his respected colleague. You are aware, said Mr. S., that the Committee on Domestic Manufactures had several memorials referred to them by the House, representing the depressed state of the woollen manufactories, and requesting the attention of Congress to the subject; setting forth, amongst other causes of their languishing state, that the spirit of the present tariff was evaded, and that they were sufferers by the violation of existing laws. To correct the evils complained of, the petitioners urged the adoption of a minimum valuation for woollen goods, and the assessment of the duty upon such minimum. I agreed with the majority of the committee as to the principle, and it was adopted. The next point was to settle the minimum prices, and, in doing this, I thought that too high a rate was, in my opinion, required, and voted with the minority. I regretted that so high a rate was settled, believing it unjust, as regarded the general interest, unwise as it related to the manufacturers. It was calculated to produce an impression unfavorable to the general purpose of the bill, and thus to defeat the whole design. I still, however, trust, that, after the discussion which has taken place, if we go into committee, those who advocate, and those who resist the bill, as it stands, may come to some better understanding, and that something may be effected, not too exorbitant on the one part, nor oppressive on the other. I cannot consent to vote for the bill as it stands. It imposes, in fact, an increase of 200 per cent. on the cost of a certain grade of goods, used principally by the poor, and an average increase of more than 50 per cent. on the part of the present tariff. If the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole, I do not despair of such facts being elicited as will lead to the preservation of the minimum principle, and an equitable adjustment of its rate, so as to save the manufacturers, without violating the general principles of just legislation. Let us, at least, do justice to ourselves, by acting upon the subject without prejudice and without passion. On the motion before you, I do not think proper to go into the general merits or demerits of the bill. Let that be reserved for its proper time. At that time, I trust that I shall be able to show that the extent to which I shall be willing to go, may be done with perfect justice to the several parts of this Union, after due reference to their various interests; and I pledge myself to never form one of a majority to do that, as regards this nation, that has not the fullest sanction of what little of the light of reason has been given to me. I voted against the motion of my colleague, although I apprehend he will finally be found to have proposed a course which would have saved the time of the House from being wasted on a bill that cannot be matured into a law during the present session.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said he was opposed to the motion to discharge the committee, for some reasons which, perhaps, were peculiar to himself. Although he was, and ever had been, an advocate for the tariff system, he was not prepared to say that he could vote for this bill in its present shape; although he was prepared to co-operate in modifying and improving it. But because he was opposed to the bill in that particular shape in which it had been presented by the Committee of Manufactures, it did not follow that he must shun the investigation of the subject, and not give to it its full and just share of consideration, if the time allowed. He would now inquire what would be the true effect of the present motion. The ground on which it is urged, is, that the House has not now sufficient time to inquire into the subject; and many gentlemen disposed to vote for the bill, are unwilling to postpone it on this ground. But the effect of the motion, whatever may be the intention of its mover, will certainly be to defeat the bill, and thus to deprive the country of the benefits derived from an adequate protection to this valuable branch of our manufactures. The consideration of the bill, at this time, is resisted on two grounds: First, it is said that it will produce excitement, by striking at the vital interests of the country; and, secondly, that it is not sufficiently comprehensive, and does not embrace a sufficient number of objects to be protected. Mr. McL. said that none could deprecate more than he did any cause of excitement in the country; but, if excitement is to be produced by the discussion of this bill, it must be because it is inseparable from the subject itself. If it arise at all, it will arise whenever the subject is brought up. But why, asked Mr. McL., is this excitement produced by it at all? It arises from a mistaken opinion, that the interests of the different parts of the great national community are distinct from, and opposed to, each other. I do not believe this, and, therefore, I am in favor of the policy; but, so long as an opposite opinion is held, the seeds of excitement will be here; the same causes of it will exist at the next session which exist now, and they will probably rather increase than diminish. As to the other objection, that the bill comprehends only one object to be protected, I am in favor of its consideration now, for this very reason; it is simple—it is brought to one point, and confines itself to a single object, which all can comprehend. Heretofore, on the contrary, it has been usual to include many different objects in the same bill, in order to carry some one prominent object of policy through the House. Now, I am entirely opposed to this species of legislation. I disapprove of legislating by compromise. Either a particular branch of industry requires protection, or it does not. If it does not, nothing should induce the House to protect it; but if it does, let it be fairly presented to the House, and clearly understood, and then let it receive that degree of protection which it merits. But I protest against the system of compromise. It is a system of injury. Here we have a single object before us: the petitioners say that an important branch of domestic manufactures is now in danger of being wholly prostrated by foreign competition. Now, it is surely easier to comprehend the subject, and to judge if their statements be true, than if all the different objects which different gentlemen may suppose to need protection, had been taken up with it and included in the same bill. I at least confess that I am more able to understand it, and I am in favor of considering it for the very reason that it excluded the principle of compromise. We may at least go into Committee of the Whole, and modify the bill; and we can as soon discover in committee as we could in the House, whether it is likely to be put into such a shape as finally to pass.

Mr. DAVIS said that the discussion had taken a much wider range than could have been anticipated, by any one acquainted with the true nature of the bill. Gentlemen, however, had entirely mistaken the character of the measure. Both the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Louisiana, had wholly mistaken the principle on which it was founded. The Committee on Manufactures were told that very extensive frauds were practised at the custom houses, by which the protecting duties on domestic cloths were evaded, and the intentions of the law of 1824 practically defeated, and rendered of none effect. They were asked to apply a remedy, and they esteemed it of great importance to do it. It was obviously in vain to increase, with this view, the ad valorem duty: for, however it might be increased, the same evasion would still be practised. Being convinced of this, the Committee on Manufactures considered what else could be done, and they adopted the minimum principle, as the only remaining expedient. Yet, to make a regular ascending scale of minimum prices, with small differences between them, would open a door for precisely the same frauds: for every foreign manufacturer, whose goods were in reality above any one of these minimum prices, would endeavor to introduce them as below it; and there was no guard against this, but to make the space between the prices so large as to render this impossible. The committee are fully aware that the space between 40 cents and 250 cents is great; but they were also aware that goods of the intermediate value are already supplied, and can be made in sufficient quantities fully to satisfy the market. Had they interposed an intermediate price, none of the existing difficulties would have been remedied. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes delay—but what is it that is to be delayed? The protection of property to the amount of 100,000,000, which is now jeopardized and suffering by fraud. The memorialists tell us, their property is suffering—is sinking. Must we wait till it is sunk, till it has perished, and then come here next year to legislate for its protection? Is this our duty? These same memorialists are our countrymen—our constituents. So much comity, at least, is due to them, as to inquire whether the statements they have made are true. It is said, that there is a want of time to consider the subject, and to derive the information necessary to act upon it. Is the subject new? Is this House taken by surprise? If it is, I am as ready to agree to delay as the gentleman from Pennsylvania—but the fact is not so. This subject has been publicly agitated for months before we met. It has been largely discussed in the public papers. Meetings have been held, and memorials have been published, with notice that they would be presented to this House. Those memorials have followed us here, and have been heaped upon our table from day to day. They have been referred to a Standing Committee of the House, and a bill has been reported, two weeks ago—printed, and laid upon the tables of the members. Can we now be told, that this is a new subject?

JANUARY, 1827.]

Duties on Wool and Woollens.

[H. OF R.]

That the House knows nothing about it? That it has been taken by surprise, and has not now time to come to any understanding of the matter? Was not this very subject discussed in 1824? and, if farther facts are necessary, is there not abundant time to obtain them? The objection, then, from the shortness of the time, is not worthy of regard. What subject of greater moment is on the table of the House? Not only the manufacturers, but all the growers of wool—not only the manufacturing, but the agricultural interest, have a deep interest in the bill. They are our constituents—they cry to us for relief—I hope we shall not be deaf to their entreaty.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the vote just taken furnished another evidence of the impetuosity with which the friends of the bill were disposed to force it upon the House. The gentlemen tell us about frauds, said he, but say nothing of how they are committed. They say their object is not to increase the duty, but only to secure the collection of the duty. I have listened attentively to all they have advanced, and I cannot say less than that, in my judgment, the House is imposed upon, if that is thought to be the object of the bill. The very discussion of the subject has a ruinous effect. If this debate goes on for one week, speculations will take place in woollen goods to the amount of millions of dollars. The object of the bill is prohibition—nor is there any thing in the bill, either in its form or substance, which will operate to ensure the collection of the revenue. It goes, on the other hand, to annihilate the revenue. If, however, the House is determined to go into the question, I am prepared to meet it; yet, with all deference to the honorable gentleman from Delaware, I must tell him that I would rather take the Tariff of 1824, with all its compromises, than the bill now proposed. That whole Tariff bill was nothing to this; with all its various and multiplied provisions, it did not affect the country half so much as this bill will affect it. I call on the Committee of Manufactures to tell us, for they have not yet told us, how much duty it is that they intend to put upon these goods. I ask, how much per cent. upon the price their new duty is intended to demand? We have no report—no calculation. When the Tariff bill of 1824 was brought into the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was then Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, (for whom, however I may have differed from him in opinion, I ever cherish the greatest personal respect,) gave to the House a statement, exhibiting, in one column, the existing duty, and in another, the duty proposed. This afforded the House some data to go by—it enabled them, in some measure, to judge of the effect of the bill; but now we have not one item to guide us.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

TUESDAY, January 23.

Duties on Wool and Woollens.

The question pending before the House being on a motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the farther consideration of the bill for the protection of Woollen Manufactures—

Mr. DWIGHT said he thought there were some positions taken on yesterday by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) which required particular notice; and he felt himself inclined to examine these positions with more particularity, since they came from a quarter which might be supposed to carry no ordinary degree of sanction. And that was from the city of New York—the great commercial emporium of the Union.

The honorable gentleman still insists that the Committee of Manufactures were imposed on. By what power, from what source, he would ask? Were they not composed of enlightened men, selected from the different quarters of the Union, for their particular fitness for the duties of the station? Had they not made a most elaborate investigation of the evil which the petitioners wished to have redressed? and had they not, after great deliberation, reported the bill upon the table, to mitigate, or, perhaps, totally to avoid that evil? But the honorable gentleman had asked, where were the detailed and specific statements of the chairman of the committee, upon which the House and the nation could form their opinion of the propriety of the measure proposed? One of the strong reasons, he confessed, which operated upon his own mind, to induce him to oppose discharging of the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, was, that, as yet, no opportunity had been offered to the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, to go into an explanation, in detail, of the operation of the several provisions of his bill; and yet, the honorable gentleman from New York, while he refused that opportunity to explain, would fain present, as a ground of complaint, that no explanation had as yet been made. The committee had stated, in the general, the strong and unanswerable grounds upon which the bill was founded, to wit: that frauds to an alarming extent had been committed upon the revenue—frauds which, while they diminished the receipts into the Treasury, operated most extensively to embarrass that invaluable branch of our home industry—the woollen manufacture. But he has said, sir, that this affords another evidence of the precipitancy with which the House was disposed to rush into legislation. Where, sir, he would ask, is this evidence? Was not the half of that period which the law has devoted to the annual legislation of this great country, sufficient to mature a set of provisions by which the established principles of our national policy were to be carried into execution? Had not the Tariff of 1824, after the fullest discussion, settled the extent of protection, which the nation were willing to afford to this branch? and were we not, in good faith, now called upon to guard that protection against the evasions complained of? If this was precipitancy, to discuss a bill after six weeks of maturing in committee, and before the House, where could be found the evidence of our deliberation? What would become of the bill for occlusion of the British colonial ports?—a measure of so much importance that it may involve us in all the calamities of war with the most powerful nation of Europe. And yet, if he was not mistaken, the honorable gentleman himself was one of that committee, who proposed a prompt and decisive action of the House upon the bill alluded to. If this is precipitancy, sir, we may as well adjourn at once, and say that a three months' session is too short for deliberate legislation. For his part, he thought that no haste, consistent with a competent understanding of the subject, was too great, where you were called upon to legislate for the relief of a branch of industry which employed 70,000 of the people, and 50 or 60 millions of the capital of your country. The very facts stated by the honorable gentleman, went far to show, that no such opposition or alarm existed, in regard to the measure, as he had attempted to show. He had written, it seems, a dozen letters to New York, and to but one of them he had received an answer. And what, sir, is the inference? Clearly, he presumed, that the interest taken in the question among the enlightened merchants of New York was not such as the gentleman had declared. And, when you are informed that four-fifths of the importing woollen trade in our own ports, is in the hands of foreigners, there is an obvious reason why the gentleman's correspondents are indifferent to the measures which are adopted to prevent impositions under it. The honorable gentleman has made the extraordinary assertion, that this measure is of more importance than all the Tariff of 1824. What, sir, is a bill, affecting at most the duties to be collected on four millions of woollen goods, to be compared with the great system by which articles yielding a revenue of twenty millions, were laid under new and increased duties? The gentleman could not seriously intend such an assertion. A change of duties upon almost the whole imports of a country, to be compared with a change which only affected the low-priced broadcloths and kerseymeres!

Mr. HAYLÉ stated, that nothing but an imperious sense of duty could have induced him to submit any remarks to the consideration of the House. We are now discussing the propriety of discharging the Committee of the Whole from the farther consideration of this bill. We are not prepared to enter upon its merits at this session. It is well known that the State he had the honor to represent, was not represented upon this floor at the last session of Congress; consequently business of much interest to that State was not acted upon. No one conceived that this measure would be seriously agitated at this session. The opinion has prevailed from one extremity of the Union to the other, that this session would be exclusively devoted to business—business heretofore presented to this House, and which had not been acted upon at the last session. So far as the public prints are any evidence, they generally indulged in the hope that no subject would arise calculated to produce excitement, and have a tendency to consume that time that ought to be devoted to subjects that have long slept upon your table, and are likely to share a similar bad fortune, if this bill is taken up. The question addresses itself to this House, whether all the variety of bills now upon your table shall yield precedence to this; whether measures of essential importance to this country, shall lie over another session, to give consideration to this bill; whether we shall be taken by surprise and forced into a discussion, without information from the Treasury Department, or from any other source, as to the effect of this measure upon our revenue—and without being fortified with information from our constituents. Courtesy should dictate to the members who urge this measure, that something is due to other sections of the country. Bills of great magnitude are yet to be acted upon. Sixty or seventy private bills lie upon your table. Mr. H. said we are bound to do justice to individuals who have waited year after year for the settlement of their just demands against the Government, so long withheld from them. The bill for the gradual increase of the navy; the appropriation bills; the bill for the removal of the Indians west of the river Mississippi, is yet to be acted upon—a measure of deep interest to the new State—a measure of great importance to the State he (Mr. H.) represented. A bill for the graduation of the price of public lands, remains also yet to be acted upon—besides other measures of deep interest to the welfare of other sections of country. Mr. H. further stated, that he had no doubt, and it must be apparent to every one, that this measure, if taken up, would consume the remainder of the session. Mr. H. appealed to the generosity of the House, to say explicitly whether other sections of country should not be heard at this session, upon other subjects of as deep interest as the one now proposed. The House, said Mr. H., ought not to be hurried into this measure. It is not called for by the expression of public opinion. In fact, the Southern people did not dream that this measure would be seriously urged. Mr. H., in conclusion, stated that he was fearful, if this measure was taken up, the balance of this session would be consumed in debate; and other business of great importance would share the cold neglect it met with at the last session—he, therefore, hoped the committee would be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

JANUARY, 1837.]

Asylums for the Deaf and Dumb.

[H. or R.]

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, said that the friends of the bill were unnecessarily protracting the debate. The Chair had stated that the real question before the House was, whether the bill should remain with the committee, or be put to the House? The enemies of the bill had supported the discharge of the committee, with a view to its final postponement. If that question were put, the House would then decide on its course, either to discuss the bill on its merits, or otherwise to dispose of it. Such a decision would relieve the public mind from its anxious suspense, and prevent those fatal speculations which the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) had yesterday anticipated. Mr. M. said he had taken different views of this question from those who agreed with him in opinion. His opposition was not so much to the increase of the duties on woollens. He thanked God that, exorbitant as they were, the laboring poor could pay them. We lived in a land where subsistence was cheap and employment abundant, and where every industrious man, no matter what his pursuit, could supply himself with the comforts of life. We are not reduced to such a state of wretched impoverishment as that industry should want the means to pay revenue. But his objections were of greater importance, and demanded the most serious attention. The bill presented two principles, which, if adopted, would completely alter the character of our internal and external policy. In one of these principles, it differed from the Tariffs of 1789, of 1816, and of 1824. They taxed the consumer in proportion to the value and quantity of the articles which he consumed. He who enjoyed most was to pay most. This was all right. It operated equally on all classes, and left each at liberty to pay so much of the duty as he pleased, or could afford. But the bill proposes the reverse of this. It taxes the poor and exempts the rich; it throws the whole burthen of the duty on the productive laborer, while those who enjoy wealth and luxury, and are mere drones in the hive, are relieved from its exorbitancy. This was contrary to every principle of taxation and sound policy. If it was right with regard to a tax on consumption, it would be right with regard to a tax on property. But, is the House prepared to say, that they would adopt it in the assessment of direct taxes? Would the people submit to an imposition of the kind? There they could see and feel it. They could compare what they paid with what others paid. Here they cannot. But the bill goes further. It affects our foreign relations, and makes a direct attack on commerce and navigation. It is admitted that the duty amounts to a prohibition—to an exclusion of the foreign article from our markets. And are we prepared to jeopardize or limit those great interests? Gentlemen had said that the bill was intended merely to prevent the frauds practised under the Tariff of 1824. It was no such thing.

VOL. IX.—26

This was a mere pretence. It increased the average duty from 83½ per cent. to 50 per cent. The manufacturers had petitioned for an increase to 80 per cent. They wished to exclude all foreign competition—to monopolize the home markets. Mr. M. said he was anxious that the House should proceed to a decisive vote.

WEDNESDAY, January 24.

Deaf and Dumb Asylums.

Mr. WURTS moved the consideration of the bill for the benefit of the New York and Pennsylvania Institutions for the Deaf and Dumb, which bill had passed through a Committee of the whole House, and now lay upon the table. The motion prevailed—ayes 59, noes 58.

The Chair stated the question pending, to be on an amendment proposed by Mr. WHITE, Delegate from Florida, to the proviso in the bill, the effect of which was to require that the land granted by the bill to these institutions, instead of being reserved to them for five years, should be exposed to sale by the Register and Receiver, at the first ensuing sale of public land.

Mr. WURTS had hoped that the gentleman from Florida would, on reflection, have abandoned his amendment. The situation of these institutions (he could answer at least for that in Pennsylvania) was such, as would induce them to avail themselves of as speedy a sale as possible of the lands which might be granted them without incurring an entire sacrifice. He could not, to be sure, expect that the gentleman from Florida would rely on this assertion as a sufficient guarantee. That gentleman had urged, and not without an appearance of reason, that there were two grants already within the limits of his Territory, the lands in which were withheld from market, to the injury of the settlement of the country. But this objection did not apply to other Territories, which were much more extensive, and which afforded ample space for the contemplated grant, without any injury whatever. And, if the gentleman would so modify his amendment as to make it apply to Florida alone, he (Mr. W.) would not oppose the amendment in that shape. He expected this much from the sincerity of the gentleman, as he had professed himself friendly to the general object of the bill, and opposed only to its operation within his own Territory.

Mr. WHITE replied, that he should have no objection to the general measure, provided the interests of that Territory which he had the honor to represent, were secured from injury. But that Territory was the most exposed frontier of the United States; and although it contained much land of the first quality, yet, it was notorious that the good land did not lie in large bodies, but was scattered through different parts of the country. If a grant to the amount of that contemplated in the bill should be withheld from market for five years, it would be productive of very injurious consequences. One large tract had already been granted within that Territory to General Lafayette, and another to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum of Kentucky. If the United States chose to proceed in this course of legislation, it was not for him to say any thing against it. All he wished was, such a modification of the bill as should fix the location of any further grants elsewhere than in Florida. The people of the Territory complained very heavily of what had already been done; and he earnestly hoped that Government would not continue to multiply these grants among them, till all the good land which remained should be taken up.

Mr. POWELL inquired of the Delegate, the existing value of lands in that Territory, and what would be the value of a township, if now exposed to sale?

Mr. WHITE replied, that, from the nature of the country, it would be very difficult to get an entire township consisting throughout of good land. The sales of the public lands were at from one dollar twenty-five cents to five dollars, and portions of the good land now sold as high as six and seven dollars. The value of a township would depend entirely upon where it should be located.

Mr. GOVAN saw no reason why the States of New York and Pennsylvania should have any preference in this matter, and wished to move an amendment to the bill; but the Chair pronounced the motion out of order until the House should have decided upon that now before it.

Mr. WHITE modified his amendment by inserting the words "and if any of the said lands shall be located in the Territory of Florida, then," &c.

Mr. MCCOY said that the desire of the Delegate from Florida to protect his own Territory was very proper, and, if the bill must pass at all, he thought it ought to pass with that amendment. It appeared to him, however, that the Congress of the United States was fast getting down to be a mere corporation for local purposes. If he were not opposed to this grant in every shape, he should move to amend the bill by substituting "a sum of money" for "a tract of land." Names, indeed, might sometimes change things, but the object of these petitioners, and of the bill, was money. But where could the authority be found, which empowered Congress to make grants of money, or of land, which was but another name for money, to this and to that corporation, or to this and to that individual, as a gift? If this was the doctrine maintained, he thought it would be a saving of time to go directly into a provision for all the poor of the country, and to divide among them at once, not only all the public lands, but all the money in the Treasury, and not to be preferring, as they now were, certain favorite corporations before others. He should be very glad if the House could agree to dispense with the bill altogether—but if they could not do this, then he should be in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CONWAY, the Delegate from Arkansas Territory, said he should prefer having the provision made general, and not let the benefit of the amendment be confined to Florida alone. If the House should reject the present amendment, he would then offer another, which he had prepared with this view.

Mr. WURTS said, although he had no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Florida, as now modified, yet he should certainly prefer the bill without any amendment at all, and he should rejoice if the House should reject every amendment which altered the provisions of the bill. In assenting to the amendment as modified, he had been governed only by a desire to accommodate the Delegate from Florida.

Mr. WHITE said, if this amendment should not prevail, he must protest against the bill altogether. It was calculated to do great injustice to the Territory of Florida. If this policy should proceed, all the best lands in that country would, by degrees, be covered with grants from without; the lands of which would not be sold in the mode prescribed by law, but would be held up by private corporations, and companies. Why must this particular Territory be selected for every grant of this description? The inevitable effect of this system, would be to prolong the periods during which the Territory must be kept in servitude. He asked if it was just; if it was fair to pursue such a course in relation to one particular Territory, and that the most exposed frontier in the Union? To the south, were the Seminole Indians—to the north, the Creek tribes—on the east, the Atlantic—and on the west, the Gulf of Florida. If any Territory needs to be strengthened by population, this Territory had a pre-eminent claim. But, if grants were multiplied upon grants, and all the good lands were tied up in the hands of private companies, and literary institutions, when would it be peopled? and when would it ever reach the privileges of a State? Mr. W. here repeated and insisted on the arguments he had before urged. The grant to the Kentucky Asylum had been pressed in the Senate, where the Territory had no Representative; and thus the bill had passed into a law. The grant to Lafayette, in the immediate vicinity of the seat of Government, left a district of six miles square a perfect wilderness. The bill proposes to give twenty-four thousand acres. To take that quantity of good land in any one spot, would completely break up a neighborhood, and hinder its settlement for a long period of time. He presumed that it might be granted in Arkansas, or Michigan, without a like injury.

Mr. VINTON insisted that the effect of the amendment would be not to keep their lands open for the improvement of the actual settlers, but, on the contrary, to throw them into the hands of speculators, who would withhold them from settlement much longer than the time contemplated by the bill. The amendment says that the land should be disposed of by the Register and Receiver at the first sale of public land. Now, it was notorious to all persons acquainted with the affairs of the public lands, that at those sales, 10, 20, and even 40 times as much land was thrown into the market, as was actually sold. The inevitable consequence of offering these lands at such a sale, must be their entire sacrifice. They were limited by no minimum price, as the public lands were. They were not sure of bringing the dollar and a quarter. They might sell for ten cents or five cents an acre, should no more be offered; and the persons who thus purchased them would hold them back from settlement for purposes of speculation. For his part, he could see no reason why the grant in this bill should be located in any of the Territories. He had no objections to its being fixed in the State of Ohio, for he did not consider it as at all operating to keep down the settlement of the country. So far from objecting to the allowance of five years for the sale, his objection, on the contrary, was, that the land was obliged to be sold within that time. All persons acquainted with the state of our new lands, knew that, in the oldest districts, even in the State of Ohio, there were more lands in market than could be sold in thirty years; he admitted that if, in the natural progress of settlement, the lands granted were likely to be taken up within the five years, the argument of the gentleman from Florida would apply. But such was not the fact. The progress of settlement was far from being so rapid. A compulsory sale, even at the end of five years, must result in a sacrifice. But gentlemen had every security against unnecessary delay. The interest of these institutions would induce them to make sale of their lands as soon as practicable; while, so long as they remained unsold, they were subject to taxation, and were only a burden instead of a benefit: this matter had been fully tried in the State from whence he came. Reservations had there been granted for the support of schools, and no efforts had succeeded in making them of any value to that end; inasmuch that the State had applied for leave to sell them, and they had actually been sold. It was next to impossible to rent lands in a new country. No man would consent to settle as a renter, who could, by a little labor, attain the fee simple of the soil. The institutions, therefore, would be glad to sell their lands as soon as they could obtain a reasonable price.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Asylums for the Deaf and Dumb.

[H. or R.]

The question was now taken on the amendment of Mr. WURTS, and negatived.

Mr. GOVAN said he was opposed to this species of legislation; but, if the House determined to go into this system, he wished, at least, to make it as general as possible. With this view, he offered an amendment, the effect of which, if agreed to, would be, to include in the beneficial provisions of this act, the Lunatic Asylum at Columbia, in South Carolina.

Mr. BARTLETT thereupon offered the following amendment to the amendment of Mr. GOVAN:

"And to such literary institutions in every other State in the Union as such State shall direct."

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, objected to the latter amendment, because it went to include States which had already received their township of land.

Mr. OWEN said he was opposed to this policy; but since it seemed the determination of the House to pursue it, he thought that the same provision ought to be made for all institutions of this character which already existed, and for those hereafter to be founded; for if Congress waited till these Seminaries should actually have arisen in all the States, the good land within its control might, by this time, have all been disposed of.

Mr. WURTS said that the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire was founded on the assumption that the grants contemplated by the bill were for the benefit of the States within which the institutions happened to be located. This was not the case; and he would not vote for the bill on any such principle. The bill was not for the benefit of the States of Pennsylvania and New York, as States, but of an unfortunate, destitute, and helpless portion of the community, within a particular section of the Union. And he would remind the gentleman from New Hampshire, that, for these unfortunate beings within the six New England States, (one of which he represents,) ample provision had already been made, by a grant similar in character to that now asked for. It would be mere folly to establish institutions of this description in each State of this Union; and it would be still worse to make grants where there are no institutions in existence; and he apprehended that the gentleman from New Hampshire would be of the same opinion, if he had thoroughly examined and reflected upon the subject. In Pennsylvania and New York they already exist, and are extending the benefit of instruction so far as their means will enable them to do it. He did not know how far New York had made provision for the education of her own indigent deaf and dumb; but it was to the honor of Pennsylvania, that she appropriated the sum of eight thousand dollars, annually, for this laudable and beneficent purpose. Here, then, were institutions already in existence, and through them the benefits of this grant would be extensively diffused. But let us not volunteer our bounty where private charity has done nothing for the creation of an institution. Before we make a grant, let us see a foundation laid—let us see an institution in full operation. It was a well-known fact to those who had had the opportunity of obtaining practical knowledge on the subject, that private benevolence must conspire with the public bounty, in order to produce a beneficial result. Individuals, acting from humane and charitable motives, must give their time, their attention, and their labor, to the object, otherwise an institution for the education of the deaf and dumb could not flourish anywhere; and where private charity has not thus been already at work, there is scarcely any reason to hope that it will be called into operation by our bounty. He had said that ample provision had been made in the six Eastern States for the education of this truly unfortunate class of the community. He would show this fact, and not ask the House to take it for granted. A grant of land had been made to the institution in Connecticut; and, on the principle on which he sustained this bill, he considered that grant as made, not for the State of Connecticut, but for the benefit of the indigent deaf and dumb within those States. Now, what was the number of the deaf and dumb within those States? It could be ascertained with something like certainty, at least with all the precision necessary to a proper understanding of the claims of other portions of the Union to a similar appropriation.

Mr. BARTLETT said he regretted that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WURRS) should have thought proper to declare, so unqualifiedly, that the proposition contained in the amendment he had offered was folly—consummate folly. [Mr. WURRS explained.]

Mr B. observed that it gave him pleasure to learn from the gentleman, that there was an escape from the judgment he had supposed was pronounced, inasmuch as an opinion from so high an authority might have given to his amendment a character which he hoped it might not deserve. The gentleman had said, that he did not understand the subject. He confessed that he had not expected, at that time, that the attention of the House would have been called to it, but he hoped that his understanding of his own proposition would save him from the error into which that gentleman had fallen respecting it. The gentleman had said it was folly to propose appropriations for institutions for the deaf and dumb in States where they do not now exist. Whatever, said Mr. B., may be the character of such a measure, that measure is not mine. He proposed no such thing, and the whole course of the gentleman's remarks were entirely aside from the subject. His proposition was not to give to such institutions only, but to literary institutions in the different States. And if there were not in all the States such institutions to receive the bounty, it was time there should be. Why should donations be made to the institutions for the deaf and dumb only? Is it more important that they should be educated than the poor and illiterate, who possess the faculties of speech and hearing? Are they more poor? They are, in all the probabilities of life, the children of as able parents as others.

But we are told the example of this charity had been set. We have given to the institution in Connecticut and in Kentucky. There was a reason for extending aid to the institution in Connecticut, when it was established, which does not now apply. This system of education was then a new experiment in this country. There was not sufficient confidence of its success in the community to enable individual effort to struggle against popular prejudice. The Government gave its aid—it has succeeded—and institutions, by private enterprise, upon the principles of other institutions for education, have since been established, and are successful. It is true, also, that, at the last session, we made a like grant to the institution in Kentucky. He remembered the passage of that bill, and, from his own impressions, had no doubt that many were influenced, and he thought properly, by the argument, that Government had aided in the establishment of that kind for the Atlantic section of the Union, while the extensive region west of the Alleghany was unprovided for. It was, in that view, considered an act of justice, with the belief that institutions of that character could hereafter present no peculiar claims to national patronage. He felt not less compassion than others for the unfortunate beings for whose instruction such institutions are intended. And he would not institute a comparison at this time, into the importance of educating them, or such as have the power of speech and hearing; he would only say, that, in the latter, the community have at least as deep an interest.

Mr. CONWAY expressed a hope that the amendment of Mr. GOVAN would not be adopted, as the territories are completely excluded from its benefit, although they certainly had as just a claim as any of the States.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, was opposed to the amendment of Mr. BARTLETT. He said that the grant, if made, will be applied to literary institutions in general; but a grant to different States for this purpose has not been called for. They have not asked it. The bill, on the contrary, is for two institutions actually in existence—institutions fully organized, and in active and useful operation. A large class of children, unhappily deprived of the powers of speech, and of hearing, are in a course of training, and the number received is only limited by the funds provided for their support. There was a wide difference between these children and paupers. It had never been held that the States were under any obligation to educate their deaf and dumb. But it had always been maintained and acknowledged that they were bound to support their own poor. The latter provision, however, was for the body merely, whereas the noble charity to be aided by this bill addressed its invaluable benefits to the minds. It is intellect which is here to be cherished and developed—and the success of such an attempt in respect to those born deaf and dumb, conferred a just elevation where it was made. The institutions of this kind abroad were some of the most distinguished, both in France and England. It is not, by any means, proposed to provide gratuitous instruction for the children of the rich. When they are received into these seminaries, they are always received as pay scholars. So far as an appeal is now made to the National Government, it is made in behalf of the poor—for those who, in addition to all the evils of poverty, have superadded the privation of speech and hearing. So sensible had the State of New York been of the importance of providing this species of instruction, than an appropriation had been made for educating a certain number of these unfortunate from each county in the State. But so great was the number of the sufferers, that this provision, though liberal, was insufficient. Gentlemen were greatly mistaken if they supposed that the benefits of the New York Institution were confined to the deaf and dumb of that State alone. Its scholars are received from all parts of the country and of the world. None are rejected whom the means of the institution will allow it to receive. Institutions of this kind were certainly among the most charitable that could be named. They aimed at introducing their unfortunate objects, he would not say to a higher rank in the scale of existence, but to existence itself. Their beneficence was not local or partial, but wide and general as the prevalence of that evil which it sought to relieve. They were in needy circumstances, and the aid bestowed upon them would go, as far as practicable, into immediate operation. But the institutions contemplated in the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, had presented no need—had exhibited no treasury emptied by charity—nay, some of them might not yet be in existence. At all events, they were asking nothing from the House. It was now known by an experience of thirty years, that the views advanced by the delegate from Florida were not correct. The State of New York had made the same experiment as has been mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio. She had made reservations for the benefit of her literary institutions, and that mode of benefiting them had proved, in practice, utterly inefficient and useless. Those institutions had all applied for leave to sell their grants, and had actually sold them. They had proved nothing but a bill of expense on their hands, and they were glad to get rid of them as soon as any reasonable price was offered.

JANUARY, 1827.]

Asylums for the Deaf and Dumb.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MARVIN opposed Mr. BARTLETT's amendment, as wholly departing from the original objects of the bill, and opening an entirely new field of legislation. If it should be deemed expedient to give to each State a township of land for general purposes of education, let the measure be brought forward in a separate and distinct form. If, however, he was not mistaken, there was already upon the table a bill which proposed to divide the proceeds of the public lands for this very purpose. When that bill was taken up, the argument of the gentleman from New Hampshire would be pertinent. At present it had little to do with the original object of the bill. Besides, if any such general distribution was to be made, it ought to have some respect to the relative population of the States: for it was not reasonable to make the same donation to the large States and to the small. The question was, whether the House would do any thing for the deaf and dumb? Connecticut and Kentucky had already received its aid, and, by a resolution of the latter institution, which did honor to its character, all the inhabitants of the valley of the Mississippi were permitted to share in its benefits. In like manner, the institution at New York did not confine its charity to citizens of that State, but threw open its doors to all the world. Mr. M. after passing a just encomium on the liberality of his native State, in making appropriations in aiding this charity, concluded by expressing his hope, that all amendments would be rejected, and the bill passed as at first reported.

Mr. KITTEBA had long wished to see the object of this bill brought before the House, and he regretted now to observe that it had found opposers on all sides of the House; yet if he had been rightly instructed, a grant had not long since been made for similar objects, both in the east, and in the west. He asked to be informed, on what ground gentlemen were disposed to deny the same privilege to the centre of the Union. Were these grants wrong? On what principle were they wrong? Was it because the same grants had been made to other parts of the United States? If there was any thing in that objection it ought to have prevailed, but it did not prevail. The grants were made—they were rightly made. These institutions commended themselves to the charities of every man. They had been cherished—warmly cherished, as far as private munificence could sustain them. But private means had proved insufficient. And what do these institutions now ask? Is it that a benefit may be conferred exclusively on New York or Pennsylvania? No, their doors are thrown wide to all, and what they receive, they receive only that it may be distributed to all without distinction. It is out of the power of many of the States to have institutions of this kind, and those in New York and Pennsylvania are open to receive the pupils from such States. Have not they then a right to come to this House, and say, give the same aid to us as you have given to similar institutions in the east and in the west? When the unfortunate deaf and dumb from our neighboring State of Delaware shall come to the institution in Philadelphia, and ask to be received, will you oblige us to say to them—we would gladly receive you, but we have it not in our power! Why is this amendment now presented? Is it because the public lands are at some day to be divided? When are they to be divided? How? To whom? For what? No one can tell. No gentleman on the floor can answer the inquiry. The object of the amendment, then, must be, to destroy the bill altogether; such, at all events, will be its inevitable effect. Grants, it seems, are to be made to all the States, for Literary Institutions. Literary Institutions! What institutions are they? Have they asked for this aid? Who has authorized the bringing forward this amendment? Who has required it to be brought forward? Nobody. Sir, I trust that these institutions will be suffered to stand on their own application. They have accompanied that application with reasons in support of it. We ask gentlemen to meet those reasons. Will gentlemen say, we refuse this application, because we won't encourage you? Because we do not approve your object? Because we have no power to help you? Or, because, when we helped others in the same situation, we did wrong? Mr. K. concluded with expressing his hope, that the amendment would be negatived, and that the House would vote on the naked question of making a grant to the two institutions which have solicited it.

Mr. BARTLETT now moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands, with the following instructions:

"That the bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of making a general provision for grants of land to all the States in the Union, which have not already received such grants, for literary or other public institutions."

This motion superseding the question on the amendment, the question was accordingly put upon the recommitment, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 75, noes 62.

So the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 26.

Deaf and Dumb Asylum.

On motion of Mr. MARKELL, it was Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom has been referred the bill for the relief of the New York and Pennsylvania institutions for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, be directed to inquire into the propriety of so amending said bill, as that the same will give to the Central Asylum in the State of New York for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, one-half township of land, and one-half township of land to the New York City Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb.

In reply to a remark of Mr. SCOTT, Chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands,

Mr. MARKELL explained the resolution, as not being inconsistent with that passed yesterday, recommitting the whole subject of the Deaf and Dumb Institutions to the Land Committee.

Mr. HOFFMAN added a few words of further explanation, stating that the intention of the resolution was not to propose any new grant of land, but as there were two institutions of this kind in the State of New York, it merely sought to have the lands intended for the object, in that State, divided between them.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27.

Grants to the Quapaw Indians.

Mr. STRONG, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to carry into effect the grants of land made by the treaty of the 15th of November, 1824, with the Quapaw Indians; which was twice read.

Mr. FORSYTH observed that the bill appeared to introduce a new principle and a new instruction in relation to Indian reserves. He hoped its passage to a third reading would not be pressed until further time had been allowed to examine its provisions; and with that view he moved to lay it for the present upon the table.

Mr. STRONG said that the bill might no doubt be debated, as other subjects were; but he was somewhat afraid to lay it upon the table, lest it might not again be brought up in time to be acted on. The treaty made with the Quapaw tribe of Indians contained an article which provides that certain small tracts of land, amounting in all, to about a thousand acres, (excepting two sections granted to a chief,) shall be reserved from cession, and granted to certain Indians by name—and the question had arisen, whether it was the intent of the parties to the treaty that these grants should be in fee, or that they should convey only a life estate. In other treaties with Indian tribes, when similar reserves were made, the language was express that a life estate only was granted. But, in the present treaty, no such language was used, and the Commissioner, Mr. Crittenden, under whose negotiation the treaty had been made, testifies that the understanding and intention on both sides was, that these grants should be in fee. A majority of the Committee on the Public Lands were of opinion that this was the proper interpretation. A minority held the other opinion. The committee desiring to carry the real intent of the treaty into effect, had reported a bill for that purpose. He hoped this explanation would prove satisfactory, and the bill be ordered to a third reading.

Mr. FORSYTH said he was not hostile to the bill, but was desirous of having an opportunity to compare the treaty and the bill together. He believed he was correct when he stated the Commissioner of the General Land Office differed in opinion from the majority of the Land Committee. It appeared, therefore, that there was a question in the case. The bill gives certain reserves to Indian chiefs in fee. Now, did they hold of the United States as citizens? or did they hold of their tribe as Indians? He concluded by moving that the bill be laid upon the table and printed.

The motion prevailed, and the bill was accordingly laid on the table.

JANUARY, 1837.]

Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians.

[H. OF R.]

MONDAY, January 29.

Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. Woods, of Ohio, on the 25th, and as modified at the suggestion of Mr. Vinton, on the 26th instant.

Mr. Polk remarked that this resolution had been laid on the table a few days ago, on his motion, for the purpose of enabling gentlemen to look into the documents. He had examined them, and did not himself see that there was any necessity for passing such a resolution; but, as the gentleman from Ohio had thought it worthy of his attention to propose such a call, he supposed it was not merely to gratify his curiosity, but that he must have some object in view which he proposed to effect by it. And he called on him to know what use he proposed to make of the information when he had obtained it. Was it intended to furnish any useful information on any subject then pending, and hereafter to be brought before the House? If so, it would seem that all the instructions ever given to Commissioners to negotiate with Indian tribes, from the commencement of the Government down to the present period, were equally necessary. Why call for the instructions given in this case alone? Did the gentleman propose to predicate on this opinion, when received, any legislative proceedings? If so, when the House was informed what that legislative proceeding was intended to be, it might, perhaps, be proper to make the call. If neither of these objects was intended, the call was wholly useless. The House was left to conjecture what the gentleman's object was, and unless he informed them, they were called on to act on his resolution without the necessary information. He would briefly state the facts of this particular case. By the act of Congress, approved on the 20th of May last, an appropriation was made for the purpose of defraying the expenses of holding treaties with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, for the purpose of obtaining from them, if practicable, cessions of their lands. Three distinguished citizens were appointed Commissioners on the part of the United States, to negotiate with them. They met the Indians of those two nations in council, and every effort made to obtain cessions of their lands resulted in a total failure. The journal of their proceedings, containing all their communications with the Indians, and their answers, in return, had been published, and were before the House. If he had understood the remarks of the gentleman, made to the House when this resolution was before under consideration, the first exception which he had taken to the proceedings of the Commissioners was, that the act of Congress, under which they were appointed, only authorized them to treat with those tribes for the purpose of obtaining cessions of their lands lying within the State of Mississippi, and that the Commissioners had exceeded their authority, by attempting to obtain all their lands lying east of the Mississippi River, a small and very inconsiderable strip of which it turned out lay in the State of Alabama; and the second exception taken was, the enormity of the price offered to the Choctaws for their country. Now, a general and satisfactory answer to both these exceptions, if they were true, would be, that any treaty which the Commissioners might have made with either of those tribes, was subject to the ratification of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, before it was obligatory on the Government, and, even if ratified by the constitutional authority, this House, when called on for the necessary appropriation to carry it into effect, would have had a negative on it, by refusing to grant such appropriations.

But were the exceptions taken, in fact true? The first rested on a technical construction of the act of Congress, authorizing treaties to be held, and not in the evident meaning and intention of that act. The object was to obtain the Indian country, all of which lay in the State of Mississippi, except this small strip in Alabama, on which but few, if any of the Indians resided, and which could have been of no value to them, if they had sold all the balance of their country, within the State of Mississippi. It would, therefore, have been simple in the Indians to have retained this small balance. The Commissioners, according to the evident intention of Congress, proposed to treat with them for the whole of their lands on the east of the Mississippi River, including this balance. As to the second exception, the gentleman from Ohio estimates the price offered by the Commissioners to the Choctaws for their country, at five millions of dollars—this, he says, he has found to be the case, "upon calculation;" yes, sir, it must have been "upon calculation:" for it is not to be found in the propositions made by the Commissioners to the Indians. He did not know by what system of arithmetic the gentleman had arrived at his conclusion, but one thing he knew, that he was totally mistaken. He took it on himself to say that it did not amount to one-fourth of that sum. The Commissioners proposed to give them one million of dollars, to be paid in annuities, as every gentleman could see, by turning to the printed documents, for their country, consisting, as near as an estimate could be made, of about 8,000,000 of acres, which would have been worth to the United States, the moment the treaty had been consummated, and they could have brought the lands into market, four or five times the price proposed to be given for it. It would be remarked, that the blanket, rifle, gun, ammunition for hunting and defence, and the one year's provision to each warrior who should remove to the west of Mississippi River, and a few other small articles, were provided for, by the treaty made with the Choctaws at Doak's Stand, seven years ago, by the terms of which a partial exchange of countries was made. And, therefore, these items cannot be properly taken into the estimate, in ascertaining the price offered by the Commissioners in their late attempt to treat with them for their lands. He hazarded nothing in saying, that the price offered to these tribes for their lands was much less, in proportion to the value of the country, than that given to the Creeks for a portion of their lands by the treaty concluded in this city during the last year. And yet, the gentleman, although here at that time, had not, so far as he had learned, considered the price paid too great.

But, it had been urged, that the Commissioners had addressed the Indians in the language of threats and coercion; that they had not been treated as a free people, and that they had been told, if they did not willingly do so, they should be compelled to surrender their country, and, in order to ascertain whether they were authorized to hold such language, it was insisted, the other day, by the introducer of this resolution, and his colleague, (Mr. VINTON,) on whose motion it had been amended, that the instructions under which they acted should be obtained. He denied the fact, that any such language calculated to intimidate, and coerce the Indians to the compliance with their wishes, had been used by the Commissioners; but that they had addressed them by arguments, and attempted to convince them of the propriety of yielding to their wishes, in ceding to the United States a portion of their lands; and, to show more clearly the course pursued by them, he read from an address of the Commissioners to the Chickasaw nation assembled in council, as follows:

"But should you still be opposed to exchanging your lands here, for a country west of the Mississippi, your father, the President, has directed his commissioners to say to you, that the interest of his white children makes it his duty to call upon you to sell him a part of your land. His white children never will be satisfied until they have a communication through their own settlements between the city of New Orleans and the State of Tennessee. In the late war, when the British invaded Louisiana, our white brothers of New Orleans and of Natchez were compelled to call upon their brothers in Tennessee and Kentucky to defend them. The distance was so great, and the difficulties of the march so numerous, that the country of the Mississippi was, for a long time, left exposed; our towns would have been burnt, our property plundered, and our country lost, but for the timely and miraculous relief by our brothers of Tennessee and Kentucky. They encountered every difficulty to give security to our southern border. This state of things must not again occur. The wide country between Mississippi and Tennessee must be settled. We must have men near at hand to defend our seaports and our southern white brothers. You have more land than you can use; your white brethren have to protect and defend their own, and the country of their red brothers; they have to defray all the expenses of the Government in peace, and to feed and support their armies in time of war. The only advantage the Government derives from its red children is, to get, occasionally, some of their lands, at a fair and reasonable price. By refusing to sell us lands, you withhold the only means in your power of contributing to the support and prosperity of the Government of the United States. Should you obstinately persist in this, your father, the President, will be compelled to do that which you ought most willingly, and of your own accord, to do. You must see the necessity of selling a part of your lands, so as to enable us to connect our lower and upper countries. If our Choctaw brothers will act towards the Government with that liberality which we have a right to expect, we shall be enabled, with what we calculate on getting from you, to accomplish this most desirable object. Your father, the President, says you must sell to your white brothers, that part of your land which you can most conveniently spare and which their necessities compel them to have. It is not proposed by your father, the President, to take any portion of your country, without giving you ample compensation. He would not defraud you; and your brothers, the commissioners, would scorn to take advantage either of your weakness or your necessities. They are resolved to deal fairly and honorably with you, and to pay a full and liberal value for your lands, in money, for the benefit of the whole nation."

Was this, he asked, the language of coercion, or threats? No gentleman would say it was. But, after having failed in every effort to procure a cession of their lands, the Commissioners learned that white men and traders in the nation, who had profitable situations among the Indians, had, and were exercising, a powerful and undue influence over them, to prevent a cession of their lands to the United States. Secret councils, at night, were held to effect this object. The Commissioners, in the journal of their proceedings in the Choctaw nation, state that, "at a private council of the nation, held in the night, to ascertain the voice of the people upon the proposals which had been made to them, there were present a number of white men, among whom was the contractor, Mr. William Easton, when Mr. David Mackey, half-breed, attempted to express his views in favor of a cession, Mr. James D. McDonald then rose and observed that Mr. Mackey would not be allowed to speak; and Mr. Mackey was accordingly silenced by the order of the council." The Commissioners having discovered this, it became necessary to undeceive the Indians, if practicable, and to convince them of the propriety of ceding to the United States a part if not the whole of their country; and, for this purpose, the address of the 15th November, 1826, to which exceptions had been taken, was delivered to the Indians, couched in strong and energetic terms it was true, but not as had been said, in the language of coercion and threats. The Commissioners, therefore, so far from meriting the slightest imputation of censure, deserve the thanks of the country, for their persevering and zealous endeavors to effect the object of their appointment.

Mr. FOSYTH said that it was not his intention to object to the object proposed to be attained by the resolution of the gentleman from

JANUARY, 1827.]

Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians.

[H. OF R.]

Ohio. He wished to see these instructions, but there was much in the resolution which he could not approve. The answering of the call was left discretionary with the Executive, how far the call was to be answered. He could not see how the disclosing of these instructions was likely to affect the public service. The call, moreover, was directed to the President of the United States. The usual course in these cases was to direct the call to the Secretary of War. But another part of the resolution was still more objectionable. It first calls for a copy of the instructions, and then it calls upon the President to say, whether the language professedly under those instructions, was authorized by him. Surely the House, when it got the instructions, would be able to judge for itself, whether it did or did not authorize the language employed. It seemed rather extraordinary to call upon the President first to disclose the instructions, and then to decide upon the construction of the terms contained in them. There was something wrong in the whole manner of conducting this business. The House was asked to make a mountain of a molehill, and to investigate the circumstances of an Indian talk, as if the country had been conducting a diplomatic negotiation with some important foreign power. Indian treaties used formerly to be conducted by talks held by the Commissioners of the United States and the Indian Chiefs; the result of which, on both sides, was submitted to the Senate. An improvement, of late years, had been introduced, and the matter was now treated diplomatically. Formal diplomatic notes were addressed to these Indian tribes, scarcely one of whom could read, and as formal diplomatic answers were returned, although none of them could write. This was quite a modern improvement, being, as he believed, of about five years' standing. For his part, he had no idea of giving countenance to any such mode of procedure. He knew that an idea was very prevalent, and was gaining ground in the United States, that the intercourse of the Government with the Indian tribes ought to be placed on an entirely new footing. Sir, asked Mr. F., what are they? Are they nations independent of the United States, or are they not the subjects of our will, and under our control—the proper subjects of legislative enactment in any manner that the interests of the United States might demand? Has this Government ever legislated for them as individuals? Or, have they not ever been treated as dependent tribes? They are so. They must be treated so, and have been so treated with undeviating rigor, from the very commencement of this Government. Under this impression he would now offer an amendment, calculated to obtain the object in view, and which, at the same time, would avoid giving to this subject an importance which did not belong to it. Mr. F. here offered the following amendment:

“That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to this House a copy of the instructions given to the commissioners and agents of the United States under the act of the 20th May, 1820, to enable the President of the United States to hold a treaty with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indiana.”

Mr. Woods, of Ohio, observed, he thought the reasons which induced him to offer the resolution, had been fully stated and explained, when it was first considered by the House. He had then stated that he believed abuses did exist; and he would now say that he believed an attempt had been made to carry into effect a policy in relation to the Indians, which he hoped would, when discussed, meet the decided reprobation of this House and the nation. If the Commissioners have used language to the Indians not authorized by their instructions, they should be held responsible. But he wished to know whether this policy and the course pursued in these negotiations, did not originate with the Executive or the Department under which the Commissioners acted. Nothing more may have been done in this case than in many others; but the number of instances can be no justification for continuing to do wrong. He did not wish (Mr. W. said) to convey any charge or imputations against the character or intentions of the Commissioners. He stated this explicitly before. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Polk) has told us that these Commissioners were influenced by their great zeal to advance the public interest, and what they believed to be the policy of the Government. This zeal, however laudable, may have led the Commissioners, and the Department too, into an error. We have (said Mr. W.) been informed that three or four thousand dollars have been expended by one of the agents to advance this scheme, which he believed (and perhaps on the information of the Department) to be the policy of the Government, and in the promotion of a measure which he (Mr. W.) hoped never would be sanctioned. The gentleman from Tennessee says, he must have been mistaken in his calculations, when he (Mr. W.) informed the House that the amount proposed by the Commissioners to be given to the Indians was not less than five millions of dollars. He could assure that gentleman that the calculation was made upon the documents and estimates presented to us by the Indian Department. And if gentlemen will look at the matter, they will find that he had not overrated the amount; and he might add that the expense of the grand scheme in which the Department of Indian Affairs had been progressing, would, if carried into effect, cost the nation little less than twenty millions. The whole number of Indians in the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, are stated, in a document which he had before him, (said Mr. W.,) at 24,625. The expense of removing them is estimated at $30 each; the cost of furnishing each warrior with a rifle, blanket, and ammunition, and the additional articles proposed by the Commissioners to be given to others, with provisions for the support of the whole nation for one year, would not be less than $50 for each individual. These items would amount to $1,970,000. The sum offered for the Choctaw lands was one million, in addition to the pay proposed to be given for all their improvements, which must be very considerable, as many of them are stated to have good houses and valuable farms. If these are added, and the sums to be paid for the land of the Chickasaws, and to purchase another territory for them, are taken into the account, he presumed the gentleman from Tennessee would find that he had not been mistaken in the statement he had made.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) had said that the resolution is unusual and extraordinary in its character; that the inquiry should be directed to the Secretary of War, and not to the President, as it would otherwise be giving too much importance to these negotiations; and as no person could suppose any injury would result to the public by the publication of the instructions given to the Commissioners. In answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. W. said, he might refer to the argument of the gentleman from Mississippi, (Mr. HALL,) who urged, that the public interest might be injured by the publication of the instructions. It was to prevent any objections of this kind, and to meet the views of gentlemen who supposed there might be an impropriety in making the call without this reservation, that he had given this direction to the resolution. It has been alleged, said Mr. W., that these Indians are entirely illiterate, and that scarcely one of them can write. He knew one of the individuals whose names appear in these documents, who was a man of intelligence, and he was pleased to find that, in these communications and arguments, the Indians had elevated themselves far above the reasoning of our Commissioners. He was glad, said Mr. W., that the practice of conducting our negotiations by written notes, of which the gentleman from Georgia appears to complain, has been introduced. It enables us to judge more correctly of the character of the negotiations; and to know better the course pursued in conducting them. In this instance, the Commissioners complain that the Indians had determined not to allow a voluntary expression of opinion, or a fair decision to be made in regard to their proposals. The Indians in answer say, "a resolution, it is true, was entered into, that, if any man should so far forget his duty as to accept money as a bribe to sell his country, he should suffer a severe penalty. But this measure, whether necessary or not, was not unjustifiable. The circumstances of the times, perhaps, called for it." These individuals, however illiterate, have proved to us that they could not be bribed by any inducement to sell their country. They are entitled to our respect. He wished the resolutions, for the reasons he had stated, might be permitted to pass.

[At this point, the further discussion of the resolution was arrested by the Speaker—the hour appropriated to resolutions having expired.]

TUESDAY, JANUARY 30.

Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians.

The House again resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore moved by Mr. Woods, of Ohio.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, said he had no disposition to prolong the discussion on the resolution introduced by his colleague, (Mr. Woods,) which had already taken a very wide and universal range. He was satisfied for himself, and he thought the House would concur with him in opinion, that the information called for by the resolution, could be of no service whatever when obtained, either to his colleague, to this House, or to the nation. If this treaty with the Indians had been successful and we were about to be called upon to legislate upon the subject, then, indeed, there might be some reason for the adoption of the resolution; but the efforts of these Commissioners have been ineffectual, and he could not conceive any possible benefit that could result from the information desired by the resolution. His colleague had, on the day on which he introduced his proposition, by some remarks, seemed to cast censure upon those distinguished individuals who acted as agents or Commissioners of the Government; but, in his remarks on yesterday, he had exculpated the Commissioners at the expense of the Executive. Sir, my colleague must know that, from the very nature of the case, the instructions given on this occasion by the Executive, were general, as they are in all such cases. The Commissioners were authorized to hold a treaty for a certain specified purpose, and vested with a discretionary power as to the manner of conducting that treaty. Mr. McL. said he had examined the documents referred to by his colleague, in which it had been asserted, threats were contained, which had been made by those Commissioners towards the Indians, in order to coerce them into measures, but he could not discover any language used, other than had been customary on all such occasions, from the foundation of the Government. He said he should not have rose to say a word on this subject, had it not been for some remarks which had on yesterday fell from his colleague (Mr. Woods) in relation to a recent expenditure of some three or four thousand dollars by an Indian agent, in his own immediate neighborhood, to aid some of the Indians in Ohio to emigrate to the west of the Mississippi, which his colleague had said, if authorized by the Executive, he trusted would not be sanctioned by this House. He advised his colleague to examine into the documents in relation to this subject, before he censures an Agent of the Government, or the course of conduct of one who stands as high, and deservedly so, in public estimation,

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

The United States and Georgia.

[H. OF R.]

as does the gentleman to whom he alludes. He said it would be found, that, by a solemn treaty held some time since with the Shawnee nation of Indians residing in Missouri, that the Government had stipulated to procure for them a tract of country west of the Mississippi, for and in consideration of certain lands by them ceded to the United States, and that the United States should furnish them with the means necessary to enable them to remove to their new territory. In that treaty, a special reference is had to that part of the same nation of Indians then residing in Ohio, who might be disposed to emigrate to the same territory with, or to their friends. This treaty had been sanctioned by the Senate, and this House had approved it also, by making appropriations to carry it into effect. He denied that the Executive, or any of the Agents of the Government, had, in this matter, transcended their authority.

Mr. HAYL said that, since offering the remarks which he had formerly made in opposition to the resolution, he had been induced, upon reflection, to permit the resolution to pass; not because he believed that the information when obtained, would be of any use, but to satisfy the gentleman who had introduced the resolution, and to prevent any opportunity for casting imputations upon the Commissioners. The gentleman, though often called upon, had not yet informed the House what use he intended to make of the information, when it should be obtained. Did he wish it for the purpose of indirectly throwing blame upon the Executive? Was it to make the President particeps criminis in the threats which he pretended these Commissioners had uttered? Or was it for the purpose of implicating the conduct and character of the Commissioners themselves? He should be sorry to think that the gentleman meant indirectly to censure those highly distinguished men, for their patriotic act in endeavoring to effect this treaty. These gentlemen had been the organs of the Government in that negotiation, and were, necessarily, clothed with discretionary power for carrying into effect the beneficial object they had in view. The gentleman had said, that, in fulfilling their trust, they had employed language of an improper kind, and had urged a policy which was not sanctioned by this nation or its Government. But, the policy which these gentlemen had endeavored to promote, was no other than that which had been recommended successively by Mr. Monroe, Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Barbour. He could see no object in introducing the resolution, unless it were intended to embarrass a bill now pending, for the gradual removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi. What was it the gentleman wished? Or why did he seek to defeat that bill? Was it possible he could desire that the Indian tribes should remain for an indefinite period within the chartered limits of any of the States, and should be maintained there at the expense of the States? Could the gentleman wish to throw obstacles in the way of their removal, when their continuance where they were must only tend to their injury and destruction?

Mr. COOK said he had risen to move that this resolution be laid upon the table, never to be taken up again.

Being informed by the Chair that a gentleman from Pennsylvania had the floor before he rose, Mr. C. took his seat: whereupon,

Mr. MINER said, that the gentleman from Tennessee had but anticipated his own intention; and he now moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to without a division, and the resolution of Mr. Woods was laid on the table accordingly.

MONDAY, February 5.

The United States and Georgia.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private Secretary. (See Senate debate of this day for a copy of the Message.)

Mr. FORSYTH moved the reference of this communication to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. He said that he rejoiced that, at length, the strange circumstances of this case had been presented to the House in such a form as to compel the rendering of a solemn decision between the Executive and the State of Georgia, and that it was called for, at this time—not by them, for they had been demanding it for years past—but that now the call came from the Executive. He could not, however, as a Representative of Georgia, consent to sit, and quietly hear the charges brought forward in this communication against the authorities of that State. They had done nothing which violated the constitution of their country. He would say this in the face of the Executive.

[Here some member called Mr. FORSYTH to order, but the Speaker decided that he was not out of order.]

Mr. F. then proceeded to say that he also rejoiced to perceive, that the Chief Magistrate in the execution of what he conceived to be his duty, had not, this time, made his appeal to military force. He denied, however, the existence of any constitutional authority to employ such force, either in the present case, or in any other which had occurred within that State; and he rejoiced to see that the Executive had now thought proper to resort to the civil authority. Mr. F. here denied that the Governor of Georgia was guilty of transcending the authority vested in him by law. He acted under the sovereignty of his State, and had exercised only that discretionary power which was vested in him by her laws. He had acted under rights exercised in every part of the Union, and which had never been resisted, except in the case of Georgia alone.

Mr. F. said that it would be easy to dilate on this subject; but he perceived that there existed in respect to it some sensibility in the House, and he would forbear.

Mr. POWELL, of Virginia, inquired whether the gentleman from Georgia anticipated any legislation in reference to the communication just received? And whether it would not be more expedient to refer it to one of the Standing Committees of the House, rather than to a Committee of the Whole?

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that since the inquiry had been so directly put, he would frankly reply, that he did not anticipate any legislation: and he insisted that no legislation in the case could be necessary or proper. He considered the Executive as asking the opinion of this House in relation to certain rights of the State of Georgia. If the opinion of the House should be in affirmance of those rights, no other act, than a declaration of such opinion, need ensue. Very false impressions were entertained on this matter. It was only for the United States to will, and her will would be instantly obeyed. There was nothing to be apprehended if the General Government did not interfere, and, under the semblance of protection, stimulate the Indians to a resistance of the authority of the State. All the difficulties which had existed from the beginning of this business, had been created by this interference. Those unfortunate beings would long since have done their duty to the country, and to themselves, if it had not been for the base interference of infamous white men, who exercised an influence over them. Was it not sufficient to refer to the scene which had taken place at this very spot during the last Winter—to the base and infamous conduct of those who came with the Indians, under the pretence of protecting them? There could be no need of any farther legislation on the subject. If the rights of the Indians had been violated, existing laws provided an ample remedy, and the courts of the United States were open to them.

Mr. WEBSTER said, on rising, that he was not much concerned what course this communication should take, or whether it should be referred to one committee or another; but he was not contented that it should be supposed, either here or elsewhere, that there existed an entire unanimity of opinion with the gentleman from Georgia on this subject. The gentleman from Georgia must know that there were two sides to this question between Georgia and the United States; and he would tell the gentleman from Georgia that there existed two opinions also, not only on that question, but on the conduct which that gentleman had designated as "base and infamous."

This, Mr. W. said, was strong language, but it was not argument. The gentleman had told the House that nothing had prevented every thing going right in Georgia but the interference of the General Government. The gentleman denounced such interference, saying in effect, "hands off for the present: leave the Indians to the remedy of the courts." But, Mr. W.

said, he would tell that gentleman, that if there were rights of the Indians which the United States were bound to protect, that there were those in the House and in the country who would take their part. If we have bound ourselves by any treaty to do certain things, we must fulfil such obligations. High words will not terrify us—loud declamation will not deter us from the discharge of that duty. For myself, said Mr. W., the right of the parties in this question shall be fully and fairly examined, and none of them with more calmness than the rights of Georgia. In my own course in this matter, I shall not be dictated to by any State, or the Representative of any State on this floor. I shall not be frightened from my purpose, nor will I suffer harsh language to produce any reaction on my mind. I will examine with great and equal care all the rights of both parties. Occasion had been taken on the mere question of reference of this communication, he would not say for argument, but for the assumption of a position, as a matter perfectly plain and indisputable, that the Government had been all in the wrong in this question, and Georgia all in the right. For his own part, Mr. W. said he did not care whether the communication did or did not go to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, nor how soon it went there, and was there taken up for discussion. When he went into that committee he should go there, not in a spirit of controversy, nor yet in a spirit of submission, but in a spirit of inquiry, calmly and deliberately to examine the circumstances of the case, and to investigate the rights of all parties concerned. But he had made these few remarks, to give the gentleman from Georgia to understand that it was not by bold denunciation, or by bold assumption, that the members of this House are to be influenced in the decision of high public concerns.

Mr. FORSYTH said, that he had not, to his knowledge, denounced the House, or any gentleman in it; nor had he attempted to dictate to the House, or to any member of it. It was, however, perfectly natural, that a Representative from Georgia, the Government of which was here arraigned, should have, and having, should indulge, some feeling on the subject. The honorable member from Massachusetts indeed might very well be calm and unmoved; he did not reside near the scene of action; the people of his State were far removed, and had no reason to dread the bayonet at their throats. It was quite natural that the gentleman should be calm and dispassionate, and prepared to take a cool and composed view of the subject; but the Representatives from Georgia did not feel so. We feel very differently, said Mr. F., and when I feel, I will not attempt to conceal my feeling. Our rights have been violated and their violation has been made known to this House; and our appeal has not been regarded. All we ask is, that the case should have a fair investigation; and it is even possible—possible, but not probable—that the gentleman from Massachusetts, after such an investigation, might feel with us. The gentleman from Massachusetts says he will investigate the subject; which implies that he has not yet done so; but he, (Mr. F.) had examined it thoroughly. He was prepared to go into the discussion of it in Committee of the Whole; to do so dispassionately, if it were necessary, (for they too could suppress their feelings when circumstances required;) but if not, they should, and would, express their feelings, notwithstanding it might draw down upon them the very dispassionate censure of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Polar Expedition.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HALE expressed a hope that the communication would go to a Committee of the Whole. When a subject of this kind was touched, it vibrated on other chords than those of the parties immediately concerned. Several of the States had already exercised their rights over the Indians within their chartered limits, and Mississippi intended shortly to follow the example, and he could assure the gentleman from Georgia that, if the bayonets of the General Government should on this account be turned against any of the States, it would speedily find its friends rallying round it. All the States, situated as Georgia was, claimed the sovereignty over the whole extent of their chartered limits. They had forborne as long as they could, and the future destinies of the Indians, their future location and civilization, or their final extinction, must soon be decided on. Three great questions were involved: 1st, the powers of the General Government within the limits of a State; 2d, the power of the States to legislate within their own chartered limits; and 3dly, the power of the States over the Indian tribes. His State might, ere this time, have extended its legislation over the Indians within its territory. If it had no right to do so, this House ought at once to say so. He hoped there would be no occasion to resort to military force. Georgia certainly had a right to assert what she believed to be her rights, and to speak her sentiments on this floor. He hoped the whole matter would be heard and settled: for, should Congress adjourn without settling it, consequences were likely to ensue, of great interest to many of the States.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to make one remark in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi. That gentleman, he said, had reason to know that he (Mr. W.) was disposed to use all proper authority of the United States to extinguish Indian titles to lands within the States. But he must tell the gentleman from Mississippi, that the States would act on their own responsibility, and at their own peril, if they undertake to extend their legislation to lands where the Indian title has not been extinguished. If any such measure was contemplated in the State which the gentleman represented, Mr. W. hoped that gentlemen would lose no time in warning his friends against making any such attempt. The relation which the United States held to these tribes, of parental guardianship over these remnants of mighty nations now no more, was a very delicate relation. Its general character was that of protection, and, while every facility was given to the extinguishment of Indian title, let not that circumstance be so far presumed on, that the States should attempt to exercise authority within the Indian limits. Any such course would be attempted at their own responsibility. Mr. W. concluded, by saying that he was ready to do all that could be done to extinguish the Indian title in the States, and particularly in the States east of the Mississippi. But this disposition, common to all parts of the country, should not be so far presumed upon as that any State should undertake, of its own mere motion, to exercise an authority over the lands to which the Indian title is guaranteed by treaties, &c.

Mr. BARTLETT said that he had not risen for the purpose of entering on the general subject, but merely to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia, whether it would not be better to refer the communication to one of the Committees of the House. Before any thing like a correct decision could be had, many facts must be inquired into; and it would facilitate the debate and the decision, if these facts should previously be ascertained and reported to the House by one of its committees. Should the subject go into the Committee of the Whole, before this was done, much room would be left for declamation, and much time probably wasted, which might otherwise be saved. He should suppose the Committee on the Judiciary would be a very proper reference.

Mr. WRIGHT said, that, with the very imperfect understanding which the House now possessed of the paper to be referred, they were not in circumstances to decide whether the case was such as required legislation or not. Even the present discussion he considered premature; and with a view that every member might obtain a right understanding of what the communication was, he moved to lay it on the table and to print it.

This motion prevailed; and it was laid upon the table, accordingly.

TUESDAY, February 6.

Polar Expedition.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from a Select Committee, appointed on certain memorials in behalf of an expedition of discovery in the Polar regions, asked to be discharged from the farther consideration of that subject, and of the several memorials thereon, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STORRS (chairman of that committee) opposed the motion. The memorials, if they went to either of the standing committees, seemed rather to belong to the Committee on Commerce; but they did not appertain strictly to any one of the standing committees. The subject appropriately belonged to a special committee—such as had been raised for the purpose.

Mr. EVERETT said, that he was not fully apprised of the nature of the memorial—for the Select Committee had, at the instance of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WORTHINGTON,) been raised on the first memorial alone—but, from what he knew of the subject, he was induced to hope that the Select Committee would be discharged from its consideration; and that it would be referred to no other committee of this House. He did not undertake to decide on the speculation of which he understood some part of the memorial to consist. At the proper time, and under proper circumstances, he was disposed to favor any undertaking the object of which was to advance the cause of science. He thought very highly of the efforts which had been made by other nations, to explore the unknown regions of the earth; but, on the subject of these memorials, he did not think the public mind had reached such a point as would lead them to approve of an undertaking based on a theory of the kind referred to. He was far from wishing, or intending, to cast any thing like ridicule on the theory; he did not profess to be sufficiently acquainted with the principles on which the Newtonian theory was founded, to pronounce between them. At all events, he did not believe the nation would approve of the time of this House being occupied with a consideration of the subject. He, therefore, moved to divide the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, so that the select committee might be discharged, and the memorials laid upon the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not risen for the purpose of expressing any opinion with respect to the truth or falsehood of the speculations in these memorials. But the peculiar situation in which he stood toward some of the memorialists, rendered it proper for him to say a word on the subject. Some of the memorials were presented by men of as great respectability in the community, of as cool heads, and as far removed from any thing like enthusiasm, or credulity, as any that could be found. They recommended not an expedition to Symmes's hole, (if there was such a place,) but an expedition of discovery in the high latitudes of both hemispheres. That was the subject of the prayer of these petitioners—a subject entirely distinct from the peculiarities of any hypothesis. He hoped it would be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs—as, should any expedition be determined on, that would be the appropriate committee through which the report ought to come. The Legislature of Maryland was among the petitioners on this subject. They had unanimously recommended the subject to the attention of Congress—other petitions came from various parts of the United States. He thought it was due to the character and standing of these memorialists, that proper attention should be paid to their application. For himself, he professed to have formed no opinion on the subject of Symmes's theory. There might be a hole at the poles for aught he knew; but however that might be, the expedition recommended was not for the purpose of finding it.

Mr. WEEKS said he had in his hand a petition from the Governor, Council, and Chancellor of Maryland, on this subject, which he wished to present. [He was reminded by the Chair that this was not the time for the presentation of petitions.]

The question being then taken, on the motion of Mr. WORTHINGTON, it was decided in the negative.

SATURDAY, February 10.

Jefferson Lottery Bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which had been referred the bill from the Senate, to authorize the Corporation of the City of Washington to introduce into the lotteries they are authorized to establish certain land prizes, (being the lands of the late President Jefferson,) reported the same without amendment.

On reporting this bill, Mr. A. observed, that the Legislature of Virginia had passed an act for the benefit of the family of Mr. Jefferson, granting a lottery for the disposal of his real estate. An agent in Washington had been employed to prepare a scheme for the lottery thus granted; but owing to the small number of the prizes, this scheme was found impracticable. Application was made to Congress to fulfil the wishes of the Legislature of Virginia, by connecting the Jefferson lottery with some scheme which had for its object the benefit of the City of Washington, and the present bill was intended to effect that object. What Mr. Jefferson might have thought or done in relation to such a proposal, had he lived, it was not for him to say; but in making this application, the executor of that illustrious man had done no more than was his duty, under the will. He had acted under the influence of feeling and of duty, and the application was recommended by every principle of filial gratitude, and by all those sentiments of the human heart, which, if he would, he could not change.

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to a third reading on Monday—ayes 104, nays 26.

Duties on Wool and Woollens.

The bill for the protection of the woollen manufactures was read a third time; and the question being on the passage of the bill,

[An earnest debate took place in which Messrs. Cambreleng, Lawrence, Buchanan, Wurte, Stewart, Cook, and Ingham joined, when finally]

The question recurred—"Shall this bill pass?" and was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

Yates.—Messrs. Adams of New York, Allen of Mass., Angel, Bailey, Badger, Baldwin, Bartlett, Bartley, Barber of Conn., Barney, Beecher, Brown, Burleigh, Burges, Campbell, Cassedy, Clarke, Condict, Crowninshield, Davis, Deitz, Dwight, Eastman, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Everett, Findlay of Pa., Findlay of Ohio, Forward, Fosdick, Garnsey, Garrison, Hallock, Harris, Harvey, Hasbrouck, Healey, Henry, Hobart, Holcombe, Hugunin, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kellogg, Kidder, Krebs, Lathrop, Lawrence, Little, Locke, Mallary, Markell, Martley, Martindale, Marvin of New York, Mattocks, McKean, McLean of Ohio, McManus, Meech, Merwin of Connecticut, Metcalf, Miller of New York, Miner, Jas. S. Mitchell, John Mitchell, Orr, Pearce, Phelps, Plumer, Porter, Reed, Rose, Ross, Sands, Scott, Shannon, Sill, Sloane, Sprague, Stewart, Storrs, Strong, Swan, Test, Tomlinson, Tucker of New Jersey, Van Horn, Vance, Varnum, Vinton, Wales, Ward, Webster, Whipple, White, Whittemore, Whittlesey, James Wilson, Wilson of Ohio, Wolf, Wood of New York, Woods of Ohio, Wright—106.

Yates.—Messrs. Addams of Pennsylvania, Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Tennessee, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Armstrong, Ashley, Barbour of Virginia, Barringer, Bassett, Baylies, Blair, Boon, Brent, Bryan, Buchanan, Buckner, Cambreleng, Carson, Carter, Cary, Claiborne, Cocke, Conner, Cook, Crump, Davenport, Drayton, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Forsyth, Garnett, Gist, Govan, Gurly, Haile, Hamilton, Haynes, Herick, Hines, Hoffman, Holmes, Houston, Ingham, Jacks, Jennings, Johnson of New York, Kerr, Kittera, Kremer, Lecompte, Letcher, Livingston, Long, Marable, McCoy, McDuffie, McHatton, McKee, McLane of Delaware, McNeill, Mercer, Merriwether, Mitchell of Maryland, Mitchell of South Carolina, Mitchell of Tennessee, Moore of Kentucky, Moore of Alabama, Newton, O'Brien, Owen, Peter, Polk, Ripley, Rives, Saunders, Sawyer, Smith, Stevenson of Pa., Stevenson of Va., Talliaferro, Taylor of Va., Thompson of Geo., Thompson of Ohio, Trezvant, Tucker of S. C., Verplanck, Weems, Wickliffe, Williams, Wilson of South Carolina, Wurtz, Young—92.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

MONDAY, February 12.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARNEY presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, praying that a law may be passed, providing that all children hereafter born of parents held to slavery within the District of Columbia, shall be free at a certain age, and moved that it be printed.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, it was immaterial to him what disposition was made of this memorial; but he should vote against the printing of the memorial, and he should do so on this principle: We act as Representatives of the people of the District of Columbia. They are deprived of all the privileges which, as freemen, they originally possessed. They are under as perfect a despotism as ever existed in the provinces of Rome, under the Prætors, which all know to have been so despotic. They are not represented: they have no voice in the election of those who legislate for them. I trust, therefore, that every member of this House, feeling the magnitude of the trust devolved upon him, without the responsibility of elections, will feel it to be his duty to stand as a sacred sentinel over the rights of the people of this District; and I trust, sir, whenever we legislate for them, that we shall not permit the people of other States to come here with impertinent suggestions of what ought to be done in any particular case. Suppose the people of Maryland were to go to the Legislature of Virginia, and undertake to instruct them what they should do in relation to a particular class of population: would it not be outrageous and insulting? Is it not equally so for them to come here, and call upon the National Legislature to sacrifice any right which the people of Virginia deem important to their peace or interest? If the people of the District of Columbia wish to abolish slavery, and will present a petition to this House to that effect, no man in this House will be more ready than I will to grant to the people any measure which they may deem necessary to free themselves from this deplorable evil. But, so long as they deem it an important privilege, I never can consent to print and spread abroad a memorial from any portion of the people of Maryland, asking Congress to abolish slavery in this District—to violate the very first principles of political legislation and of liberty, by depriving the people of their property, by means which they have no agency in creating or promoting.

Mr. COOK moved to lay the petition on the table.

The Chair pronounced this motion not to be in order.

Mr. POWELL opposed the printing of the document. The session was fast drawing to a close, and it could not be expected by the honorable gentleman who presented the petition, or by any one else, that any legislation was to grow out of it. The only effect which would result from printing the petition, would be to disseminate a partial and intemperate view of the subject of slavery, a measure very likely to do harm, and from which no possible good could arise.

Mr. BARNEY observed, that he had presented the memorial in performance of a duty to its numerous and respectable signers, having previously ascertained that it was couched in decorous and respectful language, such as became them to use, and this House to hear. The petitioners, conscientiously believing that the period had arrived when measures ought to be adopted to promote gradual emancipation, exercised an undoubted right to present their views for the consideration of the Representatives of the people, and it was entirely pertinent for them to do so, the opinion of the gentleman from South Carolina to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. B. felt himself constrained to state that, although the existence of negro slavery was deplored as an evil by all classes of constituents, yet a very large majority of them deprecated the agitation of this question as premature, impolitic, and injudicious, and not calculated to produce any beneficial results to the present generation. Every member of this House can bear witness that, so far from voluntarily introducing subjects calculated to create excitement, he had never permitted himself to mingle in any debate, affecting, in the remotest degree, our colored population, either black or red. He had acted from a conviction that the sensibilities of a portion of the Union were feelingly alive on all such questions. As illustrative of this determination, it was on his motion that the memorial was laid on the table. The printing being requested by the memorialist, he had moved it accordingly, and he was perfectly content to acquiesce in the decision of the House, be it their pleasure to sustain or reject the proposition.

Mr. DORSEY said that, whatever disposition he might feel to gratify a minority of the constituents of his colleague, he could not consent that the paper they had just presented should be promulgated by means of an order of this House for the printing of it. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) was mistaken, if he supposed that the whole object of this memorial was confined to the District of Columbia. It breathed the spirit of general emancipation; and though its request began with this District, its ulterior purpose went much further. The House had received petitions on the same subject, and in much the same tone, from Pennsylvania, and other States, but no such importance had been attached to them, as induced the House to order their being printed. Why was the present memorial to be distinguished by such an order respecting it? If this petition was ordered to be printed, all the others should be printed too. But, he could see no good consequence likely to arise, and he should therefore oppose the motion.

The question being taken on printing, it was negatived by a large majority; and the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Georgia and the Creek Indians.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. FORSYTH, on the 8th instant, was read the second time:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of ——— dollars, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, be, under the direction of the President of the United States, distributed among the Creek Indians, as a full indemnity for their claim to hunt upon, or in any other manner use, the strip of land lying between the Chatahoochie River and the dividing line between the States of Georgia and Alabama, which said land is to be subject to the undisturbed occupation of the citizens of Georgia, under the laws of that State."

This resolution was referred to the Select Committee appointed on the 9th, on the Message of the President of the United States, in relation to the events growing out of the conflicting claims of Georgia and the Creek Indians, to certain lands lying within the limits of that State.

The bill from the Senate "to authorize the Corporation of the City of Washington to introduce into the lotteries they are authorized to establish, prizes, to be composed of the late President Jefferson's lands," was read the third time, and passed.

TUESDAY, February 13.

The Vice President's Appeal.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee of Inquiry into the official conduct of the present Vice President, when Secretary of War, made the following report:

The Select Committee, to whom was referred the communication of the VICE PRESIDENT, of the 29th December last, respectfully report:

That, immediately after they assembled, they informed the Vice President of their being organized, and of their readiness to receive any communication which he might see fit to make. On the receipt of his reply, dated the 3d of January, and which accompanies this report, Mr. McDuffie, as the friend and representative of the Vice President, was admitted before the committee, and attended throughout the examination which followed.

The first object of inquiry, in proceeding to business, was, to ascertain whether any charges against the Vice President had been placed among the public records of the War Department. And after an examination on this point, the committee became satisfied that no such charges were, or had been, among the records or papers of that Department. But, as the letter from Elijah Mix, addressed to Major Saterlee Clark, under the name of "Hancock," had been published in the Alexandria Phoenix Gazette, of the 28th December, which publication the Vice President had particularly referred to, in his note to the committee, they felt bound to examine fully and freely into the truth or falsity of the matters contained in that letter.

From the nature of the duties imposed upon a Committee of Inquiry, especially when connected with the distinct wish, as expressed by the Vice President, in the present instance, for the "freest investigation," it has been impossible for the committee to give to their proceedings the connection and conscientious incident to trials, when the testimony is ascertained and arranged before it is presented. They have, however, diligently applied themselves to the subject referred to them, and after a long and laborious examination, they are unanimously of the opinion, that there are no facts which will authorize the belief, or even suspicion, that the Vice President was ever interested, or that he participated, directly or indirectly, in the profits of any contract formed with the Government through the Department of War, while he was intrusted with the discharge of its duties, or at any other time.

They are also of opinion, that the conduct of Mr. Barbour, the present Secretary of War, in regard to the letter of Elijah Mix, is not, in the slightest degree, deserving of censure. The accusation contained in the letter was regarded by him as a base calumny upon the Vice President, penned by a man wholly unworthy of notice; and the committee have no reason to believe that the supposed truth of that accusation was at any time the basis of any act of the War Department. The publication of the letter appears to have been produced as follows:

FEBRUARY, 1897.]

The Vice President's Appeal.

[H. or R.]

In the month of December last, Howes Goldsborough and Elijah Mix were competitors for a contract with the War Department; Goldsborough, soon after his arrival in Washington, obtained from Major S. Clark a copy of the letter, with a view to use the same against Mix, should he find it necessary. From this copy a transcript was obtained by William F. Thornton, the junior editor of the Phoenix Gazette, on the 27th December, which he published the next morning in that paper, accompanied by his editorial remarks. In this publication Mr. Barbour had no agency, either direct or indirect. When he heard that the letter had been made public, he requested Col. R. M. Johnson, of the Senate, to call upon the Vice President as a mutual friend, and inform him of the manner in which the letter had come to his (Mr. Barbour's) hands, and that the same had been subsequently transmitted through the post office in an envelope to Major Clark, to whom it belonged. This information was given by Col. Johnson to the Vice President, in the morning of the 29th of December, just before he transmitted his communication to the House.

The letter to "Hancock," as published, and to which the Vice President had referred, contained, among other things, the following assertion: "And I have written letters of Vandeventer's, which most positively mention that he (meaning Mr. Calhoun) was engaged, and received some portion of the contract." As such letters, if they existed, might lead to further evidence, and be important to aid the committee in their inquiries, they thought proper, in the early stage of their proceedings, to issue a subpoena both for Mix and Vandeventer, with a clause therein contained, commanding them to produce any papers in their possession, tending to prove the accusation which Mix had made in his letter to Hancock. In obedience to this summons, the witnesses appeared, and Mix having been first called upon to testify, produced, during his examination, the letters from Major Vandeventer, dated August 7th, 1818, September 10th, 1818, July 8th, 1820, March 24th, 1821, and the letter from Col. W. K. Armistead, dated March 24, 1821. On his second examination, he produced the letters from Major Vandeventer, dated August 3d, 1818, September 19th, 1818, and October 17th, 1820. When it was perceived that in one of the letters of Major Vandeventer, to wit: the one dated the 7th of August, 1818, and to which they here particularly refer, allusion was made to a partner in the contract, whose name was to have been kept secret, they felt it to be their duty to discover, if they could, who this secret partner was, or, at any rate, to push the inquiry so far as to leave no room for suspicion that the Vice President was the person alluded to. This branch of the subject has been the principal cause of their consuming so much time in the investigation; they found that they were here led into a wider field than could have been at first anticipated, and that it was necessary in order to get a full view of the whole ground, to go thoroughly into the origin and history of what is commonly called the Mix contract. The letters of Major Vandeventer above referred to, appear to relate principally to the private and confidential transactions between him and E. Mix, in regard to the contract; and there is no reason to believe or presume that the Vice President was ever made acquainted with their contents. The letter from Col. Armistead, written while he was at the head of the Engineer Department, although it wears the appearance of an official paper, and was improperly intended, as the committee believe, to bring the weight of official influence to bear upon the private transactions between Vandeventer and Mix, was not written with the sanction or knowledge of the Vice President, and no copy of it was ever entered in the letter-book of the Department.

The committee will here remark, that they place no reliance whatever on the testimony of Elijah Mix. From the self-contradictions, apparent on the face of his testimony, and which it is unnecessary here to recapitulate, aside from the infamy attached to his character, the committee were satisfied that he ought not to be believed on his oath. The letters, however, just referred to, and produced by him during his examination, do not rest for their authenticity on his testimony. Those from Major Vandeventer, excepting such parts as had been defaced or obliterated, were acknowledged by Major Vandeventer himself to be genuine; and he was requested in every instance, to state, with the letters before him, what names or words had occupied the obliterated places, when the letters were written. The letter from Colonel Armistead was also acknowledged by that officer to be genuine. But the three papers purporting to be copies or the substance of a letter from Major Vandeventer to Mr. Calhoun, rest for their authenticity on the unsupported testimony of E. Mix, and are regarded by the committee as having been fabricated by him. They are also of opinion that the words or names defaced from the letters of Major Vandeventer were so defaced by E. Mix: and the committee have been unable to ascertain with certainty, either from Vandeventer, the admitted author of the letters, or from any other source, what the words or names were, which have been thus obliterated.

The offer for the contract appears to have been made by E. Mix on the 23d of July, 1818, and proposes to deliver at Old Point Comfort, "from one to one hundred and fifty thousand perches of stone, at three dollars per perch." The contract as furnished from the War Department, bears date 25th of July, 1818. It stipulates for the delivery of one hundred and fifty thousand perches of stone, at three dollars per perch—is drawn up in the handwriting of Major Vandeventer, and by him alone witnessed, and is signed by General Joseph G. Swift, the then Chief Engineer, and by Elijah Mix. Although Mix here appears to have been the only contractor, yet, from the evidence, there is reason to believe, that, at the time the contract was made, or soon after, and before the execution of any valid bond for the performance thereof, it was divided into shares, and that one-fourth belonged to Major Vandeventer, one-fourth to Elijah Mix, one-fourth to R. C. Jennings, and the remaining fourth to a person whose name was not to have been mentioned. The title of Vandeventer to his fourth, at the time above referred to, appears to have rested on a verbal and confidential agreement between him and Mix, and so remained till the 24th of April, 1819, when he received a written bill of sale of one-half of the whole contract. Howes Goldsborough & Co. subsequently became the owners of one-fourth, by purchase from Samuel Cooper, who had previously purchased from Major Vandeventer; and they (Goldsborough & Co.) were recognized at the War Department, by the consent of E. Mix, expressed in a letter sent by him to the Secretary of War, and dated the 18th of April, 1821.

The first bond, received at the Engineer Department, on the contract, is dated 5th of August, 1818, and describes the contract as having been made by Elijah Mix and George Cooper, for the delivery of one hundred thousand perches of stone, being fifty thousand less than Mix was entitled to deliver. This bond is signed by E. Mix and George Cooper, as contractors, and by Samuel Cooper and James Oakley, as sureties; the sureties were regularly approved by R. Riker, Recorder of the City of New York, as appears by his certificate following immediately after the signatures, and dated the same as the bond. It will be perceived, at once, that there is an obvious and fatal variance between this bond and the contract. In an official letter written from the Engineer Department, on the 11th day of August, 1818, to Lieutenant George Blaney, and copied into the letter-book of that Department, the contract is described as for one hundred thousand perches of stone. The language of the letter is as follows: "You will inform the Agent that a contract has been made with Captain E. Mix, to deliver, as soon as practicable, at the Rip Raps, one hundred thousand perch of stone."

In a subsequent letter, written to James Maurice, also copied into the same letter-book, and dated the 21st day of August, 1818, the contract is described as being for two hundred thousand perches. The language of this letter is as follows: "Mr. E. Mix will soon commence to deliver stone at the Rip Raps, under contract with this Department for two hundred thousand perch."

Some time after the delivery at the Engineer Department of the first bond, but at what precise time does not appear, a new bond was given for the delivery of one hundred and fifty thousand perches, describing the contract as made by E. Mix. This second bond is signed by E. Mix as contractor, and Samuel Cooper and James Oakley, as sureties—and it is antedated to 5th of August, 1818—but no certificate in regard to the sufficiency of the sureties, was attached to this instrument. The committee have been unable to ascertain when this second bond was received at the Engineer Department; though the impression of General Swift is, that it was received before he left the office, which was on the 11th of November, 1818. Major Vandeventer also expresses his belief, that it was delivered during the Fall of 1818. How far his testimony conflicts, if at all, with his letter to Mix, dated 17th October, 1820, in which he urges upon the latter to attend to "the bond," the committee will not undertake to determine.

The attention of General Swift was particularly directed, before the committee, to the discrepancies in the bonds, and also to the two letters from the Engineer Department, in which the contract is alluded to. The explanation which he gives will be found in his testimony, to which the committee refer.

During an investigation relative to this contract, by a Committee of the House of Representatives, in 1822, a copy of the bond was requested by that committee. In answer to which the Engineer Department furnished a copy of the second bond, which had been substituted for the one first given, but, as there was no certificate of the Recorder of New York, approving the sureties on the second bond, a copy of the certificate annexed to the cancelled bond was made, and attached to the copy of the bond furnished. Captain Smith, of the Engineer Department, who attested these copies, has explained the cause of his certifying to this inaccuracy; and to his testimony, in that particular, the committee here refer.

The question still remains, who was the secret partner? But the committee being entirely satisfied that the secret partner was not the Vice President, which was the main question to be decided, will leave the conflicting testimony on the other point with the House, without attempting to decide upon its relative weight.

On the 27th January, 1827, the committee closed the examination of witnesses on their part, except as to one or two who had been summoned but had not attended. On that day the friend and representative of the Vice President was advised that the committee had so closed their examination, and he was also informed by a member of the committee, in its presence, that the committee were unanimously of opinion that the Vice President was innocent of the charge of having participated in any manner in any contract made with the War Department, while he was Secretary of War. The same day, at the instance of Mr. McDuffie, subpoenas were issued for witnesses to appear and testify on behalf of the Vice President. On the 29th of January, the committee received from the friend and representative of the Vice President a paper protesting against the previous proceedings of the committee. Considering this paper as prepared and presented under the sanction of the high officer, in whose behalf it protests, the committee have deemed it their duty to transmit it to the House, but they forbear all comment on its contents.

The committee submit herewith all the testimony they have received during the examination.

The report was read by the clerk.

On motion of Mr. Wright, it was then ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Paper accompanying the report of the Committee on the application of the Vice President.

To the Hon. JOHN FLORY:

SIR: The Committee of Investigation, over which you preside, having announced to me, as the friend and representative of Mr. Calhoun, that they have closed the examination of all the witnesses they deem it necessary or proper to summon before them, I should be equally insensible to the claims of private friendship, and the obligations of public duty, were I not to enter my solemn protest against the extraordinary course, and not less extraordinary conclusion, of a proceeding, singularly destitute of almost every attribute of a legal investigation. Even if it should be considered that this committee was instituted, not for the exclusive purpose of sitting in judgment on the specific charge submitted to their examination, but for the additional purpose of exercising, to a certain extent, the functions of an inquisitorial commission, I cannot conceive that there would be any thing in the character of such a commission, that would authorize it to depart

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

The Vice President's Appeal.

[H. OF R.]

from the fundamental principles of judicial investigation, and the established rules of judicial evidence; and after wandering at large, through the perplexing mazes of suspicion and conjecture, guided only by the bewildering lights of incompetent and inadmissible testimony, to select the precise point where suspicion ends and legal evidence begins, as the conclusion of their inquiries. But, confidently believing that it was the intention of the House that this committee should assume the solemn character of a judicial tribunal, and that the facts and opinions which they may report to the House will be consequently regarded by the public as having the stamp of judicial authority, I feel impelled, by a profound sense of the duty which I owe to Mr. Calhoun, to the country, and even to the committee themselves, to state, briefly and distinctly, my objections to the course pursued, before it shall be too late to correct or to palliate its injustice. And, in the very outset of my remarks, I cannot but advert to the fact, as strikingly illustrative of the anomalous character of this proceeding, that, with the exception of the solitary question as to the fact of Mr. Calhoun's participation, which every witness has promptly and unequivocally answered in the negative, there is not one tittle of all the encumbering mass of documentary and oral testimony which has occupied the incessant labors of the committee for more than twenty days, that has the slightest pretension to the character of legal evidence, whether we regard it as applicable to the present accusation, or to any other accusation against the private integrity or official purity of Mr. Calhoun. In order to demonstrate this proposition, I beg leave to present, for the reconsideration of the committee, a descriptive and analytical review of the recorded testimony.

It will be recollected that the first three or four days of this inquiry were devoted to the examination of witnesses, professedly produced for the purpose of exculpating the present Secretary of War from the imputation of having any agency, either in bringing forward the charge of peculation against Mr. Calhoun, or in the infamous publication of the equally infamous letter of the yet more infamous instrument of this dark and nefarious conspiracy. It is not my purpose to complain of the course pursued by the committee, in this respect, although it might seem to indicate a more anxious desire to exonerate one against whom no imputation had been made, than to administer speedy justice to the second officer of the Government, when actually on his trial upon a charge of official delinquency, calculated, if true, to stamp his reputation with indelible infamy. But, as the committee have thought proper to make the conduct of Mr. Barbour, in this transaction, a distinct subject of inquiry, I feel constrained to remark, that although I readily exonerate him from any intentional participation in this most insidious attempt at moral and political assassination; yet it is a circumstance much to be regretted, that, in the editorial commentaries by which the publication of the letter of Elijah Mix, in the Phoenix Gazette, was accompanied, the name, and office, and official decision of the Secretary of War, were so artfully associated with the charge against Mr. Calhoun, as to give it additional solemnity and importance; and that no measures were taken to have this injurious association disclaimed through the same channel. It is a fact, equally to be regretted, that the Secretary should have retained in his possession, officially, for three days, the letter containing the charge against Mr. Calhoun, without giving him the slightest intimation of it. And even the verbal declaration made by the Secretary to Col. Johnson, that he believed the charge against Mr. Calhoun to be an atrocious calumny, was not made until a day had elapsed after the publication in the Phoenix Gazette, and was only communicated to Mr. Calhoun after he had prepared and sealed his letter to the House of Representatives, and placed it in the hands of a friend. And I must also state, as a fact worthy of notice, that neither in the Phoenix Gazette which assumed a semi-official attitude in stating the proceedings of the Secretary of War in relation to the letter of Mix, nor in the notice taken of the publication in that Gazette by the National Intelligencer the next day, was the fact stated, that the Secretary regarded the charge against Mr. Calhoun as an atrocious calumny.

But to resume the analysis of the testimony, with a view to its immediate bearing upon my opening proposition. After submitting the obvious remark, that all the evidence produced to exculpate Mr. Barbour was not only irrelevant, but immaterial to the pending issue, I will proceed to the examination of that part of the testimony which is intended, as I presume, to bear, directly or indirectly, upon the official character and integrity of Mr. Calhoun. The great mass of the evidence that has so long engaged the attention of the committee consists of the private letters of Major Vandeverter to Elijah Mix, with the explanations to which they have given rise. It is hardly necessary that I should enter in a course of argument, before a committee, of which six, out of seven, are lawyers by profession, to show that these letters ought to have been promptly rejected, as incompetent and improper testimony. Even if it be granted that Mr. Calhoun is now on his trial for every act of his life, official or private, and not merely upon the specific charge referred to the committee, it is perfectly clear that, according to those great principles of evidence, which have been devised by the wisdom, and consecrated by the experience of ages, the letters or declarations of another person cannot be given in evidence against him. Nor is this one of those technical principles, which sometimes mar the symmetry of the law, and have no foundation in reason. There are no principles of our law more deeply founded in wisdom, than those which regulate the admission of evidence. And I will take this occasion to remark, that, next to such an organization of the Government as will secure the effective responsibility of political agents, civil liberty derives its principal security from the establishment and sacred observance of fixed rules of judicial proceeding and of judicial evidence. The opinion entertained by the enlightened sense of modern times, of the inseparable connection between the rules of criminal evidence, and civil liberty, may be clearly inferred from the opposite judgments which posterity has pronounced upon the characters of Sydney and of Jeffries. For, while the name of Sydney is inscribed on the imperishable rolls of fame, as a patriot and martyr, that of Jeffries has, by universal consent, been consigned to everlasting infamy as a judicial monster. And yet, the catastrophe of the victim has excited the sympathy, and the tyranny of the judge the abhorrence, of mankind; principally because the sacrifice was effected by violating those rules of evidence, in which every member of the community had a common interest, as the only means of securing his life and character against the combined machinations of prostitute informers and profligate rulers. To unsettle and subvert these rules, therefore, under whatever plausible pretext it may be attempted, is to destroy the only substantial security for every thing sacred in life, and, consequently, to inflict a vital stab upon the public liberty. Nor is there any thing in the character or circumstances of the present investigation, that should absolve the committee from the observance of these rules. On the contrary, all history will justify the remark, that there are no occasions in which their rigid observance is so highly important, as when legislative bodies or political commissions exercise judicial powers for the trial of political offences. On such occasions, the strongest of human passions almost unavoidably usurp the seat of judgment; and, unless restrained by pre-established forms of proceeding, and pre-established rules of evidence, the most capricious freaks of despotism and vengeance are perpetrated, in the sacred names of law and justice. Without referring, for illustration, to the lawless proceedings of those inquisitorial tribunals which are at once the reproach and the terror of despotic Governments, or to the shocking outrages committed by the Revolutionary tribunals of France, it would be sufficient to advert to the disgraceful proceedings of the Parliament of England, in cases of attainder, not only to sustain the general principles here presented, but to communicate the most vivid impression of their truth and importance. If these general views evince to the committee the necessity of adhering to the established rules of evidence—and if I have shown that one of the most important of those rules excludes the letters or declarations of a third person under any circumstances—how incomparably stronger does the objection to their admission become, when we advert to the singular and extraordinary circumstances under which the letters of Major Vandeventer have been produced to the committee. In the first place, they are obviously the detached parts of a garbled correspondence. In the second place, they are mutilated and defaced, so as to render their meaning unintelligible as to every purpose connected with the investigation. But what is of infinitely more importance, this correspondence was obviously garbled, and the letters mutilated and defaced, by one of the most artful and consummate villains that ever figured in the annals of human depravity, for the unquestionable purpose of exciting doubts and suspicions, by means of the mutilations and erasures, which could not have been produced by the letters in their original and entire state. It is impossible, therefore, to conceive a combination of circumstances more strikingly demonstrative of the wisdom of those rules of evidence from which the committee have thought proper to depart, than that which exists in the present instance. For it is obvious to remark, that this is a political commission, composed of political men; and, disguise it as we may, I must be permitted to add, without intending to insinuate any thing in the slightest degree disrespectful to a majority of the committee, that they are sitting in judgment on a political opponent, charged with a political offence. And when it is moreover considered, that these garbled and mutilated letters have been produced by the vilest of all that tribe of informers who have been the disgrace and the terror of those countries in which they have been countenanced by the wickedness and profligacy of rulers, a self-condemned and self-immolated wretch, who, in the very presence of the committee, has literally covered himself with "all the multiplying villainies of nature," I cannot but believe that the committee will themselves shrink back with abhorrence from those machinations and devices which they have unwittingly received in the place of evidence, and upon which the characters of incompetency and infamy are so clearly and indelibly impressed. There is one other species of testimony sought by the questions, and placed upon the records of the committee, equally excluded by the principles upon which I have insisted. Hearsay evidence is inadmissible, not only by the code to which we have been accustomed, but by every system of civilized jurisprudence with which we have any acquaintance; and yet the committee, apparently assuming, by a strange complication of issues, that every officer of the War Department who had any agency in forming a certain contract with Elijah Mix, or any interest in it, is now actually under trial, have received and recorded, as testimony, the declarations of those officers, indistinctly recollected, and vaguely and doubtfully stated.

Admitting that it is proper for the committee to assume inquisitorial powers in this investigation, and in that character to ask of the witnesses, not only what they know, but what they have heard from others, it must be exceedingly apparent, that the only excusable purpose, even of an inquisitorial kind, for which such questions could be propounded, is the discovery of other witnesses, by whose evidence the charge might be established. Let us see how far the proceedings of the committee have been conformable to this view of their functions. In the evidence recorded by the committee, Col. Armistead states, in substance, that either Major Vandeventer or General Swift informed him that the latter was concerned in the Mix contract. Upon further recollection, the witness states, that he must have received this information from Gen. Swift himself: for that he remembers to have had a conversation with him, in which the General stated that he had an idea of leaving the army, and becoming interested in some contract with the Government, which the witness supposed to have been the contract in question. He further states, in the same conversation, Gen. Swift informed him that he had asked the permission of Mr. Calhoun to become thus interested. This evidence, if evidence it may be called, is to be regarded in the twofold aspect of implicating Gen. Swift in a criminal participation in a contract made by himself as the agent of the Government, and Mr. Calhoun in a scarcely less criminal connivance at such a participation. So far as it relates to Gen. Swift, common justice requires me to remark, that it is contrary to those great principles of criminal jurisprudence which our forefathers have consecrated by a constitutional declaration, to sit in judgment upon a citizen against whom no charge has been presented; who has no notice that his character is even thus informally implicated, and who, instead of being present to confront his accuser, is wholly unrepresented before the committee.

But, so far as this testimony tends to implicate Mr. Calhoun, the course adopted by the committee is liable to a much stronger objection than that merely of receiving, and recording for publication, incompetent and improper testimony. They have evidently closed the investigation precisely where it ought to have commenced, leaving upon the reputation of Mr. Calhoun all the suspicion which illegal evidence could produce, and omitting to summon before them the only witness who could give legal testimony on the matter in question.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

The Vice President's Appeal.

[H. OF R.]

Colonel Armistead states, obviously from the recollections of a most treacherous and feeble memory, that General Swift informed him, eight or nine years ago, that he had asked Mr. Calhoun's permission to become concerned in some contract with the Government. This is the only material fact bearing upon the character of Mr. Calhoun; and it must have been obvious to the committee that General Swift was the only witness who could give legal testimony in relation to it. Yet they have declined to summon him on their own motion, no doubt from a view of the subject satisfactory to themselves. The ground upon which I must presume they have acted is the incompetency of the evidence before them, and its utter insufficiency to fix upon Mr. Calhoun any imputation which requires to be refuted. But I must be permitted to say, that the incompetency and insufficiency of the evidence, though a very sufficient reason for rejecting it altogether, is no reason at all for refusing, when it is improperly received and recorded, to produce the only legal testimony by which judicial certainty could be obtained on the subject. Although, therefore, the committee must have acted with a view to impartial justice, the course they have pursued has been precisely that which is best calculated to give the most injurious efficacy to illegal testimony against Mr. Calhoun, and to avoid the conclusive refutation, which the production of legal evidence would undoubtedly establish. To do away the effect of this proceeding, the only alternative left to Mr. Calhoun is to place the most emphatic and unequivocal negative, which I am expressly authorized to do, upon the imputation of his ever having any knowledge or belief of General Swift's participation in the contract, and to call upon the committee to examine General Swift himself, as to the imputed fact of Mr. Calhoun's knowledge and connivance.

Having shown that the entire mass of the testimony produced is legally inadmissible on the trial of any issue which can be made upon Mr. Calhoun's official conduct or moral integrity, it is due to the committee that I should explain my reasons for not objecting to it as it occurred in the progress of the investigation.

Convinced of the absolute falsity of the charges presented, and of the entire purity of Mr. Calhoun's character in all the relations, public or private, in which it can be contemplated, I determined, from the beginning, that I would interpose no objection to any inquiry which the committee might think proper to institute, nor to any description of evidence by which they might think proper to pursue it. Any attempt on my part to restrain the latitude of the investigation, or to prevent the adduction even of improper evidence, would have been construed by the malicious into a desire to screen Mr. Calhoun, behind technical forms, from a full and free investigation. And as I was satisfied that the more severe the ordeal, the more conclusive would be the evidence of the fidelity and zeal of his official conduct, I was the more willing that the investigation should assume any form which the committee might choose to give it, and be prosecuted by any sort of evidence which they might think proper to admit upon their own responsibility.

But although I had a right, as the personal friend of Mr. Calhoun, to abstain from any interference with the course of the committee, I have no right, considering the relation in which he stands and in which I stand to the public, to sanction, by my acquiescence, a species of unlicensed inquisition, unknown to the jurisprudence of any free country, and which would furnish a precedent utterly subversive of the only effectual safeguards of the reputation of public men in periods of great political excitement.

Having disposed of that branch of the investigation which relates to the imputations upon Mr. Calhoun's official integrity, it remains for me to offer a few remarks upon a view of this subject, which, though not involved in the issue referred to the committee, is evidently embraced in the scope of their inquiries. It has been too apparent to escape the observation even of one less interested than I am to mark the bearings of this investigation, that a very large portion of the testimony can have no other application or object than to call in question the general administration of the War Department, while Mr. Calhoun presided over it, by holding him responsible for the minute irregularities of its subordinate branches, and particularly those of the Engineer Department: While, therefore, the charge is specific and limited, the investigation is general and undefined, and the most obvious principles of justice require that the defence should at least be co-extensive with the attack, whether this be open and direct, or disguised and incidental.

Assuming, then, that the general irregularities of a subordinate branch of the War Department are fair subjects of inquiry, let us see whether the specifications are such as, admitting their truth, will fairly fix any portion of the responsibility on Mr. Calhoun. The contract in relation to which the imputed irregularities occurred, was made the 25th of July, 1818. Mr. Calhoun took charge of the War Department, the 8th of December, 1817; and it is a fact of undisputed notoriety that he found it utterly destitute of organization in almost all its branches, and pre-eminently so in the Engineer Department. The extensive operations and large disbursements of the then recent war, effected under a system of administration having neither organization nor responsibility, had introduced such irregularities and abuses, and caused the accumulation of such a mass of unsettled accounts and unfinished business, that the War Department was actually shunned by several distinguished citizens who were solicited to preside over it, as an Augean stable, holding out in prospect the labors of Hercules, without any portion of his fame. Such being the condition of the Department when Mr. Calhoun became its Chief Officer, and every irregularity which is imputable to the Mix contract, including the omission to advertise, having been common and frequent in every preceding Administration, without any effectual effort to correct them; the injustice of holding Mr. Calhoun responsible for not correcting, in a few months, irregularities which his predecessors had not even attempted to correct in as many years, is too gross to be tolerated for a moment.

It is obvious that the Head of such a Department cannot, upon any rational principle, be made responsible for a particular instance of irregularity in the details of a subordinate Department. The true point of this responsibility is the general laxity and want of system from which the particular instance arises. If, therefore, Mr. Calhoun is obnoxious to any censure in the present case, it is for the imperfect organization of the Engineer Department on the 25th July, 1818. In this view of the subject, it is to be remarked that he took charge of the Department in December, 1817, at the opening of the session of Congress; left Washington for South Carolina, on indispensable business, immediately after the close of the session in the May following, and did not return until the month of July, only two weeks before the contract in question was closed; and was almost incessantly occupied during these two weeks, in the deliberations of the Cabinet on the military occurrences of the Seminole campaign.

Under these circumstances, the irregularities in question cannot be imputed to him, either in fact or in theory. Coming into a complicated Department, which was almost literally in a state of chaos, nothing but a spirit of official quackery could have prompted him to commence the great work of a general and systematic reformation, before he had deliberately surveyed the working of its disordered machinery, and ascertained both the causes of the existing irregularities and the most effective means of correcting them permanently.

In fact, when it is considered that Mr. Calhoun first necessarily devoted himself to the creation and organization of the Departments of the Quarter Master General, Surgeon General, and Commissary General, under an act of Congress, passed upon his recommendation, in April, 1818, the wonder is that the reformation of the Engineer Department was commenced and completed at such early periods as in fact it was. I cannot believe it possible, therefore, the committee will select the minute irregularities of detail in a transaction which was conducted exclusively by subordinate officers, and of which the irregularities really belonged to the antecedent period of disorder, as criterion of Mr. Calhoun's general administration of the War Department.

Indeed, the very irregularities which we are now considering, are the more striking, because of the perfect organization, responsibility, and system, which Mr. Calhoun has the high merit of having subsequently imparted to all the arrangements and operations of the Department.

Standing in contrast with his own improvements, these petty and subordinate irregularities are exhibited in bold relief to the prying and invidious research of the censorious; and in this way not only the imperfections which he found in the system of administration, but the signal regularity which he introduced in the proceedings of the Department, are made to furnish matter of accusation against him.

As the general industry, zeal, and ability, with which Mr. Calhoun discharged his official duties, are thus distinctly put in issue by the direction which the committee have given to the examination, I claim the right of calling before them all the Heads of the subordinate Departments, who were his able coadjutors in the great work of reform, and of showing by their united testimony the condition in which he found the Department; the fidelity and unremitting labor with which he devoted himself to its improvement; and the high perfection of its arrangements, which crowned his labors with a success equally conducive to his own fame and to the welfare of his country. I must, therefore, request that the committee will examine the following gentlemen, touching this branch of the inquiry: Major General Brown, General Thos. S. Jessup, General A. Maccomb, Dr. J. Lovell, Col. N. Towson, Col. G. Gibson, Col. G. Bomford, Col. I. Roberdeau, and Col. John E. Wool. If I am not greatly mistaken, it will conclusively appear from their evidence, that the system of rigorous responsibility and strict economy which Mr. Calhoun introduced in the operations and disbursements of the Military Establishment, have effected an annual saving in the national expenditure of more than a million of dollars, to say nothing of the striking improvement made in the moral of the army, as well as in its military discipline and efficiency.

Although the views already presented show the injustice of holding Mr. Calhoun in any degree responsible for the formal irregularities which may have existed in the formation of the contract with Elijah Mix, it is due to the historical truth of the case that I should state, that, in point of fact, no injury resulted to the Government from those irregularities, or from the making of the contract with such a person. On the contrary, it was conclusively shown in the investigation which took place on the subject in the House of Representatives in May, 1822, that, previous to the formation of the contract, notice was actually given, and inquiries made, at all the points where suitable stone could be procured, and that Colonel Armistead, to use his own words, "made experiments, by having the stone quarried near Georgetown by laborers hired by the United States, and found that it could not be procured and carried to Old Point Comfort for less than $3 50 per perch, together with the great uncertainty of getting vessels to transport it." The testimony of Commodore Rodgers, General Mason, Mr. Baker of Georgetown, and various other witnesses, all concurred in the uncontradicted statement, that $3 50 per perch was the lowest sum for which the stone could be delivered. And accordingly, $3 50 was the lowest bid except that of Elijah Mix. It is apparent, therefore, that the contract at $3 per perch would have been ruinous to Mix, but for "the very unexpected and rapid fall in the price of labor and transportation" adverted to by the witnesses in the former examination. Such was the conclusive force of this testimony in 1822, that the bare reading of it, without a single word of commentary or argument, induced the House of Representatives, by a vote of 131 to 20, to reject the report and resolution of the select committee which recommended a suspension of all appropriations for the fulfilment of that contract. Although, therefore, the character of Mix was, even at the date of the contract, stamped with infamy, the fact was then wholly unknown to Mr. Calhoun, and I believe, to every officer of the Engineer Department; and however much some of those officers may have suffered from having to deal with a man so profligate and unprincipled, it is clear that the Government has actually saved $75,000 in the whole contract, by accepting his bid. And I cannot but remark, in concluding this part of the subject, that the vigilant regard for the public interest with which Mr. Calhoun has invariably enforced upon Mix the performance of this contract, has evidently brought upon him the infamous calumny which has given rise to this investigation.

I cannot bring this communication to a close without formally and distinctly protesting against

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

The Vice President's Appeal.

[H. OF R.]

blending the examination and trial of charges against the subordinate officers of the War Department, with the present investigation. The injustice of such a course to those officers, has been already stated. It would be literally condemning them without trial. The injustice to Mr. Calhoun is equally great, though not quite so obvious. Upon principles of association, which the committee will readily comprehend, it would be visiting upon Mr. Calhoun, by a most severe and cruel dispensation, the guilt of these subordinate officers, established by a mode of proceeding having none of the forms of legal accusation and trial, but assuming the most odious of the prerogatives of those inquisitorial tribunals fortunately known to us only by the history of less favored countries.

Finally, I cannot but express my sincere regret at the extraordinary delay which has characterized this proceeding, and at the great injustice and injury which have unavoidably resulted to Mr. Calhoun from that circumstance alone. It is now more than four weeks since this committee was charged to inquire whether the Vice President of the United States had been guilty of the infamous offence of participating, while Secretary of War, in the profits of a contract made with an individual, by the Department over which he presided. The atrocious character of the charge, and the high station of the individual implicated, naturally excited in every portion of the Union the most lively interest in the proceedings of the committee; and the people of the United States, at a loss to account for the delay upon any other supposition than that some evidence of guilt had been exhibited, have been looking, day after day, and week after week, with the most intense anxiety, for the result of an investigation involving not only the honest name of a public servant, who has been for fifteen years honorably and eminently identified with the political history of the country, but involving also, in no small degree, the reputation of that country—whose rights and whose honor he has so largely contributed to defend, whose character he has so largely contributed to elevate, and whose institutions he has so successfully labored to establish and mature. If, from the high honor and unsuspected purity which have characterized every action of his life, all who know him, whether friends or enemies, have looked with equal confidence to his entire acquittal of the charge presented, it can scarcely be doubted that a large portion of the people of the United States, who do not know him, must have regarded the unexpected procrastination of the inquiry, as a circumstance inexplicable, if not suspicious. And, while I am under the necessity, from the course pursued by the committee, of still farther protracting the investigation, I shall use every effort, in which I earnestly solicit their co-operation, to bring this long labor to a speedy termination.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient servant.

GEO. McDUFFIE.

Mr. FLOYD rose, and said, that the report which had just been read, with the single exception of the passage declaring the conviction of the innocence of the Vice President of the charges imputed to him, was from a majority of the committee. After being engaged for forty days in this investigation, he (Mr. F.) had, so far as he could collect the sense of the committee, framed a report accordingly, which report had not proved agreeable to the majority of the committee. The objection which he had to the report adopted was, that it did not give the true color to the results of the inquiry. The report which he had drafted, and which he held in his hand, and was about to offer to the House, did justice to the views of the minority; and, as an exposition of their views, he wished to present it to the House. Mr. F. said he had gone into this inquiry with a disposition to do ample justice to all concerned in it. The character and conduct of that man, Mix, he said, had been marked, in the investigation, by greater atrocity than had ever been witnessed before since the days of Titus Oates. He would say one word more: during those days when he, and others with him, were stigmatized as "ruthless Radicals," for thinking as he still thought—for disapproving of Yellow Stone expeditions, and enormous expenditures for unnecessary fortifications—he must yet say, in justice to Mr. CALHOUN, that, as regarded the Department of War itself, the then Secretary had been of as much benefit to the country as any man, in similar circumstances, could be. Previous to the year 1818, there had existed the greatest confusion in the organization of that Department. The engineer department had followed the chief of engineers wherever he moved; other branches of the administration of the War Office were but little better arrayed, and there was a general want of responsibility for disbursements of public money. The then Secretary (now Vice President) had, Mr. F. was satisfied, imparted an organization and a regularity to the Department, such as it had never before possessed, and which were highly creditable to him as a public officer.

Mr. F. then presented to the House a paper, as expressing the views of a minority of the committee; and the paper being about to be read—

Mr. WRIGHT said he did not rise to interpose any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) but to say a word on the part of a majority of the committee, whose organ he was, in reply to the remarks of that gentleman. He understood the gentleman to say that the paper he exhibited as containing the views of the minority of the committee, contained a clearer view of the transactions of the committee than the report made by the majority.

[Mr. FLOYD explained, that he had not meant to enter into any controversy with the majority of the committee, but merely to say that, as one of the minority of the committee, he did not approve of the color of the report.]

Mr. WRIGHT: The gentleman now says he did not like the color given by the report to the transactions before the committee, and therefore he was induced to offer his project. Sir, said Mr. W., the committee have given no color to the facts detailed in the report. The majority studiously avoided giving any color, or expressing their opinion on facts relating to other than the direct matter before them. Therein, he said, would be found to be much of the difference between the report and the paper now exhibited. He said there would also be found another difference, which he considered material in such a paper, and he believed a majority thought that the principal objection to the paper offered as a report. That was in this—both papers unqualifiedly pronounced the innocence of the Vice President, and the infamous character of Mix, rendering him unworthy of belief.

The report, when it had asserted that, sought no more to establish the fact by a detailed reference to his testimony. It was not thought necessary or proper to do so. The paper offered asserts the fact of Mix's infamy, and then labors, through many pages, to prove the assertion true, thus wasting its force upon an immaterial matter, and losing sight of the principal matter in view. The paper offered employs many hard and harsh words, in characterizing Mix's evidence, which a majority thought unnecessary, and highly improper in a report of a committee made to this House. They could not add to Mix's infamy, but might detract from the respect the members of the committee felt for themselves and the House. These, I believe, sir, were the principal objections with the majority of the committee, against adopting the paper now offered as their report.

Mr. W. said he had no sort of objection to the gentleman presenting his views to the House, in any way most agreeable to himself, or to any order the House might feel disposed to make on them.

The paper presented by Mr. FLOYD, as expressive of the views of the minority of the committee, was then read, as follows:

The Select Committee, to whom was referred the communication of the Vice President, of the 29th December last, have had the same under consideration, and report:

That the committee convened, as soon after their appointment, as could be done with convenience, to consider the subject referred to them. The first step which they thought it advisable to take, was to inform the Vice President that the committee was organized, and would receive any communication he might think proper to make. This was accordingly done on the 2d of January last; in reply to which the committee received a letter on the 3d, stating, that his communication to the House, of the 29th December last, would make known to the committee his motive for soliciting an inquiry; that he had nothing further to add than to reiterate his desire to have a full investigation; and that, in order to avoid the inconvenience and delay of communicating by letter, he had requested Mr. McDuffie to act as his friend before the committee. Upon the receipt of this letter, Mr. McDuffie was admitted accordingly.

The committee then proceeded to inquire whether there were any charges on file in the Department of War, or any paper or document which went to show that the Vice President had been, whilst Secretary of that Department, engaged in any contract, or in the profits of which he in any way participated. The result of this inquiry was, that there were no charges, or other evidences, of any kind, against him.

Yet, as a confidential letter, signed by E. Mix, and addressed to the author of "Hancock," who was known to be Major Satterlee Clark, a Paymaster, who had been dismissed from the service whilst Mr. Calhoun was Secretary of the Department of War, for not settling his accounts, as will be more distinctly seen by reference to the testimony of Col. Towson, had appeared in one of the newspapers, printed in this District, and the Vice President, in his communication to the committee, of the 3d of January last, having referred to it, and desiring a full investigation, the committee felt it their duty to examine the whole subject fully and freely, as containing the foundation of his letter to the House of Representatives.

From an inquiry into this subject, it was ascertained that Howes Goldsborough and Elijah Mix were competitors for a contract with the Government of the United States in December last, and, on Goldsborough's arriving in this city, he procured from Major Satterlee Clark, the author of the publication signed "Hancock," a copy of the confidential letter from Mix to the author of Hancock, to be used in depriving Mix of the contract, should he find it necessary.

From this copy a transcript was taken by Wm. F. Thornton, the junior Editor of the Phoenix Gazette, and published by him in that paper the next day, which was the 28th of December last, accompanied with his editorial remarks.

This letter of Mix to the author of Hancock is an exhibit among the files of the committee, and was acknowledged by him to be in his own handwriting. The motives which induced him to make this communication, he has himself developed. To extort money seems to have been his aim, without any scruples as to the means by which his object was to be accomplished.

From a view of the whole evidence on this part of the subject, the committee are unable to find any thing warranting the belief that the officer at the head of the Department of War had any agency in the publication of this letter in the Phoenix Gazette.

It is due, however, to Mr. Calhoun, that the committee should state, that his communication to the House of Representatives was founded exclusively on the publication in the Phoenix Gazette of the 28th of December, and that the facts assumed in that communication, viz: That the letter of Mix to the author of Hancock had been made the basis of an official act, and would, of course, be filed among the records of the Department, were professedly stated; the first upon the authority of that paper, and the second as an inference from the statement contained in it.

In the early stage of this investigation, the committee discovered, from the letter of Major Vandeventer to E. Mix, dated the 7th of August, 1818, and to which they refer, that a person whose name was to have been kept secret, was interested in the contract commonly called the Mix, or Rip Rap Contract.

On making this discovery, the committee felt bound, if possible, to bring to light this hidden associate; and in following up their inquiries, they have been led into a much wilder field than could at first have been anticipated. They have, in short, found it necessary to go thoroughly into the origin and history of the Rip Rap Contract, which involved the necessity of summoning numerous witnesses from distant parts, who were believed to possess knowledge of this contract; consequently requiring much time for their examination.

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

The Vice President's Appeal.

[H. or R.]

The committee are, however, unanimously of opinion, that there is nothing in the evidence to warrant a belief, or even the slightest suspicion, that the Vice President was interested in any contract made with the Department of War, whilst he was entrusted with the discharge of its duties, or that he, either directly or indirectly, participated in the profits of any such contract, or that he connived at such participation in any of his subordinate officers.

From the prominent figure which Elijah Mix makes in this transaction, throughout, occupying the twofold attitude of an informer and a witness, seems to command of the committee a direct expression of the opinion they have formed of his general character for veracity, as well as of the specific opinion they have formed in relation to some of the most prominent parts of his testimony.

On the subject of his general character for veracity, they have no hesitation in saying, that he is entirely destitute of the slightest claim to be believed upon his oath.

They have come to this conclusion, not only from the testimony of respectable witnesses, going to establish the general infamy of his character, but from the total disregard for truth which he manifested during the progress of his examination, and the numerous contradictions in which he involved himself whilst giving in his testimony in the presence of the committee.

Without attempting to detail the numerous instances in which it is apparent to the committee that he has sworn to wilful and deliberate falsehoods, they have confined themselves to those parts of his testimony which demand a separate and distinct consideration on other grounds.

On his first examination, he produced a letter written by Major Vandeventer to him, dated the 7th of August, 1818, commencing with the following mutilated sentence: "I am very sorry that the —, who are concerned in the contract, will not agree to admit George on the terms you have stated."

The letter then goes on to state, that the writer (Vandeventer) had informed Major Cooper, his father-in-law, that there was one other person concerned in the contract, whose name was not to be mentioned; and the letter seems to be designed to prevail upon Mr. Cooper to become one of the sureties for the fulfilment of the contract, without the condition, on which it appears he was insisting, that his son George should have one-fourth of the contract. Mix states that this letter was obliterated when he received it, and that he does not know what were the words that have been erased. The committee are decidedly of opinion, that the erasure was made by Mix, for the purpose of throwing a mystery over the matter, and of exciting suspicion that the person alluded to in the part obliterated was Mr. Calhoun.

That the obliteration was not made by the writer of the letter is clear, from several obvious considerations. If he had been so desirous to conceal the words erased, the obvious and natural course would have been, to have omitted them altogether, instead of first writing them down and then making an erasure that rendered the sentence unintelligible.

Another circumstance, that tends to satisfy the committee that the erasure was made by Mix, is the manifest difference between the ink with which the letter is written, and that with which the erasure is made, and the equally striking resemblance between the ink used in making the erasures in question, and that used in making other erasures in the same letter, which Mix acknowledges were made by himself. It is obvious to the committee, that the word "the" is left unobliterated immediately preceding the erasure, in order to raise a suspicion that the word "Secretary," or "Secretary of War," occupied the blotted space which followed: But not understanding the rules of grammar, which, otherwise, is an ingenious device, has left visible the words "who are concerned," immediately after the erasure; from which it is evident that the definite article preceding the erasure must have agreed; not with "Secretary," but with some common substantive in the plural number, such as "the other gentlemen," "the rest of the gentlemen," according to the explanation given by Major Vandeventer. This explanation of the words obliterated, which is almost self-evident, conclusively shows that Vandeventer could have no motive to make the obliteration, and as clearly shows the base motives by which Mix must have been actuated in making it.

If, to these circumstances, we add the oath of Major Vandeventer, that he did not make the erasure, the fact that Mix did is established by a conclusive weight of evidence.

On his first examination, Mix stated that, previous to the 13th of April, 1821, he presented to Mr. Calhoun, among other papers explanatory of his claims, a letter from Major Vandeventer to him, (Mix,) written whilst they were both in the city of New York, dated the 1st of April, 1821, and containing a copy of a confidential letter which Vandeventer had that morning written, from New York, to Mr. Calhoun. In the first instance, Mix stated to the committee that he could not recollect the contents of the confidential letter, farther than that it informed Mr. Calhoun that Mix had been brought to terms, and would consent to the transfer to Goldsborough.

He afterwards, during the same examination, stated that it contained something about Vandeventer's going abroad upon a foreign mission. A member of the committee perceiving that he had a paper in his hand, to which he occasionally referred, asked if that was a copy of the letter in question. He said that it was not a correct copy, but that he had two others at home, one of which was correct, or nearly so. On being requested to give up the paper he held in his hand, he refused, stating that it was too incorrect to be exhibited as a copy. The next day he produced the two other alleged copies, together with the one he had refused to give up the day before. On being asked which of the three was the most correct copy, he said he could not tell, but stated that they were all copied from the original while it was in his possession. He now stated that he lost the letter in the Department of War five or six months or a year before Mr. Calhoun left it.

He further stated, that Mr. Calhoun, in the presence of General Macomb and Captain Smith, of the Engineer Corps, took the bundle of papers, laid them on his table before him, and said he would attend to them. That he (Mix) retired, but returned, in from five to ten minutes, and wrote a note to Mr. Calhoun from the audience room, requesting either to see him or have his papers returned. That the bundle was presented to him by the messenger, and, on examining it, he perceived that the letter of the 1st of April, 1821, was missing; that he immediately went into Mr. Calhoun's room and stated the fact that a paper was missing, upon which Mr. Calhoun called Major Vandeverter, and asked him if he knew any thing of it. Major Vandeverter answered promptly, no; and Mr. Calhoun, looking sternly, first at Vandeverter, and then at Mix, said he knew nothing of it.

On examining the three copies, they are all found to agree tolerably well in substance, but differ both in the arrangement and construction of the sentences, and in the words used to express the same idea. The composition is evidently that of an illiterate man, who does not understand the rules of grammatical construction.

Major Vandeverter denies, unequivocally, that he ever wrote such a letter to Mr. Calhoun, and also states, that on the occasion alluded to by Mix, when he states the loss of the letter in the Department of War, he had nothing further to do with the bundle of papers than to take them from Mr. Calhoun's table, in compliance with his order, and deliver them to the messenger at the door, to be handed by him to Mr. Mix. He also states that the bundle appeared not to have been opened at all; and Captain Smith also says that Mr. Calhoun was engaged in official business with him during the whole time the papers remained there.

The committee have no hesitation in pronouncing these alleged copies of a confidential letter from Major Vandeverter to Mr. Calhoun, to be gross fabrications, and that the whole story about receiving such a letter from Vandeverter, and losing it in the Department of War, is a tissue of falsehood throughout.

To say nothing of Mix's character, and the positive denial of Vandeverter, both as to the fact of writing such a letter, and as to the fact of taking it out of the bundle in the Department of War, the story is, in itself, so improbable, and contains so many internal evidences of fabrication, that the committee feel bound to reject the papers presented as forgeries.

It appears that Major Vandeverter had gone to New York to prevail upon Mix to consent to the transfer to Goldsborough, and had succeeded in that object by personal communication. It is quite likely, therefore, that he used all the arguments he could suggest in the conversations he had with Mix on the subject, previous to obtaining his consent; and it is particularly to be presumed, that, if he had any thing confidential, he would have communicated it verbally, and not in writing.

Nothing can be more unnatural and improbable upon the face of it, than that he would have formally reduced to writing, and sent to a man who was in the same city with him, confidential matter, which he must have previously stated in conversation, if the whole be not a fabrication. In addition to the improbability of the story itself, the papers presented as copies of the confidential letter have internal evidences of their having been fabricated by Mix. He swears that they were all taken from the original, whilst in his possession. If he had merely taken copies from the original, it would have been much easier to take a true copy than an incorrect one, and all the objects of copying would be defeated by not making the copy accurate. Now, it is found that all the three copies, taken, as be says, from the same original, differ from each other in the construction, composition, and arrangement of the sentences. But the most conclusive badge of forgery stamped upon the papers themselves, is their composition. They are evidently composed by an illiterate man, who does not understand the art of writing good English, and correspond, in this respect, with the general character of Mix's composition. On the contrary, from the letters of Major Vandeverter, it is obvious that he writes correctly and grammatically. Moreover, it is highly improbable, in the nature of things, that Mix should have taken three separate copies, unless we suppose he had a foresight of its loss; and even if that had been the case he would have taken one correct copy, instead of three incorrect ones. The story relative to the loss of the original is equally improbable, and is accompanied by palpable contradictions. He first stated that he lost it previous to the 15th of April, 1821; and, afterwards, that it was five or six months, or a year, before Mr. Calhoun left the Department of War. That he should have left the papers with Mr. Calhoun, to be deliberately examined, and returned, and asked for them in five or six minutes, can only be accounted for upon the supposition that his object, from the beginning, was to give a plausible face to the story he was inventing.

The whole of his evidence relative to this letter, is contradictory and suspicious. He stated, in the first instance, that one of the copies was nearly correct, but that the one he then had with him was so inaccurate that he would not present it. The next day, when he produced all three of the copies, he could not tell which was the most accurate, or whether the one which he had refused to give up, as being too inaccurate, was less accurate than the rest. That copy, in fact, contains all that the others contain, and is at least equally as full as they are.

The next portion of the testimony of Mix, which the committee think proper to notice separately, is the letter of Major Vandeverter, of the 17th of October, 1820, which he produced on his second examination, with the accompanying testimony, given by him, as to the execution of the second bond. Major Vandeverter had stated that the second bond was executed a short time after the first, to-wit, some time in the early part of the Fall of 1818.

Mix produced this letter of the 17th of October, 1820, written by Vandeverter to him, at New York, in which Mix is requested to "attend to the bond." Seizing upon this expression in Vandeverter's letter, to give color to his story, he swears that the bond was executed in New York about the date of the letter, and that the reference in that letter was to the executing of the bond. After repeatedly swearing to this fact, in answer to several questions, he was asked if he distinctly recollected to have signed the bond, and to have seen the sureties sign it in the latter part of 1820. To this he answered, that he distinctly recollected signing the bond, but not in the fall of 1820. He then admitted, that the second bond was executed a short time after the first. Major Vandeverter states, that the request in the letter of the 17th October, 1820, about the bond, referred to the procurement of the certificate of the Recorder, as to the sufficiency of

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

The Vice President's Appeal.

[H. OF R.]

the securities; and General Swift swears, that the second bond was lodged in the Engineer Department in the Fall of 1818, before he left the office of Chief Engineer.

It is evident, therefore, that the whole of Mix's testimony, relative to the execution of the second bond, in 1820, is wantonly and maliciously false, and intended to discredit Vandeventer.

The last piece of the testimony of Elijah Mix, upon which the committee deem it necessary to pronounce a separate and specific opinion, is the letter of Major Vandeventer, of the third of August, 1818, with the accompanying explanations. This letter was produced at the close of his second examination, after he had repeatedly stated that he had no other letters of Vandeventer in his possession. The letter was mutilated in several places by cutting out words; and as these mutilations render the letter unintelligible to a certain extent, the committee feel it their duty to express their opinion, both as to the person who made them, and as to the object for which they were made. They have no hesitation in saying they were made by Mix, for the purpose of exciting suspicion against Mr. Calhoun, and that he is not to be credited when he says that it was done by Vandeventer. That the House may have the means of estimating the character of this witness, the committee have thought it expedient to state, briefly and distinctly, the circumstances connected with this part of his testimony. Near the close of his last examination, he voluntarily stated to the committee, that, since his first examination, Major Vandeventer had come to him, and requested to know whether he could find the letter of the 3d of August, stating that he desired permission to cut out or erase certain words that were in it; that he (Mix) found the letter the next day, and carried it to Vandeventer, at the Department of War, who requested him not to speak about it there, for that they were watched, and would be overheard, and proposed to go to the house of Mix that night, to converse with him on the subject; that Vandeventer came to his house, accordingly, and prevailed upon him, by importunity, to permit the letter to be mutilated, and that it was mutilated accordingly, by Vandeventer. In answer to repeated questions, seeking to ascertain the words cut out, he always answered that he did not know any thing of them; yet stated that the words cut out, in two separate places, were, he believed, the same.

Major Vandeventer, on being recalled, stated that he had never seen the letter in question since he wrote it; that Mix never had been to see him at the Department of War since his first examination.

Independently of the established infamy of Mix's character, and the positive denial of Major Vandeventer, this story has all the characteristics of a fabrication. Nothing is more improbable, than that Major Vandeventer should have placed himself completely in the power of an enemy, who was using every effort to destroy his character; and, if he had ever done so, he would rather have obtained possession of the letter, and destroyed it, than have left it in the hands of his enemy, just so far mutilated as to excite suspicion, and no farther. For it is to be remarked, that the word "the" is artfully left immediately preceding two or three of the excisions, with the view, no doubt, of making the impression that the word "Secretary" existed in the space cut out; though Mix repeatedly said that he did not know what were the words cut out. The committee, therefore, cannot entertain a doubt that the mutilations in the letter were made by Mix.

This contract, though formed on the 25th of July, 1818, between General J. G. Swift, Chief Engineer, on the part of the United States, and Elijah Mix, for himself, for the delivery of one hundred and fifty thousand perches of stone, at the Rip Raps, in Hampton Roads, was soon afterwards divided into four parts, as will be shown by the letters of Major Vandeventer, bearing date the 8d and 7th of August, 1818, in the manner following: One-fourth part to Mix, one-fourth part to Vandeventer, one-fourth part to Jennings, and one-fourth part to a person whose name was to be kept secret.

The only explanation on this part of the subject, which it is in the power of the committee to give, is that they believed the erasures and excisions in the letters of the 8d of August, 1818, and the 17th of October, 1820, contained the words of "the General" or "General Swift," as, at the time of writing them, Major Vandeventer believed General Swift was concerned in the contract; which impression he now swears was made by the representations of Mix, and was retained, until pending the investigation in 1822, when the General made oath that he never had been interested in that contract. Mr. Jennings also swears, that he was informed by Mix that Gen. Swift was interested in his contract. Mix also admits that he might have told Vandeventer so.

Immediately after this contract was closed, a bond was given for the fulfilment of its conditions, in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, dated the 5th of August, 1818, and signed by Elijah Mix, George Cooper, Samuel Cooper, and James Oakley. Sealed and delivered in presence of John Martin and Simon Hillyer.

To which is attached the following certificate of the Recorder of New York:

"The sureties having been by me duly sworn, I do hereby approve of them as good and sufficient.
"New York, 5th Aug. 1818. R. RIKER."

Upon this bond's being received at the Engineer Department, an advance of $10,000 upon the contract was made to Mix, by a draft upon the branch Bank of the U. States at New York. After this period, it was discovered that there were two errors in the bond; first, that it was for the delivery of one hundred thousand perch of stone, instead of one hundred and fifty thousand, which the contract called for; next, that the name of George Cooper was placed in the bond as one of the contractors, when Mix alone was the contractor.

Some time after the date of this bond, it was cancelled, and one formed to suit the provisions of the contract, in all particulars, and was forwarded to the Engineer Department, which second bond was dated the 5th of August, 1818, the same day on which the first was dated. At what precise period this bond was received at the Engineer Department, is not known, but, if the testimony of General Swift and Major Vandeventer is correct, it must have been early in the Fall of 1818.

The sum of $10,000 was drawn from the treasury, it is supposed, upon a verbal requisition, as there is nothing written upon the subject. This, however, previous to the date of this transaction, was sometimes the case, as appears from the testimony of General Swift, and from the communication of the Secretary of the Department of War to the committee, dated the 10th day of February, 1827.

The committee think it further necessary to state that the certificate of the Recorder of New York, which was attached to the first or the cancelled bond, is not attached to the second or new bond, but that, when a copy of this bond was sent to a committee of the House, in the year 1822, the copy of the certificate of the old was attached to the new bond, and certified by an officer to be a true copy. The manner in which this irregularity happened, is accounted for in the testimony of Captain Smith. It does not appear, in any part of this inquiry, that the United States sustained any injury, although there were some irregularities.

After taking all the testimony which could be had, calculated to throw light on the subject, the committee feel it their duty to state to the House, that there is nothing in the evidence warranting a belief, or that tends to induce even the slightest suspicion, that Mr. Calhoun was, either directly or indirectly, concerned in any contract made with the Department of War, whilst he was secretary of that department, or that he participated in the profits of any such contract, or that he connived at any such participation in any of his subordinate officers; and that, in their opinion, there are no grounds for any further proceedings.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, the above paper was then ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. SAUNDERS, of North Carolina, moved that the paper referred to in the report of the committee, as containing the protest of Mr. McDUFFIE, on the behalf of Mr. CALHOUN, against certain acts of the committee, be now read.

The Speaker replied, that the motion was not in order, as the report and documents had just been laid upon the table by the House, and ordered to be printed. The motion, however, might be received by leave of the House.

The question being put, leave was granted for the motion; and

Mr. SAUNDERS renewed his motion.

Mr. WRIGHT opposed the reading of this document, unless the other documents accompanying the report were read also. If this were read, he should call for the reading of all the rest.

Mr. SAUNDERS replied, that, should the gentleman do so, it would be for the House to say whether his call should be complied with.

The question was then put on reading the document, embraced by the motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, and negatived—ayes 78, nays 81.

Mr. FORSYTH asked leave to present a petition which had reference to the subject now before the House.

Leave being granted, Mr. F. then presented the following communication:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13, 1827.

Sir: I cannot but express my regret, that the Select Committee of the House of Representatives, appointed on the Vice President's letter of the 29th of December last, have not accompanied their report to the House by a communication of mine, of the 1st instant, explanatory of transactions, as far as I am concerned, in connection with the subject of investigation. Deeming this communication as necessary for that purpose, I herewith transmit it, with its accompanying documents, and pray that it may be received by the House, and placed among the papers presented by the committee, connected with this investigation.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, your most obedient servant, C. VANDEVENTER.

The petition was read.

Mr. FORSYTH said that, in presenting this petition, he did not intend to give any statement of his own sentiments in relation to the petitioner. He knew nothing about the testimony to which it referred, whether of an inculpatory or of an exculpatory character. In presenting it, he would only do to this person an act of justice which he would be willing to perform in all similar cases. He concluded his observations, by moving that the petition and accompanying documents be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. BRENT asked for a division of the motion, and that the question be first taken on laying the petition on the table.

The question was so divided accordingly, and the House ordered the petition to be laid on the table.

The question then recurred on printing the petition and document; and on this question a debate arose, in which Messrs. WRIGHT, FORSYTH, BARTLETT, CLARKE, STORES, HAMILTON, WEEKS, LIVINGSTON, FLOYD, and BRENT took part.

The question was then taken on printing the memorial of Mr. Vandeventer, with the documents accompanying it, and decided in the negative, without a count.

Commercial Intercourse with Sweden.

The House, on motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BARTLETT in the chair, on the bill to exempt Swedish and Norwegian vessels and cargoes from discriminating duties.

The bill was read by sections.

Mr. FORSYTH said he should be glad to know why any legislation in this case was necessary, further than to return the duties that had already been paid since the expiration of the treaty. The act of 1824 placed Swedish vessels on the same footing with our own, and he could not see what more was necessary.

Mr. TOMLINSON (Chairman of the Committee of Commerce) said that the committee had considered this case as not coming within the express provisions of the act of 1824, and hence the necessity for legislation. The treaty with Sweden had expired in September last, and on its expiration, the discriminating duties suspended by it revived of course. They had been abolished by the treaty, but, when that treaty expired, the Government of Sweden, through its Chargé des Affaires here, had informed this Government that Sweden would continue to observe all the provisions of the former treaty till a new treaty could be formed. The act of 1824 was prospective; but this case did not fall strictly within its terms. Hence, the subject had been referred by the President of the United States to the consideration of Congress, under the belief, it is presumed, that legislation was necessary. The stipulations of the treaty extended to the colony of St. Bartholomews, and provided that there should be a reciprocity and equality of duties between vessels owned not only by citizens of the mother country, but also by the naturalized inhabitants of that colony of Sweden. It was doubted whether the act of 1824 embraced this case. In our existing relations with another Government, in respect to the colonial trade, it was important that this point should be put beyond doubt, and that Swedish vessels from the island of St. Barts should be admitted into the United States free from discriminating duties, in order to secure to our vessels a like privilege in that island. As Congress was in session, it was, by the committee, deemed expedient that the suspending of the law should be the act of Congress, rather than the act of the Executive.

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Tacubaya Mission.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. FORSYTH said he was entirely satisfied by the explanation of the gentleman from Connecticut, and he would now offer an amendment, in the form of a new section, to the bill.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act concerning navigation, and of the acts imposing duties of tonnage or impost on vessels, and articles imported in vessels into the United States, as are contrary to the provisions of the treaty between the United States and the kingdom of Denmark, the ratifications whereof were exchanged on the 10th day of August, 1826, shall be, from and after the date of the ratification of the said convention, and during the continuance thereof, deemed and taken to be of no force or effect."

The President of the United States had sent to the House two other treaties, one with Denmark, and the other with the Republic of Central America. These treaties stipulate for an alteration in the Navigation Laws of the United States, the Laws of Tonnage and Imposts. He did not see that the Committee of Commerce presented to the House any proposition for an act of legislation on this subject, and yet both of these treaties were now in a course of execution. The Navigation Law of the country was openly disregarded, as well as the laws imposing discriminating duties. Now, according to a solemn decision by the House of Representatives, the power to suspend these laws does not belong to the President of the United States. He cannot alter the commercial laws of the country, imposing duties and imposts, without the consent of this House. This matter had long since been solemnly argued, and definitively settled. If the amendment which had now been offered should be adopted by the House, he would then offer another, for the execution of the other treaty.

The question was now taken on Mr. FORSYTH'S amendment, and it was negatived by a large majority.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, February 14.

General Appropriation Bill—Tacubaya Mission.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. LATHROP in the chair, on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1827.

The question arising on agreeing to the item appropriating 9,000 dollars for an outfit for a Minister to succeed Mr. Anderson, at the Congress of Tacubaya—

Mr. FORSYTH asked the chairman to put the question on filling the blank in the clause just read, with $9,000. By a document lying on the tables, it appeared that there was an unexpended balance of 31,000 dollars of the appropriation of the last year of 60,000 dollars. Mr. F. supposed an outfit had been paid to Mr. Sergeant, and one to Mr. Anderson. The proposed outfit is for Mr. Poinsett, our Minister at Mexico. The fact that this gentleman had been selected for this mission, had been stated in the public papers. We have just appropriated the sum for his salary as Minister to Mexico, where he is to remain Minister. If this allowance of a full outfit is to be made, there is a sufficient sum at the discretion of the President for its payment. The unexpended balance is chargeable with 9,000 dollars, the salary of Mr. Sergeant, 2,000 dollars salary of Secretary of Legation, add 9,000 for an outfit to Mr. Poinsett, and there is still a balance of 11,000 dollars of the sum originally appropriated. It being apparent that a further appropriation of money was unnecessary, Mr. F. was at a loss to understand the reason of the insertion of this item in the appropriation bill. It might be intended to procure an expression of the opinion of Congress on the amount of the outfit to be allowed, or on the policy of the transfer of our Ministers from Panama to Tacubaya. If either object was contemplated, Mr. F. was unwilling to legislate to afford pretext for a conclusion, however erroneous, that the Representatives of the people were satisfied with the course pursued.

Of the amount of outfit, the President, by the act of 1810, was authorized to determine. He would leave him to exercise this power on his own responsibility. That act permits a year's salary to be given as an outfit—does not require it to be given; the President may give as much less as he chooses—he cannot give more. In the present case, Mr. F. did not think that a full allowance was justifiable. Tacubaya is within two leagues (six miles) of Mexico, where the Minister resides. The travelling thither, and temporary short residences, as circumstances might require, could not be attended with serious inconveniences or great expense. He would be unwilling, therefore, to do any thing by which the public should be led to believe that we thought the appropriation proper. Yet, if the President, on his responsibility, allowed a full outfit, Mr. F. certainly would not make it hereafter a subject of complaint.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that the explanation furnished by the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Cook,) had not satisfied his mind that it was necessary or expedient to make this appropriation of 9,000 dollars, for an outfit to Mr. Poinsett, who is associated with Mr. Sergeant in this new mission at Tacubaya.

First, it is not necessary to appropriate the money, because there is yet left unexpended enough of the 40,000 dollars appropriated at the last session of Congress, to defray the expenses of the Panama mission. If you will allow to Mr. Sergeant his whole year's salary of $9,000 and outfit $9,000, equal to $18,000; to Mr. Anderson his outfit, $9,000; to the Secretary of Legation, $2,000—in all, $29,000; there yet remains the sum of 11,000 dollars, subject to the disposition of the President of the United States. Surely this sum ought to be sufficient to pay the contingent expenses of our Ministers, and Mr. Poinsett's extraordinary expenses for the temporary change which he may find it necessary to make during the session of this congress of nations.

The gentleman from Illinois tells us, that the balance of the appropriation of 40,000 dollars, made at the last session, will be required to pay Mr. Poinsett's salary as Minister associated with Mr. Sergeant in this new mission. This certainly is not correct. By the previous section in this bill, we have appropriated 9,000 dollars for the salary of a Minister at Mexico, who is Mr. Poinsett. Does the gentleman contemplate the payment of a double salary and an outfit to Mr. Poinsett, equal to 27,000 dollars per annum? or does he intend the House to understand that the President will send a new Minister to Mexico? When Mr. Anderson was appointed to the Congress at Panama, he was still regarded as the Minister to Colombia.

But, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. W.,) I am, in the second place, against the expediency of allowing this outfit of $9,000. Mr. Poinsett has been required to represent, together with Mr. Sergeant, this nation, in the Congress of Tacubaya, a distance from his present residence of nine miles, and you propose to give him, by this bill, 9,000 dollars besides his salary of 9,000 dollars, for the trouble, expense, and inconvenience he may be subjected to, by a travel of nine miles; and this is done under the name of an outfit. So far as the Minister of Mexico shall be subject to any extraordinary expense, I am willing that a sufficient sum be appropriated to meet that expense, if the 11,000 dollars be not thought equal to that object.

Mr. FORSYTH admitted that he had erred in stating the amount of last year's appropriation: it was $40,000, and not $50,000, as has been supposed. This did not, however, affect his argument, which was founded, not on the sum appropriated, but on the unexpended balance of $31,000. According to his first estimate there was a balance of $11,000, after allowing full outfit to Mr. Poinsett; as Mr. Sergeant's outfit, and Mr. Anderson's, were yet to be paid, the surplus would be $2,000, instead of $11,000. The exact balance could be ascertained, without an examination of the details of the estimate from the Department of State, or the calculations of the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. F. would be glad to see them. By way of retort on the gentleman from Illinois who had set him right about the $40,000, he would correct an error of that gentleman, affecting the result of his own calculation. He had charged the appropriation of the last year with an outfit for a Secretary of Legation—Secretaries of Legations receive no outfits.

Mr. F. said he had been asked, if it could be intended to question the right of the heirs of Mr. Anderson to the amount of an outfit. Certainly not. His representatives are entitled to it. If not paid, it must be paid. That estimable man performed a long and dangerous journey: painful, toilsome, and expensive. He fell a victim to the common disease of the climate into which he was sent to perform public service. Surely these circumstances give a claim to pecuniary rewards, as great as any which could be argued in favor of his nominal associate in the mission—who had remained amusing himself in Philadelphia in attending to his private concerns—who remained at home while the Congress of Panama was in session, and was gone to look for it when it is at an end.

Mr. Cook repeated the statement he had made when last up. The appropriation granted at the last Congress, was $40,000. Of this sum, 36,000 dollars was required for outfit and salary for one year; 2,000 dollars for Secretary, and 2,000 for contingencies, absorbed that sum. The Minister appointed had now gone to his post. He was entitled to $9,000 outfit, and to his salary; at the end of the year $9,000 more. The Minister at Colombia was to receive $9,000, and his Secretary $2,000; this made 29,000 dollars. The heirs of Mr. Anderson were entitled to receive his salary up to the time of his death. Another Minister appointed to succeed him was entitled to his salary of $9,000. This absorbed the whole sum already appropriated. The question now was, whether our Minister at Mexico should have an outfit on going to a new mission at Tacubaya. The gentleman from Kentucky, and the gentleman from Georgia, seemed to proceed on the supposition that an outfit was to be allowed much in the same manner with mileage. So many miles travel, so much outfit; but the Government did not proceed on this principle—they wished the diplomatic services should be performed at as cheap a rate as comported with the respect due to a public representative of the nation. In securing to such a representative the means of appearing with respectability, they consulted the nation's honor; and so sensible was the gentleman from Georgia of the propriety of this principle, that he had, at the last session, avowed it as his opinion, that the salaries allowed by this Government to their Ministers abroad, were insufficient, and ought to be increased. The object of granting an outfit was to enable a public person, who represented the character and honor of his country at the court of a foreign nation, to appear there in a suitable manner; and to do this, it was indispensable that he should conform, in some degree, to the ideas and habits which there prevailed. Those who had had experience on this subject, would be disposed rather to say that 9,000 dollars was too little than too much for this purpose. In the present instance, our Minister at Mexico would have to go into a wilderness country, where no conveniences or accommodations could be procured, but at great expense. When there, he was to meet the representatives of the United Sovereignities of the southern hemisphere. Under circumstances like these, did gentlemen wish that the Minister of the United States should be placed on a humbler footing than those with whom he was to associate? If they did, he could assure them, and so could any one who was acquainted with the high-toned feelings and lofty character of our Minister at Mexico, that he would never consent to degrade his country in the eyes of all the nations of the South. Was this House prepared to say that he should present himself before that Congress without the means of appearing respectable? He asked, especially, the personal friends of Mr. Poinsett, whether they would consent to this! If they were willing to send him penniless on such an errand, or without enough scarce to pay for his board and lodging, let them refuse to grant the appropriation.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Tacubaya Mission.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. McCOR went into a calculation to show that there must be a balance of $11,000 still remaining, out of the $40,000 appropriated for the Panama Mission, at the last session. But whether or no, he could see no great propriety in allowing an outfit of 9,000 dollars for travelling the distance of only nine miles, to attend "a new court." For his part, he never before understood that there was to be any "new court" at Tacubaya, or that travelling nine miles from the City of Mexico, would bring the traveller into "a new country."

Mr. INGHAM said, if there be any one point on which we have a right to demand of the Committee of Ways and Means to give us minute, accurate, and certain information, it is in those matters which depend on calculation; and I do think, said he, they are bound to satisfy the House, before they can expect support, that their calculations are correct; they have been called upon again and again to furnish the items of expenditure charged on the fund of $40,000 appropriated last year, and yet no member seems to understand from the Committee of Ways and Means what those items are; the calculation must certainly be very simple, not involving the slightest difficulty, and yet it is not given. We appropriated last year 40,000 dollars—out of this the following items are to be paid:

Mr. Sergeant's salary and outfit,	$18,000
Mr. Anderson's outfit,	9,000
Secretary's salary,	2,000
Contingencies,	2,000
	<hr/>
	$31,000
Which leaves a balance of	9,000
	<hr/>
	$40,000

We have been told that Mr. Anderson's salary as Minister to Colombia is chargeable on this fund, but we find that provided for in the general appropriation bill.

If, as it would seem, the President has at his disposal an unexpended balance of 9,000 dollars of the appropriations of the last year, why is it necessary to give an additional sum. We ought not to put at the discretion of any officer a larger sum than the public services require; and if we look back into the history of allowances for public Ministers, we shall find some of a very extraordinary character, which will furnish good cause for scrutinizing these appropriations hereafter, and confining them to specific objects. The law fixing the compensation of public Ministers declares that the salary shall be 9,000 dollars a year, and that the outfit shall not exceed one year's salary, which shall be "as a compensation for all his personal services and expenses;" the outfit is placed at the discretion of the President, and it has several times happened that when a Minister was sent on a special mission, the President had agreed to allow him his personal expenses, not to exceed an outfit; but in no case that has come under my notice, has an outfit been allowed, and personal expenses in addition, until the Ghent Mission. There is a class of expenses, called contingencies, of foreign missions, which is always allowed under appropriations for that purpose; these are for messengers to carry despatches, stationery, postage, newspapers, &c., to which has latterly been added, office rent; but, as the law gives the salary and outfit in full "compensation for all personal services and expenses," it must be a strained construction of it that would admit all the personal expenses of a Minister to be paid under the head of contingencies, after he had been allowed a full outfit and salary.

Mr. COOK replied, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania thought that the Committee of Ways and Means had not done their duty, and had omitted to give that particular information which the House had a right to demand. He denied the charge. The Committee of Ways and Means had done its duty. It had made a particular statement, and it had stated the truth. The gentleman and his friends had the error on their own side of the House. They all went on the supposition that the salary of Mr. Anderson was paid out of the last year's appropriation; and that the salary of his successor might be used to pay the present outfit. The ground the committee went on was, that money, appropriated for a salary, might not be touched for any other use. If Mr. Poinsett shall accept his appointment at Tacubaya, he cannot touch his salary as Minister to Mexico. The whole must be paid out of the appropriation of the present year. He did not see how calculations could be plainer than those which had been presented to the House; and gentlemen, especially when they themselves were mistaken, should at least be temperate in their manner. The appropriation for salaries was a specific appropriation, and was not left to be abused by the Executive at his discretion.

H. OF R.]

Tacubaya Mission.

[FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Mr. McCoy remarked that this was mere matter of opinion. He thought the gentleman might satisfy the House, if he would show out of what fund the salary of Mr. Anderson was to be paid. As to Mr. Sergeant's salary, it did not commence till October last.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that the gentleman from Georgia had stated, as the question, that which was not before the House. The question was, whether the House should make the appropriation before the President of the United States could be allowed to pay Mr. Poinsett, or whether there must be authority of law before he could be paid? The present appropriation, it would be recollected, did not come under the general law of outfits.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the appropriation, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 71, noes 67; when the committee rose and reported.

THURSDAY, February 15.

The Mission to Tacubaya.

The House then proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday; being the appropriation of 9,000 dollars for an outfit to the Minister to succeed Mr. Anderson at the Congress of Tacubaya.

Mr. CARSON said he was opposed to the Panama Mission at the last session of Congress, and had seen nothing to diminish his objections to it, but much to increase them. The policy of the measure was not now under discussion, but it came before us again on a proposition to appropriate $9,000 for an outfit to the Minister appointed to go from the City of Mexico to the village of Tacubaya; in other words, to give a gentleman $9,000 for travelling about nine miles, who, at the same time, would be under pay at the rate of $9,000 per annum. I am against the appropriation. This mission has cost us enough already. Forty thousand dollars were appropriated at the last session, and the present sum is to be in addition to that. Besides that, the sloop of war Hornet has been fitted out to carry Mr. Sergeant to Vera Cruz, who had already been paid $9,000 to carry himself; and men acquainted with naval affairs say, that the expense of fitting up this vessel, and keeping her at sea the length of time necessary to carry out Mr. Sergeant and return, cannot be less than from $30,000 to $50,000. Here, then, is nearly $100,000 already expended on this abortive mission, which is enough, in my opinion, to be wasted on one of the idlest projects that ever was conceived. So much for the expense; but I wish to remark upon the strange inconsistency which I have witnessed upon this subject in the short space of two sessions, from the leading supporters of this measure. At the last session, when certain movements were made in this House to stimulate the tardy deliberations of the Senate, and a call was made upon the President for certain information, gentlemen said the information was indispensable to enable us to judge of the propriety of the appropriation; now, the same gentlemen hold us bound to vote the appropriations without the least exercise of judgment on our part. They say the President and Senate have instituted the mission, and that we, the representatives of the people, are bound to vote the money to carry it into effect. As one of these representatives, I protest against such doctrine. We are the peculiar, and I might say, the exclusive representatives of the people in matters of revenue. Money bills must originate in this House. Every new tax must have its origin here; but what would become of this right to originate taxes and money bills, if we are bound to raise all the money which the President and Senate may think proper to demand? Certainly we should have no option. We should no longer be voluntary agents, to raise money or not, according to our own judgment, but mere machines in the hands of the President and Senate, to be worked at their pleasure. Sir, I dislike the manner of carrying on this mission as much as the mission itself. We all remember the loud complaints of the President and all his advocates, because the Senate took time to deliberate last Winter. We were then instructed to believe that the most calamitous consequences would result, if the mission did not depart forthwith; yet, when it was sanctioned by the Senate, and $40,000 voted by us, and a ship of war prepared at a great cost, the mission lingered at home for seven or eight months, and two of its members engaged in important elections as the Administration candidates. One, unhappily, lost his life by being ordered to a sickly place to wait for his colleague, which colleague was electioneering, not for the Congress at Panama, but for the Congress at Washington city; and when this election was lost, then, and not till then, was he ordered to depart. We are informed, that one of these gentlemen did not receive his salary till near the time of his departing, but it is admitted that the other did. Yes, sir, it is admitted that the Secretary of the Panama Mission was receiving his $2,000 a-year, while engaged in an active canvass in New York, as the administration candidate for Governor of that State. But, sir, where is the invitation to this Congress at Tacubaya? Mr. Poinsett, in his despatch to the Government, presented among our documents, and now on our tables, tells us, that by the Treaty of Union, League, and Perpetual Confederation, signed at Panama, new invitations were to be given to the neutral and friendly powers, to send Ministers to Tacubaya. The Confederacy of course were to send without invitations. Now, sir, we have had no such invitation; and if we are to be considered as neutral and friendly, we ought to have it; if as a confederate, the people of the United States ought to know it. It would be a pity that our Minister, in his laced coat and waving plumes, should be told that he had no invitation, and must retire.

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Tacubaya Mission.

[H. OF R.]

I say, Mr. Speaker, that we are not invited to this new Congress, and I think it probable that the Congress itself will never be found. Look at the changes which are going on in South America. Two of the republics which invited us a year ago, have ceased to exist as such. Colombia and Upper Peru have lost their constitutions, their form of government, and one of them its very name. Bolivar commands them, and it is immaterial by what title, whether liberator, or dictator, or imperator; he is, in fact, the king of Colombia and Peru, and more absolute than any monarch in Europe. It was with this man that the project of a Congress at Panama originated, and with a change of destiny in him the project may die. Why not wait for the promised invitation? Why not wait for the result of Bolivar's operations against the freedom of his country? Why this haste, after so much delay? Sir, I see nothing but waste and folly in this mission. Every step is a new expense. Not less than four outfits of $9,000 each to be paid, and, as Mr. Poinsett vacates his present appointment to receive another, he, or his successor, will be entitled to another on repairing to Mexico. I trust that some friend of the President will be able to show that there is some object in this expenditure of $100,000. I call upon them to show how the people are benefited by it to the amount of one cent.

Mr. BRENT said he had risen for the purpose of correcting the gentleman from North Carolina. (Mr. CARSON.) That gentleman had said that the Government had been at the expense of fitting out a public vessel to carry out Mr. Sergeant to Vera Cruz, and that the cost of this expedition could not be less than from thirty to forty thousand dollars. Now, if the gentleman would take the trouble of looking at the documents from the Navy Department, he would see that no vessel was fitted out for this purpose. The vessel employed was already in the service; her cruising ground was in those seas; and all that was done was to require the commander to touch at Vera Cruz, and land the Minister.

[Mr. CARSON admitted that he might have been incorrect as to the particulars of this subject. It would be remembered that he had expressly said, his information respecting it was derived from others.]

Mr. BRENT went on to state, that the gentleman was incorrect in another respect. He had said that he considered it necessary to state to the people the great expenses to which the President had run the nation by not sending the Ministers in proper time to the Congress of Panama. The gentleman ought to remember, that it was the persevering opposition of himself and others who acted with him, that was the cause of this delay. They had trammelled the President, and had kept on opposing and discussing the measure, until at length the Congress of Panama had adjourned. It adjourned to meet at Tacubaya, and to what place could the Ministers have been sent, sooner than the President did send them? The fault must rest with the gentleman and his friends, if the country suffered any injury from the delay. It could not be charged on the Administration. As applied to them, the gentleman himself could not but know that the accusation was unfounded, and this the nation knew also.

Mr. BURGESS said he did not often call on the patience of the House, and he hoped, therefore, they would the more readily give him their attention. I will not long detain you, sir, (said Mr. B.,) for our time is too important to be consumed in protracted debate. The question before the House is, Shall the blank in this bill of appropriation be filled with nine thousand dollars? The object of placing this money at the disposal of the President, is, to enable him to compensate Mr. Poinsett, now Minister residing at Mexico, for new expenditure in the new services allotted to him, as Minister to the Congress of American nations about to assemble at Tacubaya. He will continue to hold his station of Minister Plenipotentiary at Mexico, and perform the duties of Ambassador to this Congress, in addition to those of that station. He fills a place made vacant by a Providential dispensation, in the death of Mr. Anderson, late Minister Plenipotentiary of this nation to the Republic of Colombia, and Diplomatic Minister from these United States to this same Congress of Panama. Mr. Sergeant is colleague with him in this important mission. This last gentleman receives an outfit of nine thousand dollars, with a like sum for his per annum salary. Mr. Anderson had the same outfit and the same salary; for, although he lost his life before the close of the year, yet it is presumed that as he had entered on his mission, and died in the service of the United States, these sums will be paid to his family. The Secretary of Legation, Mr. Rochester, has entered upon service in this mission, and his salary will be a charge on the appropriation of last year. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina has objected to the filling this blank with this or any other sum, because the mission is useless, and will, as it already has, lead to a great expenditure of the people's money. This question is not now before the House; for the Executive branch of the Government determined, last year, and the people were highly gratified with the determination, to send this mission; and this House, in aid of that determination, voted to appropriate the sum of forty thousand dollars, on account of this mission. The only question is, therefore, has this appropriation been exhausted? and if it has not, can the Executive convert that unexpended balance to the furnishing Mr. Poinsett? or must there be a new appropriation for this new purpose?

This fund is already charged with two outfits of nine thousand dollars each; two salaries of like amount; together with the salary of the Secretary of Legation, two thousand dollars; leaving only a sum equal to this last item to cover all contingent expenses of this mission. These expenses have been always charged by our foreign Ministers; and the Government have, from its commencement, always allowed and paid them. They have, for each Minister, amounted to about one thousand five hundred dollars a year. No part of the appropriation of last year, therefore, remains unexpended. For, although thirty thousand dollars are now in the treasury, being part of that fund, yet the whole is due to those who have been employed in that mission. If, however, it were all there, it has been clearly shown by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) that the Executive could not apply it to this purpose, nor meet this new expenditure, without a new appropriation for this purpose: for, if no money can be paid for any purpose, without an appropriation by law, much less can money, appropriated to one purpose, be, by the Executive, diverted from that purpose, and converted to another. The appropriation of last year was made to cover the contingent expenditures, the outfits, and salaries, of Mr. Sergeant, Mr. Anderson, and their Secretary of Legation. If, therefore, Mr. Poinsett, the new Ambassador to this Congress, be paid at all, it must be by a new appropriation.

Mr. CARSON rose again, to reply to the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. BRENT.) He said, that the gentleman from Louisiana had undertaken to correct him on matters of fact, and had proved his own want of knowledge in the attempt. He had ventured an excuse for the Administration in not sending out the Panama Mission during the last summer, and attributed the delay to the opposition, who had consumed the time in debate. But such was not the fact. The Panama Congress did not meet until the 22d of June, and the mission had been sanctioned by the Senate as early as the middle of March, and the appropriations were made in April, and might have been made earlier, if the time of the House had not been consumed by the supporters of the Administration in landing the measure, and waiting for the President's labored reply to the Senate, which fell dead-born from his mouth. There was time enough for the Ministers to have got to Panama at the opening of the Congress, and certainly before the treaties were signed, which was done late in July. But they neither got there, nor attempted to get there. They never started. They did not know whether they had time enough or not. They remained in this country, and went to electioneering; and it does not become the President, or his supporters, to say they had not time to go there, when they made no attempt to use the time which lay upon their hands. If Mr. Sergeant had been elected to Congress, and Mr. Rochester Governor of New York, they would not have gone at all: for the offices would have been double and incompatible, and to hold both would have been unconstitutional. The fact of being candidates, and of waiting until the elections were over, and themselves defeated, proves that they would not have gone if they had been elected; and further proves, that they waited for the elections to be over, and not for the Opposition to cease speaking. The gentleman from Louisiana has undertaken to set me right about the voyage of the Hornet, and the expense of sending her to Vera Cruz with Mr. Sergeant. Unhappily for himself, he has missed the facts in both attempts to correct me. I asserted, that the Hornet went to Vera Cruz, and returned to the United States: he alleges, that she merely touched at Vera Cruz and continued her voyage according to her original destination. Such a peremptory statement called upon me for a re-examination of the grounds of my knowledge, and I now re-affirm what I first said. The Hornet did not proceed from Vera Cruz upon any other voyage. She returned direct to Norfolk, having been fitted out and sent to sea for the sole purpose of carrying Mr. Sergeant to Vera Cruz, who had been previously paid 9,000 dollars outfit to carry himself there, and was under pay at the rate of 9,000 dollars per annum. The expense of this naval transportation is to me unknown. The gentleman from Louisiana undertakes to controvert my statement of it; but after the proofs of fallibility which he has given in other particulars, it is not for me to yield any thing to him in this instance. My statement is bottomed upon the opinions of naval men, and old members, who believed that an expense of from $30,000 to $50,000 must have been incurred in sending the Hornet upon this service. I return, then, to my first assertion, that this abortive mission has cost the United States nearly 100,000 dollars, and cannot bring them one cent's worth of benefit in return! And am I to be contradicted for telling the people these things? Am I to be denounced for exposing to their view such a profligate waste of their money? Am I to be called a "factious oppositionist" because I

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Tacubaya Mission.

[H. OF R.]

will not vote these enormous sums? I have read such denunciations, and I despise them. They will not prevent me from doing my duty; they will not prevent me from looking into the measures of the Administration; they will not prevent me from holding up to the indignation of the people a vain, fantastic, ridiculous, and abortive mission, which has cost them one hundred thousand dollars!

Mr. BREXID said he was sorry any misunderstanding should have occurred as to facts. The gentleman must have misunderstood him: for he would not suppose he wished to misrepresent him. He had not stated that the Congress of Panama had adjourned during the period of the discussion in this house, but only that the discussion had produced a delay which prevented our Ministers from attending that Congress. The Congress at Panama adjourned to Tacubaya during the Summer. The Executive already knew that it was so to adjourn when the bill passed this House providing for the mission. As to the Hornet, the report of the Secretary of the Navy would show that that vessel was already in commission and under cruising orders.

Mr. DWIGHT said, that the Committee of Ways and Means, in making the report of an outfit for the Minister to Tacubaya, had been governed by no other considerations than those of the duty they owed the country in supporting its important diplomatic relations abroad, and this implied an obligation on their part to the House, to explain the necessity of the intended appropriation, and the consequences, should the appropriation be refused to that mission, which had so recently received the sanction of the other branch of the Legislature.

It was a mistake in gentlemen to suppose that the Committee of Ways and Means felt any other anxiety on the subject than that which resulted from a desire to fulfil its own duty in presenting the question to the House. When they had presented to the House the information upon which it was required to act, they had done all that could be required of them, and the action of the House upon that information would, and ought to be, entirely satisfactory to them. He would observe, however, that at the time the specific sum now in the bill was recommended by the committee as an outfit to the Minister to Tacubaya, neither the committee nor the House could have known that the gentleman who then represented this country at the court of Mexico would be required to represent it also at the Congress of Tacubaya. The President had thought proper to nominate that gentleman; the Senate had confirmed the nomination; and, so far from this being bad economy, as some gentlemen seemed to suppose, it was apparent that if any gentleman now in the country had been nominated, we should be called upon to appropriate for this object 18,000 dollars, instead of the outfit proposed. The present Minister could only receive one year's salary for his services on both the missions, whereas any other person would have been entitled to a salary and an outfit. Gentlemen, then, he was persuaded, would see in the proposed arrangement, that just regard to a wise and frugal expenditure of the public money, which some had unjustly suggested the absence of.

In reference to the unexpended appropriation of last year, he insisted that gentlemen who had alluded to that, as a fund out of which the present outfit could be taken, were entirely mistaken, both as to the balance of the fund itself, and the operation of law in regard to that fund. It was true that forty thousand dollars had been appropriated at the last session, for the mission to Panama, and that the Congress at Tacubaya was but an adjourned meeting of the Ministers to the former one.

But gentlemen could, for themselves, consult the provisions of the appropriating act of 1824, and they would see that the sum therein appropriated, was set apart to the particular objects enumerated in the act. There were two outfits and two salaries, each of $9,000, making

	$36,000
Salary of Secretary, - - - -	2,000
Contingent sum, - - - -	2,000
Making	$40,000

Now, if it should appear that no outfit remained of that appropriation, out of which the present sum could be paid, gentlemen must admit the propriety of the present appropriation, or be reduced to the necessity of denying altogether the expediency of giving to Mr. Poinsett any additional compensation for the new and arduous duties imposed upon him by this additional mission. Does any outfit remain of that appropriation, he would ask? An outfit and salary had been paid to Mr. Sergeant; and unless gentlemen would be guilty of refusing to Mr. Anderson, or his heirs, just compensation for his efforts to make the journey from Colombia to Panama, in which he sacrificed his fortune, his health, and finally his life, they cannot pretend there is any thing left of that appropriation out of which this outfit can be paid. He need not remind gentlemen that the law forbids money appropriated to one object to be diverted to another. This was a salutary principle; and if any thing remained of the appropriation alluded to, it would pass to the surplus fund. If any thing does remain, it must be a part of that which was appropriated for a salary, and cannot now be taken for an outfit. He assumed that Mr. Anderson was paid his outfit; if not, it can make no difference, as he was unquestionably entitled to it, and it may be claimed by his heirs or legal representatives.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said he never was in the habit of opposing appropriations which he considered necessary to the due administration of public affairs; but he could not consider the present as such an appropriation. Could it be that Tacubaya, at only three leagues distant from the ancient City of Mexico, was situated in a new country? Could it possibly be necessary to provide nine thousand dollars to meet the expense of travelling nine miles? To him it appeared wholly unnecessary; and believing this, he was opposed to the appropriation.

Mr. BLAIR said, that the real question before the House was, were we now satisfied that such hardships existed in Mr. Poinsett's case as to justify the indirect repeal of the act of Congress, passed in the year 1810, so far as it operates against allowing to him an outfit? It will be recollected that that act only allows to a Minister an outfit "upon his going from the United States to a foreign country," in that character. Mr. Poinsett is not going from the United States to a foreign country, and cannot legally receive an outfit, whilst that act of Congress remains in force. I have been led to inquire into the circumstances in which Mr. Poinsett will be placed on his assuming the new station conferred on him, as well as the expenses incident to that change; and I can see nothing that would justify excepting his case from the general operation of the act in question. Mr. B. said he would inquire what gave rise to the authority of allowing to a Minister an outfit? Surely, it was for the purpose of enabling him to defray the expenses incident upon his travel to the foreign court. Can it, then, be seriously said, that the same consideration should be paid to Mr. Poinsett for travelling ten miles, that you pay to other Ministers who leave the United States, and are subjected to the expense of travelling thousands? That would level all distinction between the different services as well as the expenses of our diplomatic agents. But the gentleman from Illinois, who is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, asks, if we do not wish to furnish our Ministers with the means of presenting themselves with becoming dignity at foreign courts? I answer for one that I do; but I am unwilling to do indirectly what I would not do directly and openly, or take from the Treasury by stealth, and add to their salaries under a different name. If the salary is too low to justify our Ministers appearing at foreign courts with becoming dignity, the fair course of legislation would be to amend the general law which governs that salary, and not attempt in an appropriation bill, to make an exception in favor of any individual. If gentlemen who complain of the inadequacy of the salary will propose a general remedy, and satisfy him of the propriety of it, he would go with them, as he was entirely willing to allow the necessary compensation to all public officers; but he would not consent to repeal the provisions of the act of Congress in so indirect a manner as that now contemplated. We have been told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. DWIGHT,) who is a member of the same committee, that the Executive Government has construed the act of 1810, so as to allow an outfit to a Minister, as well upon his removal from one court to another, as "upon his going from the United States to a foreign country," and has called upon this House to sanction that construction. I answer the gentleman, that I cannot adopt that construction, because I believe it to be in direct violation of the plain, positive language of the law, than which none could be more clear. Mr. B. said that very much had been said respecting the accounts of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams, when acting as foreign Ministers, all of which he believed to be without the scope of the present inquiry; and if they proved any thing more than the abuses which had crept in under the custom, of which mention had been made—custom founded upon "Executive construction"—he was incapable of seeing it. The allowance of Mr. John A. King's account, as Chargé, had also been mentioned as another instance of "Executive construction" in the payment of outfit. Believing, as I do, that these examples can furnish no light in deciding upon the present question, I pass them over with the remark, that, as to the account of Mr. King, I will notice it at a more convenient season. Mr. B. said that he wished it distinctly understood that he did not vote against the present proposition to allow to Mr. Poinsett an outfit of nine thousand dollars, on the ground suggested by some gentlemen who had partook in this discussion—that of there being an unexpended balance of the appropriation of the last year, to which the President had the right to resort, if he chose to pay Mr. Poinsett the outfit of a Minister; but because he did not believe him entitled to it, from the very inconsiderable distance to be travelled by him. Mr. B. said that he could not vote for the proposed amendment on another ground, namely, that it was avowed as an increase of salary when, to render it the more palatable, it was called outfit; and because he was unwilling to pay any officer of this Government one thousand dollars per mile for travelling.

Mr. KREMER rose to call the attention of the House to the origin of this appropriation. What was the language held by the advocates of the Panama Mission, when that measure was first introduced? They told us that the expense attending it would be of but short duration, and that all that was valuable would be the result. The child was not to live more than six months, and was then to be hurried to the grave. But now a year has elapsed, and the child is again to be washed and swaddled, at an expense of nine thousand dollars. What do they tell us now? Oh, it becomes a great nation to support its dignity. And is it come to this? Will you, even in the green tree, show your greatness by pride and extravagance? Are we to be told that this House has nothing more to do than to register the acts of the Executive? The President has willed; the Senate have responded; and I am told that therefore the purse of the nation is to be open? He called upon gentlemen to pause before they went on to strike at the very foundation of republican principles. For his own part he never believed in this mission: he never believed that any good would come out of it: he never had believed that the country was to ascend to heaven by sending Ministers to Panama; he never had believed that we should be put at the head of that assembly; it now appeared that we were rather at the tail.

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Colonisation Society.

[H. OF R.]

Government had heard that invitations were to be sent to neutral powers; but they had gone on appointing and sending Ministers, without waiting to receive any invitation. The advocates of Monarchy, however, would maintain that these Ministers were to be furnished in the most profuse manner. They would meet the servants of great monarchs; and they would say to them, my master knows his duty, and furnishes me accordingly. For his part, he still hoped there were some few remains of old-fashioned economy; and that our Ministers would appear as became the Ministers of a plain Republic. The deputation mania seems to have seized the nation—the diplomatic corps kept on increasing, and though some of them, when they left the shores of this country, might be pure in principles, and plain in habits and manners, they soon became corrupted, and came back enamoured with what they had seen in the courts of monarchs. Need he tell any who heard him, that the present Chief Magistrate went away from this country a republican in principles and habits; but while remaining at the Court of St. James, had become so enamoured that he declared the monarchical Government of that country was the most stupendous fabric of human invention; and if any man would now go to the President's house, and look at the grandeur of the furniture, and the luxury which appeared on every side, he would see the effects of a residence at foreign courts. The question was then taken on filling the blank in the bill with 9,000 dollars, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, 45 to 119, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bailey, Badger, Bartlett, Barney, Brent, Burges, Cassedy, Cook, Crowninshield, Davis, Dorsay, Dwight, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Everett, Gurley, Herrick, Ingersoll, Jennings, Kittera, Lathrop, Locke, Martindale, Mattocks, McDuffie, Mercer, Miner, Newton, O'Brien, Pearce, Reed, Sands, Sill, Sprague, Storrs, Strong, Swan, Tomlinson, Tucker of New Jersey, Vance, Varnum, Vinton, Whipple, White, Wood of New York, Woods of Ohio—45.

NAYS.—Messrs. Addams of Pennsylvania, Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Mass., Alston, Anderson, Angel, Archer, Armstrong, Ashley, Baldwin, Bartley, Barber of Conn., Barbour of Virginia, Barringer, Bassett, Baylies, Blair, Boon, Bradley, Bryan, Buchanan, Buckner, Campbell, Carson, Cary, Claiborne, Clarke, Cocke, Conner, Crump, Davenport, Deitz, Edwards of North Carolina, Estill, Findlay of Pennsylvania, Findlay of Ohio, Forsyth, Forward, Foedick, Garnsey, Garrison, Govan, Harris, Harvey, Hasbrouck, Hayden, Henry, Hinea, Hobart, Hoffman, Holmes, Houston, Hugunin, Humphrey, Ingham, Isaacs, Johnson of New York, Johnson of Virginia, Kidder, Krebs, Kremer, Lawrence, Lecompte, Letcher, Little, Long, Marable, Markell, Markley, Marvin of New York, McCoy, McHatten, McKean, McKee, Merriwether, Mervin of Connecticut, Metcalfe, Miller of Pennsylvania, James S. Mitchell, John Mitchell, Mitchell of Maryland, Mitchell, of Tennessee, Moore of Kentucky, Moore of Alabama, Orr, Owen, Peter, Phelps, Plumer, Polk, Powell, Ripley, Rives, Ross, Saunders, Sawyer, Scott, Shannon, Sloane, Stevenson of Pennsylvania, Taliaferro, Taylor of Virginia, Test, Thompson of Geo., Thompson of Ohio, Tucker of South Carolina, Van Horn, Verplanck, Wades, Ward, Weems, Whittemore, Whittlesey, Wickliffe, Williams, Wilson of South Carolina, Wolf, Young—119.

So the House refused the appropriation of 9,000 dollars for an outfit for Mr. POINSETT as Minister to Tacubaya.

Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. COOK then both rose to claim the floor. Mr. COOK obtained it, and moved to fill the blank for this outfit, with $4,500.

On this question, Mr. KREMER demanded the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them, (ayes 25, noes 100,) a sufficient number not requiring them.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the amendment, so as to require this sum to be paid out of the appropriation made for this mission last year.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. DWIGHT and McDUFFIE, and negatived.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. COOK, and carried—ayes 93, noes 48.

So the blank was filled with 4,500 dollars.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.*

FRIDAY, February 16.

Colonisation Society.

Mr. CLARKE presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky, approbatory of the association called "the American Colonization Society," and requesting the representation of that State in Congress to use their best efforts to facilitate the removal of such free people of color as may desire to emigrate to the Colony in Africa, and to ensure to them the protection and patronage of the United States.

Mr. OWEN objected to these resolutions being received, on the ground that the resolutions were not addressed to Congress, but to the Representatives from the State of Kentucky. They were, in this respect, private papers, with which Congress had nothing to do.

The Speaker said, that, had these resolutions referred to a subject not previously under the consideration of Congress, the gentleman from Kentucky must have introduced them by a resolution of his own; but the subject was already before the House, and had been referred to a committee. When this was the case, it had been the settled practice of the House to admit such resolutions from public bodies to be received, and to submit them to committees.

* This proposed mission to Tacubaya, like that to Panama, of which it was to be the continuation, proved abortive: the congress of national deputies to which it was to go, never met.

After a few words of reply from Mr. OWEN, the question was put on the reference, when the ayes were 84, noes 21.

A quorum not having voted, the question was about to be again taken; when

Mr. CLARKE defended the propriety of the reference, contending that there was no difference between the present case and others in which similar resolutions had been laid before the House. He contended that the respect due to a sovereign State demanded that its resolution should at least be heard, and be sent to a committee having the general subject of them under its care.

Mr. OWEN replied, and insisted on the consideration which he had before urged, that there was nothing in these resolutions which directed them to this House, or presented to it any subject of legislation. For the House to act when it was not called upon, would, in his opinion, be a disrespectful interference between the Legislature of a State and her Representatives. It was not his intention to express any opinion on the subject-matter of these resolutions.

Mr. LITTLE advocated the reception of these resolutions. He had himself presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, which, though not directly addressed to Congress, had nevertheless been received, and referred to a committee. He thought that a deliberate expression of the sentiments of any public body, especially one so respectable as the Legislature of a State, on a subject under consideration by the House, ought to be treated with respect, and that to refuse its reception, would indicate a want of respect for the source from whence it proceeded.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said, that he hoped the gentleman from Alabama would not press his objection. The course in these cases has been sufficiently settled, by the acquiescence of the House. As one example, he referred to the famous Missouri question, on which occasion, resolutions had been received, not only from State Legislatures, but from other public bodies, expressive of their opinions of that controversy.

The question was then taken on the reference of the resolution, and carried without a division.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware presented resolutions entered into by the General Assembly of the State of Delaware, of similar import to those presented by Mr. CLARKE; which were referred to the same committee as the others were referred to.

Georgia Militia Claim.

The House then, on motion of Mr. COOK, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BARTLETT in the chair, on the Military Appropriation Bill; and the question being on the following amendment, moved yesterday by Mr. VANCE:

"For the settlement of the claims of the militia of Georgia, for services rendered during the years 1792, '3, and '4, agreeably to the estimate of Constant Freeman, and to be paid under the sanction of the Secretary of War, one hundred and twenty-nine thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars and sixty-six cents:

[A debate took place on the adoption of this amendment, in which Messrs. Clarke, Thompson of Georgia, Burges, McCoy, Williams, Haynes, and Dwight took part.]

The committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended.

MONDAY, February 19.

Canal around the Muscle Shoals.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing a survey and examination of the Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee River, with a view to the location of a Canal.

Mr. MOORE said, in offering this resolution, he would ask the indulgence of the House for a single moment only, whilst he attempted to recommend the subject of this resolution to their favorable consideration. The improvement of the navigation of the Tennessee River, at the point contemplated, (said he,) will be deemed an object of the very last importance, not only to the State of Alabama, but likewise to those of Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Mississippi, Louisiana, and the western part of Virginia. Immediately after the passage of the law of 1824, authorizing the President to procure the necessary plans and estimates upon the subject of roads and canals, the delegations of the States of Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama addressed a joint communication to Mr. Monroe relative to the importance of this improvement in a national point of view. They received a reply from Mr. Calhoun, the then Secretary of War, stating the President was fully impressed with its importance, and that he viewed this as justly belonging to the first class of objects to which the attention could be directed, in the execution of the law to which I have referred. At each subsequent session of Congress, I have urged the consideration of this subject upon the attention of the present Secretary of War. I presume that objects of greater magnitude have heretofore claimed his consideration, but we hope the time has now arrived, when this subject will engage the attention of that Department. The State of Alabama, it is true, is among the youngest sisters received into the Federal family, but we hope none the less respectable, nor are her legitimate claims upon the General Government to be postponed or altogether defeated upon this account; and I would fondly hope, that as from this circumstance, her own resources must be more limited, her claim upon this Government, for her parental and benign aid in the prosecution of this work, would be strengthened and supported. This may justly be said to be an object purely national in its character, and within the contemplation of the law which has been the basis of the system of Internal Improvement which has been prosecuted. From information which can be relied upon, I am authorized to state, that from fifty to fifty-five thousand bales of cotton descend the Tennessee, through the Muscle Shoals, annually, and that the cost of transportation, the distance of from twenty-five to thirty miles only, is frequently fifty cents per bale. Thus, it seems that the citizens of this section of country pay the enormous tax of more than twenty-seven thousand dollars, for the transportation of their product the trifling distance of twenty-five or thirty miles, to say nothing of the risk in damage and total loss which frequently occurs by boats being stove, &c.

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Liberia Agency.

[H. OF R.]

WEDNESDAY, February 21.

Territorial Governors.

Mr. CONWAY Delegate from Arkansas, submitted for consideration the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing some competent persons to discharge the duties of Governor and Secretary of the Arkansas Territory, in the absence of the Governor and Secretary of said Territory, who are alone authorized, by existing laws, to perform said duties.

Mr. CONWAY remarked, that it was entirely from a sense of duty to his constituents, that he offered the resolution which he had just submitted to the consideration of the House. Last Summer the President of the United States granted permission to Governor Izard, as he had been informed, to visit Philadelphia this Winter, for the purpose of attending to his private business. In October, he believed it was, the Governor left the territory, and left Mr. Crittenden, the Secretary, to discharge the duties of the Executive Department. This morning he had received letters from the territory, informing him that the Secretary and acting Governor set out on the 9th of January, for this place, and complaining that there was no one in the country authorized to discharge the duties of Secretary or Governor. His object in offering the resolution before the House, was to bring the subject before Congress, that a law might be passed to guard against any evil which might grow out of a similar state of things in future. It will be recollected, by at least some of the members of this House, that the Governor and Secretary were both absent in the Winter of 1822-'24, and that the Indians availed themselves of that opportunity to kill several citizens of the Territory. He alluded to Major Walborne, and several other persons who were killed by the Osage Indians. The citizens in a part of the territory, are in a great degree dependent upon the mercy of the Indians, at all times, for their safety. In the absence of the only persons who are authorized by law to order out the militia for purposes of defence, they are entirely so.

Mr. C. said, that, early in December, he heard of the Governor's departure from the territory, and in compliance with what he then conceived to be his duty, he notified the Secretary of State of the fact; and informed him that the commission of the Secretary of the territory would expire early in the Spring, and that, to prevent an interregnum in the Government, it would be necessary to reappoint him in time for his new commission to reach him, before the old one expired. He was accordingly reappointed by the President, and his commission transmitted to him by mail. In November last, Mr. C. observed, he saw Mr. Clay in Philadelphia, and learned from him, that, some time in October, (I believe it was,) he received a letter from Mr. Crittenden requesting permission to visit Washington, and that he had granted the request; but in a few days he learned that the President had given the Governor leave of absence, and he then wrote to Mr. Crittenden that it would be improper for the Governor and Secretary to be absent at the same time; and that the permission to leave the territory granted to him by his former letter, was necessarily countermanded. It may be, that Mr. Crittenden never received Mr. Clay's second letter, and that he has left the territory under the impression that he had the will of the Government to do so. Be that as it may, all will agree that it is necessary that some persons should remain in the territory to discharge the duties of Governor and Secretary, and he hoped the Committee on the Territories would immediately report a bill to correct the evils complained of. Before I sit down, said Mr. C., I take occasion to repeat, that it is entirely from a sense of duty to my constituents, that I bring the subject before the House. They have complained to me of the absence of the officers appointed to govern them; and I should not perform my duty here, if I were to neglect to communicate their complaints to this House.

The resolution was agreed to without a division.

Liberia Agency.

Mr. FORSYTH wished the sense of the committee on the appropriation of 86,710 dollars for the African agency, and asked for the estimate on which this appropriation is founded.

Mr. COOK sent the estimates to the Chair, which were then read.

Mr. FORSYTH asked if the claim of the Marshal of Georgia, which, as appears by a note, had been examined and refused, had been re-examined and found correct.

Mr. COOK said he understood that this claim had been examined, and reduced considerably.

Mr. FORSYTH went into the other items of the estimate, and wished some explanation as to the charge of forty dollars each for the transportation of Africans to Liberia. Others can convey blacks for twenty dollars; why cannot we send them at as cheap a rate? There is an item for the support of twenty-eight Africans at Liberia. The agent says they can support themselves. Why, then, are they to be supported by the United States? There is an appropriation of 2,800 dollars, for an agent and assistant agent. There is no law authorizing these salaries; and he wished to withhold the salaries, and thus get rid of one or both of these officers. He thought the sum was too great to be given for taking care of twenty-eight persons. But there is a sort of sub-agent who also receives payment for superintending these Africans. All this is authorized only by an appropriation of money, and by no other act of legislation. He hoped it would be cut down to the lowest point. The act of 1819 contemplated the transportation of captured Africans to their homes. The act contemplated that they should be left there. What has been the practical construction? Only one of these persons, according to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, had got back to his tribe. It is impossible to take them back through impenetrable forests, and over dangerous rivers and deserts. They became, then, part of the Mesurado establishment, live at the expense, and under the protection of the United States. This act of 1819 has been made the instrument to carry into effect the views of a society to establish a colony at Liberia, contrary to the wishes and opinions of Congress. It appears, from the report of the Secretary, that there is a colony of free blacks which has sprung from this origin.

By a contract with the Department, under the act of 1819, forty laborers were sent to Africa to prepare for these Africans. This step was taken to enable the Colonization Society to get a foothold with the money of the United States. The first colony was unfortunate. A negotiation was made by the agent, aided by an officer of the Navy. It was a negotiation like all others which are made where one party is a civilized and powerful nation, and the other a weak, miserable, ignorant, and wandering tribe. Lands were purchased and occupied. In a subsequent war, hundreds of the inhabitants have been killed; a fort was erected by an officer of the United States, and arms and ammunition were provided. The money of the United States was then put into the hands of the agent, who held the double office of Agent of the United States and Agent of the Society; and he hired the colonists to work for the twenty-eight Africans; he did not hire them to eat for them, although he might have done so. The next step was to declare war, in order to put down the slave trade; and because a piratical attack was made by a Spanish vessel, some poor sick

Spaniards on shore were taken prisoners. Being no charge against them, they were released; and the agent, with great liberality, after taking away their property, gave them the forty-three dollars to support themselves, and divided the residue among the captors and the natives. The United States is charged with the balance of this infamous plunder, about five dollars. It is said those Spaniards were grateful for the blessings they received; yet they attempted to make their escape. They were so insensible to those blessings, that they braved the horrors of the forest to escape from them. They were taken by slave factors, and sold to a factory. The agent demanded them. The answer was, that they were purchased. He marched his troops to the scene of action; but did he take and restore them? No: if he had done so, there would have been some excuse. He subverted the factory, and obtained some thirty or forty more protégées for the United States. He did not stop there. Having exercised his military prowess, he was desirous to show his prowess by capturing all establishments. Notwithstanding the surveillance of the colonists, some of these escaped and were captured, and made slaves. But this happened to be a strong factory; and the agent could not have succeeded here, but for the aid of two Colombian schooners, (one commanded by Captain Chase, of Baltimore.) A severe battle was fought, and we are told of the important services of these privateers. He read an extract from the letter complimentary to the Colombians. The consequences may be conceived. This other establishment was subverted by men under the flag of the United States; and this contrary to the opinions of the Government. The Secretary of the Navy understood the act precisely as he (Mr. F.) did; as intended to transport the Africans who are captured. Yet the agent, after being instructed to use all means to send these people home, speaks of desertion. Dr. Peaco calls on the Government to send out a military force, saying, that the colony is in danger. He read part of the letter of Dr. Peaco.

According to the statement of the agent, having by a little address and management connected ourselves with this society, we must now send out a military and naval force to defend the colonists. He held in his hand an answer to one of these splendid military achievements. The agent has asked for a reward for those engaged in this trade. He was not content with the spolia opima found on the field of battle. But this the Secretary could not swallow. In reply, he stated what was the object of the act. It must be obvious, from all the documents, that the object of liberating and restoring the Africans is impracticable. These poor animals are regarded with distrust by everybody. The Colonization Society is not able to support them; and if the Government does not, they must sink. Into this situation we have brought them.

FEBRUARY, 1827.

Liberia Agency.

[H. OF R.]

The reply of the Secretary, while it censures the course of the agent, does not impugn his motives; but says if he had gone no further than to recapture Africans, the Department would have sustained him: but he did go further, and the Society is left to answer for the consequences. The double character which Mr. Ashmun fills, is thus convenient for him. If all is fair, he is Agent of the United States; if foul weather comes, he is the Agent of the Society. He, Mr. F., regarded the situation of the poor creatures who were sent to Mesurado, as more lamentable than that of the free blacks of the United States. We are told, in one of the official reports of the colony, that every colonist receives from one dollar to a dollar and a half a day. Native labor can be obtained for three or four dollars a month. The colonists get the native labor. The liberated Africans are employed in public labor, and get no pay. They are compelled to be satisfied with their rations, and a little tobacco. The recaptured Africans are made hewers of wood and drawers of water. A letter from Dr. Peaco is the authority on which this statement is made.

He wished to know on what principle we are going to send these 180 Africans included in the estimates, to be fed on palm-oil, and cassada and tobacco. But there is an appropriation to support these Africans. Dr. Peaco says, the Africans who have been there for more than a year, and the colonists, support themselves, and are not of much expense. Now, the Africans, for whom this appropriation is asked, have been there more than a year. It is a mere farce to talk of sending home these recaptured Africans. The committee must come to a decision, and cut the connection with this Colonization Society, or obtain the authority of law. He would be justified in calling this a gross abuse, if notice had not been given of this intention. In 1819, the President had thrown out this idea, and said he was going to legislate on the subject. He repelled the inference that all which had been done is legal, because no legislation has been made to act against it. He hoped General Gaines would not be sent to Africa; but, if necessary to send any, he hoped it would be done by the agency of law. He thought we ought to get rid of the 28 Africans, if the colony would not take them into its bosom. It would be better to send them elsewhere, at the public expense.

Look at the possible consequences. Suppose Spain, in her wisdom, should demand satisfaction, and payment of her slaves. She has the right. Can we say this was the act of the colony, when she can reply, it was committed under the sanction of the flag of the United States? Spain will not enforce her claim on us; but she may go and take vengeance on the colony. Menaced by war, the colony cannot support itself. The 28 Africans, and the 180 men to be sent, will perish, or be again captured. If they are sold, and carried into slavery, on whose head will be the responsibility? Not on the head of Congress. We have done nothing to legislate them into this situation. We are not under any obligation to stretch out our hand to prevent these consequences. We will do nothing to punish those who repel the aggressions, and to retaliate on them the outrages which they have practised upon others. The example has been set by the colonists; can they complain if the example be retorted on them? We have thrown away the Bible, and taken the sword, thrown aside persuasion, and adopted force; and our colonists must be prepared for all the consequences of the measure.

Mr. Cook would not go into a reply to the gentleman from Georgia in all his range of remarks, which were as much unlooked for by the House as by him. We are called on to make an appropriation, under an existing law, to carry that law into effect. He reminded the committee that the United States had determined to set her face, and array her moral and physical power against slavery. In fulfilment of the powers confided to the President, and under his construction of the act giving authority, he had sent out armed ships. The act authorizes the President to transport out of the United States all blacks, mulattoes, or persons of color, to place them under an agent, and to make such rules as he may think best for that purpose. Language could not be plainer nor stronger than the language of the act. In fulfilment of the provisions of this act, the President, in 1819, informed the House what he had done. An appropriation of 100,000 dollars was made. This had been exhausted. The power by which this act was passed, is founded on the clause of the constitution which refers to the migration of such persons. We have authority to restore them to their native land; and now the gentleman from Georgia rises to oppose an appropriation, in an appropriation bill, to carry into effect an existing law. He has been pleased to present to us a long history of the difficulties which this colony has encountered, and which, if true, could not affect the present question.

Mr. MERZER did expect that some remarks would be made on this subject by the gentleman from Georgia, but he thought they would have been made on his resolution, which he thought was still on the table, or on some other fit occasion, and not at the end of the session, and at the close of a fatiguing day's business. The appropriation is asked for by the Secretary of the Navy; and the committee has already cut down the appropriation lower than he had expected. But he did not, above all, expect that the gentleman would have given the distorted and discolored picture, which had placed him in a situation in which he was scarcely fit to answer. He did not expect to hear that the soil had been acquired by deception. He did not expect to hear the colony had been settled by fraud, and supported by force of a lawless character. He would endeavor to do all the justice in his power to the subject. In all human efforts, we find imperfection in every step; the exercise of our will is frequently but the choice of evils. What was the state of the slave traffic? Whose voice was first raised, in this House, against it? The act of 1807 provided that the African taken should be placed in the States into which they were taken, and placed at the disposal of the State Legislatures. It was called an act to prohibit the trade; but its effect was merely to change it from a private to a public trade. The State of Georgia passed a law to sell. The State of Georgia, hearing of the existence of a Colonization Society, recognized it in the law, and provided that any slaves, about to be so sold, should be given over to the Society, on the payment of the expenses. The agent who went to announce to these Africans that they should return home, experienced the most perfect pleasure ever enjoyed; these unhappy beings hung around him, and he enjoyed the purest of human satisfaction. It is not necessary that they should be taught the pains of slavery here, to induce the wish to return to their own country. Condemned to die, do they not kiss the halter, because they think it will convey them to their native land. He did not believe that there was a man within the sound of his voice, who would abridge the few enjoyments of this race. We have naturalized all others; but have never naturalized a black; and if such a proposition was made in this House, it would be received with feelings very different from his at this moment. We have brought them here; here it is their interest that they should be brought. If we believe that the sins of the father were visited on the children to the third and fourth generation, if we sincerely repent of this evil, let us eradicate it. He had a list of two hundred and twenty-eight vessels, which carried on this traffic all along the coast of Africa. What American enterprise and capital is engaged in this traffic, he knew not. It was carried on with an art which puzzled the most able judges to develop. We know that this trade has been carried on on American account.

Mr. HAMILTON said he was admonished, by the lateness of the hour, not to do more than to explain an amendment which he meant to offer, but which it was not now in order to offer. He wished we should act in good faith to the Africans, but should not go beyond it. He thought this would meet all the Government is bound to do. We are not bound to support these Africans, after we have transported them to their native land. He thought this would be the first step towards the declaration of a compulsory co-partnership, which has commenced in what he believed to be a serious fraud, although the motives were no doubt good. But it was something like the great contention in Christendom which was found in the days of fanaticism. He did not wish to prevent the co-operators in this scheme from following their own project. He would not quarrel with them on that point. But he was desirous that we should keep in view the meaning of the act; and not suppose, that, by merely sending these Africans to Cape Mesurado, a mere port, we are fulfilling its object. He had wished to submit a proposition with a view to obtain the aid of Great Britain to send these persons to Sierra Leone. At present one hundred and fifty thousand dollars have been expended under this act, and only two of these individuals have kissed their native hearths.

Mr. MEZOMB said, part of this had been expended in the keeping of the slaves in Georgia.

Mr. HAMILTON said he did not include the sum appropriated at the last session. If we do not change our policy in this respect, we shall find that we have planted a troublesome gourd on the shore of Africa, which it will cost much gunpowder, and much of our energy, to support. He believed that the question of the power of Congress to adopt a system of colonies would be involved in this subject. As soon as the great impediment in the avenue of resolutions, the great mountain slide which stopped up the way, he meant the resolution of his friend from North Carolina, should be disposed of, he would offer a resolution on the subject, requesting the President to adopt a course which he would point out, and he would then leave the colony to act for itself. Mr. Ashmun had been called a "military chieftain." He was glad to find this Government patronizing military chieftains. But if another military chieftain should come into power, he would give a lesson to this military chieftain in Africa as to his precise duties, and his privilege to declare war and peace. This hero wants fifty dollars a head, and, while demanding it, he has a law in his pocket, which it requires no Justinian to explain, prohibiting such a conduct. Yet on this man his friend from Virginia pronounces a high eulogium. Mr. Ashmun defeated the object of the Government in a particular point. He brings back these recaptured Africans to hard labor, instead of sending them home; and when they attempt to go home, they are pursued as deserters. The intention of the Government is defeated by this individual. The gentleman had said this man displayed talents worthy of the founder of an empire. For that very reason we do not want him there, where he chooses to take into his own hand the right of making war and peace.

He concluded with stating that he should offer his amendment as soon as it would be in order; and would follow up this with a resolution calling on the President to give information, from which it would be seen whether it be proper to keep up this society.

Mr. WILKINS said: the committee would remember that, at an early stage of this session, before the subject had been offered, or perhaps thought of, in any other quarter, he had respectfully, although unsuccessfully, attempted to draw the attention of Congress to a subject very closely connected with, and intended, had it succeeded, as a substitute for the present sideway appropriation, (as it had been styled,) he had asked to raise a committee to inquire into and report how far it would be expedient to go in aid of the transportation of such free people of color as might wish to go to Liberia, or to other parts of Africa, the land of their fathers, where, under providence, they might not only afford timely but efficient aid to save this little colony of their brethren, but might also find cause to rejoice, even in their day, from beholding around them the comforts of civilization, and the blessings of light and life diffused through their instrumentality. And here he asked the committee, whether thus colonizing the whole coast of Africa would not be more likely to put a stop to the slave trade than the plan now adopted, or any other that could be devised; attended, too, as it would be, with the least possible expenditure of blood or treasure, and, at the same time, would be relieving us from an evil growing out of an intermingling of a free black and slave population, nowhere desirable, everywhere calamitous. He would also embrace this opportunity of reminding an honorable member of the House, who, when he had, on one occasion, respectfully called for a consideration of a certain resolution, demanded a division; that he envied him not for his disposition; that where he intended a mortification, by showing that he stood alone, he had given him reason to rejoice, because it most clearly evinced, what would at all times delight his heart to know, viz: that he had not only sufficient strength offered him, but that he was willing to use it in the conscientious discharge of his duty, however unsupported he might find himself by others. He rejoiced to be able, as he was bold here to declare, that the greatest share of happiness he experienced was derived from those few facts of willing obedience to the directions of that spirit, ever victorious with him, who shall look with honest sincerity within his own breast, for a true and faithful monitor. He had last year refused to vote for the re-appropriation of the unexpected balance of the original $150,000 that had been voted for this object, because he, like the gentleman from Georgia, was then under a mistaken opinion. That honorable member had, however, removed, by his arguments, this day offered the House, every remaining doubt on his mind, and he was now satisfied he ought to vote for the appropriation called for. And why? Because this colony at Liberia—this little handful of men (three or four hundred only)—had so conducted themselves by the authority and advice of those accredited agents of this Government, no matter whether justifiably or unjustifiably offered, that they had become endangered, hourly endangered, from the joint efforts of the natives, and the merciless slave traders; and that their only protection rested on the arms, ammunitions, and rations thus pledged and heretofore afforded them. What is then to be done, sir? Are we, after having been, however unintentionally, the instrument in thus involving them, at once to cut off their only chance of escape, and thereby become their murderers, by leaving them thus situated, to meet inevitable destruction, rather than grant the pittance asked for? He trusted not: at least, he would clear his own skirts of their blood; and, thereby, discharge a duty he owed to God and humanity, by voting for the appropriation.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Mackerel Fishery.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. KREMER said, there was certainly a time for all things; a time to speak, and a time to be silent. He had hoped the committee would rise, and take the bill into the House. Now, as he found his motion for the rising of the committee was not carried, he hoped the committee would excuse him if he said a few words. He did not think that the law should be a sanction for this appropriation, any more than that a wrong, committed many years ago, derived sanctity from age. He thought Mr. Ashmun had about as much purity of motive as the reformer who went to South America to teach religion, with a bible in one hand, and a sword in the other. He had once thought there was disinterestedness in great men; but experience had taught him that this was a mere dream of fancy. David, the pious, tender-hearted little David, sent his captains to the war, while he staid at home with Bathsheba; and ordered Joab to place Uriah in the front of the battle, and not to let him return alive. He looked at the situation of these Africans in their own country, as well as in this country. We say we are all the children of one common parent, that we meet at the communion table, and are fit to go together into the presence of God; but will we allow them to meet us in our own parlors? No; that is another thing. He referred to the course which had been taken on the resolution of Mr. SAUNDERS. It was a simple question, and might have been plainly answered. We were told in this discussion that the freedom of debate had never been assailed.

SATURDAY, February 24.

Mackerel Fishery.

Mr. TOMLINSON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following bill:

"A BILL to authorize the licensing of ships and vessels to be employed in the mackerel fishery.

"Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the thirtieth day of April next, it shall be the duty of the Collector of the District to which any ship or vessel may belong, on an application for that purpose, by the master or owner thereof, to grant a license for carrying on the mackerel fishery, to such ship or vessel, in the form prescribed in the act, entitled 'An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same.' Provided, That all the provisions of said act, respecting the licensing of ships and vessels, for the coasting trade and fisheries, shall be deemed and taken to be applicable to licenses, and to vessels licensed for carrying on the mackerel fishery."

Mr. TOMLINSON briefly explained the nature of the bill. By the law, as it now stood, licenses were granted for vessels engaged in the coasting trade and cod fishing, and, in order to obtain the bounty allowed on that fishery, the claimants are required to make oath, that they would not be engaged, except in the coasting trade and cod fishery. Since the passage of this law, a fishery for mackerel has arisen, and was fast becoming a valuable branch of trade; but those engaged in it were deprived of the bounty by the terms of the oath. This state of things had been represented by about seventy respectable petitioners who prayed that the terms of the oath might be so altered as to cover the mackerel as well as the cod fishery. The scruples of these persons ought to be respected and relieved. If the law was suffered to remain as it now stood, there was reason to apprehend that frauds would be committed, and that vessels engaged in the mackerel trade would, by indirect means, obtain the bounty given by law to those engaged in the cod fishery.

The bill was then ordered to its third reading on Monday.

MONDAY, February 26.

Claims under the Florida Treaty.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. FINDLAY, of Ohio, in the Chair, on the bill "making provision for the settlement of sundry claims under the Florida Treaty."

(This bill involves the important claim of Mr. MEADE, and provides that the President of the United States direct the Third Auditor to examine and liquidate all such claims, under the eleventh article of the treaty, as were rejected by the Board of Commissioners for want of the documentary evidence which the Spanish Government was bound to furnish, and which had been demanded by the United States, but not received before the 8th June, 1824. That the Third Auditor shall be governed by the rules of examination and liquidation established by said Board; and that of the claims which he shall adjudge to be valid, there shall be paid from the Treasury the same proportionate amount as was paid on the claims allowed by said Board. The bill also provides for the compensation of the Third Auditor for the services required.)

The report of the committee upon the subject was read, when—

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the bill so as to leave the liquidation of these claims to "any three Auditors of the Treasury," under the direction of the President of the United States, instead of leaving it to "the Third Auditor."

The amendment having been read—

Mr. F. observed, that the object of the present bill was to give an opportunity to those persons who had claims upon the Spanish Government, which had been assumed by the Government of the United States, but who had been precluded, by want of time, from presenting them to the Board of Commissioners under the Spanish Treaty to try the validity of those claims. The Select Committee which had been appointed on this subject, had satisfied themselves that the claims of the persons named in the bill never had a fair and adequate examination, and that this was not owing to any fault or neglect of theirs, but to circumstances over which they had no control. The Commissioners who were appointed under the treaty for the cession of Florida, had applied to the Spanish Government for copies of the papers required by the claimants, as evidence in support of their claims, and correspondent instructions had been given by the American Government, to our Minister at the Court of Spain, to obtain them; but, owing to the unsettled state of the country, our Minister had been deprived of all opportunity to make the demand, until the three years limited by the treaty for the establishment of such claims had so nearly expired that there was no time left for their presentation to the Board of Commissioners. The causes which had thus detained our Minister were of public notoriety. The Government had been driven before the French armies from Madrid to Seville, and from Seville to Cadiz, and he had been prevented by the blockade from landing at the latter place till what was called in Spain the counter-revolution had taken place, and this event did not happen till near the close of the last year allowed by the treaty for the establishment of American claims. Hence the evidence in support of these claims had never been submitted to any tribunal. All that was intended by the bill was to provide such a tribunal for their examination, in order that the claimants might have judgment in their cause. He had proposed the amendment with a view to greater security, believing it more proper that demands of such magnitude should be passed upon by a court consisting of more than one judge.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose to put a single question to the honorable gentleman from Georgia. It was, whether his object was not to re-organize a Board of Commissioners to examine Spanish claims?

Mr. FORSYTH said, in reply, that his object was to create a tribunal for such claims only as arose in consequence of a non-fulfilment of the treaty with Spain in 1819. An article in that treaty limits the duration of the Commission for deciding on claims by American citizens, against the Spanish Government, to three years, and provides for the furnishing of copies of all official papers in the possession of the Spanish Government, when requisite to the establishment of those claims. In some cases it is a question, whether the failure to establish claims is not attributable to the neglect of the Government of Spain; but in that of Meade it was purely a

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Meade's Claim under the Florida Treaty.

[H. OF R.]

misfortune, in which no culpability attaches to any one; circumstances, over which neither the claimant, the Government of Spain, not that of the United States had any control, having prevented the establishment of the claim within the allotted time.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought that the House ought not thus, at the heel of a session, to be called on to legislate upon this class of claims. For his part, he was not in possession of a sufficiently accurate knowledge of the nature and extent of the claims referred to, nor could he judge how far the Government might become liable by the passage of the bill; for aught that appeared, it might be to an immense amount; the extent of it was, it seemed, to be left to a foreign Government to determine. The Government of this country had undertaken, in the Florida treaty, to satisfy claims of United States citizens against Spain, to the amount of five millions of dollars, on condition that Florida should be ceded to the United States; and a board of Commissioners had been established for the purpose of examining and passing on the validity of those claims. They had performed the duty assigned them, and had distributed the whole of the five millions among various American claimants. That fund was wholly exhausted. One claim is now presented to the amount, as he understood, of upwards of four hundred thousand dollars, and others are included in the bill, to what amount he was at a loss even to conjecture. Of one fact, however, he was thoroughly satisfied, and that was, that many claims had been passed by that Board, which, had they been judged of by their merits alone, must have been promptly rejected. But the Commissioners were bound by the letter of the treaty, and had considered themselves compelled to pass them. Now, said Mr. W., it seems, a new Board is to be created, to consist of the Auditors of the Treasury, and this new Board is to decide these claims upon evidence derived from the Spanish Government. But that Government is not liable for the accuracy with which this evidence is to be furnished; they have no interest in presenting it in a fair and equitable manner. All they will probably do, will be to furnish such evidence as is called for by the claimant, and no more. The decision will, therefore, be made virtually on ex parte evidence. He thought these reasons, of themselves, conclusive why the House should not now provide for paying claims on such an award. He would, therefore, move that the committee should rise. He had not expected that the House was to be deluged, at this late hour of the session, with old claims that had been once rejected. He moved, accordingly, that the committee now rise.

Mr. DWIGHT asked the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his motion for a few moments; to which Mr. WYOLIFFE consented, understanding it to be on the condition that, when Mr. DWIGHT had concluded his remarks, he would make a similar motion.

Mr. DWIGHT then observed that this claim was of a sacred character; it was one of those which the Spanish Government had stipulated should be paid by that of the United States; and the allowance of it would not open a door to controversy with a foreign nation, as might be objected against similar claims on the French Government. By our treaty with Spain we obtained the cession of the Floridas, which were worth, already, five times the amount of all our claims on that Government. Gentlemen need not, therefore, be alarmed at the amount involved in the present bill. The amount had nothing to do with the principle of the claim. If the claim was just in principle, and the Government was able to pay it, the amount would form no valid objection, were it ten times as great. The claim had not been adjudicated by the commission of 1821, only because the proofs could not be produced in time, though they had been seasonably applied for. The gentleman had spoken with dread of the number and amount of other claims in the bill, besides that of Mr. Meade. He would, in reply, read to the House a written statement of the whole of them; they amounted to but five in all, and were of no great amount.

[Here Mr. D. read the statement referred to.]

The claim of Meade, whatever might be its amount, was indisputably included in the provisions of the treaty of cession. A question, as would be remembered, had arisen in relation to that cession, viz: whether it would be recognized, or not, by the Cortes? The gentleman who is now Chairman of the Select Committee (Mr. FORSYTH) was at that time our Minister to the Court of Spain; and he had been personally told by several of the influential members of the Cortes, who called upon him, that the recognition of the cession would depend on the payment of these claims by the American Government. The cession was recognized as well by the Cortes as by the subsequent Government; and the claim before the House had, therefore, a sacred character, making its appeal, in a forcible manner, to the national faith. It would, doubtless, have been passed by the Commissioners, had the evidence applied for been received from Spain, in time to examine and to act upon it. The application for it was made fourteen months previous to the presentation of the claim. It was demanded from Spain by the American Government, and would have been procured and presented in time, had not Mr. Nelson, our Minister, who went out as successor to Mr. Forsyth, been prevented from presenting himself to the Spanish Government by the blockade of Cadiz. The commission, it would be particularly noticed, sat long enough to have received and passed upon the Spanish evidence, had the demand been made when Mr. Nelson first arrived on the coast of Spain; but his being prevented from landing by the French blockading force, occasioned the delay which has proved ruinous to this claimant. The commission closed without allowing his claim; but it ought not, therefore, to be said, that the claim had been rejected by the Commissioners; for they never examined the proofs on which it rested. We have, in the meanwhile, obtained the Floridas, and twenty millions would this day be too small a price for them. Were the United States to pay three, four, or five hundred thousand dollars to these claimants, they would still be vast gainers by the bargain. As to the tribunal before whom the proofs were proposed to be laid, it was notorious to all men that no officers were more keen-sighted, rigid, and scrupulous, than the officers of the Treasury—they have even been censured for the rigor with which they judged of all claims that came before them. We have, he repeated, received the compensation from Spain, for allowing and paying these claims of our own citizens; and if the House dared to refuse the just demand of an American citizen in such circumstances, he would only say they dared to do flagrant injustice. Here were services of a very important character, rendered by one of our citizens to Spain, and that under circumstances the most trying that could be imagined; for this claimant had been two years in the most odious and irksome confinement in a Spanish dungeon. If his Government could refuse to compensate him, they would be less just than that of Spain; for she acknowledged the debt, and would have paid it, had we not assumed the obligation. He was persuaded that this imputation could never be deliberately incurred by an American Congress.

Mr. WICKLIFFE now said, that the more he heard of this claim, the more he was confirmed in the correctness of his former opinion respecting it. How many gentlemen, of all those present, had looked into the documents accompanying this claim? Were gentlemen satisfied that it ever ought to have been paid under the Florida Treaty, or was covered by its provisions? Were they prepared to say that this Government is liable to make good the claims of its citizens on Spain out of other funds besides the five millions pledged by the treaty? And if the bill passes this House, is there the least probability that it will pass the other branch of the National Legislature? Is it right, at so late a period as this, with such a mass of matter pressing for the attention of the House, to attempt to settle a principle of so much importance? As to the equity of the claim, derived from the value of the Florida purchase, he thought there was very little weight in that argument; for he was inclined to think the Government had been worsted in the negotiation. They had paid five millions in claims—and when to this should be added the expense of surveying, he believed that it would turn out that we had got but a sorry bargain.

Mr. W. now renewed his motion that the committee rise.

The motion prevailed—ayes 83, noes 66.

And the committee having risen, and asked leave to sit again, leave was refused.

The bill having been reported, together with Mr. FORSYTH's amendment, to the House,

Mr. WURMS said that it would be impossible to do justice to the discussion of the bill, without having some reference to the argument which had been adduced, while it was in committee; and though this, he knew, was not strictly regular, he hoped it would be permitted by the Chair from the consideration he had mentioned. The argument of the gentleman from Kentucky came too late; the equivalent for these claims had already been received, and it was too much to say that an American citizen was to be consigned to irretrievable ruin, while the country had received, and was enjoying, a benefit ceded to it on the express condition that Spain's debt to him should be paid by his own Government.

The gentleman had borne a very conspicuous part, in a late debate, about the paltry sum of $20,000. Now, Mr. W. said, he should hold up his hands against the gentleman's consuming so much of the time of the House on such a matter as that, and refuse to give an hour to a claim like the present, so sacred in its character, so large in its amount, and of such vital importance to one of our own citizens. The gentleman asks, who has read the documents in this case? And is a just claim to be rejected because gentlemen have not read the documents? Why have they not read them? The documents have long been printed and laid on the gentlemen's tables. When is the time to come when they will choose to read them? Are they to defer it till the claimant is in his grave and his children come here and find us gray-headed? When the treaty was negotiated by which this country has acquired the Floridas, this gentleman was a merchant under the Spanish Government. He had a claim on that Government which is acknowledged to be just; it was not for spoliation, but for matters of contract. When the treaty was concluded the United States agreed to exonerate Spain from all obligations to pay this and other claims of our citizens against her; but Mr. Meade, instead of availing himself of this provision, petitioned, on the contrary, that he might not be considered as included within it, but might be left to fight his own cause with the Spanish Government single handed. This was refused him, and the Government of the United States, for purposes and views of its own, included his claim within the treaty stipulation, exonerated Spain from the payment of it, and took upon itself to pay it out of the fund it had by that treaty recently acquired.

The gentleman from Kentucky had said, or insinuated, that the testimony in support of this claim was not of a satisfactory kind. The gentleman was entirely mistaken. The objection of the Commissioners did not rest on the character of the testimony, but on points wholly distinct from it. In support of this assertion he would beg leave to refer the gentleman and the House to a written opinion of one of the Commissioners to the contrary.

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Meade's Claim under the Florida Treaty.

[H. OF R.]

[Mr. WURTS here read the opinion of one of the Commissioners.]

Now, asked Mr. W., will the gentleman from Kentucky rise in his place and say, that, after such an examination and such an expression of opinion by one of the officers of this Government, men who had no conceivable interest in the decision, and who were of known talent and integrity, that the claim shall at once be rejected? that no tribunal shall be allowed to examine and decide upon it?

It was a claim which had been presented prior to the date of the treaty, and the officers of the Spanish Government had allowed and admitted it; but Spain lingered in the payment; it has been transferred to the Government of the United States, and deferred, from season till season, till at length we are told the United States is not bound to pay it. All the original papers Mr. Meade was obliged to surrender to the Spanish Government, when his claim was urged there; they were distributed through the Departments of the Spanish Government, and there they still remain. The Commissioners, esteeming themselves bound to require these originals, apprised Mr. Meade that, until these should be produced, they could not admit his claim. He, in consequence, made immediate application for them to the Spanish Government; but, from circumstances which had already been stated to the House, he could not obtain them in suitable time. The five millions had all been paid away; and he was thus, without any fault or neglect of his own, entirely excluded. Thus the Government has, in effect, taken the property of this American citizen, applied it to the purchase of the Floridas, and now refuse to pay him for it, or even to appoint a tribunal where he may have a fair hearing. Is not this monstrous? Shall I, asked Mr. W., take the money out of that gentleman's pocket, use it to buy a farm for myself, or my children, and when he asks repayment, and offers to prove how much I took, shall I say, because I am stronger than he, that I will not pay him, or even suffer him to prove his demand? Must this claimant, after waiting with patience at our door for years, when at length his bill has come up for consideration, be told that his just claim is deferred for yet a year longer? He is not a young man; he was once wealthy; he is not so now; we hold his property; all he asks is a tribunal, and a hearing. Shall he be turned off and told to wait till another Congress shall consider his case? I trust not. I trust there is enough of justice in this Congress, to say that he has waited long enough; that his day of hearing shall be set, his judges appointed, and his claim fully and fairly examined. Mr. W. concluded with an apology for the earnestness he had betrayed, and the time he had inadvertently occupied, but he should feel that he had been wanting to the rights of a constituent and of an American citizen, had he remained silent, and suffered the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky to pass without reply.

Mr. ARONKE said, that he had been a member of the Select Committee to whom this claim had been referred, and he had given it a careful examination. The gentleman from Kentucky was mistaken in both the points he had taken. He supposes the House is not now prepared to pass this bill—if not, when would it be prepared? The bill had been reported at the last session, and if want of preparation was a good reason now, why might not the same reason be repeated forever? If gentlemen were not prepared, they ought to be; ample time had been allowed, and every opportunity given.

But the gentleman seems to be of opinion that this Government is not bound to pay this claim, be it ever so just a one. Sir, I say that this Government is bound to pay it. And why? It has, in two instances, forcibly interfered and obstructed this claimant in obtaining justice, when he had the near prospect of fully succeeding.

When our treaty was made with Spain, he expressly said that he did not ask the Government of the United States to be responsible for the claim; all he asked of it was to stand aside; to leave him to his own chance, and only to abstain from throwing any obstacles in the way, or taking any course which would condemn the claim. And what was the reply of his own Government? They refused his request. They determined to interfere; and they said to him, your claim shall be comprehended in the treaty, and it shall be liable to the terms of the treaty. This was the first case in which we forcibly interposed, and we here prevented his obtaining his money from the Government of Spain. Ascertaining that the proof required by the Commissioners was such as could only be got from Spain, fifteen months before the time for examining this evidence, he again goes to his own Government and prays them to send to Spain for the necessary vouchers. The Commissioners expressly said they were satisfied a large amount was due to him, but they could not allow him even this amount without having evidence from Spain. Here, then, the American Government says to one of its own citizens, who has a claim already acknowledged by the Government of Spain, "you shall look to me, and not to Spain, for this money; I will send for your vouchers, and get them for you within the time which I have chosen to limit for the production of proof." He accordingly gives his Government a memorandum of the papers required. The Government, owing to circumstances with which he had nothing to do, does not apply in time to get these papers; and the period it had arbitrarily fixed for their examination expires; its citizen is shut out from the tribunal of the Commissioners; and now, when he comes to you, and modestly asks that some tribunal may be ordered to examine his vouchers and pass upon the justice of his claim, he is to be refused? He does not ask for money; he asks only a tribunal and a judge; and is it to be refused? It would form a case of enormous and unparalleled atrocity. Sir, I have looked at this evidence, and I care not before what tribunal it is to be presented. You may send it to the bench of Minos and Radamanthus; I care not; only let it have a full and fair examination. As one interested in the resources of the Government, I hope he may not be able to establish his claim; but never, while there is a cent in the treasury, never will I consent to obstruct any claim by methods such as these. Suppose we shall pass this bill, do we thereby declare that this man's claim is just? By no means. We only say that his claim, with the evidence in support of it, shall be examined by our own officers; and I believe no gentleman who hears me will dissent from the position, that, if it is to go before Mr. Hagner, it will, at least, be thoroughly sifted. But if you reject the bill, you condemn and annihilate the claim, without knowing whether it be just or not. To do this would, under all the circumstances, be one of the most unparalleled and unatoned acts of injustice that ever was perpetrated.

Mr. FORSYTH now renewed the motion he had made in committee to amend the first section of the bill, and also moved to strike out the third section, which provides for allowing the Third Auditor a certain sum, in addition to the salary now allowed him by law.

He said, that if it should be the pleasure of the House to pass the bill, he was willing to trust to the justice of Congress to reward the auditors for any extra service it might occasion them, and, therefore, he did not propose to insert any clause fixing their remuneration beforehand. Mr. F. said he was fully aware of the shortness of the time which remained of the session, and the number and amount of private as well as public bills, which were waiting the action of the House; he would, therefore, endeavor to guard himself from digressing into the merits of the claim, and should confine his remarks to the right of the applicant to have its justice examined and decided upon. He believed himself to be fully possessed of the merits; but it was enough for him to know that here was an 'American citizen, suffering great injustice, from no fault of his, but from that of his own and of a foreign Government, and that this House alone had the power to redeem him from it. The circumstances of this case were most extraordinary. Mr. Meade, it seems, had a claim against the Government of Spain, which was acknowledged by that Government. The Board of Commissioners, appointed under the Florida treaty, having concluded that this claim was embraced by that treaty, Mr. Meade submitted to them a written acknowledgment, given by the commissioners of the Government of Spain, that a certain sum was due by that Government to him. This acknowledgment was given between the first signing of the treaty and its final ratification. His documents were demanded by the Spanish Government, and having been surrendered by Mr. Meade, were distributed through the offices to which they severally belonged. When Mr. Meade submitted his claim to the Commissioners, accompanied by the certificate or acknowledgment before referred to, they replied that this was not sufficient evidence, and that they must have the original documents or certified copies of them. Mr. Meade remonstrated on the hardship of being compelled to produce papers which he had previously been obliged to give up to the Spanish Government, when, at the same time, he had produced a certificate which was the result of their examination, and showed them to contain conclusive proof of the justice of the claim. The Commissioners, however, were stern and inflexible, and continued to demand the vouchers. Meade, in reply, pleaded that the treaty, under whose operation his claim had, against his wishes, been brought, contained a provision that the Spanish Government should furnish to claimants such official papers as were applied for to establish their claims, and prayed that the Commissioners would take measures to obtain his evidence from that Government. They did so, and Mr. Nelson accordingly received instructions to demand them; but as he was prevented, contrary to the law of nations, from landing on the Spanish soil, the papers were not obtained, and the Commissioners accordingly rejected the claim. The consequence has been, that this claimant is made poor, though he has, according to the written acknowledgment both of the Spanish and of the American Commissioners, a just claim to what would render him independent. Can such a case be left without redress? Shall an American citizen be thus plundered of his all? What has been his fault? Did he not use all proper diligence in prosecuting his claim? Was he not in a fair way of obtaining justice when this Government interfered, declared his claim merged by the treaty, and undertook themselves to be his paymasters? If his vouchers were in Spain, could he compel the Spanish Government to surrender them? And was it his fault that his Government failed in procuring them? Surely not. And now, after having had hope thus deferred by our act, must he be refused even a tribunal to try his claim? Mr. F. said the committee had refused to go into the grounds of the Spanish Commissioners' decision, and had reluctantly brought in the bill in its present shape. If Spain was in the wrong, this Government had a right to demand from her all that it should pay to Meade—and the object of the bill was only to give him what he had been deprived of by the short duration of the commission. The committee had no choice between doing this and doing injustice.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

Meade's Claim under the Florida Treaty.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, said that the amendment removed much of his difficulty. He had himself been opposed to taking up this bill at this time, but the House decided otherwise, and as it had been taken up, he hoped it would pass as amended. He had carefully examined the documents in relation to this claim, and his sole object was, that justice should be done. Whether the amount is 30,000 dollars, or 300,000, or 3,000,000, was a consideration that ought to have no place in this matter. If the Government owed the money, he cared not what was the amount; it ought to be paid. He should augur darkly indeed for our institutions, if the inquiry of this House is to be, not whether a debt is due, but whether it is small. He regretted that the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Virginia had not contented themselves with suffering the claim to rest on its own merits, but had proceeded to comment with severity upon the conduct of the Commissioners in rejecting the claim. There was not now time to examine their decision, or to inquire into the manner in which the treaty had been conducted—he would, therefore, do no more than take leave to deny the accuracy of some of the statements which had reference to this part of the subject, particularly when the terms of the treaty and the decision of the Commissioners under it had been characterized as acts of unparalleled atrocity, and unatoned injustice. He thought that sentence of condemnation had better have been withheld.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said he concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had just taken his seat, in the view he had expressed in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. He thought it would be a material improvement in the bill. The amount due the claimant might possibly be very considerable, but that formed no reason why the bill should not now be considered, or why the amount should not be allowed. If the largeness of the amount was to have any weight at all, all it had was certainly on the side of the claimant. But it was not to be expected that a bill which might involve the payment of so large an amount, should pass without mature discussion, both in the committee and out of the committee. The amount alone was of itself sufficient to produce opposition to the bill. But it was impossible that such a body as this House should examine minutely every claim that came before it. It must, from necessity, put great faith in the examinations made by its Standing Committees. The body was too unwieldy to go into such minutiae; and the present case did but renew and strengthen a conviction he had long entertained, and had more than once expressed, of the pressing necessity for the adoption of some other arrangement, in relation to the decision of private claims. As they were now disposed of, there was not only a great consumption of time, which ought to be devoted to the public concerns of the country, but unavoidable danger of doing the most flagrant injustice to claimants themselves. The committee, he knew, and admitted, did the duties assigned them, with as much diligence and devotion as could be expected from any men; but the difficulties were such, as no diligence could surmount. It was physically impossible for them to examine with minuteness one-half the documents submitted to them. They did what they could; but the result was, that claims were either deferred in a manner that amounted practically to a denial of justice, or decided on such imperfect examination, as often put justice at the greatest hazard. The documents in the present case were voluminous, and involved the investigation of a great number and variety of questions of the greatest moment. From what attention he had been able to give them, he was persuaded that the case of Mr. Meade was one of great and undeserved hardship.

Mr. McL. then stated, that, during Mr. Meade's residence in Spain, the Government of that country became indebted to him for supplies of provisions furnished them during the Constitutional War of defence against the invasion of the French; and that, on the return of the king, Mr. Meade was imprisoned in one of the castles of Cadiz for more than two years, and was finally released by the interference of the Government of the United States. After his, Mr. M.'s release, a court was organized in Spain, which fixed the amount due, and the faith of the Government was pledged to pay it. Lands in the Floridas were offered Mr. Meade in payment, but our Government being then in treaty for the cession of the Floridas, directly intimated to Mr. Meade their unwillingness to consent to this arrangement, and he gave it up, with assurances from our Government, that his debt should be assumed and paid by the United States. The very demand itself was liquidated under the auspices of the Minister from the United States. The Cortes of Spain considered the demand of Mr. Meade a national debt; and the king affirmed it as such. When the treaty was about to be ratified by the Senate, Mr. Meade sent a memorial to the President, in which the claimant distinctly requested that, if Government could not give him assurances of being paid in full, that his claim should not be included, and that he would look to Spain for his indemnification. The treaty was ratified, with the entire understanding that this claim was included. When the Commissioners under the treaty were appointed, the claim was presented, but not allowed; not that they believed the claim was not good, but got over this large amount, upon some want of documents, entirely out of the power of the claimant then to procure. The Minister of the United States, and every officer of Government within the scope of whose duties the slightest consideration of the subject came, were in favor of the claim. But, after all these exertions which Mr. Meade has made, and all the assurances which have been given him, he has been, year after year, memorializing Congress to hear him on the subject, or to appoint a tribunal for that purpose; but he has sued in vain. Every obstacle has been thrown in his way; no investigation, beyond a hearing before the committee, has been afforded. An investigation is all he now asks; shall this be denied him? Is it for the honor of our country to keep one of its valuable citizens so long in suspense? Shall we waste his means, his time, his patience, in following Congress from session to session, and get no remedy? The good faith of the nation is involved in the question; and he, Mr. MOLL, trusted that the bill would pass. If the sum was due Mr. Meade, as he believed it was, he ought to have it. The amount of the claim should make no difference in the readiness to examine it, nor the willingness to pay it.

Mr. KITTERA said, that it was a lamentable truth, which the experience of every year confirmed, that the claims of public creditors were so long delayed, and were attended with expenses so enormous, that often, when a favorable judgment was pronounced, it came too late to do them service. That Mr. Meade, who was one of his most valued constituents, had been attending in the hall for six or seven successive sessions, and, at the happy moment when his hearing is at hand, he is threatened with longer delays, because, it is said, his claim has not been examined with sufficient attention by the members of the House. Rely upon it, such an answer will as little justify us, as it will console our fellow-citizen, who has so long and so earnestly claimed a hearing. He did not mean to enter into a detail of all the circumstances; but there were a few prominent facts known to every gentleman. The Government of Spain was indebted to Mr. Meade in a very large sum of money, found by the tribunals of the nation to be due, and sanctioned by a royal decree. After this, we formed a treaty with Spain, by which the Floridas were ceded to the United States for five millions of dollars. By the 11th article of that treaty, we discharge the Spanish Government from the claims of our citizens, and among the rest, from that of Mr. Meade. A tribunal is established to distribute this fund among the claimants against Spain, who are to receive only so far as the fund extended. Mr. K. said he would not inquire into the fairness of placing Mr. Meade's claim upon no better footing than the ordinary claims for spoiliations—that tribunal is limited in point of duration. That Mr. Meade's claim is embraced in the treaty, no one could doubt. He presents himself before the Commissioners with the Spanish decree as the evidence of the debt. He is told that will not do; that he must give to the Commissioners the same evidence he had before the Spanish tribunal. Mr. K. said he would not say a word as regarded the propriety of this decision. It however required of the applicant that which, as the result proved, it was impossible for him to do. Efforts, national and individual, were made to procure from the Spanish Government these documents, which were in their possession, but in vain. The limitation of the commission is about expiring, and the Commissioners finally distribute the fund to the exclusion of Mr. Meade. That his claim was good for some amount, and that it was rejected because the documents were not within his control, but at the pleasure of the Spanish Government, there can be no doubt. Is it, under such circumstances, fair and equitable that Mr. Meade should lose his debt? We have discharged, by an act of sovereign authority, his original debtor. Ought we not to pay? If, by withholding documents, Spain has violated the treaty, let the United States look to Spain to repair the injury we sustain; but not put forward a citizen upon his private responsibility to coerce the payment of money upon such a ground. By the passage of this bill, we admit no particular amount due. We only establish a tribunal to examine and decide, and that, too, upon principles of the strictest character, upon matters which, it must be allowed, we cannot. This is not a claim for spoiliations, but, as he believed, a fair and honest debt, ascertained in character and amount, for which the Spanish Government was liable, till we transferred that liability to ourselves, and which he thought this Government could not refuse to discharge without disregarding her high sense of justice and national faith.

Mr. BRECKNER asked if there was any other evidence in support of the claim but that which was received from the Commissioners?

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that the bill did not propose to the House an investigation of this case. It only appointed a tryer.

Mr. BRECKNER rejoined: the treaty had done this before—it appointed a Board of Tryers more competent than the Auditors could be supposed to be—they had rejected the claim because it was not supported by evidence. If there was now no more evidence than there had been before, there could be no need of appointing new tryers.

The question was then taken on Mr. FORSYTH's amendment, appointing three Auditors of the Treasury to examine the evidence, and carried—ayes 72, nays 40.

Mr. FORSYTH observed, that he held in his hand a list of six claims, all which were similarly situated to this of Meade's, all resting on evidence to be furnished by Spain. The question, therefore, involved in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, was, whether this one claim ought to be separated from all the rest, and paid, while the rest were neglected?

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that this exemplified, in the strongest manner, the utter unfitness and inability of Congress to become judges in private claims. If the motion now made should prevail, the evidence furnished will be in the Spanish language, and he for one, would like to be present when the claim came to be decided. He should like to see the Spanish papers submitted, for instance, to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee. He presumed the first thing to be done would be to swear an interpreter. The next step must be to send for witnesses to prove that the evidence was taken according to the Spanish law. These records, according to the Spanish style, were all voluminous; he presumed there was not one of the examinations that would not occupy several quires of paper. Now, without going further, he would ask the gentleman whether the claim of an individual, in which his all was involved, was to be decided before such a tribunal as this House, on such evidence? He entered now, and would forever enter, his protest against the performance of Judicial duties by such a body. He prayed gentlemen not to throw new difficulties in the way of this claimant; he thought the bill already interposed difficulties enough.

FEBRUARY, 1837.]

British Colonial Trade.

[H. OF R.]

The question being then taken, the amendment proposed by Mr. COCKE was rejected.

On the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, Mr. WICKLIFFE required the yeas and nays, but a sufficient number did not rise to authorize them.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without a division.

WEDNESDAY, February 28.

British Colonial Trade.

The House again took up the Colonial Trade Bill; and the question being on agreeing to the amendment offered by Mr. WEBSTER in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. BASSETT moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table. The motion was negatived—yeas 65, noes 81; and the House then concurred in adopting the amendment of Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. PEARCE now moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House yesterday rejected the amendment proposed by Mr. MALLARY, which was to insert the words "by sea."

On this question, Mr. BARRINGER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. FORSYTH remarked, that the vote by which the amendment had been rejected was very large; that a distinct proposition to defer that vote to this morning had been made and refused. He wished to know what new light had arisen to-day, on account of which the House was asked to reconsider a deliberate vote, on a proposition fully understood. He should be glad to hear some of the reasons stated which induced gentlemen to ask a reconsideration.

Mr. INGERSOLL said he should vote for the motion to reconsider; and if that prevailed, would also vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, so as to confine the operations of the bill, as was done by the act of 1820, to the navigation "by sea," without interfering with the navigation on the lakes. But he should vote for the bill whether amended or not. He felt willing to accede to the proposed amendment, not only as it would make the measure more acceptable to a large portion of the country, but because he hoped yet to see the embarrassments which now rest on our trade with the British West India colonies, amicably removed by negotiation; and he was unwilling to entangle that negotiation in any new subjects of collision between the Governments. He would deal out measure for measure: whenever the British interdicted a trade in our vessels, he would interdict the corresponding trade in their vessels. But it was a matter of serious consideration, whether, in the onset, we should go one step further, and strike at a new interest, and thereby remove the prospect of an amicable arrangement still further from our view. The British have excluded our vessels from certain colonial ports: in return for this he would promptly follow their lead, and exclude their vessels when coming from places interdicted to us. For the present, he was willing not to carry the war of restrictions further than this; he would not yet extend the interdict to a trade between us and other places, from which we are not in like manner excluded. He did not consider it a safe policy to invite Great Britain to new restrictions, in lieu of friendly negotiation. The bill does not propose to take effect till after the 30th of next September—about two months before the session of the next Congress: and we shall then have a better opportunity to determine upon the effect of the measures which we may now adopt, as well as what the ulterior views of Great Britain are, and can legislate accordingly. The perplexing question might, before that time, be in a train of adjustment. The offers on our part are fair and honorable, and if not embarrassed by matters calculated rather to irritate than heal the existing difference, the Colonies themselves would feel that the mother country was in the wrong, if she did not accede to the lenient and liberal policy proposed on our part. If it should appear, hereafter, that all hopes of negotiation are at an end, we would be right then to assume a new attitude. He would, in such an event—when we resorted to a war of restrictions—not only be willing to strike at the indirect trade to Europe, which oozes through the Canadas, and which is, in part, supplied by our northern frontier, but he would strike home upon the manufactures of the mother country; he would aim a blow at the direct European trade itself, so far as it could be done without interfering with treaty stipulations. No gentleman on this floor felt a deeper solicitude for the preservation of the West India trade than he did. He came from a community whose foreign commerce was almost exclusively with the West Indies, and his anxiety to have this trade resume its wonted channels, was his principal reason for wishing to see the question in relation to it now pending between us and the British Government kept separate and distinct from any new cause of difference. He would meet Great Britain on this point with firmness but without unnecessary irritation: he would try mild measures first; and if they did not lead to amicable results, then, and not till then, would he, in the language of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG) be prepared to "go the whole."

If we adopt the proposed amendment we place our West India interests on precisely the same footing on which they rested under the act of 1820, the British having, prior to that time, excluded us, as they now have, from the direct trade. Our experience on this subject should not be disregarded. That act had well done its office; it brought Great Britain to terms, but it did not, at any time, touch the Canada trade. The words "by sea" now proposed to be inserted in this bill made a part of that; indeed, the bill before us is substantially the same as the act of 1820, except that these words had been here omitted. Under the operation of the act of 1820, when the Colonies were obliged to take our supplies through neutral islands in their neighborhood, at an enhanced price to the planters, they became intensely anxious for the direct trade; their clamors finally assumed so deep a tone that they were heard and regarded by the Ministry at home, and the consequence was, the opening of the interdicted ports to our vessels. The question now is, shall we adhere to the policy of 1820, which proved effectual then, or shall we bring a new point into the controversy, by striking at that portion of the European trade which is carried on through the Canadas, so far as it is supplied by articles transmitted to those provinces through our own frontiers? This question is one of more embarrassment than at first meets the eye. Gentlemen are laboring under a mistake in supposing that the articles which we furnish the Canadas, find their way, to any considerable amount, to the West India markets, through the circuitous route of the St. Lawrence, and if they would attentively examine the able report presented to us by the Committee on Commerce, they would see the fallacy of that supposition. The mass of what the Canadians purchase from us is either consumed by themselves, or sent to Liverpool, and but a trifling part of the whole finds its way to the West Indies. He felt unwilling, at this late period of the session, to fatigue the House by a recapitulation of statistical tables, or a barren calculation in figures; but he based himself on official documents for the accuracy of what he had said on the Canada trade. The whole amount of exports to Canada, during the last year, are valued at upwards of $1,800,000; of this large sum but about $39,000 was the value of the wheat and flour which Canada received from us, and those articles, he admitted, might go into the assorted cargoes for the West India market. The lumber amounted to about $127,000, but the great bulk of this went to Europe in lumber ships, which are constantly floating down the St. Lawrence, when the navigation is unobstructed by ice. The heaviest article furnished from our frontiers is potash; but it is notorious that this is exclusively for the Liverpool trade. The other articles which we send to Canada are almost all consumed there, as will be seen by reference to them. They are fresh provisions, and butter and cheese, for the Montreal and Quebec markets; leather and leather shoes, manufactured tobacco, American cotton goods—yes, sir, our cotton fabrics, under the existing tariff, find their way there, and compete with the manufactures of the British on their own soil. Salt is also a heavy article; Upper Canada is almost exclusively supplied with it from the salt works of New York; but no one ever dreamed of its being sent down the St. Lawrence to such a market in the West Indies: it would be like sending coals to New Castle; scythes, axes, and the other implements of husbandry, which are furnished by our mechanics, to the farmers of Canada. Such are our exports to that country. The geographical position of the Canadas will always prevent their supplying the West India markets to any considerable extent. The islands can purchase our products from a neutral depot, on more advantageous terms than they can be furnished by way of the St. Lawrence. Cargoes intended for the West Indies are generally of a perishable nature; the supplies of provisions for a tropical market must be furnished frequently, and, comparatively speaking, in moderate quantities. If they accumulate for six months in the year, most of them will become deteriorated. The St. Lawrence is bridged by ice for more than six months on an average; the consequence is, that but one long voyage can be made in a year from Quebec to the West Indies—whereas, from the Atlantic States we make four or five short voyages. And it is an undeniable fact, that, although we have had to encounter heavy discriminating duties at the British West India ports, from which vessels from Quebec were exempt, yet they never could compete with us successfully in that trade. The disadvantages of position which the Quebec merchants labored under were greater drawbacks upon them than the discriminating duties were upon us. Nay, further: When our vessels were excluded entirely, as they now are, from the British West Indies, and we were driven to the neutral ports, the British colonial planters could supply themselves, and did supply themselves, with our produce from the neutral islands. Canada could not then supply the West India market; and from this it may safely be inferred that Canada cannot now supply that market: our experience on this subject is worth all the theories with which gentlemen can furnish us, however ingeniously presented. From the range taken in debate, one would be apt to suppose that we were now called upon to pass a non-importation law, or a non-exportation act, as was our former embargo; and hence,

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

British Colonial Trade.

[H. OF R.]

the argument that such a law should extend to the frontiers as well as to the Atlantic. Nothing can be more erroneous than this. We are called upon to pass a navigation act merely, in regard to certain colonial ports: and hence, the impropriety of connecting with such a measure what must amount, if persisted in, to a non-intercourse on the lines, and an interference with a trade not necessarily, or principally connected with the West India ports. We should be cautious not to enlarge the commercial controversy, already sufficiently wide between the two countries. He preferred, for the present, to repose, as we formerly did, upon the policy of 1820—exclude the vessels of our rivals as they exclude us, and not by grasping at more, run the risk of eventually and permanently losing the whole. Notwithstanding this obnoxious Order in Council, we expect, as the committee tell us, in their report, to supply the British West India colonies with our products as we did under the act of 1820—if they are willing to take them—through neutral ports, and receive their produce through the same channels. The trade, by this new order of things, becomes circuitous instead of being direct; but still it would afford a vent for a part of our surplus, and is worth preserving. Let it not be said that our frontier country can also dispose of their surplus through neutrals, if the Canada trade is interdicted. It would cost more to bring the produce from many parts of that frontier to the City of New York, or any other Atlantic port, than it would to transport the same article from New York to Liverpool. The amount of our exports to the British West Indies, was upwards of two millions of dollars annually, and the Canada trade was over 1,800,000 dollars, a sum nearly equal to that which is affected by the British Orders in Council.

If, however, it should be thought expedient to extend the restrictions at the present time, to the Canada trade, it would require very different provisions from those contained in this bill to enforce the interdict on our extensive frontier. This bill would be inoperative there. The temptation to smuggling would prove too strong to be resisted by such feeble barriers as are here presented. We know how this was during our former restrictive system, and we should not shut our eyes on the admonitions of experience. Men of desperate fortunes and more desperate character, would be attracted to the frontiers, the moment an opportunity offered for the employment of their guilty talents. This demoralizing result was to be deprecated and avoided as long as possible. The mass of corrupt materials which had gathered on the frontiers during the former embargo, and set at defiance the civil and military force of the country, was now scattered and had been replaced by a sound and healthy population. It requires very different provisions to enforce an interdict on an inland frontier, from what are sufficient to exclude foreign vessels from the Atlantic coast. Should we find it necessary again to resort to restrictive measures on the frontiers, we should enact a law that would be prompt and effectual: one that should be armed with severe penalties, and rigidly enforced by numerous and vigilant officers. When a crisis in our commercial affairs demanded such a measure, Mr. I. said, it should receive his humble, though cordial support.

Mr. STOKES said that the only effect of refusing the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. MALLARY,) was to interdict the trade between the northern States and the British Colonies on our northern frontiers. This trade, Mr. S. said, is not affected by the spirit of our late navigation laws. It has been open under all of them. On a question that related only to the interests of our ship owners, in the freight between our ports and the British West India islands, we should not go out of our way to interdict a trade which he thought was not within the general policy of the measure before the House. The object of the bill is to secure to our navigating interest a fair share and equal advantage of competition in the trade with the West Indies. We are to say whether this Colonial trade shall continue to be carried on in British vessels, exclusively, after the Order in Council, under the act of Parliament, of 1825, has excluded American ship owners from all participation in it. It is admitted, on all hands, that the trade itself is valuable to both countries. The Colonies and the West India interest in England are as deeply interested to continue it as we are. No one pretends that it is desirable that we should exclude their productions from our markets, or withhold our own from theirs, if it is not to be done at the sacrifice of our shipping interest to a foreign monopoly; and so far as the mere exchange of products is concerned, it is the professed object of both countries to continue the trade itself. We now propose, and very properly, to secure to our own ships at least a fair share of the freight of our productions and what we take from them, or to exclude British ships from it. Now, sir, the trade across our inland frontier and the Lakes, with Canada, has no connection with the differences which have brought this measure before us; and the effect of closing it is only to inflict on those interested in it, in several of the northern States, the evils of an interdiction, without any benefit to either party. The policy of our navigation laws has only been to interdict trade in British vessels, by sea, to ports from which our own ships are excluded by Great Britain. The northern trade with Canada has been open under all these laws, and no one has ever thought, before now, of shutting that trade up, to coerce Great Britain to admit American vessels into her West India ports. The only reason now offered for extending an interdiction to this trade is, that the products of the frontier countries of some of the States may possibly find their way to the British West India islands, through the Canadas; and we have been asked why the acts of Parliament and Order in Council have left that trade open, unless Great Britain expects to supply them with American products through the northern Lakes and the St. Lawrence? It is certain that she could not do this profitably, from 1820 to 1822, while the interdiction was substantially in force in the Atlantic ports.

Mr. MALLARY spoke in reply. The gentleman from Louisiana had insisted, that if the bill passed, it ought to exclude the trade from the United States to Canada, and one argument he had advanced, was derived from the constitution. He was aware of the gentleman's standing and legal reputation, and was ready to confess that the gentleman was far superior to himself; but, learned and able as he was, on the present occasion he was mistaken. The gentleman says that no preference is to be given by any regulation of commerce to the ports of one State over those of another. He did not object to this principle, but was it not then plain, that, according to that article of the constitution, no one particular section of the Union might, by any regulation of commerce, be deprived of a branch of trade, while the rest of the Union was suffered to enjoy it? If the rule was good, it ought to work both ways. The country on the frontier now enjoys the benefit of the Canadian trade to Europe. It was only through the Canadas that their heavy articles could reach the European ports. Now, if Congress should deprive them of this trade, while it continued to be enjoyed by the Atlantic ports, would it not, on the gentleman's own principle, be a direct violation of the constitution? How must the bill operate? Unless the amendment is introduced, it cuts up the whole of the Canadian trade, both Colonial and European; but it leaves to the ports on the Atlantic all the trade they now have, saving only that branch of it which is carried on with the British West India islands. This is not treating different sections of country alike. Its effect is manifestly unjust. It destroys the whole trade of the interior, because a small portion of that trade happens to be connected with the subject of the bill. It annihilates the trade of an important portion of the country merely to give a preference to American bottoms in the trade with the West Indies. There is but two millions engaged in the direct trade with those islands, and that whole amount may still be carried on at a small inconvenience, through neutral ports.

At this stage of the debate, the bill which had passed the Senate on the same subject was received; when

Mr. TOMLINSON remarked that this was the last day of the session on which bills could be sent from this House to the Senate. A bill, he said, having been just received from that body, relating to the subject now under consideration, which would enable this House, according to the existing joint rule, to act on the subject now before it, either on to-morrow or next day, he felt it to be his duty to make a motion which would afford an opportunity to consider and pass several bills of great importance, now pending before the House, and to send such bills to the other House, to be acted upon during the present session. He then moved that the bill under consideration be laid on the table, to be taken up to-morrow.

This motion prevailed, and the bill was accordingly laid on the table.

The bill from the Senate was then read at the clerk's table; when

Mr. TOMLINSON moved its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved it to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. After some conversation between Messrs. TOMLINSON and FORSYTH, on motion of the latter, the bill was laid upon the table (aye 71, noes 62) and ordered to be printed.

The military appropriation bill having been received from the Senate, with amendments striking out the proviso adopted by this House, and which restricted the payment of double rations to officers "commanding garrisons and military posts;"

The question being on agreeing with this amendment of the Senate.

On this question, a debate of some extent took place, (involving, substantially, the same principle as that which arose when the provision was inserted,) and in which Messrs. COCKE, WEBSTER, BRENT, DRAYTON, WOOD of New York, FORSYTH, and MITCHELL of Tennessee, took part.

The question was then put, and on motion of Mr. COCKE, was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative.

So the amendment of the Senate was not agreed to.

[On the following day, the House recessed from its disagreement.]

THURSDAY, March 1.

Indiana Canal.

Mr. WOODS, of Ohio, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, to authorize the State of Indiana to locate and make a canal therein named, reported the same without amendment.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and it was read a third time accordingly, and passed.

The Navy—Ship Timber.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRAGUE in the chair, and took up the bill for the gradual increase and improvement of the Navy.

Mr. STORRS (Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) moved to amend the bill in that section which refers to the preservation of valuable ship timber, after the words "live oak," by inserting the words "or other timber;" which was agreed to.

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

Naval Academy.

[H. OF R.]

Naval Academy.

Mr. EASTMAN moved to strike out the seventh section of the bill, (which provides for a Naval Academy.)

Mr. WICKLIFFE advocated this motion, and insisted that the proposed school was unnecessary; but if it must be erected, farther leave should be allowed to digest rules and regulations for it.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, and defended the measure, which he argued to be a great public good as adding science to the practical knowledge of our naval officers.

Mr. KERMEC supported the amendment. It was opposed at great length by Mr. DRAYTON, who defended the value and importance of such a seminary.

Mr. BURGESS wished farther information before he could vote in favor of this feature of the bill. He opposed the idea of any other instruction as a substitute for that which is gained at sea.

Mr. WEEMS said, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) was opposed to this school, because "the Academy at West Point had been so managed, in his opinion, as to be altogether a matter of patronage, and that it was so far from benefiting the sons of poor men, that he had known one member of Congress to have three sons educated there; ergo, he would not vote for another establishment of the sort, no matter by what name it should be called." He would ask that gentleman, and the committee, if such were the facts, whether the fault was not with Congress, whose duty it should be to enact such rules and regulations as ought to govern that institution. The honorable member from Rhode Island as well as other gentlemen opposed to a Naval School, appeared to forget that warrants were (and very properly) granted to youths at a very early and tender age, before they can (even if they are the sons of rich and wealthy parents, able to bear the expense) obtain a suitable education to render them as useful and respectable as they might and ought to be through life. He presumed no one would deny the benefit, as well as gratification, resulting from a scientific education, not often to be obtained on board of ship, but contemplated to be afforded to all at this Naval School. Again, he would remind the committee of the very great advantage that would result from having such an institution near at hand, to which the Secretary might direct young officers, when in port, to go, for improvement, instead of granting furloughs indiscriminately, as now done, obliging them to spend most wastefully, and it is to be feared often most destructively, if not dishonorably, their pittance of half pay.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, having also replied,

The question was taken on striking out, and carried, ayes 71, noes 65.

The committee then rose.

In the House, the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the Naval Bill, were taken up in order, and severally agreed to, until the House came to that which strikes out the section providing for a Naval School. On the question of concurrence in this amendment, Mr. WEEMS demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered by the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN stated his views briefly in opposition to such an institution, and in favor of concurrence in the vote of the committee.

Mr. STORRS replied, denying that the subject was novel, and insisting that the subject was at least seven, if not twelve years old. This very bill, he said, had lain for fifteen months on the table. He went into a full exposition of the plan, which he earnestly defended.

Mr. SAWYER said the estimate of appropriations for the Navy, will present an aggregate of upwards of three millions, which is half a million more than last year; it was then $2,526,612, although the half million allowed out of that sum, for the gradual increase, was not then called for, the law having expired. But to promote these maxims of economy, we are called upon to extend the term for the gradual increase, and contrive some way to economize this half million annually out of the Treasury. Three schemes are devised: one, to buy more timber and lay up to season; another, to construct docks; and a third, to lay the foundation for a School of Naval Education.

We have a Navy of 12 ships of the line, 20 frigates, and sloops in proportion, besides several of each class, on the stocks; and, although our revenue falls short more than a million this year, and the time has expired for the gradual increase of the Navy, yet as economy must be consulted, we must build docks, cut down trees, and even establish a Naval School. As I do not understand this kind of economy, I shall not agree to do either. I am willing to let the trees grow longer, and to let our officers learn naval tactics at sea. While other nations are dismantling, or placing their navies on a peace establishment, I think we ought to be satisfied with the present number of our ships, until we see some signs for the actual use of them. For all purposes of exhibition or parade, for the gratification of national vanity, I think the expenditure of upwards of three millions ought to suffice.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) has just told us, this school, with its nine professors, is to cost us but $7,000 a year. But, has the gentleman taken into the calculation the purchase of ground and buildings for the location. But taking it for granted that it will cost only that sum, that small sum may prove a canker in the body politic. It will tend to corrupt the whole mass of the nation. We see the effects which are produced by our Military Academy; the annual proselytes which it adds to the Administration: but when this vast source of promotion and patronage is added, when there is no limit to the number admissible, we can readily judge what a powerful engine it may prove in favor of the Government. The temptation to gain admission there will be irresistible. It will pervade every quarter of the Union. The dull pursuits of civil life will be abandoned; labor will be shunned as ignominious, and a general rush will be made by the higher class of our population for the wide-opened doors of this school. This must have a tendency to produce degeneracy and corruption of the public morality, and change our simple Republican habits.

Mr. BRADLEY followed on the same side. He had understood, from authority upon which he placed the most perfect reliance, that it required seven years' service to make a prime seaman. The present mode of educating midshipmen, was to instruct them in navigation during voyages, between decks, and, in the mean time, they were acquiring the habits of a sailor's life, and learning the parts and management of a ship both in calms and tempests. He put it then, by way of inquiry, how the public interest could be subserved by giving them a preparatory education on shore, when so much time must be afterwards consumed before they could be perfect in their duty.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, in answer, stated a variety of facts in relation to the British Navy and its Marine school, to show the advantages which might be expected from a school of this sort.

Mr. COCKE said a few words in answer, the substance of which was, that the American naval officers were not inferior, in any respect, to the British, though we have hitherto had no Naval School.

Mr. WOOD explained, and denied having made or meant any such assertion.

Mr. KREMER spoke in opposition to the school, as intended to increase the patronage of the Executive, and calculated to injure the morals of the young men who might enter it.

The question was then taken, by yeas and nays, on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on striking out the part of the bill which relates to a Naval School, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 78.

So that part of the bill was struck out.

FRIDAY, March 2.

British Colonial Trade.

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, all the orders which preceded the Colonial Trade Bill were dispensed with; and the House took up the bill as received from the Senate.

Mr. TOMLINSON proceeded to state the substance of the bill, and to explain the operation and effect of the amendment. The first section, he said, proposed to abolish the discriminating duties which are imposed by our laws, on British vessels and their cargoes, arriving in the United States from the British colonial ports, after the 31st of December next; the second suspended until that day, the acts of Congress of the 18th of April, 1818; the 15th of May, 1820; and the 1st of March, 1823; and the third section authorized the President to issue his proclamation, declaring that the acts suspended by the second section are repealed, if he should, at any time, before the 31st of December next, receive satisfactory evidence that the prohibition of commercial intercourse, by the British Order in Council of July last, had ceased, and that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost are imposed in the ports enumerated in the first section of the bill, on the vessels or produce of the United States arriving in such ports. If, therefore, the bill from the Senate should become a law, and no arrangements should be made between the two Governments before the 31st of December next, British vessels would, after that time, be admitted into the ports of the United States, from the British colonies, paying no discriminating duties whatever, either on their tonnage or cargoes, while vessels of the United States would be absolutely excluded from the British West Indies, and all the other colonies named in the Order in Council, except the continental colonies in North America; and in the ports of the latter colonies, American vessels would be required to pay on their tonnage and cargoes, the discriminating duties which had been continued by that order. Such a state of the trade would result from the passage of the bill, unless some measure should be adopted by our Government to prevent it, before or at the period mentioned.

In the mean time, the act of 1823 being suspended by the second section of the act before the House, British vessels would not only enter our ports directly from the British colonies, but would be allowed to depart thence, laden with our produce, to any part of the world. They might even clear directly for Cuba, or any other West India island, or clearing for the British colonies, being in consequence of the suspension of that act, no longer obliged to give bonds to land their cargoes in a British colonial port, they might engage in carrying, as they would be allowed to carry, our own produce to any market.

Now, sir, said Mr. T., is it not apparent to every mind, and can it be denied or doubted, that this state of the commercial intercourse between the British colonies and the United States, will be decidedly disadvantageous to our navigation, besides placing this nation before the world, in the attitude of humiliation? To permit it would be to abandon entirely the ground which this country had uniformly maintained, in its commercial relations and intercourse with all nations. It would be a departure from the principles which had governed our councils from the organization of our Government. For himself he was free to say that he would not yield his assent to a measure which involved such consequences. Such a state of things ought not to exist. In his opinion, a due regard to the honor of the country forbade it. The rights and honor of the nation he would maintain. However anxious he might be that the two Governments should make a friendly and satisfactory arrangement, in respect to a subject which had so long been in negotiation, he was, by no means, prepared to give his consent to an act, which, in the event of no arrangement being made, would leave British shipping in possession of the whole trade with the British West Indies, and to give to it a most manifest advantage in the continental ports, while it left our own navigation pressed by all the embarrassments and restrictions to which it was now subjected by British laws. If this bill should become a law, he thought its tendency would be to procrastinate, rather than to facilitate an arrangement between the two Governments.

MARCH, 1827.]

British Colonial Trade.

[H. OF R.]

He was utterly opposed to the adoption of any measure, which did not establish an ultimate exclusion from our ports, of British ships coming from the colonies, in case Great Britain should continue the provisions of her Order in Council. If that order should not be annulled, he deemed an interdict of all intercourse with the British colonies indispensable, and he entertained the decided opinion that the interdict ought now to be established by Congress, to take effect after a reasonable time. The want of such an interdict constituted the chief defect of the bill under consideration, and with him, an insuperable objection to it.

Mr. T. said he should have preferred the 30th of September next, as the period when the prohibition of the colonial intercourse proposed by the amendment should take effect, the former acts, on the same subject, having gone into operation on the 30th of September next following their passage; but he was not disposed to insist on that day, and was willing, for the purpose of effecting the passage of a proper act, which he deemed important, to extend the period to the 31st of December next. In this opinion he understood the Committee on Commerce to concur. A full and fair opportunity would thereby be afforded to settle, by negotiation, a perplexing and difficult question, affecting important interests.

The interdict of the Order in Council took effect in less than four months after the promulgation of the order, but we, by this amendment, do not propose an interdict until the lapse of ten months, although the British interdict has been in operation since last December. This certainly was liberal, perhaps too liberal; but it would manifest a friendly spirit, as well as a spirit of forbearance on the part of this Government. It will, however, give the British Government distinctly to understand, what is our purpose on the happening of an event which we wish to avoid. He would not leave the matter in a state of uncertainty, which might, and probably would, induce the British Government to speculate on our ultimate measure. It was due to frankness, that the measure by which we mean to abide be now fixed.

The measure certainly could not be justly offensive to Great Britain. She had no right to except to it, having herself led the way. It was not a threat, but a measure of protection on our part.

In order to effect the interdict which the Committee on Commerce considered expedient, the amendment he had offered proposed to revive the acts of the 18th of April, 1818, and of the 15th of May, 1820, which constituted the interdict deemed proper by Congress at that time, under circumstances like the present. The measure now proposed had been tested by experience, and found effectual. It had once induced Great Britain to open her colonial ports to our navigation, and would probably be again followed by a like result. It was the safer mode, because it had been tried. The construction of those acts had been settled, and was well understood. He, therefore, was willing to substitute the system established by those acts for the interdict originally proposed by the Committee on Commerce. It was co-extensive with the Order in Council, and met, and would, he hoped, thwart, the object of it.

The amendment provides, also, that the act of March 1st, 1823, shall be repealed on the 31st of December next, and thus will take away that obstacle to negotiation. Mr. T. said he felt fully satisfied that no measure of less rigor than that proposed in the amendment, ought to be adopted; but with that alteration of the bill, he should give it his support. Unless the principle of the amendment should be incorporated into the bill in some form, it was to him very objectionable, and, in his opinion, it ought not to be passed.

He said he had proposed in the amendment, certain modifications of the section of the bill from the Senate under consideration, which were intended, by a change of the phraseology, to remove an ambiguity that was apparent on a slight examination of it, and to make the section clear and explicit. As the section stood, it might lead to difficulty, in case it should become necessary to carry it into effect. He submitted the amendment to the House, in the hope that it would be approved.

Mr. FORSYTH rose to state what he understood to be the difference between the bill from the Senate and the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce of the House, and the effect which would be produced on the bill of the Senate by the amendment just proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON.) The bill from the Senate proposes to suffer the trade to remain as it now is, until the 31st of December next; suspends the acts of 1818, 1820, and 1823, except in regard to the discriminating duties, until that time; after the 31st of December, the discriminating duties are abolished, but the acts of 1818, 1820, and 1823, will stand as they now do, and if, in the mean time, no arrangement is made, the President must, according to the provision of the act of 1823, issue his proclamation announcing the existence of the fact, upon which the acts of 1818 and 1820 are immediately in force. The bill of the Committee on Commerce of the House interdicts all intercourse after the 30th of September, unless one of two propositions offered to Great Britain by the bill is accepted before that day. In the mean time the trade remains as it is. After that time, if no arrangement is made, there is an interdict of all intercourse. The difference between the two propositions is, as to time, between the 30th of September and the 30th of December. Our bill proposes express terms on which alone the trade can be restored to its former state. The other leaves the whole matter open to negotiation. Both are founded on a belief that the British Government is disposed to make a fair arrangement. The proposition of the Senate is preferable, as it gives more time, and leaves the whole subject to negotiation, unembarrassed by legislative propositions. The gentleman now proposes, as an amendment to the Senate's bill, to revive the acts of 1818 and 1820, and to repeal the act of 1823, after the 31st of December, leaving the trade just as it would stand under the bill, until that time. The proposed amendment is unnecessarily involved. The acts of 1818 and 1820 being suspended by the act of 1823, will revive whenever the act of 1823 is repealed. The proposition is, therefore, simply to repeal, on the 31st day of December, the act of 1823, the trade being, in the mean time, in the same condition as it will be if the Senate's bill should become a law. The value of the proposed amendment would be perceptible by considering the relative condition in which the trade would stand on the 31st of December, supposing that no satisfactory arrangement is made in the interim, under the bill of the Senate, as it is, and as it would be, if the amendment should be adopted. On the 31st of December, under the Senate's bill, all the acts of 1818, 1820, and 1823, will stand as they now do, save only that the discriminating duties will be repealed. The President must issue his proclamation under the act of 1823, and the acts of 1818 and 1820 interdicting intercourse will be enforced. Under the bill as proposed to be amended, the act of 1823, which suspends the acts of 1818 and 1820, being repealed, the acts of 1818 and 1820 are enforced without a proclamation. The whole difference then is between an interdict preceded by proclamation of the President and an interdict without a proclamation. Entertaining as he did, the belief that the act of 1823 did not vest a discretion in the President to withhold the proclamation after the fact contemplated by the act occurred, Mr. F. could not see the policy of touching the Senate's bill. He submitted to the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Commerce, and to the gentlemen who thought with him, whether it would not be better at once to adopt the bill of the Senate, and put an end to the question. Were he even incorrect in that opinion, as the President would have the power, under the act of 1823, to issue the proclamation, Mr. F. presumed gentlemen would be willing to rely upon the firmness of the Chief Magistrate to do that which they seemed to believe the public interest would require. Mr. F. could not understand why the proposed amendment was urged as less humiliating than the Senate's bill, or in what respect it produced any alteration in the trade between this and the 31st of December. If he was incorrect in his views of the matter, he stood open to conviction, and would acknowledge the error, when it should be pointed out to him.

Mr. ARCHER thought it was not very material which of the two propositions the House should accept. He was one of those who thought there could be no sort of advantage from a retrospect of what had taken place. Our object at present was to produce an arrangement of the existing difficulty—and whether, by going back to the steps which had been taken, we should prove that we, or Great Britain, had been in the wrong, it would, in his opinion, be equally undesirable. There was but one purpose for which such a retrospect could be necessary, viz: to determine at what point in the controversy we had now arrived. If this Government does not mismanage, and without necessity provoke that of Great Britain, there will undoubtedly be an adjustment. It was impossible she should refuse to put the trade upon a proper footing, unless she should have her national pride provoked by some offensive features in our bill. What was, in truth, the great difference between the Senate's bill, and the amendment of this House? Both held out substantially the same terms. According to both, the trade will remain as it now stands till December. The amendment couples with this a matter of offence—a menace of interdict. It tells Great Britain that you hold a rod over her head. Why must this be added? Do we want to offend? Do we wish to prevent a compromise? Great Britain is disposed to adopt our terms, unless we fasten on something offensive. And to what end shall we do this? Will any one tell me that England does not already fully understand, that, if she refuses, we shall apply an interdict? There can surely be no one so absurd as to suppose this for a moment. She will understand this fully, as well without a threat as with one. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not risk losing the bill, by pertinaciously insisting on the amendment. The bill of the House was not so full as that of the Senate, and by insisting, they would only get into a squabble with the Senate, and effect no good purpose.

Mr. WYERS said, that he was one of those who had voted to extend the interdict to Canada; but for the sake of getting the bill through the House, he had given up his opinion; but he had rather have no bill at all than take that of the Senate; that bill leaves the trade open, subject to discriminating duties; to this he did not object; he considered it as liberal and proper; but it goes further, and proposes, after the 31st of December, to repeal the discriminating duties. Could gentlemen feel prepared to go home and say to their constituents, we left the trade, until the 31st of December, in the possession of British vessels, and after that period, we left vessels, trade, and all, in their hands? Mr. W. said that he, for one, was not content to leave matters in such a posture. By the amendment, we propose to say to Great Britain, in a spirit of manly frankness, not in a spirit of hostility, if you accept the terms we offer you, it is well, but if not, the acts of 1818 and 1820 will go into force. He trusted the next Congress would do more than this. He concluded by saying that he was willing to abandon his objection respecting the Canadian trade, but he could not consent to give up the amendment.

MARCH, 1827.]

The United States and Georgia.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BRYAN said, that his State was materially interested in the present question; and if the bill had come up at an earlier period of the session, he should have considered it his duty to have gone into a more extensive discussion of the subject than would now be proper. He rose at present chiefly for the purpose of pointing out the inconsistency into which the House would be betrayed by adopting the amendment. He was willing to act fairly, but he would also act firmly. When the Government did interdict the trade he was in favor of making the interdict general. The great majority of the House, he was confident, were disposed to advocate an interdiction both by sea and land; and if it were laid at all, it should not only revive the acts of 1818 and 1820, which cut off the trade "by seas," but should extend universally to every part of the Union. If it was intended as a threat directed to the interests of Great Britain, it should be made to affect her interests as much as possible. It was at present the policy of Great Britain to revive the trade of the Canadas, and to build up those provinces as rivals to the United States. The extensive fortifications now erecting all along the frontier, were not without a meaning; the proximity of these provinces to our territory enabled her to assail our trade and navigation more effectually through the Canadas than through the West Indies. She is evidently about to try the experiment whether she cannot feed her West India possessions through her continental provinces; if she finds that she can do this, she will turn about and laugh at us, and set our interdicts at defiance.

The question was then taken, and the amendment agreed to, 80 to 56.

The United States and Georgia.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

WASHINGTON, 2d March, 1827.

I transmit to both Houses of Congress copies of communications received yesterday by the Secretary of War from the Governor of Georgia, and from Lieut. Vinton.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

[The communications herewith transmitted consist of the letter of Governor Troup, already published by us as copied from the Georgia papers, and two letters from Lieutenant Vinton to the War Department, one of which transmits the Georgia paper containing the military order of Governor Troup; and also the following, which, by some accident or other, we had not before seen:]

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA,
Milledgeville, 17th February, 1827. }

Ordered, That the Attorney and Solicitors General of this State, in every instance of complaint made of the arrest of any Surveyor engaged in the survey of the lately ceded Territory, by any civil process under authority of the Government of the United States, do take all necessary and legal measures to effect the liberation of the person so arrested, and to bring to justice, either by indictment or otherwise, the officers or parties concerned in such arrestation as offenders against the laws and violators of the peace and personal security of the public officers and citizens of this State; that they give professional advice and assistance in their defence against any prosecution or action which may be instituted against them as officers in the service of the State; and that they promptly make known to this Department, their acts and doings in the premises.

It is, moreover, enjoined on the civil magistrates of this State, having competent jurisdiction of the same, to be aiding and assisting in inquiring into the causes of every such arrest or detention as aforesaid, that the person may be discharged forthwith, if illegally or unjustly detained; and in affording such redress to the aggrieved or injured party, as, by law, he may be entitled to receive.

By the Governor:

E. H. PIERCE, Secretary.

Mr. EVERETT moved its reference to the Select Committee on the subject of the Georgia Controversy.

Mr. FORSYTH warmly opposed this reference; and, after some discussion, moved to lay the Message and documents upon the table, and to print them.

The motion was negatived—ayes 54, noes 68.

The discussion was then farther continued by Messrs. DRAYTON and WRIGHT, when the Message, &c., was referred to the Select Committee, as moved by Mr. EVERETT—ayes 68, noes 41.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to postpone the orders of the day, which precede two bills granting certain sections of land to the States of Illinois and Indiana, to aid those States in the construction of two canals.

The motion prevailed. The bills were taken up, and after an animated debate, in which Messrs. WEBSTER, HOFFMAN, HAMILTON, WOODS, GOVAN, HAILE, and MERCER, took part, Mr. HOFFMAN moved to lay the bill for Illinois on the table.

The motion was negatived, and the debate renewed by Messrs. BASSETT, MERCER, McDUFFIE, WEBSTER, HAMILTON, MINER, and BURGESS; when Mr. BURGESS moved to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was negatived—ayes 60, noes 65.

Mr. HAYNES now moved that the House take a recess till six o'clock, which was carried.

At the evening session, Mr. STORRS moved that a Committee of Conference be appointed on the part of the House to meet a similar committee on the part of the Senate, on its disagreement to the second amendment made by the House in the bill for the gradual increase in the Navy—(for increasing the number of Dry Docks to three.) The motion prevailed, and a committee of three was ordered.

Canal in Illinois.

The bill allowing certain townships of land to aid the State of Illinois in the construction of a canal being again under consideration—

Mr. MINER moved to recommit the bill, "with instructions to inquire into the expediency of subscribing, on behalf of the United States, for stock in the proposed canal, to an amount not exceeding one-third of the whole; the stock to be paid for out of the proceeds of lands on or near the route."

Mr. M. avowed his decided hostility to the bill. What does it propose? said he. To give to the State of Illinois certain alternate sections of land, along the whole line of the proposed canal from Michigan to the Illinois River. The first question that arose was, what was the extent of this grant? how much land did we give? Could any gentleman tell? It was estimated at about two hundred thousand acres; but as the extent of the line of the canal was indefinite, so the grant was indefinite. Illinois might make the canal only fifty or sixty miles, and demand only two hundred thousand acres; but she might extend the canal down the Illinois along the whole extent of the State, and, under this bill, demand five hundred thousand, eight hundred thousand, or a million of acres. It is, said Mr. M., a strong objection, to my mind, that the whole matter is so indefinite. If we grant, we ought to know precisely what. These uncertain indefinite grants were extremely objectionable. No member on the floor of the House could tell, within several hundred thousand acres, what amount of land he was giving.

Again, sir, why do we give? We are told that if this canal be made, it will enhance the value of the public land through which it passes. Admitted. If we give money towards making the canal, we should know, then, exactly what we give, and all the public land would be enhanced in value; that which we propose to give, as well as what we retain. But suppose a proposition was made on this ground, to give to that State $200,000 to make the canal, would there be a single vote in this House in favor of such a proposition? But the argument would be equally strong in behalf of a grant of money as of land, and not liable to so many just objections. What is money? It is not value—it is the representative of value. Land is as valuable at what it is worth; and if you give the value, it matters not whether in money or land. Why then will gentlemen vote away the public property of one sort, when they would not of another? What is the value of this land? On the line of the canal, villages, towns, and cities, will grow up; some of the tracts will be of great value; take it altogether, it will not be an unfair estimate to put it at five dollars an acre. Suppose the canal 60 miles in length, and the land given 200,000 acres: you give then a million of dollars to Illinois: the canal is estimated to cost from 600,000 to 800,000 dollars; so that you make the canal and give a bounty to that State besides. Who makes the canal? Those who furnish the funds. The people of the United States make the canal, and then they are to be taxed to all enduring time for liberty to use it. He begged gentlemen to consider that there was no restriction, no limitation, on the State of Illinois, as to the amount of tolls; they might impose tolls the most burdensome. He thought the matter had not been well considered. There is no member in this House or in this nation, more ardently the friend of internal improvements, (said Mr. M.,) than I am; but, I think the better mode to pursue is to subscribe to stock in canals so that our expenditure shall be an accumulating fund, enabling us to do more and more good as we advance. This seems to me a wild waste of the public domain. I entreat gentlemen to pause before they make this excessive grant. In my opinion, it will bring a system of internal improvements more into disrepute than all the arguments of its enemies. Sir, Pennsylvania came this session, I will not say cap in hand and with bended knee, but in the most respectful manner, and asked the grant of one little township for her institution for the deaf-mutes—poor dumb mouths—they could not plead for themselves. What was the answer? This petition was rejected—this request was refused; and now you propose to give to Illinois two hundred thousand acres. I hope the bill may be recommitteed.

After some further debate—

Mr. HOFFMAN moved to lay the bill on the table.

On this question, Mr. VANCE demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House. The question was then taken, and determined in the negative, by yeas and nays—69 to 92.

Mr. HAILE advocated the grant to Illinois.

The motion of Mr. MINER was then determined in the negative.

Mr. HAILE then moved an amendment pro-

MARCH, 1837.]

British Colonial Trade.

[H. OF R.]

posing a similar grant to each State in the Union, for the purposes of internal improvements—but the Chair decided the motion to be out of order.

Mr. HAYDEN moved to strike out 20, and insert 10, as the number of years within which the canal must be completed. The motion was negatived—ayes 59, noes 73.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and was read a third time; and, the question being, shall it pass?

Mr. McCOR demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House, and were, yeas 90, nays 67.

So the bill was passed, and returned to the Senate.

A similar bill, with respect to the Indiana canal, was ordered to a third reading, and, having been immediately read a third time, was passed, and returned to the Senate.

The House, on motion of Mr. BRENT, went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WICKLIFFE in the chair, on the bill to increase the salary of the Postmaster General.

Mr. LOSE moved an amendment, going to increase the salaries of his two assistants by $500 each, and reduce the increase proposed for the Postmaster General from $2,000 to $1,000.

The amendment was negatived; and the bill was reported to the House without amendment, read a third time; and the question being on its passage—

Mr. BARENGER asked the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them.

Mr. PEARCE opposed the bill; insisting that the merit of the present incumbent was leading the House to an improper enlargement of the salary attached to the office. He referred to the Fifth Auditor, as performing duties equally arduous, and expressed an opinion that $1,000 would be a sufficient increase.

Mr. COCKE warmly advocated the bill, and spoke in high terms of the fidelity and industry of the officer in question.

Mr. FORSYTH said a few words on the same side; when

Mr. KREMER warmly opposed the bill, as did

Mr. PEARCE, in a few closing remarks; when, the question being taken, the bill was passed—ayes 103.

The House then, on motion of Mr. VANCE, went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. FORSYTH in the chair, on the bill to increase the compensation of Captains and Subalterns in the Army; which was reported without amendment, read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

The Navy Bill.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee of Conference, appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill for the gradual improvement of the Navy, made a report, by which the Joint Committee of Conference recommended that the following clause be added, by both Houses, to the fourth section of the bill, and that the amendment of the House be receded from on its part: "and as soon as the said docks shall be completed, docks shall be constructed at the two remaining places, surveyed under the resolution of the 22d of May, 1826."

A message from the Senate was received, stating that it had refused to agree to this clause, and adhered to its own bill.

[The House then receded from its amendment, and the bill was subsequently passed.]

Colonial Trade Bill.

The disagreement of the Senate to the amendment of the House, to the Colonial Bill, having been announced—

Mr. TOMLINSON moved that the House insist on its amendment and ask a conference.

Mr. FORSYTH stated that the United States were obliged to act with delicacy on this subject, because Great Britain has told us, in a sarcastic, if not an insolent tone, that so long as the act of 1823 remains unrepealed, things shall remain as they are. The committee in its propositions, has evaded the question. The difference between the 30th of September, at which time the committee proposed that the bill should take effect, and the 31st December, which is proposed by the Senate, he did not regard as worth disputing about.

Mr. WEBSTER most decidedly supported the motion for insisting on the amendment to the bill, as made by this House, preferring that the bill should fail altogether, rather than it should pass without this amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT said, the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) when he first addressed the Chair, insisted there was no material difference between the bill from the Senate and the amendment of this House, and he invoked you not to sacrifice the interests involved in this question upon mere punctilio and form. Now the gentleman seems to think there is a material difference in the propositions, and the comparison results favorably, in his view, to the bill from the Senate. It is difficult, sir, to accord with the views of gentlemen who shift their ground so often, and in so short a time, and we must endeavor to inform ourselves, from some other source, of the true state of the case.

I think, sir, said Mr. W., there is a very material difference between the two propositions, and I will endeavor in a few words—for I will not, at this late hour, consume your time in discussion—to give you the sum of the difference. The proposition of the House contains specific legislative provisions, of a retaliatory character, intended to remedy the unjust inequality to which the British Government has subjected our trade with her colonies. These provisions are in conformity with the course and policy heretofore pursued by the Government, with the sanction of the country. The bill from the Senate, to my understanding, makes no such provisions, but leaves every thing at loose ends. It says to the British Government, if you do not, within a given time, change your determination in relation to our trade, we shall do nothing, and let you take your own course. Here is, indeed, an essential difference. The one proposition abandons the settled policy of the country, its legislation, and its interests, to the entire control of British legislation, and the orders of the King and his Ministers in council. The other occupies American ground, and seeks, by congressional enactments, to remedy existing evils. Sir, the agricultural, grain-growing portions of this community have too much at the hazard in this question not to be deeply sensible of the great importance of this trade, as affecting the almost entire markets for their surplus produce. But, sir, let foreign Governments affect this interest as they will, gentlemen may rest assured the farmers of the United States will never abandon their own country, or submit American interests and American rights to the fostering care of Great Britain, or to British legislation. I, for one, sir, can never consent to give up the power of legislating for the rights and interests of the people of the United States, which, under the constitution, the people have confided to us, to the control or direction of any foreign power whatever, much less to the Parliament of Great Britain. Let us legislate for ourselves, and preserve the rights and interests of the people, by our own acts, and not abandon them to our enemy and rival. I had much rather no act should pass on the subject of this trade, than to pass the bill from the Senate, and I think such is the sentiment of the people of the country. I hope we shall insist on our amendment, and if we fail of success in that, that the bill from the Senate will be rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would have preferred the bill of this House to that of the Senate, because it came out boldly. But the committee had abandoned this bill, and allowed Great Britain a monopoly until the 31st of December. He was willing to support the dignity of the country. He thought the only difference was, whether we should act now by anticipation, or at the meeting of the next Congress? He was unwilling to act now in the manner proposed by the Committee on Commerce, since it had taken this bill. If Congress should not act, he, for one, should not blame the President for issuing his proclamation, and ordering an interdiction.

Mr. WURTS defended the Committee on Commerce for having taken the bill from the Senate, on the ground that it was so late in the session as to render it impracticable to get the original bill through. He was willing to leave the legislation on the subject till next Congress. The President had acted well in refraining from issuing his proclamation as Congress was about to go into session, and in leaving it to Congress. Now let Congress act, and give its opinion. Why should it not do so? Why is it to be left to the Executive? He would rather leave the whole to Congress at its next session, than agree to this amendment of the Senate.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, if I correctly apprehend the true state of this question, as presented by the conflicting views of the two Houses, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) is under an erroneous impression as to the supposed inefficiency of the bill of the Senate. I understand the gentleman to say that the bill sent to us by the Senate absolutely effects nothing until the 31st of December next, and that we had as well pass no bill at all until the meeting of the next Congress. The gentleman appears to me to have overlooked entirely the very diplomatic difficulty which our present legislation is intended to remove. It will be recollected that the great obstacle which has heretofore prevented the adjustment of this question with England, is the pretension set up by our Government, under the ambiguous phraseology of the act of 1823, to have our merchandise imported into the British West India islands, with no higher duties than are levied upon similar merchandise imported into those islands, from the other parts of the British Empire. The British Minister alleges that this is in effect to claim to have our own citizens placed not only upon the footing of the most favored nations, but on the footing of English subjects; and that he will not consent to negotiate upon the subject, while such an absurd pretension remains upon our statute book. This I understand to have been the ground upon which Mr. Canning broke off the negotiation with our Government; for it was not until the British Government was informed that a proposition to repeal the exceptionable pretensions set up by the act of 1823, had been rejected by the legislative branch of this Government, that Mr. Canning refused to continue the negotiation. Now, sir, the object of the bill of the Senate is to do what we were prevented from doing at the last session, by the interference of the Executive, and which, if it had been done, this whole difficulty would have been avoided. The bill proposes to renounce, by a legislative declaration, the indefensible pretension which the British Minister seems to regard as an insuperable barrier to negotiation, and which our own Government, in their instructions to Mr. Gallatin, have distinctly abandoned. To say, therefore, that the bill of the Senate will effect nothing until the 31st of December, appears to me to be an assertion founded upon a total misconception of the causes of our present difficulty. It is not because the British are unwilling to accept the terms recently offered by our Government through Mr. Gallatin; for they are the very terms that Government offered to accept more than twelve months before Mr. Gallatin's arrival in England. It is not because our Government are now unwilling to grant those terms, for, after huckstering for an unattainable

MARCH, 1827.]

British Colonial Trade.

[H. OF R.]

ble shadow till they lost the substance, they are now willing and anxious to do what they grossly neglected to do when they had the power. The real difficulty, then, which now remains between the Governments, is not one affecting the honor of either, but a mere matter of diplomatic etiquette.

The British Government proposed, by the act of Parliament of 1825, to place our trade with their West India islands on a footing of perfect reciprocity. Our Legislature, under the avowed recommendation of the Executive Government, refused to meet this legislative tender by a corresponding act on our part.

The British Government have chosen to regard this as a disrespectful tampering with their dignity. Whether it is so or not, I think it is the part of a wise Legislature to avail itself of the very first occasion to convince the British Government that we had no such intention. And, sir, if the influence of the Administration shall again defeat the attempt to remove the existing obstacles, as present appearances seem to indicate, I trust the nation will place the responsibility of the failure upon the shoulders of those who ought to bear it. The Senate have sent to this House a bill which does remove the existing difficulty, in the least exceptionable mode, and will enable our Government to resume the negotiation with the strongest possible hopes of success. The friends of the Administration in this House attach an amendment to the bill of the Senate, which is to have no effect until a month after the meeting of the next Congress, and yet declare they would rather lose the bill altogether than not have this amendment incorporated in it! Now, sir, I think the amendment proposed by this House, decidedly exceptionable, because it holds out an unprofitable threat to the British Government, which may prevent them from negotiating or rescinding their Orders in Council, but certainly can do no good before the meeting of Congress. There is another objection to the amendment proposed by this House. It does not embrace, in the interdiction it denounces after the 31st December next, the trade through the Canadas. Now, sir, I am clearly of the opinion that, whenever we do resort to a system of retaliatory prohibition, it ought to close up every avenue through which the interdicted trade may be carried on. If the British Government perceive, from a previous legislative declaration of ours, that we intend to leave open the Canadas, she will have all the inducement to adhere to her restrictive system, which the prospect of supplying her islands from the United States, through that avenue, is calculated to hold out. This is a contest, not for commerce, but for navigation. If, therefore, the British Islands shall be supplied through the Canadas, Great Britain will have the whole carrying trade—the very object of the controversy. The Senate therefore consider it important to exclude our proposed amendment from their bill; and if the friends of the Administration in this House will pertinaciously adhere to an amendment which may do harm, and can do no good, with a full knowledge that, by such adherence, they will defeat the bill altogether, then I presume the responsibility of defeating the only measure which can extricate us from our diplomatic entanglements will fairly rest, a second time, upon the Executive Government. I trust, sir, the House will not adhere to its amendment, as, in the present state of the question, a vote to adhere is equivalent to a determination that no legislative act shall be passed on the subject.

Mr. LITTLE, then, after a few remarks on the shortness of the time remaining, demanded the previous question.

The call was sustained by the House, and the House having then determined that the main question shall now be put.

The question was then put, "Shall this House insist on its amendment?" and decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, noes 47.

The question being put on asking a conference, Mr. McDUFFIE asked the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them.

Mr. POWELL advocated a conference, as did also Mr. McDUFFIE, Mr. CAMBRELENG, and Mr. TOMLINSON; and the question being put, the conference was asked for, and a committee of three appointed.

Mr. TOMLINSON, from the Committee of Conference on the Colonial Bill, reported that the Conferees of the two Houses had been unable to agree, and moved that this House do adhere to its amendment.

On this motion a very extensive and animated debate took place, which continued till near two o'clock.

The main question was then put, viz: "Will this House adhere to its amendment?" and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen of Mass., Bailey, Badger, Baldwin, Bartlett, Bartley, Barber of Conn., Barney, Brent, Burges, Clarke, Cocke, Crowninshield, Davis, Dwight, Eastman, Everitt, Fosdick, Gurley, Hasbrouck, Henry, Herrick, Hoffman, Hugunin, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Ky., Kidder, Lathrop, Lawrence, Little, Locke, Mal-lary, Martindale, Marvin of New York, M'Manus, Meech, Merwin of Conn., Metcalfe, Miller of New York, Miner, James S. Mitchell, O'Brien, Pearce, Porter, Powell, Reed, Ross, Sands, Scott, Shannon, Sloane, Sprague, Stewart, Storrs, Strong, Swann, Test, Tomlinson, Tucker of New Jersey, Vance, Var-num, Wales, Ward, Webster, Whipple, Whittemore, Whittlesey, Williams, James Wilson, Woods of Ohio, Wright, Wurts, Young—75.

NAYS.—Messrs. Addams of Pa., Alexander of Va., Alexander of Tenn., Alston, Angel, Ashley, Barbour of Va., Barringer, Bayle, Blair, Bradley, Bryan, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Carson, Cary, Claiborne, Conner, Crump, Davenport, Deitz, Drayton, Edwards of Pa., Edwards of N. C., Findlay of Pa., Findlay of Ohio, Forsyth, Forward, Govan, Hamilton, Harris, Harvey, Haynes, Hines, Houston, Ingham, Isaacs, Jennings, Krebs, Kremer, Lecompte, Livingston, Long, Marable, McCoy, McDuffie, McHatton, Merri-wether, Miller of Pa., John Mitchell, Mitchell of Md., Mitchell of Tenn., Moore of Ky., Newton, Orr, Owen, Peter, Plumer, Polk, Taliaferro, Trezvant, Verplanck, Weems, Wickliffe, Wolfe—65.

H. OF R.]

The United States and Georgia.

[MARCH, 1837.]

So the House resolved to adhere to its amendment.

SATURDAY, March 3.

Thanks to the Speaker.

On motion of Mr. SWAN, it was Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Honorable JOHN W. TAYLOR, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

Register of Debates.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved the following resolution—

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized and directed to subscribe for three hundred copies of the Register of the Debates in Congress, for the two last sessions, published by Gales and Seaton, at the rate of five dollars per volume, and that he be authorized to pay for the same out of the contingent fund of this House.

In supporting this resolution, Mr. McD. adverted to the necessity for a work of this description, and its value in illustrating the laws of the country, by showing the motives and reasons which had influenced the Legislature in passing them; stated the great expense incidental to such a publication, and the inability of the publishers to persevere in their design without aid from Congress, as the character and price of the work restrained it from a circulation proportioned to its great public utility.

Mr. WEBSTER, after expressing similar views, stated his belief that the encouragement proposed in the resolution would be insufficient, and moved to increase the number of copies from three to five hundred.

Mr. McDUFFIE accepted this amendment as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. BARTLETT made some further observations on the character of the work, as hitherto executed, and in support of the resolution as modified.

Mr. FORSYTH opposed the resolution; and was replied to by Mr. EVERETT and Mr. MERCER; When the resolution was adopted.

Colonization Society.

Mr. MERCER, from the Select Committee to whom were referred the memorials of the American Colonization Society, and of sundry citizens of the United States praying for the aid of Congress in colonizing the free people of color of the United States in Africa; together with the resolutions of the States of Delaware and Kentucky, recommending to the favorable regard of Congress the prayer of the memorialists, made a report thereon favorable to the views of the memorialists, but recommending that the subject be postponed till the next session of Congress.

On a motion to print the report, a desultory debate arose, in which Messrs. FORSYTH, KRAMER, STRONG, CAMBRELENG, MERCER, and HAMILTON, took part.

Mr. WEEMS said he felt himself constrained to offer a word or two on this subject. He owed it to the honorable chairman, and to each member of the committee who had directed him to present this report, and, as one of that committee, to himself, to remark, that he considered this, to say the least of it, one of the most unusual and unprecedented attacks ever made upon a report on its presentation to this House; and he might be permitted to add, with propriety, the most unwarrantable. To print reports without being read was, assuredly, an every day practice. But if the House, under existing circumstances, was willing to afford the time, the committee could have no possible objection to have the report read; that he had heard it read twice, and that attentively, and so far as judgment went, he could assure gentlemen they would find it ably and instructively drawn up, not meddling in the least with the right of property in the slave, whilst, at the same time, it pointed out the true policy as to what should be done with the free people of color. A train of reasoning, sir, well calculated to produce convictions as desirable as honorable. When read, and properly understood, he might be permitted to say, he hoped and believed would be the means, under Providence, of inducing the South to step forward, and the North no longer to hold back. He said it was not his intention, at this stage of the session, unnecessarily to detain the House. The gentleman last up, from Maine, (Mr. SPRAGUE), had measureably saved him the necessity, by anticipating him in some of his remarks. The report ought, and he trusted would be sustained, now that it had been attacked without a hearing, consequently the contents unknown. He would trouble the House with no further remark, but leave it to their good sense and justice, under a persuasion they would order the report to be printed.

And the report was then ordered to be printed—ayes 71, noes 40.

Georgia and the United States.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Select Committee to which was referred two Messages from the President of the United States, with resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia, and other documents, relating to the controversy as to the right to certain lands lying within the limits of the State of Georgia, occupied and claimed by the Creek Indians, made a long and detailed report thereon, recommending the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to procure a cession of the Indian lands in the limits of Georgia.

2. Resolved, That, until a cession is procured, the laws of the land, as set forth in the Treaty of Washington, ought to be maintained by all necessary constitutional and legal means.

Mr. EVERETT, after some remarks on the late

MARCH, 1827.]

Final Proceedings.

[H. OF R.]

ness of the period of the session, and the unwillingness of the committee, at this moment, to engage in the discussion, unless compelled to do so by a determination of others to debate the subject, made a motion that the report and accompanying documents be printed.

The Chair thought some other disposition of the report must first be made.

Mr. POWELL moved to lay the report on the table, and print it; but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. DRAYTON, who said, as he did not concur in the report which had just been read, he should offer an amendment to it. The questions arising out of this report, (said Mr. D.,) require for their solution the consideration of great constitutional and legal principles—an examination into the political and territorial rights of Georgia before and since the adoption of the Federal Constitution; and an inquiry into the powers affecting these political and territorial rights, which, under that instrument, have been granted to the United States. Grave and complicate such investigations would be, if they were presented to us merely as abstract propositions; but when the parties at issue are the United States and a sovereign State, when the maintenance of the conflicting doctrines asserted by the President, and by the Governor of Georgia, may lead to the employment of the regular force against our fellow-citizens, may shake the solid fabric of our Union to its centre, and involve our country in the horrors of civil war, it is difficult to conceive any investigation in which we could be engaged, of a more important and critical nature. It would be incumbent upon a member of this body, before he approached their discussion, anxiously and dispassionately to have directed his mind to the subject, and after having done so, to state and support his opinion respectfully, but fully, candidly, and fearlessly. I have, sir, bestowed upon this report, and upon the matters growing out of it, as much attention as my duties as a member of the committee, and as my other duties as a member of the House, permitted, and I have arrived at the conclusions contained in the resolutions which I shall submit. Though it is ardently to be desired, that the judgment of Congress should be pronounced upon this controversy, as it would doubtless have a salutary influence in assuaging the passions which have been excited, yet believing that to be impracticable at this expiring period of the session, I shall refrain from making any observations in support of my resolutions, unless any arguments should be urged in favor of the report. In that event, I should endeavor to reply to those arguments, and to support my own views by reasoning and by authorities. Without further trespassing upon the time of the House, I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to offer the following resolutions as an amendment to the report of the committee, to be inserted after the word "report:"

1. Resolved, That the State of Georgia possesses the right to the soil, and the jurisdiction over the lands within her limits, which are in the occupancy of the Creek Indians.

2. Resolved, That the State of Georgia has the right to extinguish the title to the lands of the Indians within her Territory, and to legislate for them in all cases, subject to the right of Congress to "regulate commerce with the Indian tribes."

3. Resolved, That surveying lands in the occupancy of the Indians, within the limits of the State of Georgia, and by the authority of her Legislature, is not an interference with the right of Congress to "regulate commerce with the Indian tribes."

5. Resolved, That the treaty of the Indian Springs having been executed and ratified by the Creek Indians, and having been executed and ratified on the part of the United States, in the manner prescribed by the constitution, and never having been constitutionally repealed, all the rights which under it were conveyed to the State of Georgia are unimpaired at this time.

5. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to extinguish the claim which is set up by the Creek Indians to the lands in their occupancy, in the State of Georgia, which were not comprehended in the treaty of Washington.

[The question was then taken on printing, and carried in the affirmative.]

Mr. EVERETT moved the printing of 3,000 copies—6,000 also was moved, and 1,000.

The question being taken on 6,000—the yeas were 61, noes 57.

Final Proceedings.

A message was received from the Senate, notifying the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and to inform him, that, if he has no further communications to make to Congress, the two Houses are about to close the present session by an adjournment.

The House concurred in the resolution for the appointment of this committee, and Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. BASSETT were named of the committee on its part.

The SPEAKER then rose and addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

It was with unaffected diffidence, at the commencement of this Congress, that I entered upon the duties of the distinguished station to which your partiality was pleased to call me. For the favorable estimate you have this day expressed of my official labors, I pray you to accept my most grateful acknowledgments. The generous support which has been uniformly given to the decisions of the Chair, and the indulgence which has been extended to me, in the discharge of every other duty, have left on my heart an impression as enduring as life.

If the deliberations of this Congress have not resulted in many acts of great national interest, it has arisen from no omission on the part of the Representatives of the people to devote their time and talents to the public service; but is attributable, in part, to the happy condition of the country, which required few changes in its established policy, and, in part, to a difference of opinion between the two branches of the Legislature in regard to some measures of primary importance.

Under your fostering care, however, our establishments for defence, both military and naval, have advanced towards maturity; the means of information and commercial intercourse have been extended; the national debt has been reduced; and your best efforts have not been wanting to afford protection and encouragement to our navigation and manufactures.

More than two thousand subjects, of various description, presented for legislation, have been examined and reported upon, by the committees of this House, whose valuable and persevering labors entitle them to public gratitude. Although many important bills are arrested in their progress by the termination of Congress, the industry and intelligence which have been employed in maturing them will not be lost. To the hands of our successors we may safely confide the doing of whatever the nation shall require to be done.

With earnest prayers that the services in which we have been engaged may redound to the general welfare; that each of you, under the guidance of a protecting Providence, may meet your families and friends in health and prosperity, and long enjoy the confidence and esteem of your constituents; in closing the session, I wish you an affectionate farewell.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported the performance of that duty, and that the President had no further communication to make to the House.

A message was sent to the Senate, notifying them that this House is ready to adjourn; whereupon

The SPEAKER then adjourned the House sine die.

DECEMBER, 1827.]

President's Message.

[SENATE.]

TWENTIETH CONGRESS.—FIRST SESSION.

BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 8, 1827.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.*

MONDAY, December 8, 1827.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the Honorable JOHN C. CALHOUN, Vice President of the United States, took the chair. The roll of Senators having been called over by Mr. LOWRIN, the Secretary, it appeared that every member was in attendance, except Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

The oath of office was then administered to such members as, having been elected since the last session, now take their seats for six years from the present time.

On motion of Mr. MACON, the Secretary was ordered to wait upon the House of Representatives, and inform them that a quorum of the Senate was present, and ready to proceed to business. He returned, and reported that the House had not yet elected their Speaker.

A message was shortly after received from the House of Representatives by their Clerk, announcing that a quorum of that House had assembled; that ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia, had been elected their Speaker, and that they were ready to proceed to business.

Soon after, a second message informed the Senate that the House had passed a joint resolution, that a committee be appointed by each House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that they were ready to receive any communication he might have to make.

The resolution was concurred in, and Messrs. MACON, and SMITH, of Maryland, were appointed a committee on the part of the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 4.

Mr. MACON, from the Joint Committee of both Houses, appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, reported that they had done so, and had received for answer that the President would make a communication, in writing, to both Houses, at twelve o'clock this day.

The Message was shortly after received from the President of the United States, by Mr. John Adams, his private Secretary, and was read as follows:

Message of the President.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

A REVOLUTION of the seasons has nearly been completed since the representatives of the People and States of this Union were last assembled at this place, to deliberate and to act upon the common important interests of their constituents. In that interval, the never-slumbering eye of a wise and beneficent Providence has continued its guardian care over the welfare of our beloved country. The blessing of health has continued generally to prevail throughout the land. The blessing of peace with our brethren of the human race, has been enjoyed without interruption; internal quiet has left

* LIST OF MEMBERS OF THE SENATE.

Maine.—John Chandler, Albion K. Parria.
New Hampshire.—Samuel Bell, Levi Woodbury.
Massachusetts.—Nathaniel Silsbee, Daniel Webster.
Connecticut.—Samuel A. Foot, Calvin Willey.
Rhode Island.—Nehemiah R. Knight, Asher Robbins.
Vermont.—Dudley Chase, Horatio Seymour.
New York.—Martin Van Buren, Nathan Sanford.
New Jersey.—Mahlon Dickerson, Ephraim Bateman.
Pennsylvania.—William Marks, Isaac D. Barnard.
Delaware.—Louis McLane, Henry M. Ridgely.
Maryland.—Samuel Smith, Ezekiel Chambers.

Virginia.—L. W. Tazewell, John Tyler.
North Carolina.—John Branch, Nathaniel Macon.
South Carolina.—William Smith, Robert Y. Hayne.
Georgia.—J. McPherson Berrien, Thomas W. Cobb.
Kentucky.—Richard M. Johnson, John Rowan.
Tennessee.—John H. Eaton, Hugh L. White.
Ohio.—William H. Harrison, Benjamin Ruggles.
Louisiana.—Dominique Boulligny, Josiah S. Johnston.
Indiana.—William Hendricks, James Noble.
Mississippi.—Thomas H. Williams, Powhattan Ellis.
Illinois.—Elias K. Kane, Jesse B. Thomas.
Alabama.—Henry Chambers, William R. King.
Missouri.—David Barton, Thomas H. Benton.

SENATE.]

President's Message.

[DECEMBER, 1827.]

our fellow-citizens in the full enjoyment of all their rights, and in the free exercise of all their faculties to pursue the impulse of their nature, and the obligation of their duty, in the improvement of their own condition. The productions of the soil, the exchanges of commerce, the vivifying labors of human industry have combined to mingle in our cup a portion of enjoyment as large and liberal as the indulgence of heaven has perhaps ever granted to the imperfect state of man upon earth; and as the purest of human felicity consists in its participation with others, it is no small addition to the sum of our national happiness, at this time, that peace and prosperity prevail to a degree seldom experienced over the whole habitable globe; presenting, though as yet with painful exceptions, a foretaste of that blessed period of promise, when the lion shall lie down with the lamb, and wars shall be no more. To preserve, to improve, and to perpetuate the sources, and to direct, in their most effective channels, the streams which contribute to the public weal, is the purpose for which government was instituted. Objects of deep importance to the welfare of the Union are constantly recurring, to demand the attention of the Federal Legislature; and they call with accumulated interest, at the first meeting of the two Houses, after their periodical renovation. To present to their consideration, from time to time, subjects in which the interests of the nation are most deeply involved, and for the regulation of which the legislative will is alone competent, is a duty prescribed by the constitution, to the performance of which the first meeting of the new Congress is a period eminently appropriate, and which it is now my purpose to discharge.

Our relations of friendship with the other nations of the earth, political and commercial, have been preserved unimpaired, and the opportunities to improve them have been cultivated with anxious and unremitting attention. A negotiation upon subjects of high and delicate interest with the government of Great Britain, has terminated in the adjustment of some of the questions at issue upon satisfactory terms, and the postponement of others for future discussion and agreement. The purposes of the Convention concluded at St. Petersburg, on the 12th day of July, 1822, under the mediation of the late Emperor Alexander, have been carried into effect, by a subsequent Convention concluded at London on the 18th of November, 1826, the ratifications of which were exchanged at that place on the 6th day of February last. A copy of the proclamation issued on the nineteenth day of March last, publishing this Convention, is herewith communicated to Congress. The sum of twelve hundred and four thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars, therein stipulated to be paid to the claimants of indemnity under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, has been duly received, and the commission instituted conformably to the act of Congress of the second of March last, for the distribution of the indemnity to the persons entitled to receive it, are now in session, and approaching the consummation of their labors. This final disposal of one of the most painful topics of collision between the United States and Great Britain, not only affords an occasion of gratulation to ourselves, but has had the happiest effect in promoting a friendly disposition, and in softening asperities upon other objects of discussion. Nor ought it to pass without the tribute of a frank and cordial acknowledgment of the magnanimity with which an honorable nation, by the reparation of their own wrongs, achieves a triumph more glorious than any field of blood can ever bestow.

The Conventions of 8d July, 1815, and of 20th of October, 1818, will expire by their own limitation on the 20th of October, 1828. These have regulated the direct commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, upon terms of the most perfect reciprocity; and they effected a temporary compromise of the respective rights and claims to territory westward of the Rocky Mountains. These arrangements have been continued for an indefinite period of time, after the expiration of the above-mentioned Convention; leaving each party the liberty of terminating them, by giving twelve months' notice to the other. The radical principle of all commercial intercourse between independent nations, is the mutual interest of both parties. It is the vital spirit of trade itself; nor can it be reconciled to the nature of man, or to the primary laws of human society, that any traffic should long be willingly pursued, of which all the advantages are on one side, and all the burdens on the other. Treaties of Commerce have been found, by experience, to be among the most effective instruments for promoting peace and harmony between nations whose interests, exclusively considered on either side, are brought into frequent collision by competition. In framing such treaties, it is the duty of each party, not simply to urge with unyielding pertinacity that which suits his own interest, but to concede liberally to that which is adapted to the interest of the other. To accomplish this, little more is generally required than a simple observance of the rule of reciprocity; and were it possible for the statesmen of one nation, by stratagem and management, to obtain from the weakness or ignorance of another, an overreaching treaty, such a compact would prove an incentive to war rather than a bond of peace. Our conventions with Great Britain are founded upon the principles of reciprocity. The commercial intercourse between the two countries is greater in magnitude and amount than between any two other nations on the globe. It is, for all purposes of benefit or advantage to both, as precious, and in all probability far more extensive than if the parties were still constituent parts of one and the same nation. Treaties between such States, regulating the intercourse of peace between them, and adjusting interests of such transcendent importance to both, which have been found, in a long experience of years, mutually advantageous, should not be lightly cancelled or discontinued. Two conventions for continuing in force those above mentioned have been concluded between the Plenipotentiaries of the two Governments, on the sixth of August last, and will be forthwith laid before the Senate for the exercise of their constitutional authority concerning them.

In the execution of the Treaties of Peace, of November, 1782, and September, 1783, between the United States and Great Britain, and which terminated the War of our Independence, a line of boundary was drawn as the demarcation of territory between the two countries, extending over near twenty degrees of latitude, and ranging over seas, lakes, and mountains, then very imperfectly explored, and scarcely opened to the geographical knowledge of the age. In the progress of discovery

DECEMBER, 1827.]

President's Message.

[SENATE.]

and settlement by both parties, since that time, several questions of boundary between their respective territories have arisen, which have been found exceedingly difficult of adjustment. At the close of the last war with Great Britain, four of these questions pressed themselves upon the consideration of the negotiator of the Treaty of Ghent, but without the means of concluding a definitive arrangement concerning them. They were referred to three separate Commissions, consisting of two Commissioners, one appointed by each party, to examine and decide upon their respective claims. In the event of this disagreement between the Commissioners, it was provided that they should make reports to their several Governments; and that the reports should finally be referred to the decision of a sovereign, the common friend of both. Of these commissions, two have already terminated their sessions and investigations, one by entire, and the other by partial agreement. The Commissioners of the fifth article of the Treaty of Ghent have finally disagreed, and made their conflicting reports to their own governments. But from these reports a great difficulty has occurred in making up a question to be decided by the Arbitrator. This purpose has, however, been effected by a fourth Convention, concluded at London by the Plenipotentiaries of the two Governments on the 29th of September last. It will be submitted, together with the others, to the consideration of the Senate.

While these questions have been pending, incidents have occurred of conflicting pretensions, and of dangerous character upon the territory itself in dispute between the two nations. By a common understanding between the Governments it was agreed that no exercise of exclusive jurisdiction by either party, while the negotiation was pending, should change the state of the question of right to be definitively settled. Such collision has nevertheless recently taken place, by occurrences the precise character of which has not yet been ascertained. A communication from the Governor of the State of Maine, with accompanying documents and a correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Minister of Great Britain, on this subject, are now communicated. Measures have been taken to ascertain the state of the facts more correctly, by the employment of a special agent to visit the spot where the alleged outrages have occurred, the result of whose inquiries, when received, will be transmitted to Congress.

While so many of the subjects of high interest to the friendly relations between the two countries have been so far adjusted, it is a matter of regret that their views respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British Colonial possessions have not equally approximated to a friendly agreement.

At the commencement of the last Session of Congress, they were informed of the sudden and unexpected exclusion by the British Government, of access, in vessels of the United States, to all their colonial ports, except those immediately bordering upon our own territories. In the amicable discussions which have succeeded the adoption of this measure, which, as it affected harshly the interests of the United States, became a subject of expostulation on our part, the principles upon which its justification has been placed, have been of a diversified character, it has been at once ascribed to a mere recurrence to the old, long-established principle of colonial monopoly, and at the same time to a feeling of resentment, because the offers of an Act of Parliament opening the colonial ports upon certain conditions, had not been grasped at with sufficient eagerness by an instantaneous conformity to them. At a subsequent period it has been intimated that the new exclusion was in resentment, because a prior Act of Parliament, of 1822, opening certain colonial ports, under heavy and burdensome restrictions, to vessels of the United States, had not been reciprocated by an admission of British vessels from the colonies, and their cargoes, without any restriction or discrimination whatever. But, be the motion for the interdiction what it may, the British Government have manifested no disposition, either by negotiation or by corresponding legislative enactments, to recede from it, and we have been given distinctly to understand, that neither of the bills which were under the consideration of Congress, at their last session, would have been deemed sufficient in their concessions, to have been rewarded by any relaxation from the British interdiction. It is one of the inconveniences inseparably connected with the attempts to adjust by reciprocal legislation, interests of this nature, that neither party can know what would be satisfactory to the other; and that, after enacting a statute for the avowed and sincere purpose of conciliation, it will generally be found utterly inadequate to the expectations of the other party, and will terminate in mutual disappointment.

The session of Congress having terminated without any act upon the subject, a Proclamation was issued, on the 17th of March last, conformably to the provisions of the sixth section of the act of 1st March, 1823, declaring the fact that the trade and intercourse authorized by the British Act of Parliament, of 24th June, 1822, between the United States and the British enumerated colonial ports, had been, by the subsequent Acts of Parliament, of 5th July, 1825, and the Order of Council, of 27th July, 1826, prohibited. The effect of this Proclamation, by the terms of the Act under which it was issued, has been, that each and every provision of the Act concerning Navigation, of 18th April, 1848, and of the Act supplementary thereto, of 15th May, 1820, revived, and is in full force. Such, then, is the present condition of the trade, that, useful as it is to both parties, it can, with a single momentary exception, be carried on directly by the vessels of neither. That exception itself is found in a Proclamation of the Governor of the island of St. Christopher and of the Virgin islands, inviting, for three months from the 28th of August last, the importation of the articles of the produce of the United States, which constitute their export portion of this trade, in the vessels of all nations. That period having already expired, the state of mutual interdiction has again taken place. The British Government have not only declined negotiation upon this subject, but, by the principle they have assumed with reference to it, have precluded even the means of negotiation. It becomes not the self-respect of the United States, either to solicit gratuitous favors, or to accept as the grant of a favor that for which an ample equivalent is exacted. It remains to be determined by the respective Governments, whether the trade shall be opened by acts of reciprocal legislation. It is in the mean time satisfactory to know, that, apart from the inconveniences resulting from a disturbance of the usual channels of trade, no loss has been sustained by the commerce, the navigation, or the revenue of the United States, and none of magnitude is to be apprehended from this existing state of mutual interdict.

With the other maritime and commercial nations of Europe, our intercourse continues, with little variation. Since the cessation, by the Convention of 24th June, 1822, of all discriminating duties upon the vessels of the United States and France, in either country, our trade with that nation has increased and is increasing. A disposition on the part of France has been manifested to renew that negotiation; and, in acceding to the proposal, we have expressed the wish that it might be extended to other objects, upon which a good understanding between the parties would be beneficial to the interests of both. The origin of the political relations between the United States and France, is coeval with the first years of our independence. The memory of it is interwoven with that of our arduous struggle for national existence. Weakened as it has occasionally been since that time, it can by us never be forgotten; and we should hail with exultation, the moment which should indicate a recollection, equally friendly in spirit, on the part of France. A fresh effort has been recently made, by the Minister of the United States residing at Paris, to obtain a consideration of the just claims of the citizens of the United States, to the reparation of wrongs long since committed, many of them frankly acknowledged, and all of them entitled, upon every principle of justice, to a candid examination. The proposal last made to the French Government has been to refer the subject, which has formed an obstacle to this consideration, to the determination of a sovereign, the common friend of both. To this offer no definite answer has yet been received; but the gallant and honorable spirit which has at all times been the pride and glory of France, will not ultimately permit the demands of innocent sufferers to be extinguished in the mere consciousness of the power to reject them.

A new Treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce, has been concluded with the kingdom of Sweden, which will be submitted to the Senate for their advice with regard to its ratification. At a more recent date, a Minister Plenipotentiary from the Hanseatic Republics of Hamburg, Lubeck, and Bremen, has been received, charged with a special mission for the negotiation of a Treaty of amity and commerce between that ancient and renowned League and the United States. This negotiation has accordingly been commenced and is now in progress, the result of which will, if successful, be also submitted to the Senate for their consideration.

Since the accession of the Emperor Nicholas to the Imperial throne of all the Russias, the friendly dispositions towards the United States, so constantly manifested by his predecessor, have continued unabated; and have been recently testified by the appointment of a Minister Plenipotentiary to reside at this place. From the interest taken by this sovereign in behalf of the suffering Greeks, and from the spirit with which others of the great European Powers are co-operating with him, the friends of freedom and of humanity may indulge the hope, that they will obtain relief from that most unequal of conflicts, which they have so long and so gallantly sustained: that they will enjoy the blessing of self-government, which by their sufferings in the cause of liberty they have richly earned; and that their independence will be secured by those liberal institutions, of which their country furnished the earliest examples in the history of mankind, and which have consecrated to immortal remembrance the very soil for which they are now again profusely pouring forth their blood. The sympathies which the People and Government of the United States have so warmly indulged with their cause, have been acknowledged by their government, in a letter of thanks, which I have received from their illustrious President, a translation of which is now communicated to Congress, the Representatives of that nation to whom this tribute of gratitude was intended to be paid, and to whom it was justly due.

In the American hemisphere, the cause of Freedom and Independence has continued to prevail; and if signalized by none of those splendid triumphs which had crowned with glory some of the preceding years, it has only been from the banishment of all external force against which the struggle had been maintained. The shout of victory has been superseded by the expulsion of the enemy over whom it could have been achieved. Our friendly wishes and cordial good will, which have constantly followed the Southern nations of America in all the vicissitudes of their war of Independence, are succeeded by a solicitude, equally ardent and cordial, that, by the wisdom and purity of their institutions, they may secure to themselves the choicest blessings of social order, and the best rewards of virtuous liberty. Disclaiming alike all right and all intention of interfering in those concerns which it is the prerogative of their Independence to regulate as to them shall see fit, we hail with joy every indication of their prosperity, of their harmony, of their persevering and inflexible homage to those principles of freedom and of equal rights, which are alone suited to the genius and temper of the American nations. It has been, therefore, with some concern that we have observed indications of intestine divisions in some of the Republics of the South, and appearances of less union with one another, than we believe to be the interest of all. Among the results of this state of things has been that the Treaties concluded at Panama do not appear to have been ratified by the contracting parties, and that the meeting of the Congress at Tacubaya has been indefinitely postponed. In accepting the invitations to be represented at this Congress, while a manifestation was intended on the part of the United States, of the most friendly disposition towards the Southern Republics by whom it had been proposed, it was hoped that it would furnish an opportunity for bringing all the nations of this hemisphere to the common acknowledgment and adoption of the principles, in the regulation of their international relations, which would have secured a lasting peace and harmony between them, and have promoted the cause of mutual benevolence throughout the globe. But as obstacles appear to have arisen to the re-assembling of the Congress, one of the two Ministers commissioned on the part of the United States has returned to the bosom of his country, while the minister charged with the ordinary mission to Mexico, remains authorized to attend at the conferences of the Congress whenever they may be resumed.

A hope was for a short time entertained, that a treaty of peace actually signed between the Governments of Buenos Ayres and Brazil would supersede all further occasion for those collisions between belligerent pretensions and neutral rights, which are so commonly the result of maritime war, and which have unfortunately disturbed the harmony of the relations between the United States and the Brazilian Governments. At their last session, Congress were informed that some of the naval officers of that empire had advanced and practised upon principles in relation to blockades and to neutral navigation, which we could not sanction, and which our commanders found it necessary to resist. It appears that they have not been sustained by the Government of Brazil itself. Some of the vessels captured under the assumed authority of these erroneous principles have been restored; and we trust that our just expectations will be realized, that adequate indemnity will be made to all the citizens of the United States who have suffered by the unwarranted captures which the Brazilian tribunals themselves have pronounced unlawful.

DECEMBER, 1827.]

President's Message.

[SENATE.]

In the diplomatic discussions at Rio de Janeiro, of these wrongs sustained by citizens of the United States, and of others which seemed as if emanating immediately from that Government itself, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, under an impression that his representations in behalf of the rights and interests of his countrymen were totally disregarded and useless, deemed it his duty, without waiting for instructions, to terminate his official functions, to demand his passports, and return to the United States. This movement, dictated by an honest zeal for the honor and interests of his country; motives which operated exclusively upon the mind of the officer who resorted to it, has not been disapproved by me. The Brazilian Government, however, complained of it as a measure for which no adequate intentional cause had been given by them; and upon an explicit assurance, through their Chargé d'Affaires, residing here, that a successor to the late Representative of the United States near that Government, the appointment of whom they desired, should be received and treated with the respect due to his character, and that indemnity should be promptly made for all injuries inflicted on citizens of the United States, or their property, contrary to the laws of nations, a temporary commission as Chargé d'Affaires to that country has been issued, which it is hoped will entirely restore the ordinary diplomatic intercourse between the two Governments, and the friendly relations between their respective nations.

Turning from the momentous concerns of our Union in its intercourse with foreign nations, to those of the deepest interest in the administration of our internal affairs, we find the revenues of the present year corresponding as nearly as might be expected with the anticipations of the last, and presenting an aspect still more favorable in the promise of the next. The balance in the Treasury on the first of January last was six millions three hundred and fifty-eight thousand six hundred and eighty-six dollars and eighteen cents. The receipts from that day to the 30th of September last, as near as the returns of them yet received can show, amount to sixteen millions eight hundred and eighty-six thousand five hundred and eighty-one dollars and thirty-two cents. The receipts of the present quarter, estimated at four millions five hundred and fifteen thousand, added to the above, form an aggregate of twenty-one millions four hundred thousand dollars of receipts. The expenditures of the year may perhaps amount to twenty-two millions three hundred thousand dollars, presenting a small excess over the receipts. But of these twenty-two millions, upwards of six have been applied to the discharge of the principal of the public debt; the whole amount of which, approaching seventy-four millions on the first of January last, will on the first day of next year fall short of sixty-seven millions and a half. The balance in the Treasury on the first of January next, it is expected, will exceed five millions four hundred and fifty thousand dollars; a sum exceeding that of the first of January, 1825, though falling short of that exhibited on the first of January last.

It was foreseen that the revenue of the present year would not equal that of the last, which had itself been less than that of the next preceding year. But the hope has been realized which was entertained, that these deficiencies would in nowise interrupt the steady operation of the discharge of the public debt by the annual ten millions devoted to that object by the act of 3d March, 1817.

The amount of duties secured on merchandise imported from the commencement of the year until the 30th of September last, is twenty-one millions two hundred and twenty-six thousand, and the probable amount of that which will be secured during the remainder of the year, is five millions seven hundred and seventy-four thousand dollars; forming a sum total of twenty-seven millions. With the allowances for drawbacks and contingent deficiencies which may occur, though not specifically foreseen, we may safely estimate the receipts of the ensuing year at twenty-two millions three hundred thousand dollars; a revenue for the next equal to the expenditure of the present year.

The deep solicitude felt by our citizens of all classes throughout the Union for the total discharge of the public debt, will apologize for the earnestness with which I deem it my duty to urge this topic upon the consideration of Congress; of recommending to them again the observance of the strictest economy in the application of the public funds. The depression upon the receipts of the revenue which had commenced with the year 1826, continued with increased severity during the two first quarters of the present year. The returning tide began to flow with the third quarter, and so far as we can judge from experience, may be expected to continue through the course of the ensuing year. In the mean time, an alleviation from the burden of the public debt will in three years have been effected to the amount of nearly sixteen millions, and the charge of annual interest will have been reduced upwards of one million. But among the maxims of political economy which the stewards of the public moneys should never suffer without urgent necessity to be transcended, is that of keeping the expenditures of the year within the limits of its receipts. The appropriations of the two last years, including the yearly ten millions of the sinking fund, have each equalled the promised revenue of the ensuing year. While we foresee with confidence, that the public coffers will be replenished from the receipts, as fast as they will be drained by the expenditures, equal in amount to those of the current year, it should not be forgotten that they could ill suffer the exhaustion of larger disbursements.

The condition of the army, and of all the branches of the public service under the superintendence of the Secretary of War, will be seen by the report from that officer, and the documents with which it is accompanied.

During the course of the last summer, a detachment of the army has been usefully and successfully called to perform their appropriate duties. At the moment when the commissioners appointed for carrying into execution certain provisions of the treaty of August 19th, 1825, with various tribes of the north-western Indians, were about to arrive at the appointed place of meeting, the unprovoked murder of several citizens, and other acts of unequivocal hostility, committed by a party of the Winnebago tribe, one of those associated in the treaty, followed by indications of a menacing character, among other tribes of the same region, rendered necessary an immediate display of the defensive and protective force of the Union in that quarter. It was accordingly exhibited by the immediate and concerted movements of the Governors of the State of Illinois, and of the Territory of Michigan, and competent levies of militia under their authority, with a corps of seven hundred men of United States troops under the command of General Atkinson, who, at the call of Governor Cass, immediately repaired to the scene of danger from their station at St. Louis. Their presence dispelled the alarms of our fellow citizens on those borders, and overawed the hostile purposes of the Indians. The perpetrators of the murders were surrendered to the authority and operation of our laws; and every appearance of purposed hostility from those Indian tribes has subsided.

Although the present organization of the army, and the administration of its various branches of service, are, upon the whole, satisfactory, they are yet susceptible of much improvement in particulars, some of which have been heretofore submitted to the consideration of Congress, and others are now first presented in the report of the Secretary of War.

The expediency of providing for additional numbers of officers in the two corps of engineers will, in some degree, depend upon the number and extent of the objects of national importance upon which Congress may think it proper that surveys should be made, conformably to the act of the 30th of April, 1824. Of the surveys which, before the last session of Congress, had been made under the authority of that act, reports were made:

1. Of the Board of Internal Improvement, on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.
2. On the continuance of the National Road from Cumberland to the tide waters within the District of Columbia.
3. On the continuation of the National Road from Canton to Zanesville.
4. On the location of the National Road from Zanesville to Columbus.
5. On the continuation of the same road to the seat of Government in Missouri.
6. On a Post Road from Baltimore to Philadelphia.
7. Of a survey of Kennebec River, (in part.)
8. On a National Road from Washington to Buffalo.
9. On the survey of Saugatuck harbor and river.
10. On a canal from Lake Pontchartrain to the Mississippi River.
11. On surveys at Edgartown, Newburyport, and Hyannis harbor.
12. On survey of La Plaisance Bay, in the Territory of Michigan.

And reports are now prepared, and will be submitted to Congress:

On surveys of the Peninsula of Florida, to ascertain the practicability of a canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic with the Gulf of Mexico, across that Peninsula; and also, of the country between the Bays of Mobile and of Pensacola, with the view of connecting them together by a canal;

On surveys of a route for a canal to connect the waters of James and Great Kanawha Rivers;

On the survey of the Swash in Pamlico Sound, and that of Cape Fear, below the town of Wilmington, in North Carolina;

On the survey of the Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee River, and for a route for a contemplated communication between the Hiwassee and Coosa Rivers, in the State of Alabama.

Other reports of surveys, upon objects pointed out by the several acts of Congress, of the last and preceding sessions, are in the progress of preparation, and most of them may be completed before the close of this session. All the officers of both corps of engineers, with several other persons duly qualified, have been constantly employed upon these services, from the passage of the act of 30th April, 1824, to this time. Were no other advantage to accrue to the country from their labors than the fund of topographical knowledge which they have collected and communicated, that alone would have been a profit to the Union more than adequate to all the expenditures which have been devoted to the object; but the appropriations for the repair and continuation of the Cumberland road, for the construction of various other roads, for the removal of obstructions from the rivers and harbors, for the erection of light-houses, beacons, piers, and buoys, and for the completion of canals, undertaken by individual associations, but needing the assistance of means and resources more comprehensive than individual enterprise can command, may be considered rather as treasures laid up from the contributions of the present age, for the benefit of posterity, than as unrequited applications of the accruing revenues of the nation. To such objects of permanent improvement to the condition of the country, of real addition to the wealth as well as to the comfort of the people by whose authority and resources they have been effected, from three to four millions of the annual income of the nation have, by laws enacted at the three most recent sessions of Congress, been applied without intrenching upon the necessities of the Treasury; without adding a dollar to the taxes or debts of the community, without suspending even the steady and regular discharge of the debts contracted in former days, which, within the same three years, have been diminished by the amount of nearly sixteen millions of dollars.

The same observations are, in a great degree, applicable to the appropriations made for fortifications upon the coasts and harbors of the United States, for the maintenance of the Military Academy at West Point, and for the various objects under the superintendence of the Department of the Navy. The report of the Secretary of the Navy, and those from the subordinate branches of both the Military Departments, exhibit to Congress, in minute detail, the present condition of the public establishments dependent upon them; the execution of the acts of Congress relating to them; and the views of the officers engaged in the several branches of the service, concerning the improvements which may tend to their perfection. The fortifications of the coasts, and the gradual increase and improvement of the Navy, are parts of a great system of national defence,

DECEMBER, 1827.]

President's Message.

[SENATE.]

which has been upwards of ten years in progress, and which for a series of years to come, will continue to claim the constant and persevering protection and superintendence of the legislative authority. Among the measures which have emanated from these principles, the act of the last session of Congress, for the gradual improvement of the Navy, holds a conspicuous place. The collection of timber for the future construction of vessels of war; the preservation and reproduction of the species of timber peculiarly adapted to that purpose; the construction of dry docks for the use of the Navy; the erection of a marine railway for the repair of the public ships; and the improvements of the navy yards for the preservation of the public property deposited in them; have all received from the Executive the attention required by that act, and will continue to receive it, steadily proceeding towards the execution of all its purposes. The establishment of a Naval Academy, furnishing the means of theoretic instruction to the youths who devote their lives to the service of their country upon the ocean, still solicits the sanction of the Legislature. Practical seamanship, and the art of navigation, may be acquired upon the cruises of the squadrons, which, from time to time, are despatched to distant seas: but a competent knowledge, even, of the art of ship building, the higher mathematics, and astronomy; the literature which can place our officers on a level of polished education with the officers of other maritime nations; the knowledge of the laws, municipal and national, which, in their intercourse with foreign States and their Governments, are continually called into operation; and above all, that acquaintance with the principles of honor and justice; with the higher obligations of morals, and of general laws, human and divine, which constitute the great distinction between the warrior patriot, and the licensed robber and pirate; these can be systematically taught and eminently acquired only in a permanent school, stationed upon the shore, and provided with the teachers, the instruments, and the books conversant with and adapted to the communication of the principles of these respective sciences to the youthful and inquiring mind.

The report from the Postmaster General exhibits the condition of that Department as highly satisfactory for the present, and still more promising for the future. Its receipts for the year ending the first of July last, amounted to one million four hundred and seventy-three thousand five hundred and fifty-one dollars, and exceeded its expenditures by upwards of one hundred thousand dollars. It cannot be an over-anguine estimate to predict that, in less than ten years, of which one-half have elapsed, the receipts will have been more than doubled. In the mean time a reduced expenditure upon established routes has kept pace with increased facilities of public accommodation, and additional services have been obtained at reduced rates of compensation. Within the last year the transportation of the mail in stages has been greatly augmented. The number of post offices has been increased to seven thousand; and it may be anticipated that, while the facilities of intercourse between fellow citizens, in person or by correspondence, will soon be carried to the door of every villager in the Union, a yearly surplus of revenue will accrue, which may be applied as the wisdom of Congress, under the exercise of their constitutional powers, may devise for the further establishment and improvement of the public roads, or by adding still further to the facilities in the transportation of the mails. Of the indications of the prosperous condition of our country, none can be more pleasing than those presented by the multiplying relations of personal and intimate intercourse between the citizens of the Union dwelling at the remotest distances from each other.

Among the subjects which have heretofore occupied the earnest solicitude and attention of Congress, is the management and disposal of that portion of the property of the Nation which consists of the public lands. The acquisition of them, made at the expense of the whole Union, not only in treasure but in blood, marks a right of property in them equally extensive. By the report and statements from the General Land Office, now communicated, it appears, that, under the present Government of the United States, a sum little short of $3,000,000 dollars, has been paid from the common Treasury, for that portion of this property which has been purchased from France and Spain, and for the extinction of the aboriginal titles. The amount of lands acquired is near two hundred and sixty millions of acres, of which, on the first of January, 1826, about one hundred and thirty-nine millions of acres had been surveyed, and a little more than nineteen millions of acres had been sold. The amount paid into the Treasury by the purchasers of the lands sold is not yet equal to the sum paid for the whole, but leaves a small balance to be refunded; the proceeds of the sales of the lands have long been pledged to the creditors of the Nation; a pledge from which we have reason to hope that they will in a very few years be redeemed. The system upon which this great National interest has been engaged, was the result of long, anxious, and persevering deliberation; matured and modified by the progress of our population and the lessons of experience. It has been hitherto eminently successful. More than nine-tenths of the lands still remain the common property of the Union, the appropriation and disposal of which are sacred trusts in the hands of Congress. Of the lands sold, a considerable part were conveyed under extended credits, which, in the vicissitudes and fluctuations in the value of lands, and of their produce, became oppressively burdensome to the purchasers. It can never be the interest or the policy of the Nation to wring from its own citizens the reasonable profits of their industry and enterprise, by holding them to the rigorous import of disastrous engagements. In March, 1821, a debt of twenty-two millions of dollars, due by purchasers of the public lands, had accumulated, which they were unable to pay. An act of Congress, of the 2d of March, 1821, came to their relief, and has been succeeded by others; the latest being the act of the 4th of May, 1826, the indulgent provisions of which expired on the 4th of July last. The effect of these laws has been to reduce the debt from the purchasers, to a remaining balance of about four millions three hundred thousand dollars due; more than three-fifths of which are for lands within the State of Alabama. I recommend to Congress the revival and continuance for a further term, of the beneficent accommodations to the public debtors, of that statute, and submit to their consideration, in the same spirit of equity, the remission, under proper discriminations, of the forfeitures of partial payments on account of purchases of the public lands, so far as to allow of their application to other payments.

There are various other subjects of deep interest to the whole Union, which have heretofore been recommended to the consideration of Congress, as well by my predecessors, as, under the impression of the duties devolving upon me, by myself. Among these are the debt, rather of justice than gratitude, to the surviving warriors of the Revolutionary War; the extension of the Judicial Administration of the Federal Government to those extensive and important members of the Union, which, having risen into existence since the organization of the present Judiciary establishment, now constitute at least one-third of its territory, power, and population; the formation of a more effective and uniform system for the government of the Militia, and the amelioration, in some form or modification, of the diversified and often oppressive code relating to Insolvency. Amidst the multiplicity of topics of great national concernment which may recommend themselves to the calm and patriotic deliberations of the Legislature, it may suffice to say, that on these and all other measures which may receive their sanction, my hearty co-operation will be given, conformably to the duties enjoined upon me, and under the sense of all the obligations prescribed by the constitution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Washington, December 4, 1827.

On motion of Mr. BELL, it was ordered that three thousand copies of the Message, and one thousand five hundred copies of the documents accompanying it, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MONDAY, December 10.

The Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury was communicated by the Vice President, and 1,500 copies thereof ordered to be printed.

Election of Senate Officers.

The Senate then proceeded to the election of its officers for the present Congress, when the following individuals were declared to be elected, and took the oaths of their respective offices:

WALTER LOWRIE, Secretary.

MOUNTJOY BAYLY, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper.

HENRY TINS, Assistant Doorkeeper.

This being the day appointed for the election of the Standing Committees, the Senate proceeded to ballot for the chairman and members of each in rotation, and elected eight committees.

TUESDAY, December 11.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for the remainder of the Standing Committees, and made the appointments required.

FRIDAY, December 14.

Indemnification to Foreigners.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented the petition of Robert Hall, a subject of Great Britain praying for further indemnification for the destruction of the ship Union; which was read, and, on the question, whether it should be referred to the Committee on Claims—

Mr. EATON said, that he was opposed to the reference of a petition of this description, on the ground that the question involved in it, could be settled otherwise; and that Congress was assembled to transact the business of the citizens of this country, and not that of foreigners. If the Secretary of State could not settle the question, he did not see how Congress could do it, consistently with the principles by which it was generally governed. He therefore hoped the reference would not be made.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarked that this was a case out of the scope of the general rule to which the gentleman from Tennessee alluded. The petition and papers had been received and referred by the other House. The vessel mentioned in the petition had been seized, and the cargo forfeited, on the day after the peace. And in awarding the indemnification at a former period, instead of obtaining the invoice of the cargo taken in at Sumatra, after leaving Calcutta, the invoice of the cargo taken in at Calcutta had been resorted to. The consequence was, that an indemnification was awarded to the petitioner for less in value than the loss which he really sustained. Congress was now asked to rectify this injury, growing entirely out of a mistake, and he hoped no obstruction would be thrown in the way of such an object.

Mr. HAYNE observed, that he saw some force in the objections made by the gentleman from Tennessee. The petition was presented by a British subject. That was not denied. And to him it appeared clear, that it ought to be presented officially to Congress; therefore, it seemed out of order for him to petition this body. The gentleman from Maryland had said, that this was a case peculiarly fitted to be laid before the Senate, because it had once before been passed upon by Congress; hence he argued that it ought to be considered again. If, as was stated, justice required that this matter should be investigated, there was, no doubt, a way in which it might be done. For instance, any member might present a resolution to that effect; and if the gentleman from Maryland was acquainted with the merits of the case—as he, Mr. H., could not possibly be—a resolution from him, that the Committee of Finance inquire into the merits of the claim, would, as he apprehended, arrive at the desired result. There were but two ways in which the matter could be properly settled—either that the claim should come through the British Minister, or should be settled by a resolution authorizing its investigation by the proper committee.

Mr. BENTON was convinced that the citizens of other countries had no right to petition Congress for the adjustment of their claims. For

DECEMBER, 1837.]

School Lands in Indiana.

[SENATE.]

he contended, that while our citizens had not the same right in England, it was a privilege Englishmen had no right to claim in this country. It was partial and unequal. The right was secured in the constitution, to our citizens, to petition Congress, and it was an infringement upon that right to permit foreigners to do so. If such a privilege were once accorded, there would be no possibility of measuring the inconveniences which would arise from it. The abuse of such a privilege would seriously interfere with the rights of our own citizens. He was aware of an instance in which a Frenchman had introduced a petition in the other House, which no American citizen would have introduced—and he, Mr. B., having then reflected much upon the effect of such a practice, came to the conclusion that no foreigner ought to be allowed to petition Congress; that they had no right to do it, and that it was an encroachment upon the privileges of our own citizens. He hoped, therefore, that the rule would now be established; and that, hereafter, foreigners would be restricted to applications made through their respective Ministers. On these grounds he was opposed to the reference of the petition.

Mr. MACOX said that, as it appeared desirable that the petition should be examined into, in order to decide whether it was or not an improper petition, he should move that it lie on the table. He did not intend by this course to kill it, as the gentleman from Maryland could call it up at any time.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, December 17.

Reporters to the Senate.

The following resolution submitted by Mr. HARRISON, on Friday, was taken up.

Resolved, That the Secretary, under the direction of the President of the Senate, cause seats to be prepared upon the floor of the Senate Chamber, for the accommodation of the Reporters of the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON remarked that, for introducing this proposition, he had but one reason. It was, that the seats, now occupied by the Reporters, were so situated that it was impossible for them to hear those Senators who were out of their view. He knew that the difficulties they now labored under were very great; for he himself had been made to say things that he had never conceived, which he readily believed arose from the impossibility that the Reporters could catch distinctly what passed in the body of the Senate. It must be perfectly obvious to all, that, as the seats of the Senators were now arranged, this difficulty must exist. For his own part, he had never experienced any inconvenience from the manner in which the seats were formerly arranged, but this was a serious evil, arising out of the recent change, which he wished to see removed. If the people were interested in knowing what passed in the Senate, and, if it was proper that it should be reported, it was highly desirable that it should be correctly reported.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, remarked, that he was in favor of the arrangement proposed; and was sensible of the inconveniences now experienced by the Reporters. He had seen some of the effects of the difficulty they had in hearing—as his friend from Missouri had been reported, in one of the papers, to have introduced a bill for a still further reduction of our little army of 6,000 men, when, in reality, he had only brought in a bill to explain a previous act, making that reduction; which had produced great anxiety among those whose interests seemed likely to be affected. It was impossible for the Reporters, under present circumstances, to give the proceedings more correctly than they did; and he hoped they would be so placed as to be enabled to perform their duties more satisfactorily.

The Chair observed, that the object of the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. CHANDLER,) that the floor would not be the most eligible situation, would be answered by striking out the words "on the floor of the Senate Chamber," which would leave the location of the seats at the discretion of the President and Secretary.

Mr. HARRISON expressed his acquiescence in the suggestion.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

TUESDAY, December 18.

School Lands in Indiana.

On motion of Mr. NOBLE, the bill to authorize the State of Indiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated to the use of schools in that State, was taken up.

Mr. BARTON disapproved of the practice, which seemed to be gradually becoming general, for States to sell out the lands appropriated for specific objects, although he allowed that, in the present case, the quantity of land was small. The practice, he believed, had been commenced by Ohio; but Ohio was differently situated from the other western States. In the year 1802, when Ohio was admitted into the Union, she declined acceding to that clause in the compact, in relation to reserves of land for schools, which vested the 36th section in the several towns. In 1804, a law passed in Congress, which vested those lands in Ohio in the Legislature, and, consequently, gave it a right to sell them. He supposed that Ohio might have sold these lands, without applying to the United States. But it was not so with the other States. They had not objected to the manner in which the lands had been appropriated.

His view of the matter was, that the inhabitants of all the townships must be consulted, and give their consent, before the lands could be disposed of. A glance at the geographical map of those States would convince the Senate that no satisfactory measure could be taken on that head. A great number of the townships, it would be perceived, were not now inhabited at all. His objection, therefore, was, that it was impossible for the sale to be made fairly in relation to the most of those townships, which were at present merely nominal. If the Legislature would provide against any future difficulties arising out of the sale, there might be no impropriety in passing the bill; and if the Senate was willing to trust the Legislature, so be it. He had, however, been informed by the member from Alabama, that when a bill was formerly passed in Congress, for the same purpose, in relation to that State, all the townships had not been willing to accede to the disposal of the lands.

Mr. NOBLE said that he should regret if the Senate withheld from the State of Indiana that which they had granted to the States of Ohio and Alabama. That the Legislature of Indiana had, by their resolution, instructed him, with others, to ask for the passage of a bill similar to the one now before the Senate. If gentlemen will turn their attention to the act of Congress, of April 19, 1816, in relation to the School Lands in question, they will find that the section numbered sixteen, in every township, and, when such section had been sold, other lands were to be granted to the inhabitants of the township or district for the use of Schools. The fact of the Legislature applying to Congress for permission to sell the lands, is an evidence that they are not productive, and the information is derived from the members of the Legislature. The bill is sufficiently guarded. The power to sell the lands, and to invest the money in some productive fund, which is to be applied for the use of Schools in the townships, solely, and for no other purpose, can never be done without the consent of the inhabitants of the township. Mr. N. said he thought the gentleman from Missouri might be mistaken—that he was well aware that the Legislature would never sell the land in townships inhabited, or partially so; their object would be, when they brought it into market, to obtain the best price possible, and never to sell it for the minimum price; that, in proportion to the fund becoming productive, so would education flourish. The reason to him was clear. To sell the land as wild lands, for less than the minimum price, would be folly; and to offer it for sale in a township uninhabited, could not be expected, because the competition would be too great, as the section of land would be surrounded by lands superior in quality, belonging to Government, and always in market. The sole object of the Legislature would be to protect the fund for the benefit of the inhabitants of the several townships by the consent of each, and to sell only in the portions of the country that was strongly inhabited. It has happened that, in some instances, those who have leased the school lands, have rendered them unproductive, instead of productive, by cutting and disposing of the timber, selling and disposing of the stone. There had been instances that school lands were the place of resort for timber and stone, by those who had no lease.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, December 20.

The Public Lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of ceding and relinquishing, in full property, the public lands, within the limits of the new States, to the several States in which they lie.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that, in offering this resolution, it was, perhaps, proper for him to make a few remarks. It would be recollected that, at the last session, in the form of an amendment to the bill proposing to graduate the price of the public lands, he had offered the same proposition, though in another form. The proposition of last session was one to which the attention of the Senate had not been very much directed. It was considered a novel proposition, a bold one, and there is little doubt that, by many accustomed to look to the public lands as a source of revenue, more important than they ever yet have been, or promise hereafter to be, it was deemed an unreasonable proposition. The bill and the amendment were laid upon the table, having received a very partial examination, and, for want of time, were permitted there to rest, without discussion, till the close of the session.

With a view of preventing this state of things, and that a full discussion of the principles contained in the proposition might be had at the present session, he had, at this early period, presented it to the Senate. The bill to graduate the price of the public lands would again be introduced, and, in all probability, be again referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. To this committee he wished to have this subject also referred. The Senate would then have the aid of their examinations and report, and be the better prepared for a vote upon the question.

Believing, as he did, that the sovereignty, freedom, and independence of the new States were much impaired, and that their equality with the old States was entirely taken away by the present condition of the public lands, as the representative of a new State he could not but feel a deep interest in the proposition, and he did believe that, when the subject should be fully canvassed by the Senate, the constitutional argument, and the question of expediency, would alike preponderate in favor of the new States, and strongly admonish of the propriety of an absolute transfer of the public lands to the several States in which they lie. He believed that the Federal Government had no constitutional power to hold the soil of the States, except for the special purposes design-

DECEMBER, 1837.]

Cancelling a certain Bond.

[SENATE.]

ted by the constitution, such as the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings, and even for this purpose, the consent of the Legislatures of the States was necessary, by the express language of the constitution.

He was well aware that the cessions from the States, and the pledge that the proceeds should be applied to the payment of the national debt, were usually resorted to as the authority of the General Government to hold the lands in the States; but these authorities, connected with the history of the times, which show the intentions and views of the actors of that day, instead of showing the right of this Government, might, in his opinion, be safely relied on to sustain a contrary position. It surely was the intention of Congress, and of the States, ceding waste and unappropriated lands to the Union, that the new States to be formed should be received into the Union as sovereign and independent States, and on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever; and nothing could be more clear than that this was the intention of the framers of the constitution. To maintain the equality of the States, it had even extended favors to the small States. It had, in some degree, balanced numbers in the large States, with political power in the small States. The equality of the representation in the Senate, was an instance of this. To Senators who hold to the letter of the constitution, and who deny to the Federal Government all powers not clearly expressed, he might safely appeal. To those who deny the power of Congress to interfere with the sacred soil of a State, so far only as might be necessary for the location of a road or canal, he might speak with the greatest confidence. If, according to their doctrine, Congress cannot thus temporarily occupy a small portion of the soil of a State, surely they would agree with him in saying that Congress cannot permanently hold, in full property, the entire soil of the new States.

If, then, the constitutional argument should be with him, that Congress has no power to become or to remain, the lord of the soil of the new States, no one would contend that the compacts ought to be binding; for, if they are not based on the constitution, they impose no obligation on the States. But, if even based on the constitution, it was in the power of the new States, on the principle of free agency, to make them, or to refuse to make them. If the new States had refused to make them, then the objects attained by them would have been defeated. And what were those objects? That the new States should never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil. And if this object had not been attained by the General Government, would not the converse of the proposition have been the consequence? Would not the inference have been irresistible, that the new States might have interfered with the primary disposal of the soil? Here it would, no doubt, he said, that the new States, refusing to enter into these compacts, could have been kept out of the Union. But this was ground untenable; for the new States were, by the ordinance of 1787, guaranteed admission into the Union, with a population of 60,000, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects.

Mr. H. said, that arguments of expediency, almost innumerable, might be urged in the present case. It seemed to him that whenever the subject should be fully examined, it would appear that an estimate had heretofore been put upon the public lands, far above their real value. The public lands had been in market upwards of forty years, and the whole receipts into the Treasury had been about thirty-six millions. We had now in market more than one hundred millions of acres, and for the last years the receipts had frequently been below a million, while the whole revenue of the country, in those years, had ranged from twenty to twenty-five millions. This view would show how small is the portion of our whole revenue derived from the public lands. This million, if indispensable to the Treasury, could easily be supplied in some other way. It could be laid on other objects of taxation, which would neither be seen nor felt, and the new States would rise to a level of equality with the old States. The new States would then be relieved from what he considered an unconstitutional and dangerous dependence on the old States and on the Union.

MONDAY, December 31.

The bill to authorize the cancelling of a certain bond therein mentioned, was read a second time.

Mr. CHANDLER proposed some questions in relation to the bill: Whereupon,

Mr. BERRIEN made some additional explanations, from which it appeared that the negroes (39 in number) referred to in the bill, were part of a cargo of negroes found on board a Spanish vessel which was captured by a revenue cutter of the United States, sent into Savannah, and libelled for an alleged violation of the slave acts of the United States. The Spanish Consul set up a claim to the vessel and cargo, as the property of Spanish subjects. The Portuguese consul set up a claim in behalf of certain subjects of Portugal; and the captain of a privateer, sailing under a South American flag, advanced another claim. Upon investigation, it was found that the negroes had been plundered from several Spanish and Portuguese ships, by a South American privateer. The suits growing out of these claims were prosecuted in different Courts of the United States, and, after the lapse of eight years, were finally decided by the Supreme Court, at the last term. The Portuguese claim was rejected because no owners appeared; and the Spanish claim was reduced in amount to thirty-nine negroes. The claimants were also required to give bond, with security, for the removal of the negroes from the United States. The other portion of the negroes was sent to Liberia at the expense of the Government. Meanwhile, the negroes adjudicated to the Spanish claimants had formed ties in this country, and were unwilling to be carried to the West India. The petitioner, from motives of humanity alone, purchased them from the Spanish owners, for the sum of $1,500. He had also paid for salvage $4,500, to Marshals $6,000, and to the proctors in the different courts between $2,000 and $3,000; the aggregate amount being greater than the value of the slaves. The petitioner had also offered the negroes to the Colonization Society, for transportation to Liberia, but the funds of the Society did not enable them to accept the offer. The petitioner now, therefore, prayed that the bond given for the removal of the slaves from the United States may be cancelled, in order that they may remain in a state of mitigated slavery in Georgia, where they are well treated, and content.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1828.

Cahawba Navigation Company.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill granting the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of Alabama, incorporating the Cahawba Navigation Company, without amendment.

Mr. KING remarked, that, in explanation of this bill, he would merely say, that the Legislature of this State, considering it incumbent on them to obtain the assent of Congress—in which he (Mr. K.) did not agree with them—to improve the waters within its limits, had instructed him to introduce this bill. The waters of the Cahawba were not now navigable, and it was highly desirable that the obstructions in that stream should be removed. It was therefore proposed to raise a toll upon the navigation, for the purpose of defraying the expense.

Mr. CHANDLER said that he did not know upon what ground the consent of Congress was asked.

Mr. KING further explained, that the Cahawba was a small stream running through Alabama, the navigation of which was necessary to enable the citizens of that State to transport their cotton to market, and bring back the necessary articles of merchandise. The State wished to know whether they had a right to levy a toll for the improvement of this stream, and to obtain the assent of Congress to the enterprise.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that the same bill passed the Senate last year, but did not pass the House. It involved no new principle. The compact between the United States and the new States had restricted the latter from levying tolls on the streams within their limits; and it had been customary, from time to time, to give the assent of Congress to the collection of a toll on waters not previously navigable, to defray the expense of the improvement of their navigation. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

TUESDAY, January 22.

Lieutenants in the Navy.

The bill to increase the pay of Lieutenants in the Navy was read a third time.

Mr. MACON observed, that it was not a time to increase the expenditure of the Government, as, in the part of the country where he resided, money was never scarcer, nor times harder, than now. He had observed, that it was always a good time to raise compensations, but never a good time to reduce them.

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Johnson of Ky., Johnston of Lou., Kane, King, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Sanford, Silabee, Smith of Maryland, Tyler, White, Willey—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bateman, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Hendricks, Macon, Parris, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith of South Carolina, Thomas, Williams, Woodbury—13.

MONDAY, January 28.

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill providing for certain surviving officers of the Revolution: the following motion of Mr. PARRIS being under consideration:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the committee which reported it, with instructions to provide for the payment of every officer, non-commissioned officer, and private soldier, who served in the revolutionary army, and who was entitled to pay from the Continental Treasury, for the service by him actually performed, deducting therefrom the just value of whatever such officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, may have received from the Government, in payment for his said service; and deducting, also, whatever sum he may have received, if any, under the pension law of March 1814, and May 1820.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated that the point of order presented on Friday last, relating to motions for recommitment of subjects to Select Committees, was decided by him on parliamentary principles; but he had since found that the practice of the Senate was different. [He then read the rule from Jefferson's Manual.] The parliamentary rule was more convenient, and he would now submit the point for decision to the Senate.

Mr. PARRIS said that his object was not, as had been surmised, to embarrass the bill by objections, or to defeat it by delay. He wished to further its progress. He was anxious that the bill should make a proper provision for the soldiers, but he would not say that, if he could not accomplish his views in regard to the soldiers, he would not vote for the separate provision for the officers. His object was to provide both for the officers and soldiers; they had contended side by side for their country's cause; and, in the distribution of the bounty or justice of their country, they should not be separated. There were many survivors of the contest who had no claims. The six months' militia men had, to this day, a claim on the States, severally, by which they were raised, but not on the Government. But there were regiments on the Continental establishment, as efficient as any others in the service, which had received no compensation in any way. If we gave to the officers a part of the sum due to them, we should pay the soldiers in the same proportion; and if our finances enable us to pay the officers the whole of their claims, the whole sum due to the soldiers should likewise be discharged. It was unnecessary to speak at this time of the merits and the sufferings of the soldiers. The story had often been told in this House, and it was matter of record. It was said by the Senator from New Hampshire that the half pay was promised to the officers as an inducement for them to remain in the service. The soldiers were entitled to their monthly pay, as well as the officers to their half pay for life; and if the officers had been paid in depreciated paper, so had been the soldiers. In one respect, the officers had a great advantage over the soldiers. If the officers were, by hard fare or bad usage, disgusted with the service, they could throw up their commissions and turn their backs upon the camp. But the soldiers, though suffering from want of food and clothing, were obliged, for the whole term of their enlistment, to perform the last day's service as well as the first; and if they left the camp, they were punished by martial law and punished as deserters. If any discrimination were made, it should, therefore, be in favor of the soldiers. Both officers and soldiers should be provided for, and that alike. Let it not be the business of this House to create a distinction between them. It had been objected to the proposition for remunerating the soldiers, that the sum required would be very large. This was an unfounded objection. It would not equal the amount annually paid to those on the pension list. He took as the basis of his calculation the statement made by the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH.) That gentleman stated, that four-fifths of the surviving soldiers were on the pension roll. This number will be excluded from the provisions of the bill. The whole number of pensioners was now 12,500. Five hundred, it was computed, would die this year. The one-fifth part embraced in the provision, was 2,400. Two hundred dollars to each of these was but $480,000—not half the amount of the pensions. The provisions which he proposed, would embrace another class of soldiers, which was not provided for by any existing law. One regiment, he knew, for documentary proof of the fact was in the Capitol, had entered the service with the promise of pay and eighty dollars bounty; they served faithfully, and never received one farthing. Justice, concluded Mr. P., should not be dealt out with a partial hand. If it was rendered to one class it should not be withheld from another. But if we were not able to do full justice to all, he would not say that he would do nothing.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

Mr. VAN BUREN said he approached the discussion of the bill under consideration with a degree of solicitude he had seldom experienced. It arose from a deep consciousness of the importance and delicacy of the subject, and the difficulties which would attend a satisfactory determination. He freely confessed that he did not remember a legislative question in which his feelings had been more deeply engaged. These feelings, sometimes too sanguine, and always ardent, might now deceive him; but he could not suppress the conviction that upon the doubtful issue of the present question, the character of our country was, in no inconsiderable degree, suspended. It would, indeed, have afforded him the highest gratification, could he anticipate, with confidence, a favorable result. But when he beheld the formidable concentration of talent and numbers arrayed against the petitioners and their advocates, he was but too conscious of the difficulties against which they had to contend. Undeterred, however, by these circumstances, he would proceed to discharge the duty which seemed to be required by his connection with the committee by whom the bill had been reported.

His brethren of the committee, said Mr. V. B., had pronounced a merited eulogium upon the character and services of the petitioners. Considerations which arose naturally from the subject, but upon which, although far from being exhausted, he would not attempt to dwell. Indeed, he was greatly deceived, if, on this point, there was any diversity of opinion. Whatever expressions might escape from gentlemen in the warmth of debate, he was sure that the transcendent merits of the petitioners, after having received the attestation of impartial history, were not now to be the subject of examination or of doubt. Sir, if, in the mysterious dispensations of an all-wise and overruling Providence, we, too, are doomed to experience the common calamities of nations, it may become our duty to receive these dispensations with meekness, and bear them with fortitude. But if there be a stain from which he would be most desirous of rescuing the American name, it would be the stain of ingratitude to the surviving officers of the revolution. If there be a calamity, which more than any other, he would pray to have averted, it would be the calamity of witnessing, in an American Senate, a cold insensibility to the services of those whose devotion to their country in peace, and whose constancy in war, had extorted the applause of an admiring world.

If, sir, gallantry in the field, and devotion to country, ever deserved the meed of grateful remembrance, the encomiums bestowed by my colleagues upon the Revolutionary officers will find their approval in every patriot bosom. But their merits, great as they were, appear to be enhanced by the cause in which they were engaged. Revolutions in Government had been witnessed before, and they have been witnessed since. But if we consider the principles involved, the means employed, and the results produced, may I not be indulged in expressing the conviction that they dwindle into insignificance with this? The revolution in which they embarked, was not only the most important, in civil Government, that oppression has produced, or patriotism accomplished, but must, in the nature of things, forever remain so. The materials for another, equally important, do not, I fear, exist; and, perhaps, the progressive character of man, precludes a well-grounded hope that they will ever again arise. Why, sir, said he, do I allude to these high considerations? Not, I am sure, for the purpose of display; and as little with a view to indulge in self adulation. It is because the unparalleled blessings, which, as a people, we enjoy; the great and successful example that has been given to the world; and the perpetual influence which that example must exert on its future destinies—awaken in every mind the most intense anxiety, lest the closing scenes of that mighty conflict should be unworthy of its own great character—and that the page of history which embalms the virtues and heroic deeds of our fathers, may not at the same time record the too early degeneracy of their sons. The petitioners at your bar are destined to be our witnesses with posterity. It is in their persons that an opportunity is afforded, either to repel, or in some degree, confirm the imputation cast upon Republics by the enemies of freedom, that ingratitude is their inherent and extinguishable vice: and it was earnestly to be hoped that our decision might be such as would be favorable to them, to ourselves, and to the cause of liberty.

But, sir, said Mr. V. B., instead of pursuing these general remarks, allow me to invite your attention to the question immediately under consideration. In doing so, my first attempt will be, to separate that which is not a subject of disputation from that which is: for, in this, as in other cases, time may be consumed, and arguments fruitlessly employed, in supporting positions which have never been questioned, or enforcing opinions in which all are agreed.

First, then, it will be admitted, on all sides, that the promise made by the Congress of the Confederation of half pay for life to the Revolutionary officers serving to the end of the war, was made by competent authority: that the condition upon which the promise was founded has been fully performed: that the obligation thereby created, rests upon the present Government in its original force: and that if it has not been fully, fairly, and justly performed, it ought now to be discharged. The critical condition of the country at the time the promise was made—the fact that this inducement to remain in service had been held up to the army from the commencement of the war, by various resolves of Congress—that this alone prevented their abandonment of a service, in which they were not bound to remain by any of those considerations which operate on the generality of mankind—that to their continuance in the army, more than to any other cause, under the blessings of Providence, the successful termination of the war was, in the opinion of Gen. Washington, mainly attributable, and that the sacrifices which they incurred, in consequence of their determination to remain, were almost unparalleled—are points upon which there can be no difference of opinion, and requiring, after the able comments of the Senators who had preceded him, no additional illustration.

If this, sir, said Mr. V. B., has been the unquestionable engagement of the Government if the petitioners are thus entitled to its fulfilment by the performance of the sole condition on which it was made to depend—the question will be asked, has that engagement been satisfied? And if satisfied, how has it been done?

Those who maintain that the Government had fulfilled its engagement, rest their position on the ground of the commutation of the five years' full pay which has been given in lieu of the promised half pay for life. Whatever might be the diversity of sentiment with respect to the legality or the fairness of that commutation—the means by which it was effected—and the manner of its execution—and on these points he acknowledged there was room for an honest difference of opinion: there was one position, he thought, sufficiently plain to challenge the acquiescence of every reflecting mind. It is, sir, that this commutation tendered by the Government as a complete fulfilment of its promise, has been any thing but a fair and just equivalent. To demonstrate this a few observations only will be necessary.

The intelligent chairman of the committee who reported the bill, whose ability in the exhibition of the claim of the petitioners would entitle him to more than the humble tribute of respect, which it was in his power to render, had submitted to the Senate statements and calculations establishing the following results:

1. That, according to authentic tables for the computation of annuities, the five years' half pay ought to have been seven, at the time it was given, in order to make it a fair equivalent, and that the reduction of this just allowance, was attributable to the necessities of the Government, and not to a disposition to elude the claims of the petitioners.

2. That, owing to the failure of the States to supply the funds necessary to the payment of the interest, and ultimate redemption of the principal, of the "commutation certificate," these commutation certificates for five years' full pay, given as an equivalent, for half pay for life, rapidly depreciated. So that, when compelled by necessity, to dispose of them, they in fact produced to the officers less than one year's pay.

JANUARY, 1838.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

3. That when these commutation certificates were funded in 1791, a deduction was made, equal to one-third of their amount, by deferring the interest for ten years, upon one-third of the principal, and allowing only three per cent. on the interest which had accrued since 1783.

That this deduction was made by the Government, on the ground (and could be justified on no other) that these certificates were in the hands of speculators, who had availed themselves of the necessities of the officers, brought upon them by their stipulated continuance in service, and thus were enabled to obtain them at a reduced and almost nominal price.

Mr. V. B. said he would refrain from attempting to enforce the views, upon this branch of the subject, presented by the Senators who had preceded him. It would be time enough to do so, should these views be ever contested. He candidly acknowledged, however, that they did not constitute the material arguments upon which he relied, for the purpose of showing the gross inadequacy of the commutation awarded to the petitioners: and he would therefore proceed to state the grounds upon which he predicated his proposition, with all the brevity and perspicuity in his power.

The certificates for commutation of half pay, were issued under the resolution of March, 1783, and delivered in November 1783. They admitted upon their face, that five years' full pay was due to their holders, to be paid with interest, at the rate of six per centum per annum. These certificates were redeemed by the operation of the funding act in 1791. They were, of course, for different amounts, according to the respective ranks of the officers. The average pay of the officers was $80 per month, and the amount which would have been due to each officer for half pay, allowing interest after the same was acknowledged to be due, would have amounted, in 1791, when the redemption took place, to $1,742 40. The average amount of five years' full pay for each officer, amounted with interest, in 1791, to $2,664; from this amount one-third was deducted in the redemption, as he had before stated. The average amount therefore received by each officer in 1791, for his five years' full pay, assuming that these certificates had been retained, would have been $1,776.

From this simple statement, it results that, in consequence of the delay in discharging the commutation, and the deduction which was forcibly made in doing so, the Government paid no more than would have been due to the officers for their half pay alone, up to the period when the commutation was actually made. To that period, therefore, the officers gained nothing by that measure. Since that time years have rolled away, during which they would have received the promised half pay, had it not been for the commutation. The sum which would have been payable to the officers since that period, is the sum precisely which the officers have lost, and the Government has gained, by this variation by the Government from its original contract.

This subject, said Mr. V. B., is simple, founded upon data which cannot deceive by their plausibility, and is liable to no mistake, except the mere errors of calculation. Those he had endeavored to avoid. The average half pay of each of the petitioners from the year 1791 to 1828, would have amounted to $18,177 88. This sum, multiplied by 280, the number of Revolutionary officers supposed to be yet in existence, would amount to $3,080,710. The effect of the commutation upon the Treasury, and upon the interests of deceased officers, could not be, said he, distinctly stated without a particular knowledge of the time of their respective deaths. But from what we know upon that subject, there was a moral certainty that the gains of the Treasury from that source had not been diminished, but on the contrary greatly increased.

It is then, said he, an ascertained and incontestible fact, that, in addition to all the injuries sustained by depreciation, the officers have lost by the course of events, and the Government has gained a sum not less than $3,080,710, in consequence of that commutation which is now set up to bar the claims of the petitioners—claims predicated upon a promise of the Government, held out to the officers as an inducement to remain, and constituting the chief reward for the most signal services ever performed by men in the cause of freedom and their country.

Upon these facts, said Mr. V. B., a question arises for our decision, no less important to the Government than to the petitioners; because, involving the character of one, and the interests of the other. What is it? Is it confined to the legal rights and obligations of the parties? No, sir, I shall never, said he, bring my mind to consider the question of strict legal right, when I look at the parties. Who are they? On the one hand, the Government of the United States, not liable to be impeached, and incapable of being coerced against its will by any power superior to its own—rich in resources, and overflowing with redundancy; on the other a remnant of the officers of the Revolutionary army, borne down by the infirmities incident to age—with one foot in the grave, and the other upon the threshold of your door, supplicating the fulfilment of that promise which was made them, in the vigor of their days. If even they have legal rights, where is their remedy to enforce them? They cannot in the nature of things have any. But candor constrained him to acknowledge, that in strictness, they have not now, whatever they may once have had, any rights, except such as are founded upon the immutable principles of justice. As early as the year 1785, the Government found it necessary to protect itself against dormant and unfounded claims, arising from the Revolutionary contest, by a statute of limitations. Various acts and resolutions were passed upon the subject before the year 1798, more or less comprehensive in their terms: and in that year, an act was passed so comprehensive in its provisions, as to embrace the claims of the petitioners, and barring them, unless presented by the 1st day of May, 1794. The officers did not present this claim until 1810, and are therefore precluded from urging their vested legal rights. Being thus furnished with a general answer to all claims which do not address both our consciences and judgments, Congress have nevertheless relaxed from time to time, the rigor of their own act, when considering claims founded on justice, and not opposed by policy. But as none of these suspensions have embraced the case of the petitioners, we have it in our power, if we can have the heart to present this statute of limitations to the petitioners, and under its mantle, resist the cry for justice, if not for bread. The question, then, is not what we are bound to do by law, but what we should do. What conduct on our part will bear the scrutiny and the judgments of impartial men, when the opportunity to remedy the consequences of our decision shall have passed away?

Let us look, for a moment, said Mr. V. B., at the arguments advanced by the opponents of the bill. The meritorious services of the petitioners, the signal advantages that have resulted from these services to us, and to posterity; the losses sustained by the petitioners, and the consequent advantages derived by the Government from the act of commutation, are unequivocally admitted. But, it is contended, we have made a compromise, binding on the parties, and exonerating the Government from further liability, that in an evil and unguarded hour, they have given us a release and we stand upon our bond. Now the question which he wished to address to the conscience, and the judgments of this honorable body, was this—not whether this issue was well taken in point of law—not whether we might not hope for a safe deliverance under it—but whether the issue ought to be taken at all—whether it comports with the honor of the Government to plead a legal exemption against the claims of gratitude—whether, in other words, the Government be bound at all times to insist upon its strict legal rights. Has this been the practice of the Government on all former occasions? Or, is this the only question on which this principle should operate? Nothing, said Mr. V. B., can be easier than to show that the uniform practice of the Government has been at war with the principle which is now opposed to the claim of the petitioners. Not a session had occurred since the commencement of this Government, in which Congress had not relieved the citizens from hardships resulting from unforeseen contingencies—and foreborne an enforcement of law, when its enforcement would work great and undeserved injury. He might, if excusable on an occasion like this, turn over the statute book, page by page, and give repeated proofs of this assertion. But it is unnecessary. He would content himself with a reference to one or at most two measures of the character described. In the year 1812, between the months of June and September, goods to an immense amount were shipped from England to the United States, by American merchants, in open violation of the acts prohibiting their importation. They alleged in justification, either their anticipated repeal of these acts, in consequence of the measures of one of the belligerents; or their apprehension that in the event of a declaration of war by the United States, their property would be seized and condemned in the British ports. The declaration, in fact, took place; but the importers were not the less liable to the fines and penalties imposed by a vigilant law, and merchandise to the value of more than twenty millions of dollars was forfeited to the United States. Upon the arrival of the goods, the owners were permitted to retain and use them, upon giving bonds to abide the decision of their Government. Application was made to Congress for relief: and although it was well known that immense profits were made upon their importation, and not a doubt existed of their liability to forfeiture, Congress, by an act which fills but a single page upon that statute book, cancelled the bonds and relinquished merchandise, which, if retained, would have been equal in value to one-fourth of the whole expenses of the war, and which would doubtless have been retained had the Government insisted upon its legal rights and acted on the principle now contended for.

The system which has been pursued in relation to the purchasers of public lands, is not a less memorable example of a departure from that rigorous policy now recommended to our imitation.

By the act of 10th May, 1800, the minimum price of the public lands was fixed at $2 the acre; one-twentieth of the purchase money was required to be paid at the time of the purchase, one-fourth in 40 days; the balance, with interest, was payable by instalments of 3, 3, and 4 years; and the forfeiture of the land was the declared penalty of non-payment.

By the act of 26th March, 1804, no interest was to be charged upon instalments for future purchases, if punctually paid, and this provision, in favor of the purchaser, was extended to those whose instalments should become due before the following October.

Under this liberal system, yielding to the Government but little more than the necessary expenses of surveying the lands, supporting the various land offices, and providing for the holder a secure landed title, a debt accumulated prior to the year 1820, from the purchasers to the United States, amounting to twenty-two millions of dollars.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

Before that time repeated indulgences had been granted, extending the times of payment, preventing the forfeitures which would have accrued, and, in numerous instances, allowing a re-entry, or a new purchase of lands, improved and forfeited to the Government upon the terms of the original purchase. No less than six acts were passed from the year 1813 to 1820, to suspend the forfeiture and sale of the lands thus purchased. The evil, however, had swelled beyond the reach of palliatives. A debt of 22 millions of dollars exceeded the ability, blighted the prospects, and deadened the energies of the States by whom it was due. Had the law been enforced, and payment inflexibly exacted, nearly the whole of the lands thus purchased and improved, would have been forfeited to the Union, and many an honest yeoman would have been compelled to relinquish to more fortunate strangers those woods and lawns which he vainly hoped would be the solace of his declining years. To prevent this calamity, the Government interposed, and by an act of liberality having few parallels in history, arrested the forfeitures; authorized the relinquishment of lands for which the purchasers were unable to pay; and the application of whatever sums had been paid to the payment of so much only as they thought proper to retain; cancelled the accumulated interest; extended the term of credit for that portion of the lands retained; and by a subsequent act passed in 1824, consented to receive as a full payment for these lands, less than two-thirds of the amount actually due. Nor was this all: by the act of 1821, the price of the lands was reduced from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents; and he who had surrendered lands purchased at the highest sum was enabled to re-enter the same lands, if not sold at public sales, at the reduced price. Sir, said Mr. V. B., by the best estimate that I am able to make on referring to the only documents within my reach, this donation to the purchasers of public lands could not have been less than seven millions and a half, and probably has not been short of ten millions of dollars. But the exact amount is not material to the elucidation of the principle from which it flowed; and in considering its value, who, that can cast his eyes upon those extensive regions, where tranquillity has succeeded to disquietude, and prosperity to ruin, will attempt to estimate it by the scale of dollars and cents?

It appears, then, said Mr. V. B., that it has not been the practice of the Government to act the part of Shylock with its citizens; and God forbid that it should make its debut, on the present occasion, not so much in the character of a merciless creditor, as a reluctant, though wealthy, debtor; withholding the merited pitance from those to whose noble daring and unrivalled fortitude, we are indebted for the privilege of sitting in judgment on their claims; and manifesting more sensibility for the purchasers of our lands than for those by whose bravery they were won; and but for whose achievements, these very purchasers, instead of being the proprietors of their soil, and the citizens of free and sovereign States, might now be the miserable vassals of some worthless favorite of arbitrary power.

If disposed to be less liberal to the Revolutionary officers than to other classes of the community, let us at least testify our gratitude by relieving their sufferings, and returning a portion of those immense gains which have been the glorious fruits of their toil, and of their blood.

Such, said Mr. V. B., would, in his judgment, be a correct view of the subject, had the Government relieved itself from all further liability by the most ample and unexceptionable performance of its stipulations. How much stronger, then, will be their appeal to your justice, if it can be shown that you have no right to urge this act of commutation as a complete fulfilment of your promise? The act of commutation is impeached by the petitioners—first, on account of the means by which it was effected; and, secondly, because the stipulations of that act have never been fulfilled.

The petitioners with reason complained that without ever having consented to be bound by the acts of their brother officers, their personal rights were made to depend upon the decision of the lines, and not upon their own individual assent. This is admitted to have been the fact. Two months were allowed to the officers of the lines, under the immediate command of Gen. Washington; and six months to those of the southern army, to give their assent to the compromise. It does not appear that the lines of the southern army ever gave their assent. Indeed, it is stated by a distinguished Revolutionary officer on this floor, (Gen. S. SMITH,) that they never did. It does not appear that there ever was a meeting of the officers of the northern army, for the purpose of deciding upon the question: and it is affirmed that there was none. To assume, then, that the assent of each individual was given under circumstances like these, appears to my mind harsh and unjust. But it is alleged, in extenuation, that the compromise was made upon the petition of the officers themselves. Let this be admitted: did the application for a just equivalent for the promised half pay for life, confer on Congress the right to prescribe the terms? Will it justify the allowance of less than that to which they were entitled? Will not the circumstances, under which this application was made, present a still stronger appeal to your liberality, if not your gratitude? Look, said Mr. V. B., at the acts of these brave and high-minded men, in whatever light you please; examine their conduct by the strictest scrutiny, and you will always find them exhibiting the purest principles and the most elevated patriotism. The half pay establishment for life, was, at that time, considered by the ardent advocates for liberty, as leading to the formation of an aristocratic body, and therefore, subversive of the principles of the revolution. An intimation like this, in the infancy of our institutions, however groundless in itself, was sufficient to excite alarm. The dangers of the past were overlooked in the apprehensions for the future; the measure was reprobated, and these meritorious officers became the objects of unfounded jealousy. To quiet these unreasonable fears, the petitioners expressed their willingness to waive the literal fulfilment of the promise which had been given: to remove the cause which could have a tendency to deprive them of the confidence of their fellow-citizens: to surrender the boon they had so dearly purchased; and, in addition to all that they had done, and to all that they had suffered, to offer up their future prospects upon the altar of their country. And could any thing be more preposterous than to attempt to found upon an act, originating in motives like these, the right to prescribe the terms of commutation? But it is alleged that the officers received the commutation certificates, and, by doing so, must be presumed to have assented to their being considered a full satisfaction of their demands. This inference was, in his opinion, removed by the peculiar circumstances under which the certificates were given. These circumstances, said Mr. V. B., are not unworthy of the deliberate attention of the Senate. Previous to October, 1788, and subsequent to the time when the signature of the preliminary articles of peace was known to the army, frequent applications had been made, in their behalf, to Congress, for an adjustment of accounts, and payment of the large arrearages which were due. These applications were fruitless. The failure of the States to comply with the requisitions of Congress, deprived that body of the means of discharging their engagements: and with a full sense of the services and privations of the army, and of the injustice they were about to commit, Congress were on the point of disbanding them, unpaid and unrequited, and sending them penniless and almost naked to their homes. The effect of this anticipated measure upon minds sensibly alive to indignity and injury may be easily imagined:—At the moment when passion might have triumphed over reason, the army was addressed by an anonymous writer, on the subject of their wrongs, with a degree of eloquence calculated to redeem if any thing could redeem, the vicious tendency of his principles. He admonished them of the futility of their complaints, and urged them by every motive that could be addressed to their hopes and to their fears, to change the supplicatory style of a memorial to language more becoming those who had the means of redress within their hands. At that perilous moment, on the events of which were suspended the honor of the Army, and the future welfare of the country, their commander-in-chief appeared amongst them. He conjured them to give one more distinguished proof of unexampled patriotism, patience, and virtue; to rise superior to the most complicated sufferings, and by the dignity of their conduct, give posterity occasion to say, when speaking of their glorious example—“Had this day been wanting, the world had never seen the last stage of perfection which human nature is capable of attaining.”

They listened to the voice of their beloved commander, followed his advice, surrendered their arms, and sunk, penniless, into the ranks of private life. In the succeeding month, the certificates of commutation were tendered, by the Paymaster General, who requested only an acknowledgment of their receipt, while in relation to the final settlement certificates for their pay, he required a full discharge of their demands. The certificates thus tendered, were accepted, and in almost every case, immediately sold, for the purpose of satisfying the most urgent necessities of nature. He asked the Senate whether it would comport with the dignity and honor of a great and magnanimous people, to avail themselves of an acceptance extorted by circumstances like these; and to urge it as sufficient to bar the claims of justice, and divest their protectors in the hour of danger, of their stipulated reward?

But it has been said, that this commutation excited no dissatisfaction at the time; that the complaints upon the subject are of a recent date, and now, for the first time, thought of as a plausible support to an unfounded claim. The Senator from S. C., (Mr. SUMTER,) who has been impelled, by a sense of duty, to assume the unpleasant task of zealously opposing the bill upon your table, has inquired, with much apparent triumph, whether a single individual could be pointed out who had refused the commutation? He assured the worthy Senator that he had adopted an erroneous impression. When tendered it was received with universal discontent, and by the junior officers who were most likely to be injured, with decided reprobation. Had an opportunity for inquiry been allowed, he had no doubt of being able to designate many who had refused. At the moment he could refer the Senator to Major Gadsden, of his own State, whose petition on the subject had been presented to the Senate; and if respect for the feelings of an honorable member before him, did not render it improper to drag the name of his venerable father into the debate, he could name another veteran soldier of the revolution,* the confidant of Washington and the companion of Lafayette, who had served his country bravely and efficiently throughout the war, and who refused to receive the commutation, because violating, in his opinion, the leading principles of the Revolution, by subjecting his property to the decision of men whom he had never authorized to act in his name or stead. But, sir, said Mr. V. B., what effect did the supposed injustice of his country have on this veteran soldier? Did it in the least damp his ardor in her cause? By no

* Col. McLane, of Delaware.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

means. He belonged to a different school, and he gave the most palpable proof of the enduring quality of the principle of that school during the late war. On learning the approach of danger he repaired to this city. On the disastrous day of Bladensburg, he was found, at the advanced age of seventy, on horseback, in the field, stimulating to exertions, by his example and exhortation. When the danger pressed the hardest he waited on the military commander of the day, and solicited the responsibility for the safety of the City, by being intrusted with the possession of this capitol, with a reasonable force for its defence. Denied in his application, mortified and humiliated by the results of the day, he found his way back to his home and the home of his family, where he still lives, blessed with the esteem of his friends, and the respect of all who know him.

But assuming, said Mr. V. B., that the act of commutation was just, in its inception, was it just in its execution? On this point, he thought there was no room for contrariety of opinion. An essential difference, he observed, existed between the claims for pay and subsistence of the Army, and those arising from the stipulation of half pay for life. The former being payable during the war, when it was known that the finances were embarrassed, were properly subject to the depreciation of that period. But the promised half pay for life was expected to survive the period of embarrassment, and therefore to be payable in the sound currency of the country. Some of the reasons which inclined the officers to accept a commutation have already been noticed. The necessity of obtaining pecuniary means to enable them to embark in other pursuits, formed a no less prevalent inducement. To effect this object, it was obviously necessary that the equivalent to be received should be promptly paid or adequately secured. The act of commutation did neither. It is surely not enough to say that the resolution of Congress prescribed that the commutation of five years' full pay, should be paid in securities, unless it can be shown that paper, absolutely worthless, was the security intended. Can it for a moment be supposed, that Congress meant to deceive their brave defenders, by holding out a "promise to the ear," only "to break it to their hopes?" No, sir, they meant what they expressed, that the securities should be real, and not nominal; their repeated and earnest requisitions upon the States prove their intention; and nothing but the inherent weakness of the Government, and the failure of the States to comply with the requisitions of Congress—an excuse fortunately not in our power to plead—prevented that venerated body from redeeming their engagements. But though the depreciation which followed was not attributable to Congress, its effect upon the officers was not the less fatal. Necessity, that waits not for times or seasons, compelled too many to carry their certificates into market, and the amount which they produced served but to realize the destruction of all their hopes. The few who retained them until 1791, experienced a loss not less severe than unexpected. It has already been stated that, by the operation of the funding system, one-third of the amount which the commutation certificates declared to be due was deducted by the Government. The reason alleged for a measure apparently so destructive of public confidence, and individual rights, was the well-known fact, that by far the greater part were held by speculators who had purchased them at an inconsiderable price. Mr. Madison, it is true, endeavored to exempt the certificates in the hands of the officers from this deduction; but having failed in his attempt, the least necessitous of the officers were doomed to experience a diminution of their already insufficient commutation.

This act of commutation, therefore, is clearly liable to the objection:

1st. Of not being a just equivalent for the promised half pay for life.

2dly. Of having been effected under circumstances, and by the operation of motives, which deprive it of all obligatory force, and entitle the officers to liberality instead of rigor.

3dly. Of partial and defective execution.

If, said Mr. V. B., no other obstacle were interposed to the claims of the petitioners than those to which he had alluded, fortified as they are, by facts not susceptible of misconception, and resting upon the plain and immutable principles of justice, no doubt could be entertained of your favorable decision. But he was apprehensive that other considerations would have their influence: that the claims of the petitioners would be clouded by dangers in prospective; and, that the fear of establishing a precedent by which the door of your treasury would be unlocked to a crowd of applicants pleading their poverty, and urging their misfortunes, may induce you, in this case, to resist the strongest impulses of your hearts, if not the dictates of your judgments. Among the different grounds upon which this apprehension is founded, a leading one, he said, is, "That the bill did not embrace the cases of private soldiers, who might also have sustained injustice, and whose services were not less meritorious than those of the officers themselves."

Before I proceed, said Mr. V. B., to consider this objection, allow me to call your attention to one or two incidental remarks. A variety of persons, officers of the army, who had not served to the end of the war—private soldiers, militia officers, and citizens who had borne the privations of that period, had been successively brought in review before the Senate; and their losses and sufferings, after having been forcibly depicted, were urged as a reason for the rejection of the claim of the petitioners.

If, said Mr. V. B., any thing could aggravate the injustice already inflicted upon the petitioners, it would be an objection like this. Had the claims of the persons alluded to been similar to those of the petitioners, the argument derived from an equality of right would be entitled to attention; but if dissimilar, let them be disjoined. The allowance of the one can constitute no ground for the admission of the other; and by uniting them together, you throw upon the petitioners the misfortunes of others, (misfortunes for which they are in no sense responsible,) in addition to their own.

Now, sir, said Mr. V. B., it is easy to demonstrate that no similarity exists. What is the object of this bill? To repair a wrong in not having given a just equivalent in satisfaction of a promise of half pay for life. Do the claims of any others rest upon a basis like this? Is it alleged that any such or similar arrangement was made with the soldier? Most assuredly not. If, then, no similarity exists, an attempt to connect them would be plainly unjust.

I am aware, said Mr. V. B., of the imposing character of the argument that has been urged in favor of the claims of the common soldier. In a Government like ours, appeals in their favor cannot be made without effect. They derive their force from that all-pervading jealousy of power, which is generally supposed to be the concomitant of official station and accidental elevation. Although not insensible to its influence, he was not disposed to complain of its effect; and when properly directed or controlled, he considered it necessary to the successful operation of our political system.

But, sir, said Mr. V. B., instead of yielding our judgments to favor on the one hand, or improper prejudice on the other; it became our duty as public men to know no distinctions but those of merit, and no rule but that of justice. Was it true, then, he asked, that the partiality of the Government had inclined to the officer, in preference to the soldier? Is it not evident, on the contrary, that in every case the former has been treated with distrust, and the latter with indulgence? Upon what can the soldiers predicate a claim for additional compensation? Upon the ground of the depreciation, and no other. The losses of the officers, on this account, were as much greater than those of the soldier, as the relative difference of their pay; and yet this bill contains no provision in their favor upon that subject. This, then, can form no objection to the proposed allowance. But, sir, in relation to the relative condition of the officer and soldier when they entered the service, General Washington informs us in his letters to the States, contained in the book which I hold in my hand, that the private soldiers had this signal advantage over the officers. They received at the time of enlistment, from the States by which they were raised, a bounty of from two to three hundred dollars, in good money, or provision for their families. No such advances were received by the officers. What, sir, said Mr. V. B., has been the subsequent conduct of the Government? The average pay of the officers, calculating from a colonel downwards, was forty dollars per month. That of the soldier was six dollars and a quarter.

Now, by the pension act of 1818, the allowance to officers and soldiers, reduced to poverty, was, for the officers, twenty dollars per month, and for the soldiers eight dollars per month. Giving to the officer less than half pay, and to the soldier more than full pay. So, said he, would it ever be. Whatever might be the declamatory appeals upon this subject, there no danger that the partiality of Congress would ever be manifested for the officer, to the exclusion of the fair claims of the soldier. To prevent misapprehension, said Mr. V. B., I will proceed further. I have said, that I am not insensible to the feeling which had been so strongly pressed into the argument. As an evidence of the sincerity with which he spoke, he expressed his willingness to adopt any measure in favor of the soldier, that the gentlemen opposed to him could reasonably desire. Most of the soldiers, said Mr. V. B., had been placed upon the pension list. The limited number who had not, must average seventy years of age. Let, said he, a section be prepared, placing all who had enlisted for the war, upon the pension list, at eight dollars per month, without requiring evidence of poverty. For a measure like this, he would readily vote; if even more were proposed, it should receive his deliberate attention, and, if possible, his concurrence. Frands might be practised; but they would, of necessity, be of short duration. Even now, the expense would not be felt; in a few years it would cease to be remembered; while the fame that would attend it, would constitute one of the most valuable legacies to posterity that can be left behind us.

Instead, then, of opposing the bill because it contains no provision for the soldier, might he not with some propriety ask of gentlemen to propose a remedy for the defect, and not condemn for omission, whilst making no effort to have that omission supplied?

Another cause of apprehension from this bill, as a precedent, arises from the supposition that if it be intended to provide for losses incurred by the depreciation of commutation certificates, the Government will be bound to compensate for similar losses, whether incurred by the army or the public creditors. These fears, said Mr. V. B., I consider visionary. The bill does not propose a compensation on account of depreciation. This would be impracticable, because no data could be obtained by which an estimate could be formed to justify a legislative act. The depreciation of the commutation certificates has been referred to solely for the purpose of enforcing the equity of a claim originating in a contract, never satisfied by the act of commutation, but from which you are legally absolved by the acts of limitation. Until the soldiers can plead a similar contract, and the equitable considerations which the officers have urged, they can have no right to place their claims on an equal footing. Still less, sir, said Mr. V. B., can it be said that this bill will afford a pretext for reviving the dormant claims of the public creditors. Their case is widely different from that of either the officers or the soldiers. While the pay of the army was fixed and stationary, its actual value was reduced by the depreciation of currency, which they were compelled to receive at par. But the suppliers of the army, the great mass of public creditors, regulated their contracts by the fluctuations in which they expected to be paid, and the prices demanded bore an exact proportion to its depreciation in market.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

It has been urged, too, as an objection, that provision had not been made for the officers who did not serve to the close of the war, and for the militia. It was sufficient to say that with them the Government had entered into no such engagement. The surviving officers of the revolution who had been called from service before the end of the war, generally by public considerations, would not, he was persuaded, repine at the success of their brethren in arms, or make it the basis of unfounded complaint. It has been stated by the venerable and worthy Senator before me, (Gen. S. SMITH,) that this bill will not embrace his case, for the reasons he has given. Who would have more cause to complain than he, if, indeed, any cause could be found in the measure proposed? Of his conduct and services in two wars, it would be superfluous to speak. They are familiar to us all; and he wished he could add, had been as well appreciated by the Union as by the State whose interests he had promoted in peace, and whose safety he had defended in war. The solicitude which he had manifested for the friends of his youth, and his companions in danger, must have awakened the sensibilities of those who witnessed it; while his zealous, though disinterested support of the bill upon your table, constituted a convincing proof that it would be viewed by others, who might be excluded from its provisions, with equal satisfaction.

The last, and, to his mind, the strongest objection against the passage of this bill, was its making no provision for the widows and children of deceased officers, who were entitled to half pay. By whom, sir, said Mr. V. B., had this objection been adduced? By the parties themselves? No, sir; by those who have had no conference with the parties. Do they advocate the claims of the heirs and widows because they have heretofore been importunate for relief? No, sir; from the first agitation of this question in 1810, to the present moment, he was authorized, he believed, to say, that not a single petition had been presented in their behalf. Sir, said Mr. V. B., we resist the claims of the living by exorcising the spirits of the dead. The gentleman from Georgia declares that he will not vote for the bill, because the heirs and widows are not included, and that he would not vote for it, if they were.

It has been asked by the Senator from South Carolina, whether a positive debt, a vested interest, does not descend to the heir, and whether a Government, any more than an individual, is discharged by the death of its creditor? The objection thus presented is plausible in its appearance, but he was persuaded, easily surmounted. He had already, in his opinion, given a satisfactory answer. Whatever might have been the original character of the claim, it could no longer be regarded as legally binding on the Government. It was barred by the statute of limitations—a measure sometimes harsh, but not the less founded in policy and justice. This shield, interposed by the Government for justifiable ends, might be removed, at the option of the Government, only in the cases which policy and justice might demand. It has a perfect right to permit it to operate upon the officers, their widows, or their heirs—and neither might, in strictness, have a legal ground of complaint. I have endeavored, said Mr. V. B., to show that equity requires, and policy does not forbid the allowance proposed for the surviving officers. The claims of the widows stood, in his opinion, on a different foundation. But he should not be willing, for one, to oppose them. Their number must be small; not half as great, in all probability, as that of surviving officers; say one hundred at the outside. Give them a gratuity of one or two thousand dollars each; and if necessary, deduct it from the sum you would otherwise give to the surviving officers. They, he was well assured, would not utter a complaint. On the contrary, the value of what they received, would be doubly enhanced by the cause of the deduction. The supposed claims of the heirs could not be presented to your attention with equal force. Of the two thousand four hundred and eighty officers of the revolution, two thousand two hundred and fifty are no more. Their temporal interests, whatever they were, have been distributed, in many cases, among successive generations. To ascertain and distribute the respective shares to which the heirs would be entitled, of the small amount now proposed to be given, if not wholly impracticable, would involve an expense that would consume the means of your bounty; and without being productive of substantial benefit, your resources would be exhausted. But, said he, these are considerations of an inferior character, founded on expediency only. Your refusal to grant to the heirs, may be placed on the highest ground of principle. Whatever you now do in favor of the officer, must be voluntary, proceeding from your liberality and gratitude. All other obligations have been cut off by time. All your endowments springing from such motives, being for the reward of personal services, may with propriety be confined to those by whom those services were rendered. This, said he, is not a new principle in your legislation. It lies at the foundation of the act of 1818, providing, not for the heirs, but certain portions of the revolutionary officers and soldiers, by the operation of which, millions have in his opinion been beneficially applied. It was called indeed a pension act, but with no more propriety, according to the established principles of the Government, than the bill upon your table.

What, according to these principles, are the grounds upon which pensions have been granted? They were, exclusively, disability produced by known wounds received in the public service, and half pay for a limited time to the widow and infant children of those who had fallen in action. Since the date of our independence, these only have been the legal and appropriate causes for being placed on the list of pensioners. The annual allowance to a limited number of the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army, by the act of 1818, was founded on no such consideration, otherwise the widows and orphans of the deceased officers and soldiers would have been as much entitled to your bounty as they can be now. They did not receive it; and the only justifiable reason which could then have been given, was the one which may now be assigned. You had a right to make your donation personal. You had a right to enlarge or contract the circle of your beneficence, according to your own views of the state of your treasury, the exigencies of society, and the claims of humanity. Among the most powerful motives for its adoption, was the desire to rescue the country from the reproach of seeing those to whom it was indebted for its liberties, thrown, in the evening of their days, amidst the prosperity they had been instrumental in producing, upon the cold charities of an unfeeling world. It was to prevent the vivid and heart-rending picture of Roman ingratitude, which, though the invention of modern days, has so long interested the world, from being only descriptive of real life in the streets of this proud capital.

Mr. V. B. said he would say nothing as to the amount. Full justice had already been done to that subject. The general object was to make up, in part, the loss sustained by the officers, out of the profits made by the Government, by the successful result of its compromise with them. Let us, therefore, said he, pass the bill upon your table. Let this body have the credit of originating it. Let no narrow or weak views impede our course. No matter where these honorable and patriotic men are from; whether from the North or the South, the East or the West; whether from the old States or the new. In every State where the blessings of a free Government are enjoyed, there they had a name, if not a local habitation, that could not fail to work its way to the hearts of their fellow citizens. It was true, he said, that by the list submitted, it did not appear that any of the officers resided in seven of the new States, and he was not sorry for it. If he were not deceived in the character as well of the people of those States, as of their representatives on that floor, they would rejoice that an opportunity was thus presented to evince their devotion to the cause of the revolution, and their gratitude for the services of those who fought our battles in that day, without even a suspicion of a selfish or local object. This will be the more gratifying to them, because it was not their good fortune, as States, to be in a situation to take part in that great struggle, out of which grew this mighty empire, and all the blessings of civil and religious liberty, that we now so pre-eminently enjoy. He had not a doubt that all that remained for them to do, they would do well. If evidence of the fact were wanting, he had only to allude to the small but patriotic State of Illinois, which alone had instructed her representatives on that floor, upon the subject under consideration, in a spirit reflecting upon herself the highest credit, and affording the most flattering presage of her future greatness.

Mr. V. B. said that he was distressed by the consciousness that he had already trespassed too much upon the kind indulgence of the Senate. In any other case he would have considered it reprehensible to have done so. He would therefore (although there were yet many considerations which he intended to have urged) draw his observations to a close. There was, however, one point upon which he felt too much solicitude to suffer it to pass unnoticed. If by any one he had been understood as casting ashpit of censure or reproach upon the old Congress, he desired to correct so erroneous an impression. He could not indeed have done so consistently with his own long-cherished opinions. On the contrary, he did not believe that the world ever witnessed, or ever again will witness a body of men more patriotic or enlightened. He would not believe that it was in their nature to be indifferent to the just claims of the Revolutionary army. The question with them was not what they would, but what they could do. The embarrassments under which they had labored from want of power, and the backwardness of the States, who themselves were struggling against the exhausting effects of a cruel, bloody, and protracted war, were known to all. As little did he wish to cast reproach upon the counsels of the nation. Every thing could not be done at once. Much had been done under the present constitution, to satisfy the claims of justice, and vindicate the character of the republic. It is our good fortune that something still remains for us to do. Fear not, that in doing it, you will go beyond the wishes of your constituents—your feelings lag behind them. Speaking for his immediate constituents—and he had not the presumption to suppose that they were more just or public-spirited than their neighbors—for them he could say, with confidence, that, having some share in the national funds, and contributing no inconsiderable part of their amount, they would willingly pour them out, like water, in a cause so righteous. With them, a million more or less of public debt, compared with the preservation of the public faith, would be as nothing. He gloried in the consciousness that he was the representative of a people influenced by such elevated sentiments. Every day, said he, makes the remnant of this band of worthies more dear to the American people. When that period arrives—which a majority of the Senate may expect to see—when the last of the officers of the Revolutionary army shall be called from time to eternity, it will be the cause of keen regret and self reproach, if, upon a review of the past, it shall appear that any thing was omitted that ought to have been done to smooth their passage to the tomb.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

One word more, and he had done. The Senator from Maine, (Mr. CHANDLER,) who, although he had lost his father in the struggle, had felt it to be his duty (and there was no man, he believed, who more implicitly followed his sense of duty) to oppose the bill, had, with his characteristic shrewdness and pertinency, asked—did General Washington, whilst at the head of Government, ever recommend this to the notice of Congress? The worthy Senator well knew what the answer must be, and the train of reflections it would give rise to. General Washington did not—but why? Before and after the war, he spared no pains to make the States sensible of what was due to the officers on this very point. His letters have been read. He urged them by all the considerations that belonged to the subject, to act efficiently for their relief. He failed. After he came into the Government, the officers themselves evinced no disposition to revive their claims, and it certainly would not have become him to be the first to bring them forward. It is not difficult to conceive why the officers were, at that day, willing to avoid all applications for pecuniary aid. New prospects opened—they were probably not exempt from those feelings of ambition and hope of preferment, which actuate mankind. They have out-lived them, and they humbly ask for justice. But, sir, what was the language of the Father of his Country, when the subject was an open one? In his circular of June, 1783, to the Governors of the States, he said:—"The provision of half pay for life, as promised by the resolution of Congress, was a reasonable compensation offered at a time when Congress had nothing else to give to the officers for services then to be performed; it was the price of their blood and your independence, and as a debt of honor, it can never be cancelled until it be fairly discharged."

One question, said Mr. V. B., and I have done. Has it been fairly discharged?

Mr. PARRIS was disposed, he said, to withdraw his amendment, with the understanding that he should have an opportunity to renew it. While up, he would remark that it was true that the soldiers had, to a great extent, been paid; but there are many who have not been paid, and who never will be paid, unless they are paid now, side by side with their officers. It is the officers alone who have kept the claims of the soldiers alive. The soldiers cannot meet in conventions, issue circulars, frame memorials, and get up all the necessary machinery for acting on the public sympathy. If they do not succeed with the officers, their claims are lost. He withdrew his motion, but should renew it when the question had been taken on the bill as reported.

The question then recurred on filling the blank with $1,100,000.

Mr. RUGGLES could not vote, he said, to fill the blank with that sum merely for the officers. He thought, also, that those officers who, on the first alarm of war, left the plough for the ranks, were as well entitled to remuneration as the officers who served to the end of the war.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was, he said, one of those officers who entered the Army at an early period, and resigned before the close of the war. He had, therefore, no claim, and never had advanced any. None who left the Army before the close of the war can have any claim. In the year 1778, General Washington addressed Congress on the state of the Army, which was near dissolution. In 1779, many of the officers resigned; and to prevent more from resigning, the act of 1780 was passed. No one, then, who resigned before the close of the war, can be entitled to any benefit from the provisions of that act.

TUESDAY, January 29.

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

The bill for the relief of the several surviving Officers of the Revolutionary Army, was taken up.

The question being on filling the blank in the bill with 1,100,000 dollars—

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said: He was opposed not only to filling the blank, but was opposed to the passage of the bill under any circumstances, and would ask the indulgence of the Senate while he offered some of the reasons upon which he grounded that opposition. Although he was far from entertaining any ungrateful feelings towards the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, yet he could never yield his assent to the assertion that they held exclusive claims, either upon the justice or gratitude of this Government.

It has been stated by the chairman of the committee (Mr. WOODBURY) which reported this bill, that there were only 280 surviving officers to provide for. To satisfy the claims of these survivors, it was necessary to fill the blank with the sum of $1,100,000. At the close of the war, the whole number of officers then surviving, entitled to half pay, were 2,480; deduct from that number 280, will leave 2,200; in the ordinary course of mortality, it is fair to suppose, that the average deaths would allow a calculation of 1,125 entitled to full pay, in equal degree to the surviving officers, now sought to be provided for. This would require an additional sum of $5,380,434, which, with the $1,100,000, asked for the survivors, would make an aggregate of $6,480,434. If either justice or gratitude require the Senate to make provision for the surviving officers, the same measure of justice and of gratitude, require provision to be made for the widows and children of the deceased officers, whose rights were as well founded, and whose rights were as perfect, up to the time of their respective deaths, as that of the survivors.

Mr. S. said he had yet to learn by what rule of law, or by what rule of gratitude, this discrimination could be made. It was a settled principle of municipal law, of almost the whole civilized world, founded in nature itself, and fully recognized by every State in this Union, to its fullest extent, that in all cases after death, the relations of the deceased, whether his widow or his children, his father or his mother, his brothers or his sisters, or relations in any other degree, were by inheritance entitled to the whole of his estate, in whatsoever it might consist; whether in lands, goods, moneys, or debts due, either from private individuals or from Governments. If, therefore, this be a debt of obligation, founded on contract, to the survivors, it is equally a debt of obligation, founded on contract, to the legal representatives of the deceased officers. And it would be a perversion of one of the soundest maxims of law, to suppose that the death of a creditor cancels the debt, or lessens the obligations of the debtor.

Mr. President, we have heard it stated, during this debate, by a Senator from Ohio, (Mr. RUGGLES,) that a revolutionary officer of distinguished merit, died in his neighborhood but a few weeks ago, and left a family of twenty children, two of them twin girls only four years old. Are we, Mr. S. asked, to close our eyes upon the claims of these tender and helpless infants, because their father has been taken from them by the hand of death? who, had he survived but a few weeks longer, would have shared in the bounty of the Government asked for in this bill. Are we to forget the dead, however meritorious their claims, claims founded on the very same law, governed by the same rules of construction, and enhanced by the piteous condition of the objects to whom it must be equally due, if due to any, merely because we behold the living presenting themselves personally before us? This would be an exhibition of feeling but little to the credit of the Congress of the United States!

Congress had in 1781, almost at the close of the war, promised by a resolution, half pay for life to all such officers as should remain in service to the end of the war. This was considered an odious distinction, and became excessively unpopular. It did not suit the genius of this country, and was opposed to the principles of that liberty for which we were then struggling, and was one of the features of the British Government which produced the contest. These officers viewed it in that light themselves, and wished to get rid of it; and in December, 1782, after the preliminary articles of peace had been signed, voluntarily stated, in a petition to Congress, their belief of its odious character, and said in that petition, "We are willing to commute the half pay pledged, for full pay for a certain number of years, or for a certain sum in gross, as shall be agreed to by a committee sent with this address."

These are their own words, and their own committee, sent with that address, consisted of Major Gen. H. Knox, Brig. Gen. Patterson, Col. Crane, Col. Maxwell, Brig. Gen. J. Huntington, Col. Webb, Col. Huntington, Col. Cortland, Col. Cummings, Maj. Scott, Wm. Eustis, Hospital Surgeon, Brig. Gen. Hazen. Officers of high standing, selected and deputed from among themselves, with full powers to make the arrangement with Congress, what commutation should be given for the half pay. And among the members of Congress appointed on the committee to make this arrangement with the committee of officers, was Gen. Alexander Hamilton, who had gone through the whole war himself, knew the relative claims of these officers, and whom he was one, and who was as just as he was generous, and as generous as he was brave; which was really surrendering almost the whole matter into their own hands to settle, and it was settled to be equal to five years' full pay, and no more. And when settled at that, it was not made compulsory by the resolution of Congress, but left optional to accept the five years' full pay or hold on to the half pay for life. Ten States, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, accepted it by lines, and not a murmur was heard for twenty-seven years afterwards, when, for the first time, they brought it up. And at the distance of forty-four years the Senate are told the commutation was unjust, arbitrarily settled at the discretion of Congress, and forced upon those officers without any alternative, to take that or nothing; and that they come now to ask justice, and demand a fulfilment of the compact. And gentlemen affirm that upon principles of law and equity, it is a contract not yet fulfilled, and which in a court of justice the Government would be bound to fulfil.

Mr. S. said he was not brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, but he understood the law of contracts better than that. To render a contract binding on both parties, nothing was necessary, but that the parties were capable to contract, were willing to contract, and actually did contract. And if capable and willing to do so, they could make, and could change that contract as often, and into as many forms as they pleased. It required no lawyer to know this. It was every day's practice, with every man in the Government. But we have a fab-

JANUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

ion of paying Government contracts as often as they are asked for. What was the contract? First, that the officers who should remain in the Army to the conclusion of the war, should be entitled to half pay for life. Who asked to change it? The officers themselves. When it was changed, to whom was it submitted for acceptance? To the officers themselves. Who did accept it in the very form in which Congress had placed it; to be paid in securities, or interest of six per cent. per annum, instead of the half pay promised for life? After they had done so, it would be sporting with the rights of the Government, to say the contract had not been fulfilled on her part. If the Government has any rights, it has the same rights of individuals, governed by the same rules, and entitled to the same privileges. And it would be idle to say, when the Government had done no more than to meet the very wishes of the officers, and gave them what they asked for, that the contract was not fulfilled, because the operations of the change had not proved as prosperous as some of them had wished.

Mr. President, our gratitude has been invoked on this occasion. The gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. H.,) has read various letters, written by Gen. Washington to Congress, stating the discontent of the officers of the Army, the hardships they endured, and concludes by saying, they would have quit the Army, had not Congress promised them the half pay; and asserts, it is to those officers that we are indebted for our civil and religious liberty, as well as for our independence as a nation, and the freedom of debate we now exercise in this Senate. Mr. S. said, it was by no means his wish to detract from the military merits of those officers; and much less would he have supposed they were actuated by the hope of pecuniary reward, to continue in the Army, had not the gentleman himself affirmed, it was the promise of the half pay which kept them there. He was willing, himself, to ascribe to them better motives for remaining in the Army, than the hope of pecuniary reward. He was willing to believe it was patriotism that kept them in the Army. All your gallant men prefer the thick of battle, and seek death itself, as the highest reward of the brave. And can it be a motive to an American Senator, to pay those officers a second time because they would have left the Army in the time of its greatest peril, but for the promise of half pay?

Mr. President, it is an error that is gaining ground in proportion as we recede from the period of the revolution, that the independence of this Government was achieved solely by the regular army. It is an error that has been promoted by the very officers themselves, and to which gentlemen very naturally subscribe who witnessed no part of those times which tried men's souls. That war was a war without a parallel. It was forced upon the people of this country when they had neither money, arms, nor experience: and not more than three millions and a half of a population. In this situation they had to meet a brave and experienced enemy, with a veteran army, and experienced and gallant officers at its head. The most determined doubted; but there appeared to be no alternative, and a general enthusiasm pervaded the whole community, with a few exceptions; and all who valued freedom were eager for battle, in defence of their homes and their firesides, and death or liberty was the universal motto. It was this proud eminence assumed by the American people, that gave them liberty, independence, and freedom of debate: not the sordid mercenary hopes of pecuniary reward.

But, said Mr. S., it has nearly come to this, since time has thrown a veil over those scenes and achievements that ought to characterize that war, that we are taught to believe that, during that war, every thing was quiescent, and everybody happy at home in the enjoyment of their families and fortunes, except the regular army; and that there was but little praise due to any but the officers. The arguments seem to go upon the ground that this is the correct history of the revolutionary war. Gentlemen who entertain this opinion, know but little of that war, as it was carried on in the three southern States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

The chairman (Mr. W.) has told us, these officers broke up their connections in life, and left their families and their homes to serve their country. And so devoted was one of them that he left his dead father unburied, to enter the Army. This, all will admit, was patriotic. But what does this weigh when compared with the bloody scenes that spread horror and desolation throughout the two Carolinas and Georgia, during the years 1779, 1780, and 1781; a good part of which time you had no regular army there. Whilst the British Army were there ravaging the country wherever they went; not a horse in the country upon which they could lay their hands, that they did not take, to repair the waste in their own cavalry, or for the use of their baggage wagons. All the cattle, hogs, sheep, flour, wheat, corn, and every description of forage, fell a prey to their rapacity. And what was not consumed, was wantonly burned and destroyed. The Tories, following in their train, burning dwelling houses, out buildings, and fences, and laying waste with fire and sword, all that came in their way. Plundering the defenceless women and children of any little remains of provisions that the Army might have left, and stripping them of their wearing apparel, and the very bed clothes that covered them by night. Mothers and daughters who had seen better times, labored in the field to procure a scanty subsistence; whilst the fathers and brothers were harassing the enemy, and fighting the battles of their country. Not in the regular army, but in volunteer and self-created bodies; self-trained, and mounted on their own horses, and armed with their own rifles, and other arms, such as they could procure; all at their own expense, without the aid, or even the knowledge of the General Government. They annoyed the enemy by hanging on their borders, killing their light troops, cutting off their foraging parties, shooting their sentries at their posts, and destroying and dispersing the tory parties wheresoever they assembled. No friend of his country could remain at home in safety. Many who ventured there for a moment, were dragged from the bosoms of their families, and butchered at their own doors. Others who were taken in arms, were treated as rebels, and hung upon the limbs of trees, on the road sides. These scenes became so familiar, that the spilling of human blood lost the most of its horrors.

While this undisciplined warfare was carried on by the community at large, by a spirit of patriotism unrivalled, General Sumter, with no other authority than a commission from the Governor of the State, for the Legislative body was dispersed by the enemy, drew to his standard a respectable number of volunteer militia, who displayed as much bravery, and fought to as much purpose, as any continental troops belonging to the regular army. They distinguished themselves, and were victorious in almost every battle they fought. Their leader was as gallant a soldier as ever drew a sword, with all the qualities of a cool, circumspect general. His successful operations were more confined to the middle and southern parts of the State.

General Marion, who acted under a similar commission, only from the Governor, confined himself more to the eastern part of the State—whose partisan corps were entirely volunteers, also. Mr. S. said that he might be more accurate as related to his operations, he would read it from Ramsay's History of the United States. Speaking of the promotion and success of General Sumter he says: "About the same time Marion was promoted to the same rank, who in the northeastern extremity of the State, prosecuted a similar plan. Unfurnished with the means of defence, he was obliged to take possession of the saws of the saw-mills, and to convert them into horseman's swords. So much was he distressed for ammunition, that he has engaged, when he had not three rounds for each man of his party. Various schemes were tried to detach the inhabitants from co-operating with him. Major Wemys burned scores of houses on Pedee, Lynch's Creek, and Black River, belonging to such as were supposed to do duty with Marion, or to be subservient to his views. Having no houses to shelter them, the camps of their country became their homes. For many months, Marion and his party were obliged to sleep in the open air, and to shelter themselves in deep swamps. From these retreats they sallied out whenever an opportunity of harassing the enemy, or of serving their country, presented itself."

Marion was a man of large fortune, and lived at his ease. He abandoned it all, made the morasses his dwelling place, and his rations were parched corn and potatoes, when he could get them. He may justly be called the Leonidas of the South. He never was defeated, nor could the strongest threats, or the most flattering promises from the enemy, induce him for one moment to forsake the cause of his country. Sumter and Marion could have had any promotions they would have asked for in the British Army, if they would have accepted it. Or if they would have laid down their arms, even at the most gloomy moment of that perilous time, they could have been protected in their persons and fortunes by that army. But they were inspired with other considerations, of a higher character. They were inspired by a patriotism and love of country that never tired, and taught them to look upon pecuniary rewards as trash; not to be put in competition with a soldier's honor, nor with a patriot's love of liberty. Their troops, composed as they were, entirely of volunteer militia, from the mass of citizens, were equally inspired by the same motives. There never was a regular army belonging to the Government, from the beginning to the end of the revolutionary war, that endured such hardships, who fought more or more successful battles, or rendered more essential service. These men never received a farthing from the General Government, neither for their services nor their arms, which they furnished for themselves for the most part. Nor has a single man among them, however hacked or cut to pieces, ever been placed upon your Pension Roll.

Many of the first citizens of South Carolina were seized, incarcerated in prison ships, and sent to St. Augustine, and other unwholesome climes, to subdue their patriotism; many of whom perished. Col. Laurens, the elder, was sent to England and imprisoned in the Tower, to subdue his own patriotism, and strike terror in others. These tortures were endured by men who lived in the lap of ease and fortune, all of which was abandoned to the reckless ravages of the enemy, rather than they would abandon the cause of that independence in which they had embarked. Was there any officer in the Continental Army who suffered such hardships, and made such sacrifices for the cause of freedom? Who is there who would not rather rush upon the spear of his enemy, and hazard his life in battle, than be confined in the hold of a prison ship, in an unwholesome clime? At the same time these scenes of horror and discomfort were going on in South Carolina, Georgia and North Carolina were also engaged in those of a similar character, except that the British Army remained principally in South Carolina. The three States were destitute for a long time of even the semblance of a regular army. It was the gallantry and patriotism of the farmers of North Carolina, who quit their ploughs, and embodied under Col. Caswell, a militia officer, that totally defeated and dispersed a large body of Scotch Tories, that had collected to the royal standard, on Cape Fear River, in 1775, and gave a shock to the formidable tory party in that quarter, from which it never recovered. This was effected by their own means, without the aid of a Continental officer or soldier, or so much as a sabre furnished by the General Government. For which they never received, nor did they even ask, a farthing.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

These achievements were followed up by the battle of King's Mountain, in the autumn of 1780, under Col. Campbell, of Virginia, Col. Cleveland, and Col. Shelby, and others of North Carolina, Col. Lacey, Col. Hill, and others of South Carolina, who assembled the volunteer militia of their neighborhoods, to stay the high-handed career of the enemy; and the Historian says, "They had so little of the mechanism of the regular army, that the Colonels, by common consent, commanded each day alternately. The hardships these volunteers underwent were very great. They subsisted for weeks together without tasting bread or salt, or spirituous liquors, and slept in the woods without blankets. The running stream quenched their thirst. At night the earth afforded them a bed, and the heavens, or the limbs of trees, were their covering. Ears of corn, or pumpkins thrown into the fire, with occasional supplies of beef or venison, killed in the woods, were the chief articles of their provisions."

Under all those disadvantages, these volunteer officers and citizens, without a moment's training, met a veteran officer of great experience, and as brave a partisan officer as any in the British army, on ground chosen for the occasion by himself; and with a very small loss on their part, killed and wounded 225, among them Col. Ferguson, their commander; and took 800 prisoners, with all their arms, ammunition, and baggage. The annals of the whole revolutionary war do not afford a more brilliant achievement, or one effected with more cool and deliberate bravery, by any portion of the regular army.

It were these resistances and these successes that gave the first check to the British arms. It destroyed their hopes of submission; and proved that freemen, without training and without discipline, were too brave to be conquered.

Those men and officers did not fight your battles for money. They never cost your Government a single cent. They furnished their own rifles, with which they principally fought. They furnished their own clothes, and their own horses; and their slender and humble rations they picked up where they could find them; and, like the other citizens who fought our battles, without the aid of Government, if any were wounded or disabled, the Government has positively refused to place them on the Pension Roll, but has left them to beg their bread, or starve, if they could find no relief. And yet we are confidently told by gentlemen, in this debate, that we owe our independence as a nation, and the freedom of debate which we enjoy in this Senate, exclusively to the officers of the Revolutionary army. Gentlemen who assert this fact, have never known by what means the revolutionary war was carried on in the Carolinas and Georgia; otherwise, they must have forgotten it. If they had not, they could not say that freemen, whose blood had streamed in torrents in the prosecution of that war; whose valor in battle had been unrivalled; who had sacrificed their fortunes, and abandoned their families and their homes, and every private comfort for its support, owed their independence, and freedom of debate in this Senate, to the prowess of any other arm but their own.

Mr. S. remarked that it had been affirmed that the regular Army had defended the Southern States. Some portions of the regular army had been there, it was true, but had rendered no sort of service, whatever, until the arrival of General Greene, in 1781.

When the British made an attack on Fort Moultrie, on the 28th of June, 1776, before the Declaration of Independence, with a view of reducing Charleston, General Lee, a Continental officer, next in command to General Washington himself, instead of defending the fort as he ought to have done, declared it impossible, and ordered the fort to be surrendered; when Col. Moultrie, of the militia, refused to obey the order; but said he would continue the defence of the place, and would take the responsibility of a failure upon himself. Your Continental General retired to a place of safety, and Col. Moultrie, with the gallantry of a veteran, sustained the attack, for ten hours in succession, against ten British ships, two of which were fifty gun ships. The siege terminated in the loss of one of the enemy's ships, and a total repulse of the whole fleet. This was the first essay of a Continental officer in the South.

The next was General Lincoln, an experienced Continental officer, who, on the 12th day of May, 1780, surrendered to the enemy, without the fire of a gun, the city of Charleston, both the Continental and militia army, with all the munitions of war, and upwards of 400 pieces of artillery; and put the enemy in the stronghold of the Southern States, from whence they could, and did play in every direction, to the great embarrassment of the southern section.

Col. Buford, with a regiment of Continental infantry, and some horsemen, was sent to the relief of South Carolina. They were assailed by Col. Tarleton, and after the first fire, laid down their arms and sued for quarters, which was denied them; and they were literally cut to pieces. And a great portion of those who were not slain on the field, had their arms or hands cut off, or their heads and bodies hacked to pieces.

General Gates, another experienced Continental officer, was sent to South Carolina with a few more than 900 regular troops. To these were added 8,000 militia from the neighboring States. With these 4,000 men he met the British army, near Camden, in South Carolina, and a battle ensued. No sooner did the enemy display their columns, and commence a heavy fire, than General Gates fled. Nor did he stop until he reached Hillsborough, a distance of 150 miles, and then but for a short time. The Continental soldiers under Baron de Kalb, and some of the militia under their own officers, fought with distinguished gallantry. But they were overpowered by numbers, and were all either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. But not a vestige of the regular army remained for active operations. And with them were taken all the artillery and 200 baggage wagons. The State was again left to the alternative either to submit as rebels, and seek protection from the enemy, or fight their own battles, without the least hope of assistance from the General Government. They preferred the latter, which they carried on with an enthusiasm that was never surpassed and but rarely equalled.

This state of things continued until General Greene went on the next year; and even then, much was done by the militia. At the Cowpens the British had 1,100 men, and the Americans not more than 800; two-thirds of them were militia, who were under the command of Col. Pickens. They formed the first line a few hundred yards in advance, and received the first fire; then fell back, as they were ordered to do, and immediately rallied and joined the regulars in charging the enemy with fixed bayonets, which threw them into complete confusion, and five hundred of the British army laid down their arms to the militia.

When General Greene took command of the southern army, it consisted of only 2,000 men, more than half of whom were militia. The battles he fought at Guilford and Eutaw, were said to have been the two best fought battles of the revolution; and more than half his army, at each place, were militia. He was a man of peculiar skill, and of distinguished bravery; and did honor to the cause in which he was engaged. But the bravest General could not fight without an army, and his regular soldiers were but about 1,000; and these were kept as a reserve. His militia were always placed in the front of the battle; many of whom were killed. And that was the last the General Government knew of them. It neither gave them pay, honor, nor provided for their suffering families.

The war in South Carolina was so protracted, and raged with such violence, that, in addition to the volunteer services of almost every man in it, that State, instead of paying one-thirteenth part, which would have been more than its proportion, paid more than one-fifth part of the whole expense of the revolutionary war. Whilst the great State of New York paid but $1,200,000, South Carolina paid $4,000,000, although ranked among the small States. The State of Maryland paid but $800,000. Notwithstanding, it is urged that we owe our liberty and independence to a very small regular army, from whose efficiency the southern States received but little assistance, when compared with their own unceasing efforts. This claim of the petitioning officers is placed on another ground, as extraordinary as it is novel, which is that the certificates given in commutation for the half pay, had been purchased from them by speculators, for a very small consideration. The answer to that argument is plainly this: If the Government were bound to protect its citizens from the grasp of speculation, it would have more than a Herculean labor to perform. Where could such a requisition end? The Government had fulfilled its engagements, and it belonged to those who were interested to guard against imposition.

Another and a louder complaint against the Government is uttered: that in establishing the funding system, Congress had done injustice by deferring a portion of the interest for ten years. But upon a fair calculation the interest will average more than five per cent. And four per cent. is considered a very high per cent. when secured upon the faith of the Government, as this was. It is far beyond any percentage produced by your best agriculturists. Moreover, these claims were placed precisely on the ground of the claims of every other citizen. And who were they that settled the principles upon which the public debt was funded? General Hamilton, and many other revolutionary officers, were among the most prominent members of that Congress. And General Washington was the President of the United States, who, by virtue of his constitutional powers, could have negated the law. And can we for a moment suppose that he would not have done so, had he seen any thing like injustice contained in it? We do not believe he ever slumbered over the rights of those officers whom he had commanded, and whom he respected.

The truth is, that the officers of your Revolutionary army, had been more liberally provided for than any other class of men, in this or any other country. In addition to their pay during their time of actual service, they were promised half pay for life, after they should retire from the army, which was commuted for five years' full pay—which was a mighty stretch for a Government at the dawn of its struggle for freedom—and were promised and received large tracts of valuable lands. Each officer, from a major-general down to an ensign, had his lands, and that placed upon the most fertile spots. In addition to this, the Southern States gave their officers large tracts of the finest land in the world. Virginia gave largely and liberally in lands to her officers. South Carolina did the same. North Carolina gave to each brigadier-general 12,000 acres; to a colonel, 7,200; to a captain, 3,600; and to General Greene that State gave 25,000 acres, that were said, at one time, to be worth $500,-

JANUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

000. To that meritorious officer, Georgia gave $22,500 in money, and South Carolina gave him $45,000 in money. These were free-will offerings, after the war was ended, which those States were prompted to make, to exalted merit, for distinguished services; and surely they would redeem the Carolinas and Georgia from the crying sin of ingratitude.

But, said Mr. S., there was another, and a very different view to be taken of this subject, which would prove, beyond a doubt, how much further the Government had gone to promote the interests of the military man, over that of every other class of your citizens. The revolutionary war continued seven years. The supplies for the armies, during the first five years of that war, were furnished by the citizens, exclusively for paper money; then called Continental money and States money. The continental money was issued by authority of Congress, and bore on its face a pledge that it would be redeemed with gold or silver. The Congress issued $241,552,780; to secure the currency of this money, on the 11th of January, 1776, Congress passed a law in the following words:

"That if any person shall hereafter be so lost to all virtue and regard for his country, as to refuse to receive said bills in payment, or obstruct and discourage the currency or circulation thereof, and shall be duly convicted thereof, such person shall be deemed, published, and treated as an enemy of his country, and precluded from all trade or intercourse with the inhabitants of these colonies."

On the 14th of January, 1777, the Congress passed another law to support and enforce this currency, in the following words:

"Whereas the continental money ought to be supported, at the full value expressed in the respective bills, by the inhabitants of these States, for whose benefit they were issued, and who stand bound to redeem the same," &c.

And thus it goes on to make it as penal as the English language could express it.

Under these very penal laws, and from their devotion to their country, the citizens received this money, $241,552,780, for the support of that war; and when the war ceased, the money ceased to circulate, and fell dead in the hands of the last holders. Not a single cent of that enormous amount of continental money, without which your army would have been a cipher, has yet been paid to your honest farmers who supported your armies upon the plighted faith of your Government, that it would be paid at the conclusion of the war. Not a militia man has ever received a farthing for his services, nor the widows or children of such as fell in battle, have, in one instance, received the bounties of the Government. Pay your debts before you talk of your gratitude. Had these classes of your citizens looked to their pecuniary interests in the hour of peril, instead of devoting their lives and their fortunes to the public service, and the public good, notwithstanding all your revolutionary officers, and your revolutionary armies, you would yet have been British subjects, and these States British provinces.

It has been said by the gentlemen who advocate this claim, your are unable to pay your militia, and unable to redeem your continental money. Is this the justice, said Mr. S., of which you boast? This one-sided justice; is this to characterize the justice of your country, pay your favorites a second time, and permit yourselves to slumber over the rights of all others, because you cannot spare the money to pay them, from your thousand projects? This would be justice with a vengeance.

Mr. ROBBINS said: In speaking to this subject, I shall speak only to the legal obligation, if any, of the United States, in this case. For though I do not agree with the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (my friend, if he will permit me to call him so,) that appeals in this case to the gratitude and magnanimity of the nation, imply the absence of legal obligation, or the apprehension of that absence; I do agree that this question is not to be determined on those appeals, nor to be influenced by them, any further than as they are sustained by that obligation. I am the more anxious now to speak to that point, as it has been more particularly challenged by the learned and able gentleman from South Carolina, who has just taken his seat.

The legal question I take to be this—whether supposing the commutation not to be equal to the half pay for life, the United States are under an obligation to make good the difference; an obligation either legal or equitable; for as to Government, there is no difference between the legal obligations and the equitable; both have the same common foundation in justice; their difference is only a difference of forms; and these forms belong to courts, not to Governments.

I begin this inquiry by saying, that the act of 1780, providing half pay for life for the officers of the Revolutionary army, who should serve to the close of the revolutionary war, became a contract with those officers who did serve to the close of that war. The proposition made to them in that act, was a conditional one; and when the proposition was accepted, and the condition was performed on their part it became a contract on the part of the United States, strictly and technically so speaking—a contract with those officers, not as a body, but with each individual officer. In 1783, when the treaty of peace was concluded and ratified, these contracts were perfected and perfect, and became from that moment obligatory upon the United States; and are still obligatory, unless they have been rescinded by each individual acting for himself. For several parties to several contracts, cannot rescind those contracts for one another; nor can a majority of all those parties rescind them for all. The idea is preposterous.

If these contracts have been rescinded, it must be, I repeat, by the individual assent of each officer to the rescinding act, whatever that act may be. If that assent has been given, I agree it is not material in what form it was given; nor whether by words or by acts; whether expressed in the former, or implied by the latter: but the fact of the assent, and of the individual assent, is material.

Now as to the evidence of this assent. The votes of the army lines, determined by majorities in those lines, is not evidence of individual assent; not even in those majorities; for it is impossible to say who voted in those majorities; and who did not vote in them; it is impossible, therefore, to bring home the assent to any one individual in particular. And there is no pretence, to say that these votes were unanimous. Had they been unanimous, it would have amounted to the requisite proof, as to each individual; but they were not unanimous; and the proof is that the votes were reported to Congress as majorities merely; a majority of the whole, certainly is not the whole; regarding, then, the votes of these majorities as not being evidence of individual assent—what evidence of individual assent remains?

It is said that the acts of these officers imply this assent; that in point of fact they did accept of the commutation notes, given as a substitute for half pay, and did receive them in lieu of half pay; that this implied assent, and was individually given. All this is very true, and would be quite conclusive against the officer, if this assent was voluntary. Here is the turning point of the whole case. If this assent was voluntary, it was conclusive against the officer; but if it was compulsory, it was not conclusive. How was the fact?

If this alternative had been presented to the officer—here, take these commutation notes, or take your half pay for life; and he had taken the commutation notes, the acceptance would have been conclusive upon him, because then it would have been voluntary. But this alternative was not presented to him. The alternative presented to him was this—here, take these commutation notes, or take nothing—yes, or take nothing. That this was the alternative is evident; first, because Congress supposed, and acted upon the idea, that these officers had agreed to accept the commutation in lieu of the half pay; and were to be held precluded. Then in consequence of this supposition, because Congress had made and contemplated making no provision, either immediate or prospective, for satisfying these life annuities, in case the commutation notes should be refused, by these officers, or by any of them. The alternative presented, then, unquestionably was this—either take these notes, or take nothing. And surely an acceptance thus constrained, thus compelled, was not, and could not be called voluntary. A constrained acceptance a voluntary acceptance! Why, it is a contradiction in terms. You might as well say that a release of a private debt for half its amount, was a voluntary release, and a binding discharge. No: as in that case, the debt would still be a subsisting debt, at least for the unsatisfied balance; so this obligation is still a subsisting obligation, unless the commutation was a fair equivalent for the half pay. This question then arises—whether it was a fair equivalent; and if so, whether this equivalent has been paid up according to the terms of this contract. But upon these questions I do not propose now to speak. Both have been so clearly explained by the honorable gentleman who made the report, and by others in this debate, that if I made the attempt, I could not hope to shed upon them any additional light. I could but repeat what they have stated, and I fear I should but weaken what I repeated.

Mr. CHANDLER said he was no lawyer, and did not understand the nature of contracts. But he gathered from what had been said, that if any original contract was changed by the consent of the parties, it was still binding. It appears that a majority of the officers did accept the terms of the commutation, and that majority, in his opinion, swept away the original contract. And he looked upon the acceptance of the commutation certificates as a proof positive of their acquiescence in the terms proposed.—Otherwise, said Mr. C., I consider it binding on the claimants to show evidence that they did not vote for the commutation law. If that could be shown, the case would have been made out.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland. I remarked on a former occasion that the Southern lines never did vote. General Greene never propounded the question to the officers under him—and when they returned home they were forced to accept the certificates.

Mr. WOODBURY observed, that there never was any proof of the acceptance of the law by the officers, with the exception of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. But, was it not evident that those who did not vote for the bill were those who were under thirty years of age? They were those alone who were to be injured by it. Besides, it is well known that the senior officers had allowed the younger officers to go home on furlough, consequently they were not present when the vote was taken in their respective lines.

FRIDAY, February 1.

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

A bill to provide for the relief of certain surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, was taken up.

Mr. MAOON rose, and, after some general remarks, pronounced a high encomium on the military services of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH.) As to the claims of these officers, we all know the straits to which the Government was put to get along, at that time; and that the Old Congress was so hard

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

run that they tried to get lands to pay their debts with. And, before the constitution was adopted, the State of Virginia surrendered her lands to the United States; whether wisely or not, I don't pretend to say. The Government wanted these lands to raise funds to pay off their obligations. The States could not help them. A great portion of the country had been so destroyed that it was as much as the people could do to live. Almost every man had been burnt out at the end of the war; and that family which had a cow left, was considered fortunate. Well, sir, you now call on these people, or their descendants, to help these officers whose families were better off during the time of danger.

Sir, had I a talent for description, I would display to you a picture of those times, which would shake the stoutest heart. I would show you the wretched women, (whose husbands were defending the country in the militia ranks,) with their hungry, barefoot, almost naked children hanging round them, contemplating the burning ruins of their homes—without a shelter, and without a morsel to supply the wants of their weeping babes. These things have passed away; and thousands of instances like this are not now remembered. The Old Congress had the most difficult task to settle the accounts of the States. His own State paid millions, besides the vast amount of private losses. The people entered into the contest with the utmost spirit, and followed the enemy with as much avidity as ever Col. Boone followed an Indian in his life. There was a continual skirmishing kept up; and, on the British side, when the Americans were taken or surprised, it was whipping, hanging, and burning. When the paper money run out, what was to be done? It could well be recollected what was the state of the country after the battle of Guilford. The paper money had run out, and there was no specie. Congress then took up a new plan, and the Continental bills run down to one-eighth of their nominal value, which the gentleman from Maryland very well knows. In my State there was but little Continental money. The State struck some paper of its own, which sold at 10 per cent., and, when the confiscated property was sold, the notes were redeemed. This was not done by any other State; and many of the States paid the interest on the Continental certificates. The last cow and the last horse went to keep up the contest; and perhaps nothing was less thought of than individual interest. There were no better troops in the war than the lines of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Delaware; but it was no safer for the inhabitants to be with them, than with the enemy. The regular troops were, he knew, very much distressed; but were they more so than the militia? They were all paid alike with the Continental certificates. Everybody was compelled to make sacrifices; and it was worse for the people to get along than settling a new country. The contributions had been so closely levied, and the ravages so great, that, where the two armies had been, there was no provisions, and few houses. The Continental money was the only currency in the country.

Gen. Hamilton was a man who undertook few things that he did not understand; and he took great pains to get this commutation done for the officers. It could hardly be supposed that he would do what would be injurious to his fellow-officers. The gentlemen of the committee had mentioned the climates of Carlisle and Montpelier as standards. They are both healthy places. But do they suppose that they will apply to this country? Col. Hamilton was sufficiently acquainted with the matter, and knew the rates of annuities, and he fixed upon five years. The commutation was, no doubt, a matter of gratification to the officers at the time. But it was maintained by the gentleman over the way, and by the gentleman from New York, that every individual among the officers did not assent to it. But it was decided by the majority of the line, and that was sufficient. The same principle applied on the adoption of the constitution. That was done by the vote of nine States. It was then argued that it must be done by the vote of the whole; but the majority ruled. And so it ought to in this case. It is said that the elder officers made a good bargain, while the younger ones suffered. But is it to be supposed that the senior officers would make a good bargain for themselves, and a bad one for their juniors? Nothing has the effect to produce mutual attachment more than mutual suffering; and these men had suffered together. Would General Wayne or General Smallwood, who began the revolution, and went through it, have done so? I do not believe it. I say, sir, that, with regard to this bill, no man has any claim upon the Government for more than he received: neither these officers nor the militia. But, should I admit their claim, and allow that it was, as the gentleman tells us, founded on equity, will it be urged that a man's claims of this kind don't descend to his heirs? Does the gentleman from New York think so? But every thing was now different. Every thing was turned upside down. It was once supposed that when a man died he paid his last debt, and settled his accounts with the world. But it is not so now.

The history of the revolution, as to the partisan warfare in the Southern country, had never given any idea of the truth. The memory of Sumter and Marion was held in high esteem; but half that they did was never told, except by some old people to the children of the present day. But history don't stoop to the militia. The battle of the Cowpens is almost the only action that figures in the history of the war in the South. But I have a gentleman in my eye who did as gallant a thing in the militia as was ever done by regular troops. Nobody had a greater respect for the regulars and militia who fought at the Cowpens: but there was another action performed by—[The name of the officer escaped the Reporter, (he thinks it was Col. Tazewell,) as also the location of this battle. Mr. M., at this point of his remarks, directed his speech to another part of the Chamber, and was, consequently, not heard.]—That, he considered, the most important event of the war. There were among the humbler officers many striking examples of bravery and patriotism. There were many others who sacrificed vast fortunes in supporting the cause of the revolution. In the State of New York there were some striking instances of the kind. Governor Clinton was more honored by his actions than by the Vice Presidency; and his stubborn whiggery gave him the strongest hold on the affections of the people.

It was impossible to go into the revolutionary war and make selections of individuals, or do justice to any one set of men. It was utterly impossible. He recollected when Mr. Monroe's bill was introduced in the other House, only four hundred thousand dollars was asked for. The sum has gone on increasing—and it only shows that this thing is like putting your hand to the plough—you never can get off again. You take one step, and you must go on. It is an unpleasant thing to oppose any measure which the Senate thinks founded in justice—but it was his honest opinion that this bill ought not to pass. He should be sorry to hurt the feelings of any one. The bill would have suited him better, had it pointed out how much each grade of officers was to receive. He should then have liked it better, although, even in that form, he should not have voted for it. The sum now put in was in the lump; and he did not know how it was to be divided. As to the sufferings of these officers, other classes of people had suffered equally. He knew instances where individuals had had their houses burnt over twice.

The gentleman from New York said, the other day, a great deal about the glory and honor of the country. But I like some other things much better. For, sir, when I hear of glory and honor, I always think of war and bloodshed. The happiness of the people seems to me much better, and I should be more pleased to see the duty on salt taken off, than increased by a war, in which the country was to gain honor and glory. But the gentleman from New York don't want to see it lessened.

[Mr. M. here made an allusion to John Hancock and Samuel Adams, which was not heard by the Reporter.]

We are told by the gentlemen over the way, (Messrs. WOODBURY, BERRIEN, and HARRISON,) that it is a debt, which this bill is to pay. But I should like to know how, under that argument, they can bring forward their claim, with a receipt in full staring it in the face. And I ask whether this bill is any more a fulfilment of the contract than the commutation act?

Do you propose to pay the full amount of the half pay? No, you give them the old certificates, with interest. Fashions are continually changing. The time is within my memory when we were a free, content, and happy people. We go now for glory and honor, as the gentleman from New York observes. We are told continually that this is a great and growing people. I think we are growing rather too fast. The poverty of the people is never taken into consideration. We count the numbers only. I ask, if this was a claim, why it did not go to the Committee on Claims? What need was there for a Select Committee? It was, I suppose, to give force to the application. The real reason why the commutation act was passed, was that pensions were thought disgraceful. This induced the officers to consent to commute their half pay. He thought the principle of this bill no better than that proposed in the time of Mr. Monroe.

[Mr. BERRIEN here handed Mr. MACOS a paper—on which Mr. M. made an acknowledgment of being in error—but in what respect, the Reporter could not hear.]

The gentleman from New York has said that it is a reproach upon the country that this debt has not been paid before. I should like to know who caused this reproach. If we had the wealth of all the world, we could not get rid of it. Do all you can, you cannot satisfy all the claims. You may live to be as old as Methuselah, and you could not do it. Some gentlemen think it could be done with a few millions. But we have enough to do to take care of ourselves. The gentleman also said that the commutation was inadequate—and, in the same breath, he praised the Old Congress, who framed it, in the highest manner.

I'll say no more on that point. We've been told about Shylock doings, &c. What the remark applies to, I don't know. I believe I have said enough to show that it can't apply to the Old Congress. I don't know but it may refer to those who vote against this bill. It must apply to somebody. Really, he did not see how this country could have been more lavish in expenditures. But every means must be taken to increase them. We must fund the public debt, and divide five millions among the States. Next to the army which achieved our independence, those men will deserve the thanks of the nation, who shall wipe the public debt from the records of the country. It had been said that one-third was lost by the funding system. I never heard that fact: for, as soon as the funding system began, there were riders from Philadelphia, and New York, and the eastward, scattered all over the country as thick as ever tin peddlers were, gathering up the paper—which gave a spring to the business, rather than otherwise. There were no post roads then, but people could travel, when their interests were concerned, without them. Will any gentleman lay his hand on his heart, and say that he thinks there was any unfair-

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Captors of the Philadelphia—Mrs. Decatur's Claim.

[SENATE.]

ness in the funding system? If gentlemen will examine the funding system, they will find that there was a plan to make speculators disgorge their ill-gotten wealth.

I look upon the object of this bill to be to take so much money out of the pockets of the descendants of the soldiers, to pay to these individuals. We are more disposed to help people whom we know, than whom we don't know. We feel more for our neighbors than for indifferent persons. We associate with the officers, and we sympathize with them. But we know nothing of the soldiers. As to the statement that the Maryland line did not agree to the commutation, he believed they accepted it, and that was agreement enough. He had heard much of suffering women. If their husbands did not provide for them, he knew that they had a hard struggle. Women have no political rights, and are necessarily passive sufferers. There were no petitions from women, and no committee appointed on their claims. They sat at home and exercised the virtues of patience and industry. I am not for glory and honor. I go on a different principle. I do right if I can; and, if I do wrong, my people will tell me of it. I wish that equal justice should be done—not give one a silver spoon, and the other a horn one. It was curious to look at the two Houses—one debating on economy, and the other opening roads and canals in every direction.

THURSDAY, February 7.

Captors of the Philadelphia.

The bill for the relief of Susan Decatur and others was taken up, and the question being on filling the first blank in the bill with one hundred thousand dollars—

Mr. HAYNE (Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) said, that, so deep was his conviction of the justice of the claim under consideration, that he could not believe it was necessary for him to do more than present a clear statement of the facts, and to explain the grounds on which the committee had proceeded in reporting this bill. In doing this, said Mr. H., I shall avail myself of the report, which, under the direction of the committee, has been submitted to the Senate; to which I will add such observations as may be necessary to give the Senate a full view of the whole subject. The claim which it is the object of this bill to satisfy, is founded on the recapture and destruction of the frigate Philadelphia in the harbor of Tripoli, in the year 1804. I do not think it necessary, Mr. President, to go back to the causes which led to the Tripolitan war. It is well known that depredations on our commerce in the Mediterranean, the demand of tribute, and the capture of American citizens, for whose release a ransom was always demanded, sometimes amounting to $3,000 a man, compelled the United States at length to appeal to arms for the redress of these grievances. As soon as the war with Tripoli commenced, Commodore Preble was despatched with a small squadron to the Mediterranean to prosecute hostilities; and not long after the arrival of his squadron on the Barbary coast, the frigate Philadelphia, of 44 guns, then commanded by Commodore Bainbridge, was stranded on rocks, in a situation which rendered resistance impossible, led to her capture by the enemy, and the imprisonment of her officers and crew, amounting to between three and four hundred men, in one of the dungeons of Tripoli. On the flood tide the frigate was got off, and being taken into the Tripolitan service, was moored in the harbor of Tripoli, "within pistol shot of the whole of the Tripolitan marine, mounting altogether upwards of 100 pieces of heavy cannon, and within the immediate protection of formidable land batteries consisting of 115 pieces of heavy artillery." It is stated that "besides this force, there were encamped at the time, in the city and its vicinity, twenty thousand troops, and that upwards of 1,000 seamen were attached to the fleet in the harbor." In this situation, sir, and while the force of Commodore Preble, originally small, was, by the loss of the Philadelphia, so much reduced as to prevent his carrying on his operations against the enemy with any prospect of success, Stephen Decatur, then a very young man, and a junior lieutenant in the fleet, conceived the idea of entering the harbor of Tripoli in the night, with the small schooner Enterprise, of 12 guns and about 70 men, which he then commanded, and of boarding and recapturing the frigate. That this scheme originated with Decatur is asserted by the committee in their report; but, as this fact has been questioned, I shall proceed to establish it beyond the possibility of a doubt, if the evidence before us is to be relied on. It is due to the memory of one of the most gallant officers that ever adorned the naval service of this or any other country, that the truth should be put beyond all question; and I know that this act of justice to her lamented husband will be more grateful to the feelings of the petitioner, than any pecuniary grant you could possibly make. I will now refer the Senate to the statements of Commodore Charles Stewart, who served under Commodore Preble, and who, in command of the Syren, accompanied Decatur in his expedition against the Philadelphia.

Commodore Stewart, in a letter dated December 12th, 1826, addressed to Mrs. Decatur, says:

"You state that your late husband has given you to understand that the project of burning that frigate at her moorings, and thereby remove a serious impediment to the future operations of the squadron against Tripoli, originated with him. This understanding was perfectly correct—it did originate with your late husband, and he first volunteered himself to carry it into effect, and asked the permission of Commodore Preble, off Tripoli, (on first discovering the frigate was lost to the squadron,) to effect it with the schooner Enterprise, then under his command. The Commander-in-Chief thought it too hazardous to be effected in that way, but promised your late husband that the object should be carried into effect on a proper occasion, and that he should be the executive officer when it was done."

In another letter, dated January 5th, 1827, Commodore Stewart says:

"The squadron under the command of Commodore Preble had been detained some time, as they severally arrived at Gibraltar, (with the exception of the frigate Philadelphia and the schooner Vixen,) to counteract the hostile designs of the Emperor of Morocco. As soon as the Commodore had accomplished his objects in that quarter, he proceeded off Tripoli, in the Constitution, accompanied by the schooner Enterprise, commanded by your husband. On arriving off Tripoli, where the Commodore expected to find the frigate Philadelphia and schooner Vixen, blockading that port, he discovered that frigate at moorings in the harbor. It was at this time your late husband proposed to destroy the frigate, with the Enterprise, under his command—and at this time, as I stated in my former letter to you, Commodore Preble assured your husband that the frigate should be destroyed, and that he should be the executive officer when done, for his having so handsomely volunteered his efforts to effect it with the schooner Enterprise. I give you these facts as I received them from Commodore Preble and your husband, at the time, as well as from several officers then on board the Constitution. Some time after this I arrived at Syracuse, in the Syren brig, from Algiers, and offered my services for the expedition, which were accepted by Commodore Preble.

"Some time after this, when the expedition was a subject of conversation in the cabin of the Constitution, (which was frequently the case, from the extreme urgency on our part to have it effected immediately, and unwillingness on the part of the Commodore to have it executed at so perilous a season of the year, and his reluctance to put any thing to hazard in a force originally so small, but then much reduced by the frigate and her crew,) that letters were received from Capt. Bainbridge, at Tripoli, I think by way of Malta, which were partly written in lemon juice, and which the Commodore read to us, after rendering it legible before the fire. In this letter the practicability of destroying the frigate was strongly urged by Captain Bainbridge, and the mode he pointed out was by a surprise. This despatch fully confirmed all our ideas and previous conversations on that subject, decided the Commodore at once to carry it into effect—which was done soon after, in a manner set forth in his reports, on that subject, to the Secretary of the Navy."

In support of this statement, we have the evidence of the late Captain Spence, and of Commodores Chauncey, Ridgely, Crane, and Rodgers. Capt. Spence says:

"The destruction of the frigate Philadelphia is associated with the name of 'Decatur only,' and I had always supposed him to be the projector of the enterprise, from the circumstance of his having been entrusted with its execution. There could be no other good reason assigned for the preference given him, in the presence of older officers. I am under the impression that Commodore Decatur was the first to suggest the re-capture of the frigate Philadelphia."

Commodore Chauncey says:

"I state that I was not in the Mediterranean when the Philadelphia was destroyed, but I joined the squadron soon after, and it was generally understood among the officers that the plan for her destruction originated with Decatur; and that the execution of it was, in consequence, entrusted to his management. I acted under this impression when I urged on the then Secretary of the Navy the propriety of promoting the gallant Decatur to the rank of Post Captain."

Captain Ridgely says:

"I have a most distinct recollection of all the circumstances attending the preparation for burning the Philadelphia, and I have no hesitation in saying that the whole originated with Commodore Decatur—it was he who suggested to the late Commodore Preble the possibility of the enterprise."

Captain Crane says:

"My recollections are very distinct relative to the recapture of the frigate Philadelphia. It has always been my belief that Commodore Decatur planned, as well as executed the enterprise."

Commodore Rodgers says:

"I had always supposed the plan by which the frigate Philadelphia was destroyed was projected by Commodore Decatur."

In claiming for Decatur the merit of suggesting the daring scheme which he afterwards so nobly carried into effect, it is not my intention in the smallest degree to detract from the merit of Commodore Preble, who incurred the heavy responsibility of sanctioning the enterprise. The commander of the squadron, in determining to commit to Decatur the conduct of the expedition, was not unmindful of the extreme hazard of the undertaking. He well knew that its success would entirely depend on the celerity, secrecy, and gallantry of its execution; and, conceiving that any attempt to bring out the frigate must be attended with extraordinary hazard to the captors, and possibly expose the vessel to the risk of being re-captured—and believing that the destruction of the Philadelphia would sufficiently restore the balance of power to enable him to carry on his operations against Tripoli, successfully—and being, perhaps, moreover, of opinion that the destruction of the frigate, under the very eyes of the Turks, was calculated to make a deeper and more lasting impression on their forces, even than her re-capture, he resolved that she should be destroyed; and, therefore, issued peremptory orders, "that, in case of success Decatur should be sure to set fire to the gun-room, berths, cock-pit, store-room forward, berths on the berth-deck," and then, after "blowing out her bottom," to abandon her. In looking at these orders of Commodore Preble, I have been forcibly struck with their remarkable tone. In every part of them he uses a language which one here might be supposed to use to another, by whom all dangers and difficulties were to be trampled on as nothing. With the utmost precision, he instructs Decatur to proceed to the harbor of Tripoli, to enter it in the night, to board the "Philadelphia," to carry every thing by the sword, and, having caused her entire destruction, to return and report to him! As if the execution of such an order, by a lieutenant and seventy men, in a small ketch, under the fire of several hundred pieces of cannon, was a matter of course! The real state of the Commodore's feelings, however, peep out in the conclusion, when, in spite of his tone of confidence, he commends the little band to the protection of Heaven, and "May God prosper you in the enterprise!"

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Capture of the Philadelphia—Mrs. Decatur's Claim.

[SENATE.]

But, to return to the expedition. Decatur sailed from Syracuse, where the American squadron then lay, on the 3d of February, in a small ketch, of sixty tons, called the Intrepid, with about seventy officers and men, all volunteers, accompanied by the schooner Syren, commanded by Lieutenant (now Commodore) Stewart, to whom was assigned the duty of supporting him with the boats of the Syren, and covering his retreat. After several days of very tempestuous weather, he arrived off the harbor of Tripoli, and, on the night of the 16th, proceeded into the harbor, ran up alongside of the Philadelphia, (moored as I have described,) boarded, and carried her, after a short but severe conflict, on the decks of the frigate, in which upwards of twenty Turks were killed on the spot, and the rest driven below or overboard. At this critical period, Lieutenant Decatur found himself in quiet possession of his prize—not a gun had been fired—the alarm had not yet been spread, and it was the opinion of the pilot who conducted the expedition, as well as of several naval officers, acquainted with the circumstances, and (the committee have been assured) of Decatur himself, that the vessel might have been brought out of the harbor in safety; and, if that had been accomplished, the officers and crew of the Intrepid would, by the laws of the land, have been entitled to the full value of the frigate, certainly equal to two or three hundred thousand dollars. But the peremptory orders of his commanding officer, prevented the attempt; and having deliberately set fire to the vessel, in the very manner pointed out in his orders, and, having remained on board until the flames "burst out of the port-holes, and had reached the rigging and the tops," he finally abandoned her, bringing off the whole of his crew, under a heavy fire from the batteries and the shipping, without the loss of a single man!

To attempt, Mr. President, a eulogy of an exploit like this, would be a vain and fruitless effort. I must borrow the language of others. A gallant officer, now no more, assures us that it acquired for Decatur the meritorious appellation of "the terror of the foe." In the language of your committee, it was an achievement, the "gallantry of which has very seldom been equalled, and never surpassed, in the naval history of the world." And, in the official despatches of Commodore Preble, it is declared that "its merit can hardly be sufficiently estimated—it is above all praise." To this, sir, there is nothing to be added.

But, sir, I must be permitted to dwell, for a moment, on the consequences of this victory, and the benefits which the country has derived from it. The Tripolitan war of 1804 has always been considered as having contributed largely in laying the foundation of the naval glory of this country. It kindled that spirit among our young naval men, which has, on every occasion, blazed forth with so much lustre. It elevated the American naval character in the eyes of foreign nations, and inspired among our officers that confidence in themselves, which, at the commencement of the late war, (when it was feared that our ships would, in a few months, be absolutely swept from the ocean,) enabled them to meet the enemy in equal fight, and to achieve so many proud victories on the ocean and the lakes. From that dark hour when Decatur, in a small ketch, with sixty men, illumined the Castle of Tripoli with the blaze of the Philadelphia, the whole career of our Navy (with but a single exception) has been a series of daring enterprises and brilliant achievements. Its path has been a flood of glory. But it is in the effects of the destruction of the Philadelphia upon the Turks, that I would at this time more especially insist upon. It is emphatically stated by the committee, and no doubt justly, that it is to the profound impression produced by this and other exploits in the Tripolitan war, (especially the affair of the gun-boat, in which Decatur was again so proudly distinguished,) that the commerce of this country is indebted for a greater exemption from depredations, on the part of Turkish cruisers, than has been experienced by any other nation, and that when difficulties have occurred, they have been adjusted with unexampled celerity, and at an expense of blood and treasure altogether insignificant, compared with that to which, under similar circumstances, the greatest maritime powers of Europe have been subjected. In illustration of the truth of this position, and to show how largely the destruction of the Philadelphia contributed to produce these results, I beg leave to refer to one or two facts. It is stated by Dr. Ridgely, formerly surgeon of the Philadelphia, in a document, on the table of every Senator, that "He has a distinct and indelible impression of the leading events of his imprisonment. The Pacha and his court did not attempt to conceal their exultation on the capture of the frigate Philadelphia. It was a jubilee in Tripoli. So extravagant were his calculations, that he would not listen to any proposal of peace and ransom for a less sum than one million of dollars. In this condition of affairs, it would have been impolitic to have opened a negotiation. It would have been regarded as an evidence of fear and imbecility. This tone of confidence and triumph continued, until the daring enterprise, led on by your gallant and lamented husband, illuminated his castle with the blaze of his trophy. The sensation produced by the achievement was indescribable—consternation and dismay were depicted on every face. But the best evidence of its impression was the frequent conferences of the Pacha with the consuls, his undisguised desire to make peace, and his proposition to that effect, on terms much more moderate—I think two hundred thousand dollars. The terror inspired by the re-capture and conflagration, (increased by the attack of the gun-boats, on the third of August, 1804,) was felt during the war, and its influence was acknowledged when the treaty of peace was signed."

Such were the immediate effects of this exploit. But they ceased not with the war—we no longer pay tribute. Our seamen and our ships in the Mediterranean have, for upwards of twenty years, enjoyed as much freedom among the "licensed pirates" of the Mediterranean, as on our own coasts. Until the war with Great Britain, I believe no depredations on our commerce, of any consequence, had been committed by any of the Barbary Powers. Being thus led to believe that our ships would necessarily be annihilated in that contest, our rights were violated by Algiers, Tripoli, and Tunis. The moment peace was made with England, our Government determined promptly to redress these wrongs, and Decatur was despatched for that purpose, with three frigates, one sloop, one brig, and three schooners. His was but the van of a larger squadron destined for that service. But, sir, his name alone accomplished the object at once, almost without cost, and without bloodshed. Sir, it is almost incredible, it is a fact, unparalleled in the annals of warfare, that in fifty days after the squadron sailed from Sandy Hook, a treaty was signed between Algiers and the United States, which included indemnity for the past and security for the future. In that short space of time, Decatur "had cruised in the Mediterranean, fought and captured a Turkish frigate and some smaller vessels, killed the Algerine Admiral, sailed into the harbor of Algiers, and ratified a treaty at the cannon's mouth." From Algiers he proceeded to Tunis, and insisted on and instantly obtained payment for American property, (to the value of near 50,000 dollars,) which had been cut out of that harbor by the British. From Tunis he passed on to Tripoli, and there effected a settlement of all our differences, with the same celerity and ease. To show that in the extraordinary success which attended these operations, Decatur was aided by the impression of his own great name and his former exploits, I will read a few lines from the statement of a gentleman, then American Consul at Tunis, who tells us "he was on the spot at the time, and perceived the effect of that influence." He thus describes the interview between the Bey and the messenger of the Commodore:

"Tell your Admiral to come ashore and see me," said the Bey. "He declines coming, your highness, until these disputes are settled, which are best done on board ship." "But this is not treating me with becoming dignity; Hamuda Pacha, of blessed memory, commanded them to land and await at the palace until he pleased to receive them." "Very likely, your highness, but that was twenty years ago." "This Admiral is the same one who, in the war with Sadi Yusef, of Trablus, burnt the frigate?" "The same." "Hum! why do they send wild young men to treat for peace with old Powers? then you Americans don't speak truth; you went to war with England, a nation with a great fleet, and said you took their frigates in equal fight; an honest people always speak truth." "Well, sir, and that was true. Do you see that tall ship in the bay, with a blue flag, (the Guerriere?) that was taken from the British; that one near the small island, (the Macedonian,) was also captured on equal terms; that sloop near Cape Carthage, (the Pracock,) was also taken in battle." The Bey laid down his telescope, reposed on his cushions, and with a small tortoiseshell comb, set with diamonds, combed his beard.

A small vessel got under weigh, and came near the batteries; a pinnace with a few men rowed about the harbor, and one person, dressed in the garb of a sailor, was taking soundings—it was Decatur. "Tell the Admiral to land," said the Bey, "and all shall be settled to his satisfaction," which was done.

The rapidity and success with which Decatur brought to a conclusion our differences with three of the Barbary States, forms a striking contrast with the difficulties experienced almost immediately afterwards by Great Britain, and Holland, and more recently by France, in settling their disputes with one of them. Not many months after Decatur had concluded his treaty with Tripoli, Lord Exmouth, in command of the combined British and Dutch fleets, endeavored to accomplish the same thing, and what was the result? With a force consisting of five ships of the line, eleven frigates, and a great number of smaller vessels, he was hardly able, after a most bloody battle, (in which he lost 150 men killed, and had 700 wounded,) to extort a peace, on terms less advantageous than those which Decatur had obtained in a few hours, "without the sacrifice of a single life, or the loss of a spar or a rope." And even now, while I am speaking, a powerful French fleet, which has been engaged for months in vain attempts to extort peace from the same nation, has nothing to boast of but a single drawn battle. It has been remarked, sir, by one of our most distinguished citizens, "that the greatest statesmen of the last war were the heroes of our army and navy," and I think I may add that they have proved themselves, on more than one occasion, our ablest negotiators.

Without dwelling longer on this topic, I will come directly to the inquiry, whether any, and if any, what pecuniary reward is now due to the captors of the Philadelphia? On this branch of the subject, sir, I adopt as my own the views of the committee. At the time of

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Captors of the Philadelphia—Mrs. Decatur's Claim.

[SENATE]

the capture of the Philadelphia, the navy was young, and it was the opinion of many, even of our wisest statesmen, that it was not the true policy of the United States to strengthen this arm of the national defence. The system which has since been introduced, and which seems now to unite all suffrages in its favor, had not yet been established, and appropriate rewards for distinguished services had not been provided. Congress, therefore, though appreciating very highly the valor and good conduct of Decatur, and his gallant associates, contented themselves with bestowing mere honorary rewards, unless it can be considered as an exception to the remark, that they devoted two months' pay to the officers and men; which, it is understood, the former unanimously declined to receive. When, at a later period, however, the people of the United States came to feel and acknowledge the importance of a navy to the national defence—when our officers and men were every day covering themselves and their country with glory, a better and more liberal spirit sprang up, and was cherished, towards this long-neglected department of the public service. Prior to the capture of the Guerriere by the Constitution, we believe, no case had occurred in which a pecuniary reward, for a naval victory, had been paid out of the public treasury. A share in the thing captured, was all that the laws or usages of the country allowed: and, if that perished in the conflict, the victors went without their reward. When, however, the navy had fought itself into favor, and our naval heroes came to be regarded with the gratitude and affection which could no longer be withheld, the rule was adopted of paying, out of the public purse, for vessels destroyed in battle; and the principle is now settled, from the uniform practice of the Government, for fourteen years, that a reasonable compensation is to be allowed for vessels sunk in battle, or necessarily destroyed in consequence of injuries received in the conflict. Conceiving, therefore, that it is the established policy and settled practice of the Government, to allow compensation in all such cases, though they do not come within the provisions of the prize acts, the question now presents itself, whether the same liberal principle ought not to be extended to the case of the Philadelphia, and whether compensation is not as justly due to the captors of that vessel as to the captors of the Guerriere and the Java, or of the gun-boat destroyed on Lake Ontario? On this point, the committee were clearly and unanimously of opinion, that both justice and policy concur in support of the claim. Where all the facts are notorious, and the merit of the claimants is confessedly of the highest order, the Government ought not to avail itself of the mere lapse of time; nor can I conceive any sound reason why a rule, founded on justice and enlarged principles of public policy, should not be extended to those who have achieved signal victories, before as well as after its adoption. I come to the conclusion, therefore, with great confidence, and I know the Senate will concur with me, that a reasonable compensation ought now to be granted to the captors of the Philadelphia.

I proceed next to consider the amount which ought to be granted. On this point I propose to look to precedents, all of which are collected and annexed to the report of the committee. On examining these, it will be seen, that the amount granted by Congress, for vessels burnt, or destroyed in battle, varied from one-fourth to the full value of the vessel so destroyed. In the cases of the Java and Guerriere, about one-fourth was allowed, but in the case of the British sloop-of-war Hermes, destroyed in the attack on Fort Bowyer, her full value was paid to the garrison. Without examining all of the precedents, there is one to which I will call the particular attention of the Senate. During the operations on Lake Ontario, carried on by Commodore Chauncey, a British gun-boat, called the Black Snake, was destroyed by two barges, under the command of Lieut. Gregory. For this exploit no reward was ever claimed by the gallant officer who achieved it. But some years afterwards, one of the persons concerned in that affair, came here and presented a claim to Congress. The subject was referred to a committee, of which a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (no longer a member of this House) was chairman, and of which I had the honor to be a member. The subject was fully investigated; all the precedents examined, and a bill reported providing for the payment of three thousand dollars, which was certified by Commodore Chauncey to be the full value of the gun-boat, to Lieutenant Gregory and his party. Here, then, it will be perceived that, if Congress at the commencement of the war found itself constrained, by the pecuniary embarrassments of the country, to grant to the captors of the Guerriere and the Java only one-fourth part of the value of the vessel destroyed—after the conclusion of peace, in a more prosperous condition of the country and of the treasury, they have not hesitated to grant the full value. Viewing the subject in all its bearings; taking into consideration the extraordinary merit of the achievement; the delay which has taken place in granting compensation; and the small number of persons engaged in the enterprise; it has seemed to the committee that one hundred thousand dollars would be a reasonable sum to be now granted to the captors of the Philadelphia. The only remaining point to be considered is, the proper distribution of that amount. On this branch of the subject, the committee have experienced some embarrassment. The case does not, in this respect, come within either the letter or the spirit of the prize act. That act provides for the distribution of the proceeds of vessels captured and condemned. Where vessels have been destroyed, the captors can only be compensated by virtue of special acts of Congress, and under such provisions as may be adapted to the peculiar circumstances of each particular case. The mode of distribution prescribed by the prize act, is most obviously applicable only to a full crew. In regulating the proportions of prize-money which the captain, a midshipman, and a common sailor should receive in a frigate of 44 guns, it is manifest that the calculation must be founded on the idea, that there would be a certain number of midshipmen, as well as of sailors, on board of such a ship: for, otherwise, if there were but one midshipman, for instance, he might receive more than his commander. From this view of the subject, it is clear that a rule of distribution properly applicable to a full crew, cannot be justly applied to a skeleton crew, filling up none of the classes arranged in the prize acts. The capture of a frigate of the largest class, by a lieutenant and 70 men, in a small ketch, is so out of the usual course, and so contrary to all reasonable calculation, that the very existence of such an extraordinary case seems to produce the necessity of providing a new rule for the case itself; and, in the present instance, this can be the more readily done, as the proposed grant is not founded on the law, but, resting entirely on the liberality, may be regulated by the sound discretion, of Congress. After looking carefully into the subject, and consulting experienced naval officers, the committee could not discover any more equitable rule of distribution than that recommended by the Navy Commissioners, viz: that, after reserving for the commanding officer of the squadron one-twentieth of the whole sum, the residue be divided among the officers and men in the same relative proportions which each would receive if the crew of the Intrepid had consisted of the same number as that of the frigate Philadelphia at the time of her capture by the Tripolitans.

Mr. H., in conclusion, said that the bill before the Senate was prepared in conformity with the views he had submitted to the Senate, and he expressed an earnest hope that the country would this day pay in part that debt of gratitude so justly due to the captors of the Philadelphia, and which had remained so long, not only unsatisfied, but almost unacknowledged.

The motion to re-commit was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bateman, Bell, Berrien, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Eaton, Knight, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, Thomas, Tyler, Williams—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Bouigny, Branch, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Parria, Robbins, Rowan, Ridgely, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Willey, Woodbury—30.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HAYNE, for filling the several blanks of the bill, and it was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, offered the following proviso to the bill—which was agreed to:

Provided, That the Accounting Officers shall in no instance pay over any portion of the moneys herein appropriated to any other person or persons whomsoever, the distributive share due to the proper persons herein provided for, to any other person or persons whomsoever, than to him, her, or them, for whom it is appropriated, or to his, her, or their legal representative or representatives, first fully ascertained to be such by the said accounting officers. Nor shall any contract, bargain, or sale, of any such distributive share to any other person or persons be in anywise obligatory on the vendor, but shall be held to be null and void, to all intents and purposes.

MONDAY, February 11.

Captors of the Philadelphia.

[The bill for the relief of Mrs. Susan Decatur and others, was taken up.

The bill was read a third time, and finally passed, and sent to the House.]

Powers of the Vice President—Right to Call a Senator to Order—Right of the Senator to Appeal.

On motion of Mr. RIDGELY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee appointed to revise the rules of the Senate; when the amendments reported by the committee were severally read and agreed to.

Mr. TAZEWELL rose to inquire of the chairman of the committee, whether the 6th and 7th rules had been considered, and whether the committee proposed any alteration in them. Mr. T. referred to a decision made in relation to those rules by the Vice President two years ago. Mr. T. thought then, and still thought, that the decision of the Vice President was correct. The Vice President, in his opinion, had not the power to call a Senator to order for words spoken in debate—it was a power that ought not to be given him.

Mr. RIDGELY, in reply, stated that these rules (the 6th and 7th) had been considered by the committee, who were of opinion that no alteration in them was necessary or expedient, and that the decision under them of the Vice President, alluded to by the Senator from Virginia, was substantially correct.

Mr. KING, a member of the committee, made an explanation similar to that of Mr. RIDGELY. He had no doubt, in his own mind, that the decision of the President, just alluded to, was a correct one. There was one member of the committee, however, who differed in opinion with the majority in regard to these rules, and who had proposed an alteration of them. He was, however, overruled by the decision of the other members of the committee, who thought it best that the rules should remain as they were.

FEBRUARY, 1838.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

Mr. Foor declared himself to be the member of the committee alluded to, who had proposed the amendment to the 6th rule; and after being called upon in this manner, he felt himself bound to propose the same amendment for the consideration of the Senate; and should assign the reasons which induced him to offer that amendment in the committee, and which he now felt it his duty to urge before the Senate, in favor of its adoption. Sir, the Senator from Alabama has stated very correctly the proceedings of the committee on the subject. The rules of the Senate are few in number, embracing only the cases in which the Senate have thought proper to depart from the rules of proceeding in Jefferson's Manual, which appears to have been adopted by consent, as their guide in all their deliberations. The 6th and 7th rules of the Senate, by the construction given by the present presiding officer, have put it entirely out of the power of any person to call a Senator to order for words spoken, until the Senator shall have finished his speech. For, if the presiding officer has not the power, it exists in no one; for, in Jefferson's Manual it is laid down explicitly, that "Offensive words are not to be noticed until the member has finished his speech, then they are to be written down." It appears from this, that these rules, instead of facilitating the business, are only calculated to produce embarrassment; and it is very evident that such has been their operation in relation to the case to which the Senator from Virginia (Mr. TAZEWELL) has alluded. And, sir, in my opinion, the rules should either be amended so as to recognize in the President the power to call to order, or that they should be expunged, and leave the Manual for our guide; for, under that rule, it is made the duty of the presiding officer to call to order: for, in speaking of offensive words in debate, he says, "such proceedings Mr. Speaker ought to suppress." It would seem from the 6th rule, as if it was not contemplated that the President should call to order for words spoken, because the member is required to take his seat until the President decides whether he is in or out of order. And if called to order by the President, it would seem unnecessary that he should take his seat to allow time for the President to decide; for the call to order would of course be a decision of the first instance.

Mr. MACOX said that he thought the President ought not call to order. He should sit in his seat to decide between the members, and he ought to be pure and unbiassed, like a judge upon the bench. Or, said Mr. M., suppose that he improperly calls to order, to whom are you to appeal? He is to decide; therefore, he ought to keep aloof from the cause of complaint, and not be the originator of the call, so as to judge impartially between the opposite parties. He had rather have it so, than alter it.

Mr. KING here read the 6th and 7th rules, and commented on the effect of the amendment as proposed by Mr. Foor. If you give, said Mr. K., this power to the Vice President, you clothe him with the most tremendous and dangerous power; a power no less than that of putting an end to debate; to gag a member when the course of debate is not consonant to his wishes or his feelings. He would suppose that the Vice President was connected, either by interest or by inclination, with those in the administration of the Government, he would then have the power to put a member down the moment he discussed a subject that he did not wish to go abroad to the people—a power which, if he chose to exercise it, would make him the veriest tyrant in existence. It is not necessary, said Mr. K., to enable us to carry on the business of the Senate with regularity and decorum, to give any such power. He had no idea of subjecting the freedom of debate to the control of any one individual. Whatever confidence he might have in the present presiding officer, still the time might arrive when this power, if now given, would be found in dangerous hands. He hoped the amendment would not prevail. He repeated, he had every confidence in the impartiality and correctness of the decisions of the present presiding officer, but he wished to guard against any possible contingency.

Mr. DICKERSON said it was certain that any member of the Senate had a right to call another to order for words spoken in debate, however inoffensive those words might be; and he considered it equally certain that the president might call to order for words spoken in debate, when those words might be an outrage upon the decorum of the Senate. It is the duty of the presiding officer to preserve order. The power to do this must be an inherent one, without which, the duty could not be performed, and the officer could not preside. He has, and must have, so much power as to preserve decorum in the Senate, that the business may proceed without interruption. Two years ago, when two Senators, by the violence of their remarks upon each other, totally interrupted the business of the Senate, they were called to order by a third Senator, who was directed to reduce the words to writing; this he refused to do, as it was no concern of his.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that he did not conceive that the office conferred the right to call to order. If the powers of the Vice President were derived from the constitution, as nobody doubted, he knew of no sanction to that power, either in cases of irrelevancy or impropriety of speech. The only express power granted by the constitution, was that of giving the casting vote. This amendment went to give him another power not contemplated by the constitution. On the contrary, the constitution has given the right to the two Houses to make rules for the government of their own members, and for the direction of their presiding officers. He thought the power a dangerous one to place in the hands of the Vice President. It was never tolerated, and it was never intended to be, that a member should be put down because of the manner in which he chose to present his views or defend his principles. Yet this might happen, under the discretion which would be given by this amendment. As to the individuals of the Senate, he could not believe that the time would ever come, when they would be so forgetful of their own dignity, and that of the body, as not to call to order any member who should overstep the bounds of decorum. He was satisfied with the rule as it was; and was, therefore, opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to the accumulation of unnecessary power in irresponsible hands, and of that character he conceived the present motion to be. Every Senator had now the right to call to order, and certainly forty-seven Senators were enough to watch one. It could not be necessary to increase the number to forty-eight, by adding the Vice President, who is in no way responsible to us. We do not elect him, and we cannot displace him, except by an impeachment, which must be instituted in the other House. Nor is it safe to vest the power of restraining debates in an officer like him, not concerned in the debate, and not responsible to us for the exercise of his power. He may abuse this power, and we are without remedy. The power of stopping a member in debate—of making him sit down and proceed in another manner, or not proceed at all, is a power of high import. The feelings of the Senator may be deeply wounded by it, but that is a trifle compared with the injury which may be done to his constituents. A debate, vital to their liberties, might be stopped and terminated, under the pretence of confining the Speaker to a particular question; and the injury would be without remedy. The Vice President holds his office independent of the will of the body over which he presides, and in that respect differs from the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and all other presiding officers to which he has been likened. The Speaker of the House of Representatives is responsible to the body over which he presides. They make, and they can unmake him, and he is vested with powers by the rules of the House, which the Senate have never conferred upon the President of this body. But the principle involved in this question has already been decided upon, and acted on for two years; I allude to the appointment of committees taken away from the President of this body because he was not responsible to us, and retained in our own hands, although it was universally acknowledged that the power had been well exercised. The admission is general, if not unanimous, that you, sir, had exercised this power discreetly and unexceptionably—no objection was taken to your conduct—it was conceded all round that it was a power of a nature to be better exercised by a presiding officer than by the Senate at large; but, because you were not one of us, not created by us, nor responsible to us, this power was taken out of your hands. I see no difference in the principle of the two cases, and there shall be no difference in my conduct upon them. I voted to take the appointing power over committees out of your hands, because you were not one of us, and I oppose your right to stop me in debate, for a real or supposed latitude of expression, for the same reason.

Allusion has been made, sir, to past scenes in this chamber, when a Senator, not now a member of this body—one whom, I am proud to say, honors me with the name of friend, (Mr. RANDOLPH,)—has been supposed to transcend the freedom of debate, and you, sir, were censured for permitting it. According to the opinion which you then expressed, and which I concur in, you had no power to call to order for that cause, and the present motion goes upon that idea, otherwise it would not be necessary now to confer this power. That you were right in your decision, is strongly to be inferred, from the fact, that of forty-seven Senators having the undoubted right to call to order on these occasions, no one did it; and if those, whose rights were unquestionable, did not act, it certainly was excusable in you, whose authority was at least doubtful, to follow their example. One thing is certain; if you erred, you erred on the side of liberty, not of authority; and the rarity of these kind of errors, by those in power, should give them a claim to our respect, when they do occur. But I do not admit there was an error, nor do I rest the vindication of my friend upon presumptuous inferences derivable from our own conduct. I take higher ground, and say that nothing which we have ever heard from that gentleman on this floor, in reference to our President and his Secretaries, exceeded in severity and violence what is said with impunity in the British Parliament, by commoners as well as peers, of their king and his ministers.

I have some acquaintance with the debates of the British Parliament—not so much as I ought to have—but enough to bear me out in the assertion, that the king and his ministers have been often animadverted upon, in both Houses of Parliament, with a degree of severity which the gentleman alluded to never transcended on this floor, in any thing which he said of our President and his Ministers. I speak of what has occurred in the British Parliament in times of order and subordination, when the Speakers were men of the first weight and dignity of character, and when no one called them to order; and I must be permitted to say, that it argues badly for the spirit of the times in our country, that it is an evil omen for our republican institutions, if American

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

Senators cannot be as free with their President and Secretaries, as British subjects may be with their monarch and his prime ministers. But this reproach, sir, does not lie at your door. By your decision, you prevented the stain from sticking to your skirts. That you were right, I then believed, and still believe. Even upon a critical construction of our own rules, leaving out the enlarged considerations which governed you, your decision will stand the test of the severest scrutiny. Those rules only give you a power to decide after the question of order is raised and placed before you. When a member is called to order, his words shall be taken down in writing, and the President shall decide. This is the rule. Now why reduce to writing, except to inform the President of the words excepted to? And why inform him, if he already knows them? And why make another decision, if he had already decided in the fact of calling to order? The words and the spirit of the rule go upon the idea, that one member is to accuse another of disorder, and that you, as a disinterested and impartial arbiter, are to decide between them. This is unfavorable to the spirit of our institution, which forever separates the function of the judge and accuser, and so may they remain on this floor as everywhere else.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said it was the duty of the Vice President, as presiding officer of the Senate, to decide agreeably to such rules and regulations as shall have been made for his guidance. In the House of Representatives the presiding officer had the power of calling a member to order "for words spoken," because he was one of their own body, elected by themselves to preside over them, and amenable to their authority. If his decisions are unsatisfactory, they can refuse to re-elect him—but we, sir, have no such power. Our presiding officer is not elected by us—he is sent here by the people of the United States, and totally independent of us. Mr. S. was not willing to vest either the Vice President or President pro tem. with the power to stop debate. It is a tremendous power—I have felt it, sir, and never shall forget it. On a certain occasion, in the other House, a report was presented from one of the Secretaries, which animadverted very severely on Mr. Gerry. I undertook to animadvert on the report, and was called to order. Unconscious that I had travelled out of the record, I proceeded, and was three times called to order. I then inquired why I was considered to be out of order?—and was told, by the Speaker, that the report upon which I had animadverted must not be considered the report of the Secretary, but of the President of the United States. That I could not proceed: for, before the discussion commenced, I had been called out of my seat, and told, by a person high in office, that the President requested that the report might not be considered as his, but as the report of the Secretary of State. Mr. President, I am unwilling to be placed in this body, differently constituted as it is from the other, in such a situation as I then was, to be stopped in the course of my argument. There were high party times then, and high party times may come again, and whenever they do, similar outrage may (with such a power) be committed. And where will be the remedy? Gentlemen say, in the appeal from the decision of the President. An appeal! My experience has taught me to know that an appeal is not worth a button. The majority will always support the Chair, right or wrong. An appeal was taken in the case I have mentioned, and the majority voted with the Speaker, and always will. An appeal from the Chair is vox et preterea nihil. I would rather be without the appeal.

Mr. McLANE commenced his remarks with an apology for obtruding his sentiments upon the Senate, in which he had so recently taken his seat, on a subject relating to their rules and orders. The amendment appeared to him directly to involve the power of the Vice President to call a Senator to order, and prevent him from speaking, for words spoken in debate. He had considered that subject, and was of opinion that the Vice President did not possess such power, independent of or according to the existing rules of the Senate, and was unwilling to confer such power by any alteration of the rules. The amendment, by its terms, concedes, and the mover, with a commendable spirit of candor, admits that, by the existing rules, the power in question cannot be exercised by the Vice President; and so far as this admission may be entitled to weight, it would place the proposed change on grounds of expediency merely; but the argument of gentlemen had taken a wider scope, had asserted bolder claims to power, and had invested the Vice President with authority to stop a Senator in debate, and arrest discussion for the use of words which he might deem irrelevant or disorderly.

A power of such magnitude, so vital to the dearest privileges of the members of this body, has been supposed, by at least one Senator, inherent in the Vice President, as incident to his office as presiding officer of the Senate under the constitution, or derived from the rules contained in Mr. Jefferson's "Manual of Parliamentary Practice." He denied these assertions altogether, which he considered dangerous in principle, and thought it perfectly plain, that the law of the English Parliament could have no force on the proceedings of the Senate, much less that they could control the privilege of debate.

That the Vice President was not a member of the Senate; that he was placed here, not by the body itself, but by the people of the United States, under the constitution, which, by specifying certain of his powers and limiting their extent, by a fair implication excluded all others, had already been sufficiently adverted to. He would press them no farther than to remark, that it thence appeared to him perfectly clear that the constitution could not have designed to subject the Senate to the administration of an officer, without other rule than his arbitrary will, and irresponsible to those who might become the objects of his oppression. It might be fairly presumed, he said, if it had not been expressly provided, that an authority thus conferred would be liable to the regulation of those on whom it was to be exerted.

The doctrine of inherent or incidental power, Mr. McL. said, was everywhere the offspring of urgent necessity, and belonged to no functions in this Government, unless indispensable to its existence. In regard to the right in question, there certainly could be no pretence for such necessity.

If the Vice President possessed the power as incident to his office, it would be the gift of the constitution, and as such transcend the authority of the Senate. There could be no limit to such power, but the arbitrary will of the presiding officer. The Senate could subject it to no control; they could neither prescribe rules of order, nor the circumstances under which their debates might be interrupted; and would thus be subjected to a dominion which he believed no gentleman had seriously contemplated.

Of the privileges of the Senate, that of freely discussing the various subjects of their deliberations was the dearest, intimately interwoven with the structure of that body. He considered the freedom of speech here, as sacred as that of the press elsewhere; and if the combined power of Congress and the Executive be incompetent, as he believed it was, to abridge the freedom of either, beyond these walls, he could not admit a power incident to the Vice President to regulate the former on this floor. He could conceive of no right more clearly incident to the Senate, than that of free discussion, without which its deliberations could not be properly conducted. He thought it constituted an important part of the proceedings of the Senate, which they possessed the exclusive power of regulating by their own rules.

The Constitution of the United States, establishing the Legislature for the Union, authorized "each House to determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a member."

In this provision, Mr. McL. said, was contained the whole parliamentary power over the subject of order—that of prescribing rules, and of enforcing obedience. It was absolute and unlimited, and could not consist with the existence of a similar power elsewhere. It relieved the Senate from any other rule than that emanating from its own will.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said that he should not have thought of offering the amendment now under consideration; but, while the rules were under discussion, he thought it best to make them as perfect as possible. At present all things were tranquil; but the peace and harmony of the country might not always remain, and it was desirable that all measures should be taken to preserve it. If the question involved in this amendment had already gone forth among the people, and caused some commotion, it was high time that it should be finally settled. He had always considered it the right ex vi termini of the President to quell all disorders of whatever description.

The question was, whether it should not be the right of the President to call to order, giving the privilege to any member to call for a revision of the decision by the Senate. It was a rule of the Senate for thirty-five years, for the President to call to order, and he, himself, had been the subject of it. He had been called to order by his late venerable friend Mr. Gailard. He had appealed to the Senate to say whether he was out of order, and the decision was, that there could be no appeal. It seemed to be assumed by some gentlemen, that they were going to place a tyrant in the chair, and that against his lawless rule it was necessary to provide. This did not produce any effect on his mind. While a Vice President was in the chair he had no fear. While the presiding officer of the Senate was one in whom the people had confidence, and who reached his elevation legally, he saw no cause of apprehension. In the House of Representatives, the members or the Chair have the right to call to order. If it did not exist in the office of Vice President, the Senate had the right to give it to him; and he was in favor of doing so. As to the supposition that the Vice President was not a member of the Senate, he did not believe the position could be maintained, as he was firmly of the opinion that he was made part of the body by the constitution. It was true that all the powers formerly exercised by the Chair had not been considered inalienable. For instance, the manner of nominating committees had been changed several times, and at present that duty was transferred to the Senate itself. But there were other powers which were entirely incidental to the Chair, and could be vested nowhere else. A gentleman gets up, and makes a certain proposition. Does not the Chair tell him he is out of order? This is done every day. When two members rose also at the same time, power was given to the presiding officer to say whose turn it was to speak first. If the principle now attempted to be established were correctly founded, why should this power pertain entirely to the presiding officer? Why should not one of the forty-eight members do this? It would be idle to argue in this way; and it was, Mr. S. considered, strong proof that the Vice President had all the powers incidental to his situation. If they looked even to ordinary societies, they should find that they elected their President, who, by the election, was invested with all necessary powers for directing the business of the meetings. He becomes at once the judge of what is to be done, and the director of the mode in which it shall be done. I, for one, said Mr. S., am for giving power to the Chair, if there is any serious doubt of his possessing it. I think there is no danger in giving him such a power. If two members were to quarrel across the house, would the Chair decline interfering? Or, suppose that a Senator were to go at length into the consideration of a subject entirely foreign to the question in hand, and talk of the Army or the Navy when the question of the proper location of a road was before the Senate? or discuss the expediency of an appropriation, when no appropriation was contemplated? Would the Chair sit silent and permit this irrelevancy? Certainly not. If he did, an individual might talk here a whole day, and arrive at nothing. There were rules, the enforcement of which could not be taken from the Chair without making the Senate a mere nullity. It would be, in fact, throwing a new and inconvenient duty into the hands of the members, by setting them to watch over and administer the rules, which, in reality, belongs to the President.

FEBRUARY, 1838.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

Mr. McKINLEY looked upon all objections to the amendment as having a bearing upon the constitutional question. It had been said that the Vice President was not a member of this body. If this declaration were modified so as to be that he was not a Senator, he would agree to it. But he maintained that he was a member. The argument appears to be grounded on the fact that the Senate does not elect him. We complain that we do not elect him—that he is not a member—but against whom do we complain? Against the people of the United States. They elect him; and they, by the constitution, declare that he shall preside over the deliberations of the Senate. I say, then, said Mr. McK., it is the Vice President to whom the powers naturally belonging to a presiding officer shall be accorded. Who is to do the duty but him? Who else should preserve order, so necessary to the effectual performance of the duties of Senators? It had been said that he possessed no inherent power. I do not, said Mr. McK., understand the term. He was not aware that any officer of Government possessed inherent power; he rather thought all powers under the constitution were delegated. He would ask in what the difference consisted between the duties of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of this body? He did not see the great distinction that had been imagined. But the great objection was, that the Vice President not being responsible to this body, we cannot expel him in case of misconduct. But again, I ask, whose fault is it that we are so restricted? And again, I answer, that of the people and the constitution. And are we to fly in the face of the constitution, and say that, because the presiding officer is elected differently, we will not give him the power necessary for the proper performance of his duties? Order must be preserved by some one; and it is preserved by the Vice President in the Senate, under a clause in the constitution. It was surely not the particular duty of a member to call another to order. He is the interested person, and ought to be free from all interference in the duty. There should be an authority above him to judge coolly of the propriety of the procedure. He wished to know whether there was not a general rule in every deliberative body for this purpose? Where did the discretion rest, but in the hands of the presiding officer? The Vice President is a member of this body; he has a modified influence in making of all laws, as he has the casting vote, and can approve or negative every measure. Was it not proper that the power should be delegated to the Vice President, from the forty-eight Senators, to preserve order? He thought there could be no question of the expediency of this measure; and under this impression was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. TAZEWELL said: I am happy to hear from the Senator from Alabama, that he admits the right of the Senate, and of each and every member of this body, to exercise the power which the amendment proposes to confer upon the Chair. The difference of opinion between this honorable Senator and myself, in relation to this subject, is then reduced to a very narrow space indeed. He admits the right of the Senate, and of each of its members; and denies that the presiding officer of this body enjoys this right at present. He thinks it expedient, however, that this officer should possess such a power, because it is not the special duty of any particular Senator to exercise the right which confessedly belongs to him. And thinking so, the Senator from Alabama is willing to grant such a power to the Chair, provided it is limited and restricted as the amendment proposes. I concur in the greater part of this opinion, although not for the reason assigned by this honorable Senator. To me it has always appeared, that the rights of public agents of all kinds, were bestowed upon them, not for their own, but for the public good; and therefore, that all such rights conferred, were in truth but duties imposed. Being duties, we have not the right to abandon their discharge, while we retain the station to which such duties attach: but we are bound to meet the responsibility they impose, without seeking to transfer the duty, and with it the responsibility, to any other. As, however, it is unquestionably within the competency of the Senate to do this act, and as some trifling convenience may possibly result from it, (limited as it is proposed to make the power granted,) I should have been quite indifferent as to the fate of this amendment, but for arguments of a very different kind from those urged by the Senator from Alabama, which have been offered in its support, by our Senators, who have declared their purpose to vote with him in its favor. To such arguments I can never yield even the assent of silence; and it is rather to contest their correctness and truth, than to oppose the amendment offered, that I have risen to address the Senate.

Mr. HAYNE said there was but one question connected with this subject, which involved principle, or was in any degree material, and that was, whether the Vice President of the United States, as President of the Senate, virtute officii, had any power in relation to questions of order, except such as was conferred by the rules of this House? The constitution declares, that the Vice President shall be President of the Senate. It makes him the presiding officer over this branch of the National Legislature, but how he is to preside, and by what rules he is to be governed, the constitution is silent. The constitution, however, expressly declares that this House shall prescribe "the rules of its own proceeding." And here is found the power, the only power, under which rules of order can be made applicable to this House. If the Vice President has any power in relation to this matter, except to expound and enforce such rules as the Senate may provide, deriving that power from the constitution, he must possess it entirely free from our control. An inherent power must make him the sole and exclusive judge, without appeal, in all questions of order. There can be no limitation to such a power, but the discretion of the officer who is to exercise it. This construction would place the Senate at the feet of an officer, neither elected by, nor responsible to them. My construction of the constitution is very different from this. I look upon the Vice President, when taking his seat as President of the body, as standing precisely in the same situation as the Speaker of the House of Representatives. They are both presiding officers, but they must preside in conformity with the rules of the respective Houses. In these views, I understand every gentleman who has spoken on this subject (except two) to concur. The rights of the Senate, therefore, are sufficiently vindicated. But a distinction has been taken by the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. DICKERSON,) between the power of the President in relation to matters of decorum and in relation to the latitude and freedom of debate, which appears to me not to be well founded; the former, he contends, belongs to the President by virtue of his office, while the latter can only be derived from the rules of the Senate. The correctness of this distinction, I think, may be well doubted. For my own part, I cannot conceive how the President can possess any power in relation to the proceedings of this House, which is not conferred by the rules of this House. With respect to the class of cases which have been stated, such as a disturbance in the lobby, or a fray on the floor, and others of a similar character, the power of the President to enforce order is derived from the rules of the House. In matters of such minor importance, and so little liable to abuse, the practice of the House, for a long series of years, may well be regarded as constituting its rules. It is a species of common law of all deliberative bodies, that no violent interruption of their deliberations should be suffered. But there is a wide distinction between the exercise of this authority, by virtue of a rule of the Senate, express or implied, and the exercise of the same authority by virtue of certain inherent powers derived from the constitution. In the former case the Senate may change the rule at pleasure; in the latter, the powers of the President would be beyond their control. Believing, from this view of the subject, that the constitution has merely designated the Vice President, as the officer who is to preside over this House, and carry into effect its "rule or proceeding," just as the Speaker is to enforce the rules of the House over which he is to preside, it seems clear, that if the President possesses the power now in dispute, it must be under some rule either express or implied. Now, if this was a subject on which we had no written rule, gentlemen might resort to the usage of the House, (if such had been the usage, which I do not believe to be the fact,) in order to show that the President possessed the power in question. But, on this subject, the existence of an express written rule, must prevent us from resorting to any other source for the powers of the President. The mode of proceeding in case of a violation of order, by words spoken in debate, is prescribed in terms that seem to admit of no doubt or question. The sixth and seventh rules declare in substance, that calls to order in such cases can only be made by a member. That the Senator, so called to order, shall take his seat, that the words objected to shall be reduced to writing, in order to enable the President to decide whether the speaker is in order or not. Now, let gentlemen compare this rule with the corresponding one in the House of Representatives. There, the rule provides that "the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order," &c. There, the Speaker is the officer whose duty it is to call to order, in the first instance. Here, the President is merely the judge, or umpire, between the Senators. The difference in our rules probably arising from the difference in the construction and character of the two Houses.

TUESDAY, February 12.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments to the rules of the Senate, reported from the Select Committee appointed to revise the rules, together with the amendment offered by Mr. FOOT, to the 6th and 7th rules.

Mr. BARTON said that he was in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, upon its own merits, without any regard to the decision of the Chair in the memorable session of 1825-'6, which had been so unnecessarily drawn into this debate. The present rule (the 6th) vests in the President of the Senate the arbitrary and tyrannical power to decide all questions of order without appeal, giving him the right, if he doubts, to take the sense of the Senate. The amendment barely proposes to settle the disputed power of the Chair to call members to order in debate, and to restore to the members of the Senate the right of appeal. This amendment, he said, would assimilate the proceedings of the Senate upon matters of order to those of the House of Representatives of the United States, and of all the legislative bodies of the several States of this Union, by restoring to the Senate their constitutional power of determining in the last resort upon all their rules of proceeding, and was the more proper, because the presiding officer of the Senate is not appointed by, nor amenable to the Senate, as the presiding officers of most legislative bodies are.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

Mr. B. said the argument that had been urged on this floor by one of the opponents of this amendment, (Mr. BEXTON,) that such a power in the President to call to order in debate, and then to decide the member to be out of order, would be making the President both accuser and judge, had no weight in it—nor, if it had, was it at all applicable to the amendment before the Senate. Every justice, and every conservator of the peace, would be liable to the same objection of being both accuser and judge, if the discharge of an official duty were to place him in the invidious character of an accuser. There was, he said, no similarity or just comparison between a court and the presiding officer of a deliberative assembly; and, if the objection were a valid one, it proved the presiding officers of almost all the legislative bodies in the Union guilty of the impropriety of acting this double character. He had been somewhat surprised, he said, to find the opposition to this amendment come from gentlemen who had heretofore expressed so much horror and fears for the public liberty, at the idea of clothing a presiding officer with too much power. Yet they are content to take the rules as presented by the Select Committee, leaving in the Vice President the extraordinary, if not the unconstitutional power of deciding all questions of order, even involving the great right of freedom of debate on this floor, without appeal. This amendment, he said, would restore the Senate to its constitutional exercise of power upon the proceedings of the body, which was much more necessary now the presiding officer is not of our own creation, than it could be in those bodies that create and may remove their presiding officer, should he abuse his powers. Mr. B. repeated, that the scenes of 1825-'6 had been drawn into this debate most unnecessarily and uncalled-for, as if by design to obtain from this Senate an indirect sanction or condemnation of the decision of the Chair, made at that session upon the subject of its powers to preserve order in debate. Those scenes should not have been interrupted in their passage to oblivion, nor unnecessarily called to revive the feelings of that memorable epoch in the history of the United States Senate. If, indeed, that subject had been revived by a friend of the Vice President with a view of obtaining the sense of this Senate upon that decision, he presumed the Vice President did not feel grateful to him for such friendship. That was a decision upon which members of this body differ widely in opinion. He hoped, he said, that our Vice President had more magnanimity and candor than to make pretence to infallibility, and he declared himself to be one of the members who believed that decision of the Chair to be erroneous. He believed the Chair possessed, and ought to have exercised, the power of confining members to or towards the subject before the body, independently of any of the rules printed in that blue book, (the printed rules of the Senate.)

Mr. BELL, of New Hampshire, said: It is made a question in this discussion, whether the presiding officer of the Senate possesses, by virtue of his office, the power of preserving order in the Senate in any case where the Senate have not expressly enjoined it upon him as a duty, by their rules. I have always considered this as incident to the duty of presiding over a deliberative body. I believe it to be a sound principle of construction, that, where the constitution creates an office, and imposes upon the person holding that office a specific duty, that it invests him, by a necessary implication, with such power as will enable him to perform that duty in a useful and efficient manner. This rule will be found to be invariably correct in every case where it is not necessary to derive the power through a legislative act.

The constitution creates the office of Vice President, and expressly imposes upon him the specific duty of presiding over the deliberations of the Senate. That duty cannot be performed, either usefully or efficiently, without the power of preserving order. The power to preserve order must therefore be necessarily incident to the office. The Senate itself cannot divest the Vice President of this power, because he holds it from the constitution; but they may enlarge, or limit, or modify it, because this power is expressly vested in that body by the constitution. When the constitution gives to the Vice President the power of presiding over the Senate, it refers him to the well-known usage of all legislative bodies for the extent and nature of his powers and duties. It was necessary that he should be invested with this power, because it was to be exercised from the first moment the Senate assembled, and before it was possible that they could establish rules for this purpose. There could be no assignable motive why the power so universally held and exercised by the presiding officers of all other deliberative bodies, should be withheld from the Vice President, since the constitution gives to the Senate the power of modifying the rules he should adopt, or establishing others, as this body should think fit. The Vice President is required by the constitution to conform to, and regulate his conduct, as a presiding officer, by the rules so amended or modified. Should he, from culpable motives, refuse or neglect to conform to rules so established, he would be liable to impeachment and removal from office. Every exercise of the power of preserving order, however different in character, rests on the same principle for support. When the presiding officer calls the attention of the members to business, or commands silence, he is performing an act of preserving order, equally as when he requires a member to adhere to the rules of decorum in debate. The same power which authorizes the one, authorizes the other; any attempt to distinguish between them is destitute of even a colorable foundation.

But should we believe that the language of the constitution, which invests the Vice President with the power of preserving order in the Senate, to be ambiguous, has not that ambiguity been removed, and its meaning long since settled by the uniform practice of all the presiding officers of the Senate, and that, too, by the assent and approbation of the Senate? That construction of the constitution which gives to the Vice President the power of preserving order in cases where the Senate have not established any rules, is not of modern date, nor established with a view to any temporary object, but is as old as the constitution itself. It commenced with the existence of this Government, and was continued without interruption for thirty-five years. Within that time, some of the ablest men this country has ever produced have presided in the Senate. When I name Jefferson and Gaillard as of the number of those presiding officers of the Senate, who believed that the constitution invested the Vice President with this power, no man will have occasion to blush when he admits that he holds the same opinion. These were not of that class of men who are prone to claim or exercise powers which do not legitimately belong to them.

Mr. ROWAN said he thought there ought to be but little difficulty upon this subject. Happily for the people of this country, they are the legitimate depositary, or rather proprietors of all the power which they had not specifically delegated. As a man, the gentleman who presided in the Senate, had no more power than any other of the millions who composed the United States. Whatever power he possessed then must belong, either to his office of Vice President of the United States, or as President of the Senate. As Vice President, he certainly possessed no power, which he could exercise in, or over the Senate. The powers which he possessed in that character, were defined, but inert powers, held in reserve, which could not be exerted, until the contingency should happen, which alone could awaken and draw them out into exercise. The little power which he could exercise in the Senate, he could exert, not in his character of Vice President of the United States, but in his character of President of the Senate. His Vice Presidency of the United States made him President of the Senate; and being thus made President of that body, whatever power he could exert then, was in virtue of the latter, not the former character; as President, not as Vice President. He thought it a circumstance of great felicitation to the American people, that their Government was not so old, as to furnish a pretext for the inference of power from office. Much less, to justify the exercise of implied powers, by any of the officers. That was the evil under which the old Governments of the world groaned. And although he wished this Government to be interminable, yet he did not wish it to live longer than it could exhibit the character of its powers. And whenever the Government should have to look through the mists of antiquity at its Charter; or, in other words, whenever its Charter should be dimmed with age, he hoped it would be renewed. And that the springs and principles of our liberty would derive increased vigor from each renewal. He considered it matter of some regret that our habits of thought led us imperceptibly to infer power from office, rather than to refer to our constitution for the specific and definite powers conferred by that instrument upon the office. The habit was, he said, though unfortunate, not unnatural. In the country with which we were originally connected, and from the dominion of which we had so gloriously escaped, all power was derived from the king. He was the source of the inherent power of the Government. And the power claimed to be exercised by the officers of the Government, was, like his, supposed to be inherent. If the king did not complain, then was no one else to do so. The people had neither act, nor part, in the matter; with them, it was matter of indifference, whether the officer or the king possessed it, they did not. Let whoever might possess it, they were the subjects of, not the agents in, its exercise. In fact, they were interested in maintaining, rather than denying the doctrine of inherent power, in the functionaries. Because they had more to fear from consolidated than divided power. Division weakens power, as it does every thing else. And when power was claimed by implication as belonging to an officer, they knew that it was not inherent in the officer, it was inherent in the king. And that the inherent stock of the king would be weakened by so much as was inherent in the officer. They were led of course to acquiesce in the doctrine of inherent power. But the very reverse is happily the case with us. Here the people are the fountain and the source of power—what the king was there, the people are here—whatever power was inherent in him there, is here inherent in the people—whatever power belongs with us to any office, is equally conferred by the constitution, or by legislative act. Power with us, thank God, and our Revolutionary fathers, is not abused or magnified, by either religious or political superstition. It is enveloped in no mystery—we are not, we ought not to be bewildered, with vague and indefinite notions of inherent official power. Our plan of Government addresses itself to our understanding, not to our credulity—it invokes our reason, not our faith. Sir, said he, Government with us, is a simple, rational, common sense matter. While it continues to be so, we will be free; when it ceases to be so, our liberty ceases. While we are jealous, and watchful, and, he would add, distrustful of our public functionaries, we should be safe. But, the moment we yielded to the exercise of inherent, undefined power, by our officers, we were in danger. Sir, said Mr. R., this case presents to intelligent observers a rare spectacle, and as honorable to the officer to whom it relates, as it is rare. When did it happen, in any Government before, that a high public functionary disclaimed the exercise of power, which was supposed to belong to his office, supposed by even his enemies to be inherent in his office? When before did it happen, that the personal and political enemies of an officer insisted upon the enlargement, by implication, of his official power? Sir, the case is singular in both its features. And, if the example of the present incumbent shall always be followed, by all the officers of this Government, the freedom of the people will be eternal. And why should it not be followed? Is it not, when closely examined, as degrading to the officer, as it is injurious to the public, that he should be discontented with the power, which he legitimately possesses, and attempt to exert dubious and undefined powers? Sir, if there be one act of a high public functionary, which more than another ought to exalt him in the estimation of freemen, and entitle him to their confidence, it is his declining the exercise of doubtful or implied powers.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WHITE was of opinion that the presiding officer had not the power of calling to order, for words spoken in debate. That, he said, was entirely distinct from the power of deciding on common questions of order. The existing rules of the Senate, said Mr. W., do not confer this power, and if they do not, the presiding officer does not possess it. Mr. W. was not aware that any member had expressed the opinion, that the rules of the Senate conferred on its President the power of calling to order, for words spoken in debate—but if any member entertains such an opinion, a simple recurrence to the 6th and 7th rules, will satisfy him to the contrary. What is the effect of those rules? "When a member is called to order, he shall take his seat; and the member calling him to order shall reduce the exceptionable words to writing, and then the presiding officer decides whether he is in or out of order." Now, will any gentleman say, that the presiding officer can call a Senator to order, reduce his words to writing, and then pass judgment, on the very words taken down by himself? Is not this contrary to reason and common sense? We cannot, said Mr. W., act in direct contradiction to the express rules of the Senate. By these it is left to his brother members to call an offending member to order, the words believed to be exceptionable are to be reduced to writing, and then the President decides. This is the power delegated, and the presiding officer possesses no other. If then this is the effect of the rules of the Senate, it is not competent to the presiding officer, to tell any member in the course of debate, that he is out of order. All officers of the Government, said Mr. W., possess powers conferred by some express grant, or fairly to be inferred from it. They possess none other whatever, and the assumption of any power not expressly granted, will always be viewed by the people with a jealous eye.

Was it intended, asked Mr. W., that the presiding officer should dictate to members of independent States? If he has the power which gentlemen contend for, why is that very power conferred in express terms on the Senate itself by the constitution? He asked of gentlemen to say, which of the two rules should be paramount—the one expressly made by the Senate, or the one brought in by the Vice President himself. Two distinct and conflicting sets of rules cannot exist at one and the same time in the same body. Sir, said Mr. W., the powers which belong to this body are one thing, and those which belong to the presiding officer are another. The President of the Senate is not to devise, expound, and enforce its rules in virtue of his office, according to his own mere will and pleasure—he is merely the organ of the body, and that body confers just such powers as are necessary to carry on its operations in the manner most conducive to the public good, and no more. It belongs exclusively to the Senate according to the constitution, to make, or devise the rules, and to the presiding officer to expound and give them effect. All must admit the Senate is vested with the power to establish the rules by express grant; now, if it be true that the President, virtute officii or inherently possesses the same power, how shall we get along, if the Senate establishes one set of rules, and the President another, inconsistent with them? Which shall be enforced? The doctrine that powers had been conferred by usage and length of time, he protested against. Would gentlemen point out where those who had exercised such powers obtained them? To tell him that distinguished men had presided over the deliberations of this body, was to tell him what every person knew—but because a doubtful power had been exercised by distinguished men, did that sanction the usurpation? The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SMITH) tells us of his having been called to order, compelled to sit down, and refused an appeal—but, sir, said Mr. W., the gentleman who called him to order was not the Vice President of the United States—he was a member of this body, put into that office by ourselves, and amenable to our authority. The gentleman being able to specify only one case, and in that one, the question of power not raised or considered, Mr. W. could not deem it a precedent of any importance. But, sir, said he, if precedent were filed upon precedent, I never can believe the exercise of such power to be correct—I should be just as ready to vote against his being possessed of this power of silencing a Senator in the midst of debate, then as now. Mr. W. denied then that the presiding officer has any powers except such as are expressly conferred on him by the constitution or by the Senate, and concluded by observing that the time might arrive when the individual presiding over the Senate may think he can devise better rules, by virtue of some implied or inherent power, than those framed by the Senate, and thus the most pernicious results might ensue.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina said, if, in discussing this rule before the Senate, references to past occurrences had been made, it could not be imputed to him. He was not among those who had invoked its discussion. The committee had reported their amendments of the rules, which were acted upon by the Senate, and the sixth and seventh rules had passed sub silentio, and would have been permitted to rest as they were, had not the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAZEWELL) called the attention of the Senate back to them, by alluding to the decision which had been made in 1825, upon the construction of these rules.

He was aware that very opposite opinions had been entertained in the Senate when the question arose in 1825; but what that diversity of opinion was, or how it was settled, he knew not. He had not permitted himself even to inquire either for the one or the other. He knew much had been said in the public prints, and the public mind had been agitated, in no small degree, by it. And to avoid a recurrence of so unpleasant a nature in future, since the subject had been introduced, he certainly thought it by all means advisable that it should now be acted upon; and let the rules for the maintenance of good order and decorum in the Senate be rendered as perfect as possible, independent of that courtesy which had heretofore so highly distinguished the Senate.

He knew that considerable agitation had existed on former occasions, and these were not the halcyon days that seemed to invite to repose. And whatever gentlemen might think upon the rule as it now stood, he could see no possible objection to making it explicit. It could not prevent the exercise of courtesy, and might promote it. At present, they were calculated to produce that effect, as great difference of opinion existed upon their true construction. That there was a power to preserve order, was admitted on all hands; but in whom that power was vested created the doubt and produced the argument. Some were of opinion that it was vested in the Chair, while others strenuously contended that it belonged only to the Senators, individually and collectively. It was surely time to put the matter to rest, and let the Senate know, distinctly, where the power was located.

For his own part, he never had a doubt but that the President of the Senate had the right to call to order. The very nature of his office implies that power. He was not one of those who relied upon constructive powers where they were not expressly given, but in this case he had the invariable practice of the Senate, from its commencement in 1789, up to the session of 1825, a term of 36 years, to sanction this opinion. He recollected very well that he had himself been called to order by the President of the Senate, more than once. On one occasion, a gentleman in the chair, (Mr. GALLARD,) for whose memory he entertained the most profound respect, had called him to order for words spoken in debate, when he, Mr. S. himself, conceived he was correct, which induced him to appeal to the Senate, and was again told by the Chair there was no appeal from his decision; and the Senate supported the Chair.

Gentlemen had contended that this power did not, nor ought, to belong to the President of the Senate. They looked upon the principle as monstrous, and as threatening future consequences of a most serious nature. Others deprecated the idea of placing the power of governing forty-eight Senators, and checking the freedom of speech, in the hands of an individual, who was not a member of the Senate; and who might become a tyrant and control the freedom of debate in that body to the destruction of the liberties of the people.

Mr. S. said we must take things as they were, and not as they possibly might be. It was fair to suppose the people of the United States never would place a tyrant in that chair. If they should, the Senate had the constitutional means of controlling him. This they could do in an instant, by giving an appeal from his decision to the Senate; and his tyranny would be at an end. That the President was not a Senator was no argument against his having this power. Gentlemen seem to have forgotten that the abuse of this power may be as great when trusted to a Senator as it would be in the hands of the President. And, as we have entered upon the wide field of supposition, let us, for a moment, suppose the President of the Senate this tyrant or monster, who would exercise the power, if he had it, of calling a member to order, that he might silence him in debate. Could he not do it with a much better grace, as the rule now stands, of which gentlemen seem not to complain, by a collusion with a member, to call to order such other member

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

as he might wish to silence, and then interpose the power, which all agree he possesses, of declaring him out of order, from which there is no appeal, and silence him at once? Any man disposed to play the tyrant in that chair, would much rather divide the responsibility in that way, with a member, as he can now do as the rule stands, than take it upon himself alone.

Mr. KANZ said he would in a few words express his opinion upon this subject. He agreed that the true question was—Has the President of this body the right to call a Senator to order for words spoken in debate? He did not agree with those gentlemen who thought the President had no power to call a Senator to order, in any case, by virtue of his office. He would cease to be the President of a deliberative body could he not preserve that order which was so essential to preserve deliberation. He can suppress noise and disturbances, because the functions of his office cannot be exercised without it. Words spoken in debate, per se, cannot be considered disorderly.

The President cannot declare them out of order without the right of interfering with, and in some degree controlling our deliberations. The distinction was this: The President may preside over, but not interfere with the deliberations of the Senate. Such a power as the latter would be incompatible with the organic principles of the body. If the President may designate what particular words are in or out of order, the discussions here will not be free. The States are no longer represented in their sovereign character. I am free to admit that no apprehensions are to be entertained on this account of any abuse of such power, should it be conferred, but upon the principle of the question he had made his decision.

Mr. WOODBURY, of N. H., observed, that the course of remarks on this subject, by the gentleman from Maryland, had imposed a duty on all who might vote for the amendment for reasons different from his, to explain their views or consent to be misunderstood or misrepresented. The amendment, said Mr. W., in its operation has not been distinctly apprehended; else probably less diversity of opinion would exist as to its adoption. It, in truth, will work two separate and independent effects. One will be, to confer on the Chair a new power, the other to place a new limit or restriction on all its power. One is produced by giving the authority to call to order for words spoken in debate; the other, by giving an appeal, from that call to order, and from all decisions of every kind, to the members of the Senate. As a friend to restricted power in all public officers, and to jealousy of its exercise, he should certainly vote for the appeal; and as the right to call to order in the first instance by the Chair, was of so little consequence, when subjected to an appeal, he should also vote for that, if he could not vote for the appeal separately. Every gentleman will see that this grant of a new power, to one person more, who in addition to the present forty-seven, may call to order in the first instance, for words spoken, is not likely to produce either much good or hurt, if controlled by that forty-seven on an appeal from the Chair. So that the whole contest, worth a moment's consideration, was that part of the amendment, subjecting all calls to order by the Chair to the revision of the Senate. This was entirely a new provision. It had not been formerly introduced for the very plain reason, that no power to call to order in this case had ever been conferred on the Chair by the rules of this body. If it had been, as was done in the other House, expressly—then, undoubtedly, as there, it would here have been subjected to an appeal. To suppose that the Senate would confer such an essential and controlling power over the deliberations without any restrictions, when the other House had imposed implicit restriction, would be to suppose the Senate less vigilant and more servile and slavish to their presiding officer than any other legislative body in any free Government. The other House acting under the same clause in the constitution would limit the power, though the Speaker is appointed by themselves—is one of their own number and daily amenable to their authority: and yet the Senate would not limit the power, when their presiding officer was not appointed by themselves; was not elected in the same manner, and was not amenable to their pleasure for any supposed neglect of duty. To argue, therefore, that the Vice President has heretofore, by our rules, had this power to call to order for words spoken in debate, without any appeal to the Senate, is to aver, that those who made these rules, were most regardless of their safety, as compared with the other House, or were "ineffably stupid." The words of the rules exempt from this reproach, most clearly, our fathers, who cautiously formed them. The sixth and seventh contain no language in any way consistent with the idea, that by them the Vice President is any thing but an umpire in all calls to order for words spoken. In both of them, he is expressly authorized to render judgment after the call; whereas, if he himself made the call, he would render judgment before he made the call. He appealed to the gentleman from Maryland, as a lawyer, as well as a politician, to say, if the words of the rules admitted of any other construction, and that their spirit would admit of no other, since no appeal was provided for from the decision of the Vice President, no man of independent feeling, and of due respect to those who made the rules, could for a moment believe.

I shall vote then for the last part of the amendment, if the first part be adopted; because the first part confers a new power, never before conferred by our rules. I should vote for it also if the first part be not adopted, as it is a salutary restraint on the old powers conferred by our rules.

But I am utterly astonished, that gentlemen can support this branch of the amendment, and still argue, that the Vice President has a power to call to order for words spoken in debate, independent of any rules made by this body. This has truly been pronounced a doctrine most dangerous and alarming. Where does he obtain it? From the constitution? But that confers upon the Senate, and not their presiding officer, the right to make rules. He can only preside, or administer rules already made. The express grant to them of this right to make rules, excludes his right to make them; and if he cannot make one by the constitution, it is, on this same principle, an usurpation, if he undertake to make one by the lex parlamentaria, or virtute officii, or in any other way not authorized and ratified by the Senate, to whom alone constitutionally is delegated this important trust. But a single and decisive answer to all claim of an implied or inherent power in the Vice President to make and enforce this rule, without an express grant of the Senate, to call a member to order for words spoken in debate, is, that if he possess this power, he cannot rightly subject it to an appeal. If he possess it in any way, I care not what, independent of an express rule made by us—we can neither divest him of it nor in any manner restrict it. It becomes an encroachment and usurpation by us to attempt to subject it to an appeal. He can, and ought to put our appeal to defiance. He is not responsible to us for the exercise of powers not conferred by us; but responsible to the people alone.

Mr. BERRIEN said that he had framed an amendment in the form of a resolution, which he would now offer to the consideration of the Senate. He considered the power of calling to order in other cases than in debate, a well-settled ministerial power, which could exist in no other hands than those of the Vice President—because the attention of the members is not supposed to be upon the proceedings in such cases. But in the debate, the attention of every member would be wide awake; they would be the most interested in checking disorderly language; and, therefore, a delegation of power to call to order in such cases would imply a want of confidence in the Senators themselves. The general disposition of the Senate to preserve decorum seemed to make such a delegation of power unnecessary. He was, thus, disposed to confirm to the presiding officer the right of calling to order in all ordinary cases; and to retain to the members of this body the right of calling to order during debate; imposing upon the President the duty of determining whether the call should be sustained or not, with a right of appeal to the Senate in difficult cases.

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

Powers of the Vice President.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Select Committee on the rules of the Senate; the motion of Mr. Foot still pending—

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said he was in favor of the amendment which conferred the power of preserving order on the presiding officer of the House, because he believed order essential to a deliberative assembly; and, as the exercise of the power had been declined, it became necessary to invest the Chair with a power without which his duties under the constitution could not be performed, nor the order of the Senate preserved. The power must be vested somewhere. It pertained, he thought, of right, to the presiding officer. It was a power usually exercised by those who presided over the deliberations of public bodies, and it could not be exercised with effect by any other. It was clear, from experience, that the power of calling to order would not, in extraordinary cases, be exercised by members. The person entitled to the protection of the House, who was the object of personal animadversion, would not claim the interference of the House, because he is on the floor to defend himself. His friends will not, because seeing the injury already inflicted, they will prefer the right of repelling the attack. The friends of the assailant will not, seeing the party is present either to stop it by appealing to the Chair, or by exercising the right of self defence. The party excited by the sense of the injury, assails his adversary in return, retorts, criminales, and insults. The party rejoins, and a scene disgraceful to the actors, to the Senate, and to the country, ensues. Where can it end, but in blows on the floor, or in an appeal to the field of honor? It being considered the duty of all to call to order, it is the particular duty of no one—and no one will take upon himself to do what equally belongs to every other member to do: the interposition would be deemed at least officious, and perhaps by both parties; and what becomes of the business, the order, peace, and dignity of the Senate? But, if the power is conferred on the Chair, it becomes his peculiar duty, under his responsibility, to exercise it promptly and firmly. In the Senate, the duty is divided, and the responsibility lost by diffusion: it becomes a mere right, without imposing any obligation or duty, and there will be no remedy for the confusion and disorder which personal quarrels may introduce into this place.

This much I have said in regard to the expediency of conferring the power. But the power to preside over the body is derived from the constitution. The power of presiding presupposes certain duties inherent to the officer, and requires no law or rule to confer the right. He has a right, by virtue of his office, to sit in the Senate; to superintend its proceedings; to preside over its deliberations; to put all questions; to administer oaths; to judge of the violations of the rules, and to enforce them, and to do every other thing which belongs to the office. The Senate have the right to prescribe rules; but he is the Executive officer here. He has a general duty of presiding over the body according to the custom of such bodies. The Senate may prescribe rules to extend, or limit, or explain his general duties.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

The right to perform the duties which belong to the office, is a right inherent in the officer not expressed in words, nor are the duties susceptible of enumeration. That without which the office cannot be is an essential part of its nature, and is inherent in the thing, as the quality is inherent in matter. The right to preside is expressly conferred by the office; but the right to enter the Senate, and to be present at its deliberations, which cannot be questioned, is inherent, not expressed: it is implied, because it is essential to the performance of the duties of the office, and without which the office could not be. The right to do, when there, what pertains to his office, is also inherent, and there can be no doubt of his right to do the duties that belong to the office. What those duties are, must be derived from the nature of the office, and the general understanding and usage.

The constitution creates the Vice President, ex-officio, "President of the Senate." The right and duty of presiding in that body is inferred from the words which create that office. The act of presiding over a body whose duty it is to deliberate, to debate, and to decide on questions of greatest interest, legislative, executive, and judicial, requires that the body should be kept free from interruption, confusion, and disorder. It requires that order, in its strict parliamentary sense, should be maintained. It is the right of protecting and preserving the body itself. It is a right without which the regular action of the body could not be carried on. To whom does this duty belong? to the presiding officer, or the collective body, or the members? What was in contemplation of those who created the office? What is the general acceptance? What is the duty of all those who, under whatever name, are called to preside over public bodies? Order is the first law of every body, and he who presides must preserve it: such is the universal understanding and usage with regard to it.

The constitution has provided that, when the President of the United States is tried on impeachment before the Senate, the Chief Justice shall preside. What rights and duties does this impose? Certainly it constitutes him the head of the court, though not a member. He presides over the Senate, conducts the trial, preserves order, and does all other acts necessary to fulfil the duty. On the trial of a Judge, that office would devolve on the President of the Senate, who, in like manner, would conduct the trial, preserve order, interrogate witnesses, take the opinion of the Senate, and do all other acts pertaining to the presiding officer of the House, of which the trial of Judge Chase furnishes an example. In like manner, the President of the Senate must preside in all legislative proceedings. There is equal authority and necessity for both; and no sensible distinction can be taken. In both cases it implies the same duties. The Chief Justice would, under the right to "preside," exercise the power of preserving order, by a right universally conceded as indispensable to his duty, not by any express delegation, or by virtue of any rule, but as a necessary incident. The President of the Senate, in similar circumstances, would have the right to exercise the same privileges; and the right to preside in all other cases implies the use of the same means; and such has been the uniform practice in the Senate from the beginning—a power never doubted by the presiding officer—never questioned by the Senate. The Senate cannot be organized, or hold its sessions, until the President of the Senate is present, or some one in his place. He administers the oath to the other members; he puts all questions; but there is no law or rule of the Senate for this. It is purely by virtue of his office, call that power what you will.

Mr. TYLER said he would fain believe that no difference of opinion could exist on the question, when fairly stated. Had the Vice President a right to originate rules, by which we are to be implicitly bound? The answer to the argument of the Senator from Louisiana, on the powers inherent in the office of the Chair, is, that the power of the Chair is confined to the construction of rules, while their origin is with this body alone. Who questions the power of a court to construe the laws? Who believes that a court can make laws? How many swords would be unsheathed, if the President of the United States were to undertake to make laws? The powers of the Chair are limited to the construction of the rules; and that power nobody denies.

Mr. T. thought the power claimed was despotic, and if exerted, would be destructive of the object for which the Senate is constituted. Who doubts that the Senate has plenary power to accomplish the objects of its institution. If the Chair has a right to frame rules of proceeding, the Senate has not. The right must be complete either in him or in us. If in both, we should be brought into continual collision. Here Mr. T. defined the powers of the Chair to be ministerial, and properly exercised under the rules originating from the Senate—and he contended, at great length, that no other power was or could be given to the Chair, by implication, or by the lex parlamentaria.

Mr. T. also vindicated the decision of the Vice President, who, he said, was debarred by his station from self defence. The high crime of which he had been accused was his declining to exercise a power, which, in his opinion, did not belong to him. If actual improprieties were indulged in, why was it not the duty of the Senator from Louisiana, as well as the Chair, to interfere? Why did the Senator remain silent, and throw the responsibility on the Chair? He announced his construction of the rules, and the Senate acquiesced. Mr. T. believed that the decision of the Chair was correct. It belonged to this body to originate rules; to the Chair to enforce them.

Mr. WHITE moved to divide the amendment, so as first to decide the question of conferring the right on the President, and then on the appeal of the Senate.

The division having been agreed to, the question upon the first portion of the amendment was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Dickerson, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnston of Louisiana, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Parris, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silabee, Smith of South Carolina, Thomas, Tyler, Van Buren, Willey—31.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Eaton, Ellis, Johnson of Kentucky, Kane, King, McLane, Macon, Ridgely, Rowan, Smith of Maryland, Tazewell, White, Williams, Woodbury—15.

The question on the second portion of the amendment then occurring, and Mr. FOOT having called the yeas and nays, it was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, McLane, Marks, Noble, Parris, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silabee, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Thomas, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—44.

NAYS.—Messrs. Macon, Smith of Maryland—2.

So the amendment of Mr. FOOT, to the 6th rule, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT then rose, and said, that he took this opportunity to express his entire satisfaction with that portion of the amendment giving to Senators the right of appeal from the decision of the Chair, as it was not only according to strict principle, but would relieve the Chair from a most delicate duty. As to the power conferred upon the Chair, it was not for him to speak; but he assured the Senate that he should always endeavor to exercise it with strict impartiality.

Mr. FOOT then moved to amend the 7th rule by inserting, after the words "called to order," the words "by a Senator," making it requisite to write down the offending words uttered by a member, only when a Senator should have called him to order; which was agreed to.

Mr. MACON asked whether a vote should not be taken on the two amendments.

The Chair answered that the division of the amendment precluded the necessity of doing so.

TUESDAY, February 19.

Judicial Process.

The bill to establish process in the States admitted into the Union since the year 1789, was taken up.

Mr. WEBSTER entered into a view of the ostensible objects and ultimate effects of the bill under consideration, and argued that the former were not adhered to, while the latter would be disastrous and inconvenient in the extreme. He replied in detail to the arguments of Messrs. TAZEWELL and ROWAN, discussing the signification given by the process acts of '89 and '92 to the term civil law, by which equity process was to be regulated, and opposing the idea that the common law was alluded to by the terms of those acts. He considered that if the bill passed in its present shape it would destroy all equity process in many of the old States. He was perfectly willing that the advantages asked for by the new States should be acceded to them, but felt it his duty to oppose a bill which threatened so much evil to the older members of the Union.

Mr. VAN BUREN was for reconsideration, remarking that the bill, in its present form, was allowed to progress merely through an oversight of the Senate.

Mr. ROWAN said, that, in order to correct some matters of fact on this subject, it would be necessary for him to consult certain documents. He therefore voted to lay the bill on the table: which was agreed to.

THURSDAY, February 21.

Judicial Process.

On motion of Mr. ROWAN, the Senate resumed the motion of the 18th instant, to reconsider the vote on the reconsideration of that of the 14th instant, on engrossing the bill for regulating process in the Courts of the United States, in States admitted into the Union since 1789.

Mr. ROWAN said that he should have been contented to take the vote when this question was under discussion on the day before yesterday, but that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) had referred to the process laws of Kentucky, in connection with the rules of the Federal Court, in such a manner as rendered it necessary, in his opinion, to have special reference to those rules. The gentleman had, moreover, misstated the execution laws of that State. To have it in his power to correct the misstatement of the gentleman, and to produce the rules of Court, he had requested the postponement.

The gentleman had stated that the laws of Kentucky would not permit an execution to be taken out by a creditor upon his judgment, unless he would endorse, that uncurrent or unavailable bank notes would be taken in discharge of it. That, to remedy this evil, the Federal Judges had made the rules complained of by the Senators from Kentucky. He added, moreover, that the execution laws of Kentucky were declared, both by the State and Federal Judges, to be unconstitutional and void.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Judicial Process.

[SENATE.]

Sir, said Mr. ROWAN, as to the first statement of the gentleman it is utterly erroneous. There never was a law of Kentucky which forbade the plaintiff to sue out execution upon his judgment, unless he would endorse that he would take unavailable paper in discharge of it. I do not know, said Mr. R. whence the gentleman obtained his information, but I do know that it is incorrect. It was always competent for a plaintiff to sue out his execution immediately after the term had expired, at which he had obtained his judgment. But there was a period in that State in which the defendant in the execution, could, when it came to be levied upon his property, replevy the debt for two years, unless the plaintiff had endorsed that he was willing to receive the current bank notes of the State, in which case he could replevy for three months only.

Why the gentleman should have referred to the execution laws of Kentucky, he could not well perceive, for whether those laws were, or were not, constitutional or expedient, must be foreign from the point under discussion, which was, whether the judges possessed the power to make execution laws under any circumstances. If under color of making rules of court, they possessed the power to make execution laws, then they could have exercised that power, whether the execution laws of the State had been wise or foolish, void or valid. And if they did not possess the power to legislate, then they could not, under any state of things, have made those execution laws or rules. But, as the laws of that State had been mentioned by the gentleman, in a manner that might seem to imply censure, he would, while he reprobated, in the most emphatic manner, the right, or propriety, of any Senator's censuring the conduct of a State, claim the indulgence of the Senate, for a few moments, while he vindicated the State, by which he had been honored with a seat in that body, from the imputation which that gentleman had been pleased to utter in innuendoes. He would, however, premise, as a fact well known, not only to physiologists, but to all close observers of human nature, that the Creator of man has wisely and benignantly endowed him with energies beyond what are required for the ordinary avocations of life—energies for special and extraordinary exigencies, which lie dormant, until the emergencies, which awaken and call them into action, occur; that the degree of energy beyond the stock habitually employed in the ordinary pursuits of life, which shall be called into exercise upon any occasion, depends upon the excitement which the occasion produces. Now, sir, it is known that there is no general condition of society which excites its members so powerfully as a state of war. Hence it has been said by wise men, that it is but little less dangerous to close, than to commence a war. To allay the stock of excitement which that condition produces; to ease men down to their ordinary pacific pursuits, from a high and fervid state of excitement; or, if the simile may be allowed, to let off the steam when the voyage is closed, without bursting the boiler, deranging the machinery, or injuring the passengers, is a task of great delicacy, and very great difficulty. This excitement may be extraordinary even for a state of war. It may be rendered so by an infinite variety of occurrences. A spirit of disaffection among those who are carrying it on; unexpected disasters: a savage and brutal species of warfare, on the part of the enemy, are among the causes calculated to produce almost preternatural excitement during its progress; and, upon its sudden termination to expose society, in its pacific state, to the effects of the very highest wrought war-feeling. Sir, such was the character of our last war. We had beheld in other quarters for more than twenty years before its commencement, the fiercest, the most desolating ravages of war. We had not looked on as cold and heedless spectators; we could not do so. The scenes, though tragic, were grand and magnificent. All Christendom, with the exception of the United States, were involved in the war; and the United States and all the rest of the world looked on with wonder and amazement. Never did nations contend more strenuously; never did war crowd upon the gaze of mankind events more splendid, or in more rapid succession.

The United States were subject, not only to the excitement which a spectacle so grand, so august, could not fail to produce on them as mere spectators; but they were unceasingly exposed to collision with some of the belligerents. They were, in fact, for much of the time, in a state of quasi war with more than one of them. Then, sir, when the war really came, it found the people of this nation in a state of great excitement. Let me ask if the occurrences during that war were calculated to diminish that state of feeling? The disaffection of some of the States; their refusal to co-operate in bringing it to an honorable close, surely was not calculated to damp the ardor, abate the zeal, or diminish the patriotism of the people of Kentucky. The Kentuckians, said Mr. R., are, and I speak it with pride, a brave and chivalric people. They felt all the zeal for the glory of their country, with which its accumulated injuries could inspire an ardent, a brave and a patriotic people. They never hesitated, never faltered, for a moment. They poured out their blood like water on the north-western frontier. They were prodigal of life at Tippecanoe, the plains of Raisin, at Dudley's rencontre, on the Thames and Orleans. Sir, Kentucky was widowed by the war—she was bereaved, by its ravages, of some of her most distinguished sons. I need not, said Mr. R., name them; the occasion does not require it. Among them were Colonels Allen and Daviess—men surpassed in none of the States, in no part of the world, whether you have reference to their virtues or their talents. Sir, the glory of the closing scene of the war was calculated, by its effulgence, to excite to rapture such a people as the Kentuckians, and they did enjoy the raptures of that unparalleled victory—a victory which they had assisted to achieve, a victory which obscured, by its splendors, the mortifying occurrences of this place—yes, sir, which obliterated the deforation, by the enemy, of the proud edifice in which we now sit, and healed the wound inflicted upon the just pride of the patriotic portion of the American people, by that humiliating event. But, said Mr. Rowan, I have dwelt longer upon this part of the subject, than, perhaps, I ought. The object was to show that the people of Kentucky were not cold blooded, indifferent spectators; that they were greatly excited, and entered into the cause of their country, with animation and zeal; that the disasters and victories, in which they participated largely, were calculated to excite, and did excite them greatly; that at the close of the war they were left in a state of very high feeling. And, in conjunction with these, he begged leave to state another fact, not without its influence in producing the state of things which ensued, and at which the gentleman has alluded, not, indeed, with express, but with evident implied reprobation. Sir, it must be recollected, that the United States Bank did not exist at that period; that the State Banks furnished much of the money, with which the war was conducted; Kentucky furnished her full portion. The needs of the Government, and the excitement to which he had alluded, had produced, perhaps, an inordinate issue by the banks, in that State. The men and supplies furnished by that State, caused naturally during, and at the close of the war, a plenary, if not profuse, circulation of local notes. This furnished, to the excited state of the public mind, facilities for the indulgence of feverish and extravagant projects; impracticable plans were honestly, but erroneously formed; chimerical notions of wealth and aggrandizement were cherished. In fine, the state of feeling was suited to the occasion which it had produced, and not to the condition which had ensued it. They enjoyed peace, while they were under the influence of war feelings. The Bank of the United States was created immediately on the close of the war, and the Government, very unwisely, as he always thought, determined, suddenly, through its instrumentality, to restore, not gradually, as it ought, but suddenly, a metallic currency.

The effects of this unwise measure are known to all; they were felt by almost all in Kentucky. The change, Mr. President, was too sudden—the shock inflicted by it was too severe—the sacrifices produced by it were too numerous and too agonizing—the basis upon which the enterprise, the hopes, and the happiness of the people of that State rested, was suddenly and unexpectedly taken from under them, and they were turned over, as lawful prey, to the Bank of the United States, and the mercenary vultures that hovered round that institution. The Legislature of the State, in the laudable view to mitigate the calamities which had so suddenly and so unexpectedly overtaken the people, and to save from ruin as many as possible of her citizens, by affording them time to disembarass themselves, passed an act authorizing the defendant, when the plaintiff had not endorsed, that he would take the current notes of the States, to replevy the debt for two years, but denying to him, when the plaintiff had made such endorsement, the right to replevy for more than three months. And what was the mighty evil of this delay? The defendant executed a bond, with two approved securities, for the payment of the amount of the execution within two years. The debt was made perfectly secure; it bore interest during the time, and had the force of a judgment upon which execution issued, as matter of course, and upon which there could be no delay. The injury was, if an injury that may be called, which is a public good, that the plaintiff was not permitted to take the entire estate of the defendant for less than a one hundredth part of its value. There was no money which would be taken, save what little could be obtained from the United States Bank; and that was not obtained by debtors, and when obtained, was employed by those who could obtain it in merciless speculation, at forced sales by the sheriff. The contracts had all been predicated upon the local currency—none other had been known or thought of, that had been put down by the United States Bank—a new state of things had ensued. The creditor refused the medium for which he had contracted, and demanded payment in one which had been suddenly created, and could not be suddenly obtained. The Legislature not only passed this law, but passed a law also abolishing imprisonment for debt; thus affording to the brave fellows who had fought the battles of their country, an opportunity of paying their debts, without the entire sacrifice of their property, and the loss of their liberty, by imprisonment. And mark, Mr. President: the great majority of creditors in that, as under like circumstances, they will always be, in every State, were not the ardent, generous, brave men who had entered with their whole soul into the war which their country had been constrained to wage. They were mostly your cold-blooded, calculating, avaricious men, whose only love of country was love of money—whose patriotism was cupidity, and whose zeal was to enrich themselves, and to ruin the men who had saved their country. These, sir, were few—but they were clamorous—and their clamors were echoed by capitalists from every quarter—and we all know that the capitalists were not the patriots in our last war.

But, he begged leave to ask, if Kentucky was the only State that had, by her enactments, attempted, during the war, to suit her code to her condition? Sir, a great majority of the

FEBRUARY, 1838.]

Judicial Process.

[SENATE.]

States altered their execution laws. Public sentiment approved it, because the deranged condition of affairs required it. Virginia, the ancient dominion, a State as distinguished for the correctness and stability of her political creed, as for the heroes and statesmen which she has produced, even she suspended executions, for (he believed) twelve months. But why quote examples—what are the States for—what the annual session of their Legislatures—but, by changing the laws, to suit them to the varying condition of society?

It is true, sir, that the Circuit Judge pronounced the replevin law of Kentucky to be unconstitutional and void. He declared the law to be void, because it delayed justice, and immediately enacted a law which authorized the defendant to replevy for three months. He declared the replevin law of the State to be unconstitutional, and immediately made a replevin law. He declared the law of the State, abolishing imprisonment for debt, to be void for the same reason, and immediately enacted an imprisonment law. [Here Mr. R. presented to the House the rules made by the Federal Judges of the Kentucky District. They consisted of 17 sections. They were read by the Secretary of the Senate in his place.] Sir, said Mr. ROWAN, if the judge had really believed these laws of the State to be unconstitutional, and if he had really believed, also, that he possessed legislative power—a respect for himself—the pride of consistency, and a decent respect for the sentiment of the State, should all have restrained him from the course which he pursued. There was an unparalleled audacity, in ordaining, by rule of court, a replevin law, when he had determined that law on the part of the State to be unconstitutional. There was an insolent defiance of public sentiment, in ordaining imprisonment for debt after the Legislature of the State had abolished it. Sir, we hear a great deal about the purity and sanctity of the judicial character, and eulogies without number are pronounced upon the present incumbents. He had nothing to say about the men; it was the corporate powers of the judicial department, and not with the judges, that this Senate had to do in the present question. He must, however, be permitted to say, that he did not rate very highly that sanctity which was unceasingly employed in profaning the State laws, and State authorities—which, in the exercise of a little usurped and brief authority, outraged the sacred principles of freedom, and drew into contempt the most solemn civil institutions. Sir, you have in the rules of court, which have just been read, a full and complex code of execution laws; including replevin, imprisonment for debt, and a system of conveyancing. The very highest attributes of sovereignty are exerted in conclave by these judges. They make their rules, which subject your property to seizure and sale, and your body to imprisonment. They are not printed nor promulgated; and yet, like the laws of the tyrant, they must govern, though they cannot be read or known. Sir, said Mr. ROWAN, we are this day debating whether the judges shall exercise the legislative power to an extent, and in a manner, which drew upon that tyrant, the just execration of all mankind. Our freedom consists, essentially, in the fact, that we are governed by laws, made by ourselves—that the will of the majority, definitely expressed, and duly promulgated, is the only power to which freemen are constrained to bend. But, what is the judicial doctrine, which, he was sorry to see, had so many advocates in this body? Why, not that the voice of the majority, but that the will of one or two Federal Judges—under (he supposed) the sacred guidance of that faithful monitor, their conscience, should regulate the property and the liberty of the people of these States—and that, too, not published, but retained in the office of their own clerk. The judges and the lawyers of the court well know what the rules are, and the people may know by making a pilgrimage to the office of the clerk and paying him for a sight of them. But that the judges and the lawyers should know the law, seemed to the Senator from Massachusetts sufficient. It was not, in his opinion, necessary that the people should know them. This doctrine was urged by the gentleman with a zeal which he had but little expected. He would notice it more at large hereafter: for the present he was concerned with the Legislative power asserted for, and exercised by the judges. Sir, said Mr. ROWAN, the legislative power, according to the theory of our Government, is never to be exercised but under strict responsibility to the people, whose will gives obligatory force to the law. But under what responsibility do the judges legislate? They are in office for life, and can only be removed by impeachment, for malfeasance in office. Their office is judicial, not legislative. Could they be impeached for corrupt legislation? Would it be official malfeasance? They were commissioned to judge, not to legislate—to expound, not to make laws. Their legislative exertions would not be official, and so, not subject, to even the remote and nominal responsibility of impeachment.

Mr. President, all the distinguished writers upon political science agree that the concentration of the legislative, the judicial, and the executive power in the same person or body, constitutes despotism. These three powers were exercised by the Federal Judges in Kentucky; and that, too, in relation to topics the most critically interesting of any that fall within the scope of those powers, in their divided and best adjusted shape in immediate relation to the enjoyment of his liberty, and the possession of his property by the citizen. That, surely, is the highest act of sovereignty, which takes from a man his liberty, or which takes from one man his property and gives to another; yet these judges make the rules by which this is done—they expound them, and they execute them. Sir, said

Mr. ROWAN, if this thing is sanctioned, we have gained nothing by the revolution; we have lost by it. For such a power was never asserted for, or exercised by, the judges of England. It would not be tolerated by the people of that country. The people of that Government have, at various periods of its history, been very much harassed and grieved by the pliance and corruption of their judges, but they never were, as the people of Kentucky have been, oppressed by the usurpation, on the part of even their most corrupt judges, of the legislative power. Sir, this assumption of the legislative power, by the Federal judges of Kentucky, has caused much anxiety to the people of that State. They have remonstrated to Congress, repeatedly, and most solemnly, against it. Their remonstrances have hitherto been unavailing. They have been patient, not from any proneness on their part to submit to judicial, or any other kind of tyranny, but from a love of order, and in the hope that their wrongs would be redressed by Congress; when that hope ceases, let the petty oppressors beware how, and upon whom, they exercise their ill-derived power. But, Mr. President, why should their reasonable expectations of redress from Congress be disappointed? What is there in judicial legislation which can enamour Congress with it? The excellence of all legislation is in the adaptation of the laws by those who make them, to the condition of those for whom they are made. The judges are not from among the people; they are, by their office, and their salaries, placed above the fluctuations, and freed from the cares, to which the people are unceasingly exposed. They cannot, therefore, if they were qualified, in other respects, be sufficiently acquainted with the will of the people, their wants and their sufferings, to legislate beneficially for them. But, sir, when did this idea of judicial legislation first present itself to the American people? The law of Congress, authorizing the judges to alter the forms of process, and to make rules for the regulation of its own judicial proceeding in court, was, we all know, passed in 1789, and re-enacted in May, 1792. But nobody ever thought that either of these laws conferred legislative power upon the judges. They themselves were unconscious of possessing any such power. The alteration of State process, in the article of form only, so as to adapt its use to the organic structure of the Federal Courts, was known to be all that was intended by Congress, in those acts. Nor, sir, did the courts ever dream of exercising any other or further power under color of those acts, until since the war, and the establishment of the United States Bank. The experiment was first made in Kentucky, in the case, and under the auspices, of that Bank—backed by all the talents, influence, and weight of character, which that institution possesses so amply the means of enlisting. The experiment was, unhappily, but too successful. The gentleman from Massachusetts tells us, that the invalidity of the Kentucky execution laws was a great evil, and that the judges were called upon to apply the remedy. It is admitted to be the duty of the judges to apply the remedy. But it is asserted to be the right of the Legislature to make it. Every remedy presupposes an evil. To explore the condition of society, to ascertain the existing evil, and to frame and suit the remedy to the evil, is the province of the statesman. To apply the remedy, when provided, is the duty of the judge. Neither should trench upon the province of the other. These different duties require very different capacities and attainments, so that the apology, offered by the gentleman, for the judges, is, at best, but the stale apology for oppression. The plea of necessity is the habitual excuse for tyranny. But if the judges had felt the urgency of that necessity, which the gentleman asserts in their behalf, why did they not refer the case to Congress, whose exclusive province it is to legislate for the tribunals of the United States. Sir, the legitimate source of the governing power in this country, as we all know, is in the people. None can be exerted by any public functionary which has not been delegated.

How much more becoming and decent would it have been in those judges, if they had even believed the State laws to have been unconstitutional, to have surrendered their judgment to that of the people of the State, until Congress could have passed upon the subject; to have supposed that, according to any, and every rational criterion of correctness, that half a million of intelligent people who compose the State of Kentucky, were right and they wrong; than to have bewildered themselves in the mazes of abstraction, to find that the legal obligation of a contract consisted in the remedy alone. Sir, the logic of the judges upon this subject is new, and somewhat curious, but more dangerous than either. It is thus they reason: "The Constitution of the United States provides that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts; the obligation of a contract consists alone in the remedy for its enforcement; any State law which varies the remedy, impairs the obligation of all existing contracts, and is, therefore, as to them, unconstitutional and void." The evident tendency of this doctrine, if its absurdity could be tolerated, is consolidation. It is to paralyze the States by denying them the exercise of the legislative power, upon which alone, their freedom and their happiness depends. The laws of right and wrong, are divine and unalterable. The laws for the suppression of wrong and the enforcement of right, are human, and may be modified and varied to suit the varying or varied state of society, as the wisdom of the people, legitimately exercised, shall dictate. The language of reason which has had the practical sanction of all free Governments, and without which free Governments could not exist, is that the remedy is in the discretion of the sovereign legislative power. The gentleman may say—as he had said in relation to the execution law of Kentucky—the sovereign legislative power may be misexercised or abused; and, in that case, the Federal judges must apply the remedy to the evil. He would answer, that the power of enacting remedial laws must be lodged somewhere, and that the people were, at least, as safe a depository of that power as the judges; besides, if it were lodged in the hands of the judges, they too, might misexercise or abuse it; and who, in that case, should apply the remedy to the evil? For the doctrine of the gentleman is, that wherever there is an evil there must be a remedy. Mr. R. said he agreed that there ought to be a remedy for every evil; he was sorry, however, to say, that the fact was not always so. There existed many evils, for which remedies had not been provided; and among the most enormous and grievous evil of that character, was the usurpation of legislative power by the judges. He should be glad to see the gentleman support his doctrine by his vote, and assist in furnishing the appropriate remedy for this most afflicting evil. This evil, which, by violating the great principles of our free institutions, leads to, and threatens the destruction of our liberty; which, by usurping the power of the States, threatens their absorption; which, by conceding to the judges the exercise of legislative power, denies to the States the right of regulating their own remedial system, according to their own will. Sir, the gentleman would remedy what he miscalls an evil in Kentucky by an infinitely greater evil. He says, virtually, that the people of that State have abused the legislative power, and proposes to remedy the evil, by transferring that power to the judges, without providing a remedy for its abuse by them. He is right in proposing no remedy for their abuses of this power; for when it is once conceded to them, it will be idle to talk of a remedy for their perversion or abuse of it. It must be irresponsibly, and will, of course, be irremediably exercised. But are we prepared for such a state of things? Are we prepared to sanction beginnings, which will lead to such a result? Mr. President, the boundaries between right and remedy are planted deep in nature—the distinction between them is obvious and plain. Shall they be confounded, and the States be deprived of their legitimate power, by judicial mysticism? Shall it be filched from them by judicial subtleties, or extorted by the force of sophisms? Sir, the new theory of obligation is too wire-drawn, too sublimated, too evanescent, for the use of a republican people. The judges should be permitted to amuse themselves with it as a sparkling abstraction, a pretty little brilliant, a glittering pageant of the fancy, or, if you please, an intellectual aurora borealis—but nothing more or farther. They should not be allowed to experiment with it upon the common sense of the people, at the hazard of their liberty: still less should they be permitted to impose it upon the people as the plan, upon which alone they could exercise the power of remedial legislation. They should not be permitted to send it abroad among the States as a destroying angel, as impalpable, and as destructive of their rights, as was the visit of that mysterious agent to the first-born of the Egyptians. Sir, mystery on the part of the political agents, in any Government, is the sure harbinger of the oppression of the people. It addresses itself to the credulity, not to the common sense of mankind. And common sense, or the power of reason, is the criterion to which alone should be referred the propriety or justness of any measure which may affect the liberty or the happiness of man. To the test of this standard alone, should every thing which affects his rights or his interest be subjected. Common sense revolts at the idea that the Legislature may provide a remedy for contingent and possible evils; but ought not, and cannot, exert any remedial agency for the mitigation of a present and urgent evil. That they may provide a remedy for evils which may never happen, but cannot, by any exertion of the remedial power, soften those which are present and pressing. Sir, a wise Legislature is like a wise and skilful physician, whose duty it is, not only to prevent, but, by remedial applications, to cure maladies, and to soften, by judicious lenitives, those which cannot be cured.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Judicial Process.

[SENATE.]

One gentleman (Mr. McLANE) says, that the Judiciary is the most important department in our Government. He compares it to a fixed star, shedding its clear, but mild light, throughout the political horizon. He, too, pronounces a eulogy upon the judges, and says they can have no motive to do wrong. It is (said Mr. R.) a sound rule in legislation to suppose the worst, and provide against it. The judges are men, and however good they may be, their successors may not be so. Wise men are subject to the errors of human frailty; foolish and vicious men are never without motives to do wrong. The judges are men, and it is wise in the Legislature to guard against the injurious exertion of their power, either weakly or wickedly. While, like the fixed star spoken of by the gentleman, they continued to occupy their appropriate sphere, and to shed their lustre upon the other departments, they would have his approbation. But when, instead of the benignant beamings of a fixed star, they pursued the erratic and desolating course of a blazing comet, threatening destruction to their co-ordinate orbs, he must be pardoned for withholding his approbation. But, to change the figure of the gentleman, for one less sublimated, he would say that the judges, when caught poaching upon the legislative manor, should be driven off, and taught to confine themselves to the judicial demesne; and, dropping the figurative, into which he had been seduced by the gentleman from Delaware, he was willing to admit that the Judiciary were an important department in the Government. But their important usefulness consisted in the enlightened and faithful performance of their appropriate duties. Their duty was, he repeated, to expound, not to make laws. It was very far from his desire to disparage the Judiciary, or the judges. He would avoid, alike, an idolatrous admiration, and a causeless censure of the judges. They were not more, and he would not have them thought to be less, than men. But he protested, once for all, against the morbid sensibility displayed by many gentlemen, whenever the powers or the duties of these judges were drawn into discussion. Sir, the judicial power is not of a complexion so delicate, nor of a texture so tender, that it cannot bear the breath of dispassionate scrutiny—at least such was not the character of that portion of it which was exerted in vacating the execution laws of Kentucky, and in creating a code of its own. It was hardly enough, in that instance, to defy and override the public sentiment of that State—and to outrage decency and consistency in the manner of doing it, as he trusted he had sufficiently shown in that part of his argument, which related to the Execution Code enacted by the judges. He would venture to predict, without pretending to a spirit of prophecy, that whenever the most vigilant scrutiny of the people's representatives shall be withdrawn from that department, the liberties of the people will be endangered. Sir, that is the department through which oppression of every kind, and from every quarter, will attempt to smuggle itself upon the people. It is under color, and through the avenues of justice, in every Government, that corporations exert their aristocratic influences. It is through that medium, masked in the forms of rules and usages of law, that oppression of every kind finds its way to the people. The power of wealth and of all the factitious distinctions which arise in society, is harmless without the connivance of the judges. Sanctioned by them, it is resistless—it is ruinous. Liberty, Mr. President, is never taken from a people at once, in their aggregate capacity. It is taken now from one, and then from another, under pretence of law, and with the sanction of its forms, until the only liberty left, is the liberty of the rich to oppress the poor—the strong, the weak; and it ceases to be enjoyed by the citizens, only because of the resistless sanctity with which it has been wrested from them. Sometimes, indeed, it loses its fragrance by the frequency of its violation, and the people abandon it in disgust, or submit in despair. But in no free Government can the people be oppressed or enslaved without the consent of the judges.

No man, as you may perceive, sir, said Mr. R., rates the judicial character higher than I do. But it is only valuable when it does its duty, and then it is inestimably so. He was, therefore, for requiring the judges to do their duty, their whole duty, and nothing but their duty. The difference between the Senator from Delaware and himself, consisted in the supposition, by that gentleman, that the judges would always do their duty, and no more; and by him, that they might, and would, if the restraining vigilance of the people were withdrawn, often transcend their duty. He was willing to appeal to history, ancient or modern, for the correctness of his opinion. He was persuaded that both would bear testimony in his favor. But why appeal, said Mr. R., to history? Why go to Rome, to Greece, to Carthage, or to England, in quest of facts? Have we not facts enough at home—at hand—of a modern and domestic character? Have not the Federal Judges boldly and unblushingly enacted a code of Execution Laws for the Kentucky District? Has not that State again and again remonstrated against their usurpation of the Legislative power? It was alleged by Cicero, in his prosecution of Verres, as an outrage of the utmost enormity, that, in his character of Quæstor, he had caused the punishment of stripes to be inflicted upon a Roman citizen, for an alleged crime; and that too, in the most degenerate state of the Roman Republic. And shall it be thought a light matter, in our Republic, yet in its youth and vigor, that two Federal Judges passed a law subjecting the free citizens of the State of Kentucky to imprisonment for debt, contrary to the laws of that State? That they not only passed a law, making indebtedness a crime, but actually inflicted, by their decision, the punishment of imprisonment, by virtue of their own law, upon many unfortunate debtors within that State.

Now, sir, said Mr. R., if to inflict stripes upon the body of a Roman citizen charged with a crime, could draw forth from that immortal orator and patriot such a burst of indignant eloquence, what sensations of indignance ought to be felt by the patriots of this free and enlightened country against the judge who, without color of crime—unless bereavements and misfortunes subject their victims to that imputation—by a law of his own enactment, and by his own decision upon that law, and by the agency of his own marshal, has thrown into prison all the debtors of his court!—who has ordained, by rule of court, that poverty shall be punished with loss of liberty! Sir, this is a point upon which, it would seem to me, there ought to be one opinion in this body and throughout the United States. If you accord to the judges the power of making laws, you do by that very act surrender to them the sovereign power of the Government. If you permit them to carry into effect, by their own judgment, the laws which they shall have made, you transform the Republic into an Oligarchy; and if, in addition to the power of making and interpreting the laws, you permit them to execute them, you substitute despotism for republicanism, and oppression and slavery for freedom.

But I feel almost ashamed to be urging upon this body arguments of any kind, to prove what ought to be taken for granted. Sir, that the Legislative, the Judiciary, and the Exec-

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Judicial Process.

[SENATE.]

tive powers, should be kept separate and distinct, and should be exercised by distinct bodies of magistracy, is an elementary truth acknowledged by all. It is recognized in most of the State Constitutions, and declared to be essential to the freedom of the people; and, in the Constitution of the United States, they are separated with an emphatic caution. And yet the assumption of this power by the judges seems to excite no alarm. So far from exciting alarm, it is approved and advocated by some of the most distinguished members of this body.

Mr. President, there is a portentous indifference displayed by the States in relation to the violation of the great principles upon which their rights depend. When those principles are outraged in the case of any one of the States, the injured State complains, but her complaints are not heard, or rather, not regarded, by the others; or, if heard, they are regarded as the ebullitions of a feverish impatience, of a restless and insubordinate temper, entitled rather to reprobation than sympathy. And what can the injured State do more than complain? She cannot alone repel encroachment upon her rights, by the General Government. The strength of each State is in the united efforts of them all, or at least, of a majority of them. And how can that majority be enlisted in the cause of the injured State? Not by an appeal to her violated principles of State rights, nor by any portraiture of the wrongs which have been done her—nor by any invocation or remonstrance she can make: for Kentucky has repeatedly remonstrated to the Congress on the subject of the usurpation of the legislative power by the Federal Judges.

Sir, it is greatly to be feared that it is with States as with individuals—they are only to be awakened to a sense of their wrongs, by their sufferings. It is owing almost exclusively to this cause that tyranny prevails, or oppression exists, or ever has existed, in the world. The heavy hand of tyranny is never laid upon a majority of the people at the same time. If they were awakened by their injuries to a sense of their rights, they would annihilate the tyrant. It is so with the States—if a majority of them had seen the Federal Judges defy their laws, and dispose of the property and the liberty of their citizens, by laws arbitrarily made by themselves, they would have felt the outrage keenly, and redressed it instantly. But he feared that, until the judges should exert their legislative power in the other States as oppressively as they had in Kentucky, they would not awaken to the dangers with which they were threatened. They would not awaken to the consciousness that, in their connivance at the wrongs inflicted upon Kentucky, they virtually surrendered their own rights, to the extent, at least, of the violated rights at which they have connived. But why talk of rights? When you have surrendered to the judges the power of legislation, there are no rights left.

You may, and no doubt will, have a splendid, but you will no longer have a free Government. You may have fine roads, and magnificent canals, made for you out of your own money, and by this bright illusion your attention may be diverted from the insidious underminings of your rights and your liberty by the Judiciary Department of the General Government. But unless you associate with a quenchless love of liberty, and an invincible ardor to maintain it, the most untiring vigilance, your roads will be travelled, and your canals navigated, by an oppressed and enslaved, and not by a free people. Sir, even now, while the judges are legislating for the States, the General Government has, through the head of the Treasury Department, asserted its right to regulate the labor of the people of the States. Sir, the master regulates the labor of his slaves—a free people regulate their own labor.

Mr. President, I could not but remark, that in the discussion of this matter, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) instead of arguing the question relative to the right of the judges to make execution laws—instead of attempting to prove, by some principle in the science of politics, heretofore undeveloped, that this power to legislate might be judiciously and safely inferred for, and confided to the judges—has, throughout, taken it for granted that they possess the power. He is willing, to be sure, to limit it—to restrain it. He is willing that they shall not legislate as to the manner in which lands and slaves shall be sold, under execution, in Kentucky. But, sir, that will not satisfy the people of that State—it ought not to satisfy the people of the United States. The people of Kentucky insist that either Congress shall furnish an execution code for the United States Courts within the States, or that executions emanating from those courts shall be carried into effect according to the execution laws of the States respectively. They insist that the Congress and the Legislatures of the States possess the only law-making power which exists among us. They deny that either is so far decayed as to grow and sustain this excrescent power asserted for the judges. They will have none of it, and they invoke you to save them, by removing it, from the unpleasant necessity of resisting it. There is a point beyond which any thing would be better than forbearance. Kentucky has been made to drink deep of the cup of humiliation—her whole remedial system has been, at one time or other, violated by those judges. First, the power of legislating over the soil within her territory was denied to her in the vacation of her occupying Claimant Laws. Next, her replevin and valuation laws were vacated. And last, though not least, her citizens were imprisoned by them, under color of rules made by themselves, and in contravention of the laws of the States. Her patience and forbearance has not been exceeded by even those enormities upon her rights. Her confidence in the General Government has been the cause of her patience. She has looked to that Government for the redress of these outrages. The fate of this bill will determine whether her confidence has been well founded or not.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

MONDAY, February 25.

The late General Brown.

Mr. HARRISON, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, said: I rise, Mr. President, to perform a most painful duty—that of announcing the death of Major General Jacob Brown, the distinguished commanding general of our army. He died yesterday, in this city, at half-past twelve o'clock. I am aware, Mr. President, that, in the performance of a duty of this kind, something like an eulogium upon the character and actions of the hero whose loss we deplore, might be expected. At all times unequal to such a task, I am particularly unfitted for it at this moment. Besides, what could I say of General Brown, that is not already known? His best eulogium would be found in a recital of his brilliant achievements, and with these every Senator present is familiar. We all recollect, sir, with what thrilling anxiety our attention was turned towards the Niagara frontier, in the late war, when it was announced that an officer of acknowledged bravery indeed, but without military education, and with limited military experience, had been placed at the head of our army. We must also recollect with what joy and gratitude to Heaven, we heard of his first brilliant exploit, rapidly followed by a second, and with what perfect confidence we then relied, that the final result would be such as it was—eminently glorious to himself, his army, and his country. Sir, said Mr. H., I will turn from this scene to one of a different character, but not less interesting, and eminently calculated to show the ruling passion of his soul, at a moment when there can be no deception, no affectation of that which is not real. It was the good fortune of General Brown to be surrounded on his death bed by a large family. A wife, who was entitled to all his tenderness; and children who justly merited his affection. In such a scene, on such an occasion, it may well be supposed that his mind would be turned with intense anxiety upon the future fate of objects so justly dear to him; and such was the fact. He knew that the head which had directed them, would soon be cold; the hand from which alone they received their daily support, would, in a few short hours, be lifeless, and no longer able to supply it. But, after having committed these beloved objects of his affection to that Almighty Power which had hitherto protected them, his thoughts incessantly turned to his country—to that country which he had so faithfully and successfully served, for which he had bled, and for which, as he believed, he had given his life. He spoke with raptures of her happiness, of her exalted rank among the nations of the earth, and her glorious destinies; and almost his last sigh was breathed for her continued prosperity. Such, sir, said Mr. H., was the man, in life and in death, for whose memory I ask the tribute of respect contained in the resolutions which I now submit:

Resolved, That the Senate have learned, with deep regret, the death of Major General Jacob Brown, the late Commanding General of the Army, and the distinguished leader in the glorious battles of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie, in the late war.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the deceased General, the members of the Senate will wear the accustomed badge of mourning on the left arm for one month.

Resolved, That, if the House of Representatives concur, the Senate will, in conjunction with the House of Representatives, attend the funeral of Major General Brown, on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock."

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the first part of the resolution. He thought it would establish a bad precedent, to go into mourning for any individual other than a member.

Mr. CHANDLER expressed his high opinion of the great merit and services of General Brown. He thought, however, that when a military man died, it was an appropriate ceremony to bury him with the honors of war. He thought with the gentleman from Maryland, that it was a new thing for the Senate to go into mourning on the occasion. He believed such a method of expressing regret for a military man, was not countenanced by the legislative bodies of any country. He should, therefore, be forced to oppose that part of the resolution.

Mr. NOBLE said, that if he voted against the resolution, he wished the reason to be understood. He was averse to the precedent which would be established by resolving to wear mourning for a military man. The case of General Washington was no parallel with the present. He was the saviour of his country—he had been at the head of its Executive—and lived in peace, as in war, the first, most virtuous man of the age. At his death the whole country was plunged in mourning; and it was consistent that the Legislative bodies should wear the badge. He was averse to voting against this resolution, because he regretted the death of Gen. Brown, and sympathized with the feelings of his family. He wished that the portion of the resolution which declares that the Senate will go into mourning, might be withdrawn; as he thought a homage of this kind to a military man, would assimilate us too much to a despotic Government. In every other case, the members of each separate profession bestowed these honors on their deceased companions. The members of the bar wore mourning for one of their fraternity; and Legislative bodies did the same. The army, he believed, went on the same principle; and there it ought to stop. He did not wish to encourage any practice which should take the shape of idolatry, for services, however great. He was sorry that he felt constrained to make these remarks. He honored General Brown in every station; he lamented his death; and in every consistent manner he was ready to testify his respect for his character, and his memory. Nothing was farther from him, than to treat with disrespect the feelings of the family of the deceased, with whom he sincerely sympathized.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Office of Major General.

[SENATE.]

Mr. BELL moved to strike out so much of the resolution, as related to the Senate wearing mourning.

Mr. HARRISON acceded to such a modification, and the resolutions having been so amended, were agreed to.

A joint resolution of the other House, for the appointment of a committee of three from each House, to make arrangements for the funeral of the late General Brown, was received and concurred in.

FRIDAY, February 29.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. HARRISON had leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, widow of the late Maj. Gen. Brown; which was read twice, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Office of Major General.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CHANDLER, to abolish the office of Major General in the army of the United States, was considered.

Mr. CHANDLER said that he fully believed the office of major general was not necessary in the present state of our army. This was no new opinion, but had long been entertained by him. In the year 1821, a bill was brought into the other House to fix the military peace establishment; and a vote of the House was taken on the question of retaining one brigadier general, and decided in favor of it by a large majority. But the friends of General Brown moved an amendment to the bill, and had sufficient influence to succeed, and thereby ensure his retention in the service. Mr. C. said he was not easily induced to second the views of the friends of General Brown; but he did eventually vote for the amendment providing for one major general and two brigadier generals. He had after regretted the vote he then gave, and had determined, on the first occasion that might offer, by the vacancy of the office, to move to abolish the office of major general, convinced, as he was, that a feeling of gratitude to General Brown, and not the sober judgment of Congress, had retained him in the office. One brigadier general was, he thought, sufficient for the present condition of the wants of our army. There would be two brigadier generals left, after the abolition of the office of major general, and they would be able to do all the duties which could be required or needed from a major general in a time of profound peace. The measure would also be a saving to the country of a considerable annual sum.

Mr. HARRISON observed that, until this morning, he had not been aware of the tenor of the resolution offered yesterday by the gentleman from Maine. He had supposed that it was in the general form of resolutions for an inquiry. On the contrary, he found it to be an imperative direction for the abolition of the office of major general. The ordinary course was, to refer all such matters to a committee, which would investigate the practicability and expediency of carrying into effect the measure proposed, and make a detailed report to the Senate of all the circumstances relating to the subject, and probable effects of its adoption. In its present aspect, the resolution met with his decided disapprobation. It was well known that, besides the major general, for whose death so much regret was now felt, there were three major generals by brevet. If the object of the resolution went no further than to refuse to fill the vacancy made by the death of General Brown, it would, in fact, not make the change anticipated by the gentleman from Maine. Each officer would take his rank, pay, and emoluments, as pointed out by the present regulations. If economy was, therefore, the object, the resolution would not compass the purpose for which it was offered.

Mr. CHANDLER said that his object was to abolish the office altogether. He would, however, go farther, and endeavor, by some additional provisions, to avoid the effects predicted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he understood the object of the resolution to be to abolish whatever related to the office of major general. He dissented from the Senator from Ohio, as to the operation of the measure. Every officer, in case it should go into effect, would remain in the present rank, until promoted by the due course, which was the nomination of the President of the United States, and the consent of the Senate. Without this process, the vacancy made by the death of General Brown would remain without an incumbent. Nor did the death of this officer make a regular routine of promotions a matter of course. The President might nominate some citizen to fill the office, as in the case of General Brown, and of General Jackson, who were taken from the people. The President was not bound to promote the brigadier generals. He did not think the rank of major general necessary, and he knew well the reason for retaining in the service the brigadier generals after the war. They had done great service during the war, and the country felt too much gratitude for those services to allow them to be turned off. It was not that they were needed to command our little army of 6,000 men. There seemed to him no difficulty in the question. The office was not required by the existing state of things; and he should, therefore, vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HAYNE observed, that it was the usage to appoint a committee consisting of men most conversant with military affairs, to whom all questions on the subject were referred, as it seemed, as a matter of course. The gentlemen from Maine and Ohio, who now differed so widely on the subject, were members, and it was certainly expedient to refer the resolution to their investigation. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine was, he apprehended, a departure from the rules of the Senate; and he thought would produce much embarrassment, if persisted in. There were many considerations which would most appropriately occupy the attention of the committee, and which ought to be examined before the Senate passed upon the resolution. They must inquire what the effect of the abolition of the office of major general would be upon the brevet generals, and upon the army, and its discipline. Upon these, and many other questions which naturally presented themselves, and which could not be settled in a partial or hurried investigation, he wished the committee might deliberate and report. He found an additional reason for wishing the reference from the diversity of opinion that had been shown by the two gentlemen of the military committee. They are totally at variance in their opinions of the operation of the measure, and others, who are not so well versed in military affairs, may well, under such circumstances, ask for information. Let us, therefore, send the resolution to the military committee, that these gentlemen may meet each other, investigate the whole subject, compare their views, and report whether it is expedient to abolish brevet rank altogether, or whether the country will be served by abolishing the office of major general. When this is done, the Senate will be prepared to act understandingly on the subject. With these views, he was in favor of referring the resolution to the military committee.

Mr. MACON said he thought the gentleman from South Carolina was mistaken. He believed the rule was to settle the principle of any question first in the Senate, and then to send it to a committee to settle the details. He alluded to some instances of this in former legislation. As to the project itself, it met with his approbation. He believed, if a nation went to war, it was bad to have too many high officers. They were not generally the men who did the most for the glory of the army. By whom, said Mr. M., were your great exploits performed during the last war?—I don't mean to say any thing against the old men—they were performed by men in the vigor of life, and full of ambition. And if you have another war, it will be so again. There was always about an equal share of military talent in every army. Times of peace did not call out that kind of talent. When war came, the kind of character you want will come out, nor was it necessary to be seeking it out when it was not wanted. In time of need, military genius will always show itself without its being necessary to search after it. He was in favor of abolishing the office of major general, and thought it not necessary that it should be submitted to a committee.

Mr. HAYNE rose to move an amendment of the resolution, but

Mr. BERRIEN moved a substitute to the resolution, making its object matter of the inquiry of the military committee, to report upon it by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., hoped the amendment would not prevail, because the discussion of the question could as well take place now as hereafter. The subject had, in former times, been thoroughly debated. After the war, the subject of a peace establishment engaged the attention of Congress. The number of men to be retained was fixed by different persons variously, from 10,000 to 20,000; the former number was fixed upon. Afterwards, in 1821, the matter was again discussed, a further reduction proposed, and the army was brought down to 6,000, and certain officers were to go off the list. It was then argued that the officers could not be dispensed with; that their numbers could not be reduced without destroying the army, by lessening the discipline which they assisted to keep up. Next year, however, Mr. Monroe, in his Message, stated that the affairs of the army went on well, and that its present organization was as it should be. It was well known that the office of major general would not have been retained but for the merit of the incumbent. He had fought several battles; displayed great skill and courage; and was unwilling to leave the service. To retain him, therefore, and as a reward for his services, he was made major general. General Jackson, who was willing to retire, was appointed Governor of Florida. That the office was useless, he never had a doubt. In the days of Jefferson there was but one brigadier general retained upon the peace establishment. Nor was there any greater necessity for a major general now than then. The army was at present billeted about in parties of twenty men in a place—the whole consisting of but 6,000—yet, with all the discipline, and out of this small number, by the documents, it appeared that from 1,500 to 2,000 deserted every year. He recollected that, at the time of the appointment of General Brown as major general, it was argued that it was necessary to have the commanding officers at the seat of Government, that they might despatch the orders from the Department, and be directly in contact with the Government. But he knew not one advantage that had arisen out of it. Your army, said Mr. S., is overstocked, and there are now, in this mere shadow of an army, officers enough for one of 50,000 men. All the facts were now before the Senate. Every member was more or less acquainted with them. He, therefore, thought it better to let the gentlemen of the committee express their views here. Or, if they are taken off their guard by any sudden argument, let them ask for delay. He would favor such a request. He wished to hear the views of gentlemen conversant with the subject, and hoped they would express them before the Senate.

MARCH, 1828.]

The Public Debt.

[SENATE]

Mr. BENTON was of opinion that the decision of the Senate, on this resolution, would not be assisted by the investigation of a committee. He believed its discussion in the Senate would be equally productive of a satisfactory result. Not thinking, however, that the subject could be decided in a moment, he thought the resolution of the gentleman from Maine had better be laid over until another day. With this view he moved to lay it on the table until Monday; but observed that he would withdraw the motion, if any gentleman desired to express himself.

Mr. TAZEWELL remarked, that he did not understand the reason for wishing for a precipitate decision. The gentleman from Maine did not oppose the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to lay the resolution on the table until all the members should have become informed upon the subject. But it is said that it is proper to refer the subject to a committee. This is a statement to which a doubt may be started. In different bodies the modes of proceeding are different. Had this resolution been introduced in such a body as the House of Representatives, it would have been committed—to what?—To the Committee of the Whole, because, as it affects the whole country, every member ought to have an opportunity to hear the arguments pro and con, and to offer his opinion upon it. But in this body, said Mr. T., it is the same thing to submit a subject to the whole Senate, as in the House to refer to the Committee of the Whole. This was the reason why he thought the resolution should be laid on the table until every member was satisfied with the opinion he should have formed upon it. There were subjects of great importance, which ought not to be referred to a Committee of the Whole, because they depend upon facts not accessible to all the members, and which could be more easily obtained by a Standing Committee, or of which the members might be in possession. But was this such a subject? The questions he would ask were: Does this subject interest the whole country?—and is it necessary that it should go to a committee to obtain the facts? Now, sir, said Mr. T., I think we can get as much information in the Senate as from the Committee on Military Affairs. Besides, the opinion you get from the committee is but the opinion of a majority of its members. You do not hear the opinions of the minority, while, if it was discussed in the Senate, you get the opinions of all. Therefore, this being a subject which interests the whole Union, and which, in the other House, would be referred to a Committee of the Whole, and as the subject under consideration can as well be understood without a reference to a Select Committee as with, he was in favor of laying it on the table.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BERRIEN, and decided in the affirmative.

MONDAY, March 8.

On the Public Debt.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by him on the 26th ult.:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether any error has occurred in the construction of the fourth section of the act, entitled 'An act to provide for the redemption of the public debt,' passed the third day of March, 1817, in reference to the amount of surplus revenue to be retained in the Treasury; and if so, to report an amendment for restoring the section to its true intent and meaning.

Also, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering and amending the same section (if no error be found in the construction thereof) as to reduce the amount of surplus revenue required by that section to remain in the Treasury, from two millions of dollars, to one million or less.

Also, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering and amending the fifth section of the same act, as to invest the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund with a discretionary, instead of a limited authority, in making purchases of the public debt, at its market price, whenever, in their judgment, such purchases can be made beneficially for the interests of the United States, and when the state of the Sinking Fund and existing engagements will permit them to do so.

Also, That the same committee be instructed to make a report to the Senate, showing within what time the present debt of the United States may probably be paid off; and upon what articles, and to what amount, the present duties may then be reduced or abolished, consistently with the general interests of the whole Union."

Mr. BENTON said that the first branch of the resolution went upon the supposition that there was an error in the construction of the Sinking Fund Act of 1817, and that he might avoid all occasion for misapprehension, here or elsewhere, he would say at once, that this error, if it existed at all, was of older date than the existence of the present Administration; and, of course, that the inquiry that he proposed to institute, whatever might be its result, was not intended to have any bearing on the conduct of gentlemen now at the head of affairs. He believed, himself, that the error existed, that it was injurious to the public service, and that it was the duty of the legislative department of the Government to correct it. The fourth section of that act directed, that, whenever, "in any year," there should be,

SENATE.]

The Public Debt.

[MARCH, 1822.]

"at the rise of Congress," a surplus in the Treasury of more than two millions of dollars, above the appropriation for the service of "such year," that all the excess above that sum should be forthwith paid to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be by them immediately applied to the purchase or redemption of the public debt. The words of this section, said Mr. B., are as clear and positive as words can be, in limiting the amount to be left in the Treasury, to two millions of dollars, over and above the appropriations for the year; but the construction which has been put upon them, as we see from the annual Treasury Reports, makes these two millions to be exclusive of the unapplied balance of the previous year's appropriations. These unapplied balances usually amount, at the end of each year, to upwards of three millions of dollars, and are usually reduced, in the course of the first quarter of the ensuing year, to less than two millions; so that a reservation of two millions, at the rise of Congress, is amply sufficient to meet them. The difference of the two constructions is, that, by my construction, there must be a surplus of two millions in the Treasury before any thing can go to the Sinking Fund; by the Treasury construction, there must be a surplus of about four millions first.* This construction is clearly at war with the words of the statute, and still more with its plain intent and obvious meaning. Its intent was to hasten the extinction of the public debt, and for that purpose to prevent a single idle dollar from lying in the Treasury; but this construction leaves two millions idle in the Treasury, or rather in the Bank of the United States, idle to us, though it may be productive to that institution, while the people of the United States are paying its interest, equal to $120,000 per annum, to the public creditors.

Mr. B. entered considerably into detail, for the purpose of showing the nature and amount of these unexpended balances. He said they existed in all Governments, and must necessarily exist to a greater or less amount, according to the magnitude of their receipts and expenditures. To illustrate this, he would suppose that the present year was the first of the existence of this Government, and that the appropriation for its service was ten millions of dollars. Now, it would follow, of necessity, that the whole amount of this ten millions could not be paid out in the course of the year. Distance alone would prevent some demands from getting in; casualties and accidents would prevent the regular arrival of others; defective vouchers, or press of business in the offices, would prevent some from being adjusted, for weeks, or months, after they came in; in some instances the service could not be rendered, the work could not be done, the contract could not be performed, for which the money was to be paid, until after the lapse of the year; and in many cases, the amount appropriated, would be more than enough, and would leave a balance that would not be called for at all. From all these causes, it would certainly happen, that a considerable portion of the ten millions voted for the service of the year, would remain unexpended at its end; and so on, year after year, as long as the Government existed. The history of our own Government shows that these balances amount to upwards of three millions of dollars; and they are always considerably reduced in the first quarter of the ensuing year, so that two millions at the rise of any session of Congress, is an ample allowance to meet them. It was upon the knowledge of these facts, that Mr. Lowndes, the able and accomplished author of the Sinking Fund Act of 1817, fixed upon two millions for that purpose; but even this I hold to be an unnecessary provision; for the annual appropriation of another ten millions before the rise of Congress, for the new year's service, would leave another unexpended balance of three millions to meet that of the preceding year; and so on, as long as the Government lasted; at the end of which, and not before, would the two millions be wanted to pay off the outstanding claims.

Mr. B. said, that the manner of stating the public accounts at the British Treasury, showed the nature and amount of these balances more plainly than they are seen in our annual Treasury Reports. The English used three columns, we but two. In the British account, the first column showed the object of the appropriation; the second showed the amount appropriated; the third, the amount paid out. In ours, we only see the object of the appropriation, and the amount paid out. The difference is, that in the British account, you see the balances in detail, upon each separate item; in ours, you only see it in gross, and that somewhere else, in the body of the report.

With respect to these balances, Mr. B. said they amounted to a large sum, constituting a standing deposit in the bank which had the keeping of the public money, and certainly yielded a handsome profit to that institution. In England, while the principal disbursing officers were their own treasurers, the profit on the keeping of these balances, was a perquisite of the office, and quickly made the fortune of the incumbent. The elder Mr. Pitt, when he was Paymaster of the forces, about the year 1740, was the first who refused to appropriate the profits of these balances to his own emolument, and accounted for them to the Government. The average balance in the Paymaster's hands, was then about 100,000 pounds sterling,

* This reserve fund has since been raised to six millions, only tending to keep up an unnecessary amount of revenue. The fact is, experience shows there is no necessity for any reserved fund over and above the appropriations, because, as seen in every annual treasury report on the state of the finances, a large proportion of the appropriations, sometimes amounting to the fourth or the fifth part, remained unexpended.

MARCH, 1828.]

The Public Debt.

[SENATE,

and interest about four per cent. ; so that Mr. Pitt gave up about 4,000 pounds per annum, which any banker would have given him for the deposit and use of his balances. In later times, when the financial concerns of the Government were so much increased as to swell this balance to a million sterling, Mr. Burke, being Paymaster of the forces, followed the example of Mr. Pitt, and accounted to the Government for the thirty thousand pounds per annum, which it commanded from the bankers. At present, the Bank of England keeps the Government money, and the aggregate balances amounted some years, to eleven millions, equal to double the amount of our whole revenue. Whether the bank paid interest on so large an amount, he knew not, but he did know that the Bank of the United States paid nothing for the use of the public money in its hands ; he believed there was often five or six millions on hand, from the collection of the public revenue ; and he submitted it to the Senate to say, whether it was right or excusable, to augment that great and gratuitous deposit, to the amount of two millions more, by acquiescing in an erroneous construction of one of our own statutes !

Mr. B. proceeded to the second branch of the resolution, which proposed to reduce, or to repeal entirely, the reservation of two millions of dollars, if the construction he contended for was not adopted. If his construction was adopted, and the Act of 1817 amended accordingly, then the reservation might remain to pay so much of the outstanding claims of the previous year, as remained unpaid at the end of each session of Congress. But, if that construction should not be adopted, and the Treasury practice should continue, of reserving this two millions, in addition to the unexpended balance on hand, then the question would present itself, how far it was proper or justifiable to leave this two millions as a permanent and gratuitous deposit in the Federal Bank ? He conceived it would be neither proper nor justifiable to make such an unprofitable disposition of so large a sum of the public money. There was no necessity for it, nor any possible way of using it for the public good. The common notion, that this reservation was a contingent provision for unforeseen demands, was unfounded and fallacious. No such demand had ever occurred since the foundation of our Government, and none such could be paid, if they did occur : for not a cent of this money could be used, until Congress should meet, and pass an appropriation law to draw it from the Treasury. No such reservation existed before 1817, and no part of it had been used since ; and these facts should be sufficient to show the correctness of the construction for which I contend. But, if that construction is not adopted, the same facts will show the propriety of repealing the reservation in toto. The repeal would let two millions more go annually to the Sinking Fund than would otherwise go to it, and would save $120,000 of annual interest, a sum of sufficient magnitude to claim the attention of all the friends of economy.

The third branch of the resolution proposes to enlarge the authority given to the Commissioners by the 5th section of the Sinking Fund Act, so as to vest them with a discretionary, instead of a limited authority, in making purchases of the public debt at its market price. As the section now stands, the authority now given by it is nugatory. The limitations defeat its intention. The Commissioners are restricted from purchasing the three per cent. stocks until they fall to sixty-five dollars for a hundred, and the six per cents until they are at par ; and the four and a half and five per cents they cannot purchase at all, because they have been created since the passage of the act, and are not included in it. The three per cents are now at 85, and will not fall lower except upon the prospect of being paid, (for the value of stocks is now in proportion to their duration ;) the six per cents will never be at par ; and the four and a half and five per cents are, some of them, irredeemable for seven or eight years to come. In the mean time, it is certain that the means of the Treasury will be competent to the extinction of several millions of debt more than is redeemable, and, unless the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have authority to purchase at the market price, this large accumulation of money must either lie in the Federal Bank, as a gratuitous deposit, or be lavished upon objects which might not be thought of except for this tempting pile of money. The question, then, for Congress now to decide, is, whether this accumulation of money shall go to the bank for nothing, or be lavished upon unknown and unknowable objects, or be applied to the reduction of the public debt in the only practicable mode, that of purchasing it up before it is redeemable, at the market price. My own opinion is decidedly in favor of this last alternative. I believe that our Commissioners may be safely trusted with this authority. The British Commissioners have exercised the same authority since the first establishment of their Sinking Fund in 1816 : they have purchased twenty times the amount of our present debt, and have never been accused of abusing their trust. Our Commissioners must be equally worthy of public confidence. They consist, and must consist, of men who cannot be presumed to lack discernment to see, or integrity to prefer the best bargain for their country. They are gentlemen who fill, and must fill, the highest offices of the country—the Vice President, the Chief Justice, the Secretaries of State and Treasury, and the Attorney-General. An objection to conferring this authority on such a body of men, cannot be an objection to them, but an objection to the object of the authority ; that is to say, to the payment of the debt itself. That there are persons who will make that objection, is beyond question. I speak, not of Senators nor of individuals, in or out of this Chamber, but of numerous and powerful classes of the community, whose sentiments are known to me. There are such classes, and I will specify them: 1. The holders of the debt are against its payment, because they wish to live at their ease upon the interest, and have the whole country bound and mortgaged to them for the ultimate payment of the principal. 2. The inhabitants of the places in which the debt is owned are against it, because it has drawn a hundred and fifty millions of dollars into their neighborhoods, and is still drawing on at the rate of three millions per annum. 3. Some disinterested people are against it, because they are afraid that foreigners will carry off the twenty millions owned by them, and make a dearth of money at home; as if the place of this twenty would not be supplied by the forty millions paid to domestic creditors, and which would then come into circulation; and as if the foreigners had not already three times carried away the amount of their capital in interest, and would again carry off its amount, in the same way, in every successive period of sixteen years, until the capital was paid! 4. Another class is opposed to it because they look upon a public debt as auxiliary to the strength and duration of the Government, by interesting the moneyed interest, and binding them to its support. This, Mr. President, is a very ancient doctrine, but not without its advocates in modern times. It is the invention of a crafty Greek, who had to make up in fraud what he lacked in force; I speak of Eumenes, who was Secretary to Alexander the Great. This man of the pen, upon the death of his master, put in, among the Generals, for a kingdom out of the wrecks of his empire; and having no army to sustain his pretensions, he had recourse to fraud to raise one and bind it to him. For this purpose he borrowed all the money he could from officers and soldiers, and then told them that their chance for payment depended upon their supporting him in possession of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, provinces which he had marked out for his future kingdom. Of course these officers and soldiers did not want to lose their money; and, like provident men, fell in with the only course which could save it. They fought for Eumenes; they made him king, they made his children kings after him; and, in return, the king and his children made the people of the kingdom perpetual tributaries to these money-lenders, in the payment of interest on the sum borrowed. And this, Mr. President, is the origin of the notion which has been so compendiously expressed in our own country, in that famous declaration, that a public debt was a public blessing. In later times, and in our parent country, we have seen the policy of the crafty Greek revived and acted upon by a crafty Dutchman, William, Prince of Orange, who had need of both fraud and force to maintain himself on the throne, from which he had chased his father-in-law. He also bound the moneyed interest to his support by borrowing their cash, and thus laid the foundation for that frightful national debt, which now overhangs and overwhelms the British empire. Such an example as this should explode the notion that a public debt was a public blessing. The doctrine, at best, is only applicable to monarchies, founded in force or fraud, and where one part of the subjects have to be bribed to keep the rest in subjection; and even then the debt must be large, diffused over the country, and held in many hands; while our Government is Republican, founded on the affections of the people, and our debt is small; one-third of it owned by foreigners, the rest centered in a corner of the Union, and held by a few. 5. The last class of objectors which I shall mention, consists of those who think our debt a trifle, which can be paid at any time, and who are for letting it alone at present, and applying our money to other objects. This, Mr. President, is the most dangerous class of objectors; for they are numerous, honest, perfectly well intentioned, and mean no harm themselves, but do the greatest possible mischief, by becoming the allies of the money-lenders, and of the sticklers for the blessedness of a public debt. It is to this class of politicians that Great Britain is indebted for her present tremendous debt. That debt is the growth of a single century—a short period in the life of a nation—and took its gigantic start in the very doctrine which I am now combating. At the commencement of the last century, this debt was but sixteen millions and a half sterling (about seventy millions of dollars)—very nearly the amount of our debt at present, and as little prospect of its growing to what it now is. One class of politicians were then anxious to pay it off; another considered it as a trifle, which could be paid at any time, and insisted upon applying the public money to other objects. This class prevailed; and what was the consequence? Why, sir, the season of peace, in which alone a public debt can be paid, passed away: wars came on; and one year of war creates more debt than many years of peace can discharge. The war for the security of the Protestant succession came on, and raised the sixteen millions to fifty-four millions; that for the Dutch barrier followed, and raised it to seventy-eight millions; then the seventy years' war, which carried it to one hundred and forty millions; then the war with us, which put it up to two hundred and thirty millions; and, finally, the wars of the French Revolution, which advanced it to nine hundred millions, equal to four thousand millions of dollars, at which it now stands, mocking all idea of payment, and crushing the people under a frightful load of taxes, to meet the annual interest. Such a result should be a warning to us. It should admonish us to eschew the policy which has proved so fatal in our parent country. It should caution us to pay

MARCH, 1828.]

The Public Debt.

[SENATE.]

our debt while we can, and not to run the risk of meriting from our posterity of a hundred years hence, the bitter reproaches which the English are the present day lavishing upon their ancestors of the reigns of Queen Anne and George the First.

The fourth and last branch of the resolution requires the Finance Committee to report on the probable time within which the present debt of the United States may be paid; and upon what articles, and to what amount, the duties now payable, may then be reduced or abolished. This is an inquiry, Mr. President, of the deepest concern to the people; and the report of the committee, if ordered to make one, will be looked for with the greatest impatience and solicitude. In my own opinion, our debt may be paid off in five years, and duties abolished to the amount of eleven or twelve millions. The debt is now, nominally, sixty-seven millions—in reality, about fifty-eight: for seven millions is in the United States Bank stock, which is worth more than par, and brings a dividend equal to its interest; and thirteen millions is in the three per cent. stock, which is fifteen per cent. below par, and may be bought for about eleven millions. A Sinking Fund of thirteen or fourteen millions would extinguish the actual debt, in five years, (letting all the public works go on as usual,) and it would require but little aid from our legislation to make that fund amount to thirteen or fourteen millions. It is ten millions now, and is increasing from the improving state of the commerce. The restoration of the 4th section of the Act of 1817 to its true and obvious meaning, would increase it to two millions more; and a more rapid sale of the public lands, according to the plan which I have had the honor to propose, would further increase it, to the amount of another million or upwards. Thus, in five years, the debt may be extinguished, and the great questions placed before Congress, whether the present revenue shall be kept up? And if so, for what objects? Or reduced? And if so, upon what articles the reduction shall fall, and to what amount? These will be great questions, worthy to engage the deliberations of the whole Union; and the discussion of them may develop a new line in the division of political parties. Some may be for keeping up the whole revenue, and making the Federal Government strong and splendid; others may be for a reduction of the taxes, and for limiting the revenue to the just and necessary support of a plain Republican Government. I shall myself be found in the ranks of this latter party; and to enable it to act best for the public good, it is necessary that the public mind be consulted before it acts. The abolition of duties will be a delicate and responsible task—it will be the counterpart of an imposition of duties—and should be executed in strict subordination to the will of the people. For one, I should wish my constituents to know my sentiments, and, in return, I should like to know theirs. If we disagree, I promise them one of two things—either to execute their will, or to retire from my station. Here, then, is my creed: I am for abolishing duties in toto, as soon as the public debt is paid off, upon all articles of prime necessity, or ordinary comfort, which are not made at home at all, or not made in sufficient quantity to merit national protection; and I am for continuing them on articles of taste and luxury, and upon such rival productions of foreign countries, as our security in time of war, and our general independence as a nation, requires to be made at home. This is what I have said on a former occasion, and now repeat, because I have been misrepresented, and my words mutilated and garbled for party purposes. I will be more explicit, and specify some of the articles which I would select for exemption from duty. I will name coffee, of which we have imported forty millions of pounds weight in the year; tea, of which the imports have been ten millions of pounds; spices, imported to the amount of six millions of pounds; cocoa and chocolate, four millions; linens to the value of three millions of dollars. Upon these articles, and others of the same class, which might be named, the duties might be abolished, I apprehend, with advantage to manufacturers, as well as farmers and merchants: for they are necessities of life which enter into use in the living of every family, and lowering their price, would be lowering the price of labor, which the manufactory demands. Salt, sugar, blankets, and flannel, present another class of necessities and comforts, upon which some diversity of opinion might arise. They are necessities of life, and partially made at home, but not in sufficient quantity to answer the public demand. Large importations of them are made from abroad, and heavy duties are paid upon them. Of salt, we import four millions of bushels, the duty twenty cents to the Government, and ten cents profit on it to the merchant; of sugar, eighty millions of pounds, the duty three and four cents to the Government, and one more to the merchant; of blankets and flannels, we import to the value of a million and a half of dollars, paying above four hundred thousand dollars to the Government, and near two hundred thousand more to the merchant. Upon these items there may be diversity of opinion, and the will of the people should be known. Let no one say it is too soon for the people to begin to think upon this subject. I detest that saying, in all its bearings and applications. It is never too soon for the people to think, but often too late! It is not too soon for them to begin to think now about the abolition of duties. Their Representatives will have to act one way or the other, in four or five years; and would, doubtless, wish to be informed of the sentiments of their constituents. The report of the committee, which I propose to obtain, will give them that advantage. It will set the public mind to work, and will enable the people to manifest their wishes in time to guide and enlighten the decision of their Representatives.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the Committee on Finance did not, on any occasion, shrink from its duty, and they would take up the subject as speedily as possible. He would make but one remark upon the statements of the gentleman from Missouri, in relation to the two millions of dollars reserved in the Treasury. There were several contingencies to which this sum was liable. One was the practice of Congress frequently to make appropriations of large sums of money, not calculated on by the Secretary of the Treasury in his estimates; and then this sum came in and fulfilled the designs of Congress. Last year, this application of the two millions was made to a large amount. Congress made such liberal demands upon it, that but four hundred thousand dollars remained in the Treasury at the commencement of this year.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, rose in reply to Mr. BENTON. He said he should not oppose the reference of the resolution, which was the usual course; but he could not permit them to pass to the committee, after the elaborate argument by which they had been recommended, without expressing his entire dissent to the opinions and views of the gentleman from Missouri.

I do not believe there is any error in the act of the 8d of March, 1817, either in principle, or in the construction of it. I think the act plain, that there is no misconception of its meaning, and that it is founded in just views of our financial affairs. This act was intended to appropriate ten millions of dollars annually to the redemption of the public debt, after the year 1817, and was, consequently, a standing appropriation after the current expenses of the year, if the Treasury was adequate to pay it. This part of the law gives rise to no difficulty, as the reservation does not apply to this section. But an additional section of the act is in these words: "That, after the year 1817, whenever there shall be, at any time after an adjournment of Congress in any year, a surplus of money in the Treasury, above the sums appropriated for the service of such year, the payment of which to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund will yet leave in the Treasury, at the end of the year, a balance equal to two millions of dollars, then such surplus shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to the Sinking Fund, to be paid at such times as the situation of the Treasury will best permit, and shall be applied by the Commissioners thereof to the purchase or redemption of the public debt."

By this section, two millions are directed to be left untouched in the Treasury, and all the surplus, after such reservation, is to be applied to the public debt. The gentleman from Missouri supposes that this reservation is either a misconception of the act, or is founded in erroneous principles, it being, as he supposes, unnecessary to reserve, even by estimation, any money in the Treasury, and, consequently, that all the estimated resources for the year may be safely appropriated by anticipation. The act seems too plain to be misconceived, and has received a uniform construction by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. It must be a surplus of money in the Treasury, over and above the appropriation for the service of the year, and the ten millions, and the two reserved millions. The balance is surplus, and is, by the act, appropriated to the public debt.

"After the adjournment of Congress," the estimate is made for the year. The net balance of the Treasury, at the close of the year, (excluding what was appropriated for the service of the last year, and all funds not available,) is added to the estimated revenue of the year. A sum equal to the appropriations made by Congress for the service of the year is set apart—ten millions are directed to be applied during the year to the principal and interest of the public debt. If any balance remains in the Treasury, according to the estimate of the revenue, two millions is allowed to cover all deficiencies and variations of the revenue, and the surplus is applied to the public debt.

The reason why two millions was directed by the act to be reserved, was, that the calculation of the amount on which they are to operate, is founded on an estimate of what may be in the Treasury during the year, not what is actually there. It was known that our revenue was liable to fluctuations of two or three millions a year, from causes that could not be anticipated even one year in advance. Our importations are subject to variations, and the revenue arising therefrom to corresponding irregularities. There are, besides, inequalities in the different quarters of the year, that materially affect the receipts of the year; and we have experienced the same thing from the sales of the public lands, so as to baffle all calculation of the actual result of the revenue for the year. It was a knowledge of this uncertainty, in all financial estimates, that induced the reservation of the two millions, to guard against a probable contingency of applying more to the public debt than might be found in the Treasury. The wisdom and the foresight of this provision has been exemplified by the experience of the last ten years. In 1817, the estimated receipts from customs were twenty-four millions; the actual receipts exceeded that sum by two millions, and this is probably a solitary instance. In 1818, the estimated receipts were twenty millions; the actual were three millions less. In 1819, estimated twenty-one millions; and the revenue fell short near a million. In 1820, the estimate of nineteen millions was found by the result to be four millions too much. In 1821, the Secretary of the Treasury estimated fourteen millions; but the Committee of Ways and Means, with the same data, estimated 15 millions. It produced but 13 millions. These differences

MARCH, 1828.]

The Public Debt.

[SENATE.]

arise with the ablest men, with all the information necessary to a correct judgment. They can but approximate the true result. There are some facts and some principles which are useful in forming these estimates; but, with all their aid, it is but conjectural. There are no known laws that govern them. Experience has shown, perhaps, that two millions is a safe allowance for the fluctuations of commerce, and the various exigencies that may arise during the year. In the last twelve years, the receipts have varied from near thirty-four to thirteen millions. But from this series we are able to form a more accurate estimate of the general average of the revenue. The receipts for twelve years may be said to average twenty-one millions—for the last five years twenty-two millions; and this is a sufficient basis for all financial calculation. It will probably vary from twenty to twenty-four millions. We may allow, in round numbers, ten millions for the ordinary expenses of Government, established by law; ten millions for the public debt; and the extraordinary appropriations average from one to three millions. So that, upon no ordinary calculation, can more than ten millions be applied, nor can we anticipate there will be a surplus.

Again: We know that, during that period, the receipts of the Government have not allowed the regular application of ten millions, and have not been found equal to this standing demand on the Treasury. We have paid, during that period, $134,506,206, of which $18,786,748 was provided for by loan; leaving the amount actually paid $115,719,458; whereas, the application of ten millions for twelve years would have extinguished one hundred and twenty millions. There is, therefore, due to the Sinking Fund, more than four millions. This shows, however, how nearly it has met the expectations of the country, and is an evidence of the ability of the distinguished man who framed the bill. But it shows, at the same time, that there has been no surplus.

It seems to my mind the gentleman labors under some erroneous impression on the subject. He seems to think that something has been lost, by mismanagement of the funds, either by the operation of this act, or the misconstruction of it, and supposes, by changing the act, he will save the interest of two millions a year. Sir, since the operation of the act, there has never been a surplus of two millions, which could have been applied to the debt. On the contrary, on the 1st of January, 1818, '19, '20, '21, the four first years after the act creating the Sinking Fund, and also in 1824 and 1825, there was no balance in the Treasury, but a great deficiency, to wit:

1st Jan. 1818,	$4,953,852
1819,	2,060,483
1820,	5,301,167
1821,	2,066,724
1824,	2,382,030
1825,	161,269

On the 1st January, 1822, there was in the Treasury only $491,166; on the 1st of January, 1823, there was in the Treasury $5,462,413 not applied, because there was no redeemable debt to which it could be applied. On the 1st January, 1826, there was a sum equal to a million in the Treasury, and that balance still remains, and will be carried to the estimated receipts of the year, to compose the fund of the Treasury, for the year, out of which the appropriations for the year will be taken, including the ten millions; and if there is any surplus, after allowing two millions for variations of revenue, it will be also applied to the public debt. If the gentleman could find the two millions which could have been, but which have not been applied, in consequence of this act, I would consent to apply it; but if, at any period, that sum had been applied, the Treasury would be now minus a million. The error consists in the idea that such sum has laid idle in the Treasury. It was never there. A view of the whole subject will show the sound discretion which has been exercised over the application of the funds, since the peace, with the exception of the sum that remained, in 1823, unemployed; but that was the business of Congress. The Secretary of the Treasury could not purchase stock, and there was none at that time redeemable.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended, in his report, in December, 1826, a loan of sixteen millions, at 5 per cent., to pay off a debt of 6 per cent., and which, if carried into effect, would have produced, at once, a large saving to the Government, but this proposition was rejected by Congress at the last session. That, to my mind, was the time and place for economy. That would have realized more than could result from the interest of the imaginary two millions, if they had actually existed in the Treasury.

Sir, the payment of the current expenses of the Government, and the ten millions, will leave us from two to three millions a year, for all objects of a miscellaneous character, including internal improvements, roads, canals, breakwaters, piers, deepening channels, removing obstructions in rivers, purchases of land from Indians, and various other claims upon the country. During the last three years, a large sum has been applied by Congress to these objects of great utility, and of indispensable necessity. These appropriations will, doubtless, be continued by Congress. What future expectation can there be, that there will ever be a surplus of two millions? We have an actual surplus, now ascertained, of a million, but we have a bill appropriating a million to the surviving officers of the Revolution; and, while it is proposed to apply the million to the public debt, it is, at the same moment, proposed to raise the million for the officers by a new loan; and where is the economy of that?

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates an excess of receipts, for the present year, of $2,852,874, and this sum is liable to the usual variations. But what are the demands upon it? There is a bill before us, which contemplates the commencement of a breakwater at the mouth of the Delaware, which will cost more than two millions, and which proposes $250,000 a year. There is another anticipated at Nantucket, of about half that cost, which will also require $200,000 a year. There are applications for opening a communication from Albemarle Sound to the Atlantic; deepening the channel at the mouth of Cape Fear River; opening the falls on the Wabash; removing the rafts in Red River; and obstructions from the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and many others of less importance. This is besides the removal of Indians and purchases of land, the claims of States for advances during the war, and the private claims now pending, amounting to more than half a million.

Now, the simple question is, whether these objects are of more pressing importance than the payment of this additional two millions to the public debt, which would hasten its extinguishment little more than one year, while these great objects must be neglected. Upon this point my mind is made up.

The regular application of ten millions will extinguish the public debt early in 1836, and, in the mean time, from two to three millions a year may be distributed over the country, to improve the navigation, by artificial harbors, deepening channels, erecting piers, and other useful works upon the coast; to improve the communications between the States, by the internal commerce of the country, now vastly greater than the foreign. The public debt is in a progress of rapid extinguishment, and quite as rapid as it ought to be, not to disturb the commerce, or the capital, or the circulation of the metallic medium of the country. The stock of the United States, to a certain extent, forms a part of its capital. By paying it off, you do not increase the circulating medium, but you destroy that part which is a substitute for capital. How far this stock enters into the capital upon which trade and commerce is carried on, I do not know, nor can I anticipate the effect upon them, of withdrawing, in a short period, seventy or eighty millions of stock. It is probable that, by a gradual operation of ten millions a year, no dangerous effect will result. Every thing will gradually accommodate itself to the changes going on. But nothing is more to be dreaded than causes which suddenly derange the money market; a panic, then, deranges every thing else. The moment the drain is felt, the banks curtail, money appreciates, property sinks in value: pecuniary embarrassment, sacrifice, distress, and bankruptcy, follow. It is the business of statesmen to look to this, and to guard against it. If a drain of specie in the Western country has produced great sacrifice and ruin, what would be its effects upon the Atlantic States, and in our large cities? Twenty millions of this stock is held by foreigners, and the gentleman says that we are tributary to them, to the annual amount of the interest. When this debt is paid off, if this sum is reinvested in the country, we shall contribute to them the amount of this interest; but there is reason to expect that foreigners will not invest in any institutions of the States. The capital is attracted here by a profitable investment in public stocks of the Government, on the faith of which they rely. They have no confidence in local institutions. If twenty millions were withdrawn too suddenly, it might disturb the circulating medium, and, thereby, the trade and commerce, as well as the value of property. I wish the public debt paid off, as fast as it is safe to do so. I think the rate of ten millions a year is rapid enough, and ought not to be accelerated.

The gentleman says there is a balance of four millions, at all times, in the Bank of the United States, the use of which that institution enjoys gratuitously. It is true, the bank receives, in deposit, at different places, the whole revenue of the Government, which they pay out to the order of the Treasury, as it is called for, to meet the appropriations; that about a quarter of the amount, varying from three to five millions, is always in the vaults in advance; the use of which, he supposes, is a boon to the bank, and without equivalent. If we had a Treasury of our own, we must always have a quarter year's revenue in advance. That must lie idle and unemployed in our coffers. That immense sum must be trusted to the integrity of a single individual, and must pass through the hands of twenty irresponsible agents. Disbursements must be made, loans discharged, and pensions paid, at various points. It would require a complicated machinery; and, even then, expenses and losses would be incurred, and inconveniences experienced. I believe the bank a necessary appendage of the Treasury, which, besides affording a sound currency for the payment of duties, facility of exchange, and transmission by checks, performs, without compensation, and without loss, all the moneyed operations of the Government. Is it nothing that we have a safe depository, and a responsible agent? Is security and accommodation nothing? We are large stockholders ourselves, and partake, to that extent, in any profit it may give. But, sir, how infinitely more important must this institution become in time of war. Besides, this balance is always appropriated, and no longer the fund of the nation. It is deposited for those who have a right to receive it, and that right is perfect at the end of the year, and liable to be drawn at any time.

The gentleman from Missouri, in looking forward to the extinguishment of this debt, has broached new and dangerous doctrines, which go to the foundation of all protection, and, carried into effect, would ruin this or any other country. I hope I misunderstood him. But what he has said touches me in a tender point,

MARCH, 1828.]

Visitors at West Point.

[SENATE.]

and I cannot permit it to pass. It is said in terms that mark deliberation—and it is distinctly announced—that these principles are to form the distinctive lines between the great parties that are to divide the politicians of this country.

He says: "I am for abolishing duties in toto, as soon as the public debt is paid off, upon all articles of prime necessity, or ordinary comfort, which are not made at home, or not made in sufficient quantity to merit national protection." And, to make his views more intelligible, he adds, "salt, sugar, blankets, flannels, present another class of necessities and comforts, upon which some diversity of opinion may arise; they are necessities of life, and partly made at home, but not in sufficient quantity to answer the public demand." If from this is to be inferred, that these articles do not deserve the national protection, because they do not supply the public demand—and the protecting duties are, consequently, to be removed—and this is to constitute the line between the parties, I have no hesitation in saying on what side of that line I shall be found. This doctrine followed out to its consequences, would reach wool, hemp, cotton bagging, iron, lead, and almost every article, agricultural and manufacturing, which is now the object of national protection.

The anticipation of the surplus revenue has already brought to the consideration of Congress two modes of employing the money. The one is to apply it, annually, to the great improvements of every kind, in their proper order, to facilitate the intercourse and the communications between the States; the other proposes to divide the sum among the several States, according to population. It is too soon to enter upon the relative merits of the two systems. I greatly prefer the former, because I believe the States incompetent to the great national works that are necessary to connect the several parts of the Union.

But, if the majority of the people should eventually decide against the expediency of pursuing the great system of improvement, I greatly prefer the distribution among the States, to the abolition of duties: and if we should ever determine—which I hope we shall not—to forego the general system, I have no hesitation in saying, that the most beneficial consequences may result, even by the direction of the States, in establishing permanent funds for education—rendering that cheap and accessible to all classes; and by judicious application to objects of public usefulness. If it was for no other purpose than to levy a fund for the support of the State Governments, it would be infinitely superior to the abolition of duties.

This fund, distributed among the States, according to population, will enable each State to dispense with direct taxation. Their taxes are levied only on property, while capital stock and income are exempt. Those of the United States fall equally upon the wealth of the community.

Sir, I do not oppose the reference of the resolutions. I am satisfied to leave this subject to the committee, believing they will disapprove all the objects contemplated by them.

[Mr. BENTON said he thought the gentleman from Louisiana had fallen into an error in relation to the two millions. He found, by the law for the regulation of the Treasury, that the sum of $2,000,000 was to remain in the Treasury over and above the appropriations of Congress. It, therefore, could not be disposed of, as the gentleman supposed.]

Mr. MACOX said that, as he had understood it, this was merely a motion for inquiry. He did not accede to the proposition, that, if the public debt was paid off, it would reduce the capital of the country. The public debt was like a private debt. If he should give his bond of a thousand dollars, he believed that, if he did not pay it when he was able, it would never be paid. It was with a nation as with an individual. If we do not pay our public debt when we have money, there is no certainty that it will ever be paid. The difference between them was, that, exactly in proportion as the public debt was liquidated, the taxes upon the people would be reduced, and they would have more money at home. He had long thought there was a strong party in the country, which did not want the public debt paid off. Not in the administration, but in the Legislature; and that party was for spending the money of the country for all kinds of projects, instead of applying it to the public debt. It was just as it was with individuals who spent all their income and neglected their debts; and it could not lead to beneficial results. England might have paid off her debt more than once, if they had followed a prudent course. For himself, he wished to see the public debt discharged. We shall not always go on as at present. There will come a time for war. We are continually preparing for it; and when we are ready, we shall go to war. He had been a long time desirous to see some more direct means taken for paying the debt of the Nation, but he began to despair; and now, instead of calculating upon its being done, he did not know as that happy event would ever take place.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

THURSDAY, March 6.

Visitors at West Point.

The bill was taken up, making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1828; the motion of Mr. BRANCH, to strike out the appropriation of 1,500 dollars for the expenses of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point, being under consideration—

Mr. HARRISON made some explanations, as to the comparative expenditure of former years and the present time. He said that, formerly, very little else but the transportation of the baggage of officers was subject of charge, on account of this visitation. As civilians had latterly been chosen as the Visitors, and some of them residing at a great distance, the payment of their travelling expenses had swelled the amount to the sum at present required.

Mr. WHITE said that his chief objection to the appropriation was, that there was no law creating the officers to whom it was paid. He knew of no law which created such an officer as a Visitor of the West Point Academy, and he considered that, when any office or commission became sufficiently important to be provided for by a distinct item in an appropriation bill, it ought to be supported by the authority of law. The expense for this object had swelled from 200 to upwards of 2,000 dollars, and had, therefore, become an item worthy of attention. Until the law appointed the officers, explained the duties, and fixed the manner and rate of their compensation, there ought to be no specific appropriation for the purpose. If this provision was stricken out, it would not have the effect of preventing the visitation, as the matter would remain as it was before. It was in the power of the Department to send Visitors, and it might be done as before.

Mr. NOBLE spoke in opposition to the motion. It had been stated, he said, that, from the beginning, the appointing and paying the Visitors to the Military Academy was an assumption of power. If it was so, Congress had to complain of itself. The power had been employed for years, and must have been within the knowledge of Congress. Why, then, if it was an assumption of power, had not Congress interposed to prevent its continuance? It had also been said, that a system of favoritism was practised at the Academy; and he had heard of well-born sons being preferred to others. If such was the case, he wished another resolution might be introduced, to inquire who created the system of favoritism. It would be found that members of Congress were at the bottom of it. They ought not to shield themselves. Call for the names, said Mr. N., of those who have recommended cadets, and you will find that members of Congress have had more to do with this scandal about well-born sons than any one else. It ought to be inquired into, and this imputation not allowed to go out to the people, to create a prejudice against the Administration. He spoke in high terms of the character of the Secretary of War. If this appropriation was thrown out, it would not have the effect which gentlemen supposed. It would not be as it was formerly. It would show the Secretary that this was an expenditure which Congress did not approve, because it was not in the spirit of retrenchment, of which they had heard so much. This was one of the continual and continued attempts to put down the present Administration, which he believed to be the best in the known world. If the gentleman from Tennessee complained of the amount of expense for this visitation, he could inform him that the most expensive Board of Visitors had been that over which the present Governor of Tennessee presided. That gentleman had thought it his province to give dinners, for which Mr. N. did not blame him, but only mentioned it to show who encouraged the extravagance, if such it was to be considered, of the Visitors of West Point. He should go for the whole appropriation, and regretted that the motion had been made, because it might be construed as a reflection upon the present incumbent of the War Department.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the contingent fund of the War Department had uniformly been 10,000 dollars, and the expenses of the Visitors had been paid out of it. The sum for their expenses had of late years become so large, that the Secretary thought it had better be supplied by specific appropriation. He had asked for 3,000 dollars, but the other House had cut it down to 1,500. The Secretary had also asked for 15,000 dollars for the contingent fund. The House had reduced that sum to 10,000 dollars. If, now, this provision were denied, and the Secretary were to pay the Visitors out of the contingent fund, it would be reduced to 7,000 dollars.

Mr. CHANDLER observed that he had at first been in favor of making and retaining 500 dollars for this purpose; but, under the consideration that these officers were not appointed by law, he should vote for the present motion.

Mr. McLANE rose to ask for information, as to the reason for the increase of this expenditure, of the Chairman of the Committee on Finance. He was in favor of the examinations of the Military Academy, but was far from being satisfied that this appropriation was necessary. As far as he had received information, the appropriation was altogether too large. It was difficult to account for the augmentation of the expense which had grown up from year to year. He wished to know why the sum for this expenditure should be greater in 1826 than it was in 1825. He thought if the contingent fund could supply this fund formerly, it could now be drawn from the same source. He would also ask the Chairman of the Committee of Finance, on what ground 15,000 dollars were asked by the Secretary of War, as a contingent fund, and 3,000 for this purpose—thus swelling the demand of the Department to 18,000 dollars. He merely rose to ask for information on these heads.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that the question was, whether the Senate would appropriate $11,500 instead of $10,000, without information as to the cause of this increase of expenditure.

The question being taken on the motion to strike out the appropriation, it was rejected.

Mr. WHITE then renewed his motion to strike out "1,000," so as to reduce the sum to $500, and the question being taken, was decided in the negative.

Mr. CORB moved to amend the 1st section of the bill, by striking out 10,000 dollars, (the contingent fund,) and insert 8,500 dollars.

MARCH, 1823.]

Claims of South Carolina.

[SENATE.]

Mr. KNEB said, if the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw his motion, he would move to reconsider the vote on striking out the whole appropriation; having voted for that motion, he would remark, that he did it with the hope that a smaller sum would be fixed upon. That not having been done, he chose rather to strike out the whole, than vote for the sum of 1,500 dollars.

The motion to reconsider was rejected.

MONDAY, March 10.

Claims of South Carolina.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the adjustment of the claims of the State of South Carolina, against the Government of the United States.

The report of the Military Committee on that subject, having been read, at the request of Mr. HAYNE,

Mr. HARRISON (Chairman of the Committee) briefly explained the merits of the bill. The report just read, said he, had gone so extensively into the subject, that it was hardly necessary for him to enter on it at large. The account upon which the claim of South Carolina was predicated, contained a great many items; the principal of which, having been allowed by the General Government, put the subject of interest entirely at rest; there being no question but that, on the money actually allowed, and paid to the State, interest was justly due. The cases of Virginia and Pennsylvania, who had been allowed interest by Congress for advances made by them, were somewhat different in detail, though not in principle. South Carolina had entered into these expenses for the defence of the country, without having any previous bargain with the General Government. Virginia and Pennsylvania, upon a call made upon their patriotism, borrowed money from the Banks, which they expended in the service of the country, and it was because interest had been paid by them, for the sums so borrowed, that interest was allowed them on their advances.

The case of South Carolina was nearly similar to that of those two States. She did not borrow the money, to be sure, which she advanced; but she had a fund producing an interest of 12 per cent. per annum, which, without any hesitation, she appropriated, when danger threatened. The committee were therefore of opinion, that equal justice ought to be meted to the State of South Carolina, which had been meted to Virginia and Pennsylvania, the actual loss of interest being the same, in effect, as the actual payment of interest. In relation to another item of the account, viz: for cannon-balls furnished by the State, it was necessary, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, that the balls should be procured at all events. The General Government was unable to furnish them, and they were cast at the expense of the State. The enemy not having made the expected attack, they remained until the close of the war, and then the Government refused to receive them, because they had not been made of the proper size. Another item was for the transportation of baggage, which had been rejected, because it had been customary to allow no more than eight wagons to a regiment. Without their having the means of ascertaining how many wagons were necessary, in the peculiar case of the State of S. C., whether eight or nine, the committee could see no reason why she should not be allowed this item as well as for the cannon-balls, since she had actually expended the money in both cases. He had seen operations where 40 wagons would hardly be sufficient for a regiment. There were some other small items, said Mr. H., and one of $— for blankets. With regard to his last, he would observe that the troops of the State had been called out in a very inclement season, and the State, finding that blankets were absolutely necessary, had furnished them. The committee, however, not finding any precedent for an allowance of this kind, did not think proper to sanction it.

Mr. CHANDLER wished the State of South Carolina to receive the same justice which had been granted to other States, and no more. He was not well informed what had been allowed in other cases; but, from what he did understand, in this case it appeared that the State of S. C. had a fund vested in bank stock, which, without having been called on by the United States, she expended in her own defence. He objected to the claim for pay of the staff officers, as he believed it had never been the practice of the Government to allow pay to officers of a State to carry on its own operations. With respect to the charge made for cannon-balls, the State, he said, had the strongest motive to place herself in an attitude of defence, and was therefore perfectly right in procuring those balls. She had them on hand at the close of the war, and if they did not answer the calibre of the United States, and did that of South Carolina, she ought to have retained them for purposes of her own defence. As to wagons, he believed the rule had been to allow them in reason. If any State had been allowed as many as South Carolina charged for, he should not be disposed to object to the allowance. Whatever had been the custom, in similar cases, he was disposed to accede to, in the present one.

Mr. HAYNE entered into the merits of this bill: exhibiting in a clear and strong point of view, the justice of the claim, which the State he represented in part has upon the General Government. Mr. H. showed that South Carolina was in an exposed state, and that when the enemy were hovering on the coast, and the General Government without money or arms, that she came forward without asking terms, and took the money which she had vested in bank, yielding her 12 per cent. on every dollar, and loaned it to the Federal Government. Mr. H. answered all the several inquiries and suggestions made in relation to this business; showing the conduct of his State, as at once disinterested, patriotic, and worthy of imitation.

Mr. McLANE said: The State of South Carolina was entitled, on every principle of equity and justice, to receive the amount claimed by her. A distinction had been drawn between the debts due by the United States to individuals, and to States; and to individuals, interest is not allowed by the Government on the amount found to be due them. What is the principle, he asked, on which interest is refused to individuals? It is one to which he could not subscribe, though the precedent had become so strong as not now to be shaken. It is refused to individuals, said he, on the principle that the Government is always prepared to pay them their just demands, and therefore, ought not to be bound to pay interest on money waiting their disposal.

But that principle did not apply to advances made by States to aid the public exigencies of the country, when the General Government was unable to provide for that particular exigency. The principle, said Mr. McL., has already been established, that States should be allowed interest on the advances made by them for the service of the General Government. Here, then, was a strong case of that kind. Money had actually been advanced by the State of South Carolina, for the use of the General Government. Wherein, he asked, did this case differ from those of the States of Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New York, as argued by the Senator from Ohio? It was the duty of the United States to have performed those services and made those advances, made and performed by those States; having neglected so to do, those States stepped forward and made the advances required; and were paid, not only the sums so advanced by them, but the interest on the money they had borrowed for that purpose. Now, sir, we have adopted the principle, that wherever a State has paid interest on such advance made by it, the interest is part of the advance made; and it is on this principle that the State of South Carolina should be paid for the loss incurred by her, for her loss has been twelve per cent. interest, while she claims but six. The fact of the State's having advanced a particular stock fund, instead of money, was no argument to his mind, why the interest should not be paid. Suppose, said Mr. McLANE, a State holds stock on which she is receiving interest. If she borrows money, and holds her stock, it is admitted she ought to be paid; but if she sells her stock, and advances the money, interest is refused her. This was a doctrine he could not agree to. Is not the loss of the State the same, whether that loss was occasioned by interest actually paid by her, or by the deprivation of interest which she was actually receiving? If an individual, said Mr. McL., advances Bank stock for another, will not the chancellor award him the full amount of his loss? If he sells his stock, and advances the money, is not the case the same? On every principle of equity and justice, the present claim ought to be allowed. Treat it as interest paid—treat it as interest lost—treat it as a loss either way, and he did not see how payment could be avoided. In a case of this kind, he would make complete and full indemnity, and the Government never can, said he, place itself in a stronger attitude, than to say to those States, who are the first to encounter the shock of calamity, if you will voluntarily step forward for the defence of the country, you shall not be placed in a worse situation.

WEDNESDAY, March 12.

Barracks at New Orleans.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill providing for the purchase of a site, for the erection of barracks thereon, at New Orleans, was taken up.

Mr. HARRISON explained the object of the bill, and read several letters of the Quartermaster General upon the subject. It was proposed to build barracks for four companies.

Mr. PARRIS asked the Chairman of the Military Committee whether it was necessary to keep so large a force as four companies at New Orleans.

Mr. HARRISON said that two companies were generally stationed there, but the number was now four. But, let the number be what it might, the expediency of building barracks for at least four companies, could not be doubted. The situation of New Orleans seemed to call for a large military force. There were vast numbers of foreigners continually in the city; great numbers of islanders, among whom were a lawless banditti, sailors and negroes, resided in, or resorted to, the city, and endangered the property of its inhabitants—while a greater quantity of property deposited by other individuals than citizens, than in any other place in the Union, was always jeopardized, unless secured by some adequate means.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said that the amount of force was always according to the exigency of the time, and four companies might generally be required at New Orleans. Eight companies were considered by the Commander-in-Chief as necessary to be stationed at that post. Four only were quartered in the city, and the four others across the lake, in a more healthy position. He thought it needless for Congress to interfere in the details of measures taken by the Department. If the War Department stationed the troops as it judged best, it was not requisite for Congress to interfere. There was no force on the coast, for three or four hundred miles, and these troops were always ready to be detailed to any quarter

MARCH, 1828.]

Revolutionary Officers.

[SENATE.]

where they might be needed. It was a central position, and intelligence of any emergency would immediately reach New Orleans. It was, also, the most exposed situation in the country. There were always about 4,000 sailers in the harbor, and generally three hundred square-rigged vessels. Besides these, there were always a great number of Kentucky boats at the wharves, and thousands of pirates and renegades from the islands resorted there. It was within a short time that the papers were filled with accounts of attempts to fire the city, and not only the whole police was called to act, but a military guard was considered necessary in every square. They had already seen an attempt, at a former period, at an insurrection by the numerous black population. All these considerations, with that of the safety of public property, made it necessary to station four companies at New Orleans. The Government would lose nothing by the erection of the barracks, as the ground on which the former buildings stood, sold for double the amount which the proposed buildings would cost.

Mr. BENTON said that our army consisted of 6,000 men, who must be stationed somewhere. Wherever they were posted they must be sheltered, and he thought the unhealthiness of the climate at New Orleans was an additional argument in favor of this bill. Experience had shown that the erection of barracks was economy, when compared to the expense of hiring buildings. The latter had been practised at St. Louis, and had been found to be very expensive, as well as inconvenient. It was well known that troops ought to be kept at a distance, instead of being mixed up with the population of a town. Barracks had been erected at St. Louis, and the same provision was now asked for at New Orleans. It was not for the Senate now to inquire whether the troops were properly stationed—that duty belonged to the President of the United States; and if he chose to station four companies at New Orleans, Congress could not do less than provide barracks to shelter them. He considered it settled as a part of the policy of the country, that troops should be stationed at New Orleans. On the withdrawal of the troops, several years since, the Government was petitioned not to leave the city destitute of defence; and the reasons given were then satisfactory to his mind that a considerable permanent force was required at that point. It was the duty of the Government to provide for the protection of all parts of the country, and this was acknowledged to be one of the most defenceless, and the most exposed to contingencies which might call for the presence of military force. There was no proposition before the Senate either to increase or diminish the number of troops stationed at New Orleans; but to erect suitable buildings for those already posted there. He was in favor of the appropriation, as necessary for the safety of the city, and as a matter of permanent economy.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, remarked, that, whether this bill passed or not, it would not affect the disposition of the United States troops. They had been stationed there for the last twelve years. If the bill was rejected the officers and soldiers would be kept, as they now were, in different parts of the city, very inconveniently dispersed from each other. Besides, if this appropriation was refused, the soldiers would be exposed to the yellow fever, by being quartered in the city. The gentleman from Maine had fallen into a great error, in supposing that it was the intention of Government to withdraw the troops when the barracks were sold. The sale was made at the application of the citizens—as the barracks occupied a part of the city which was convenient for business; while, higher up the river, vessels could not come in on account of the immense batteries which defended the land from the Mississippi. It was supposed that the sale would produce a sufficient sum to build barracks in some other part of the city, less valuable for commercial purposes. There was another consideration in favor of erecting barracks capable of quartering four companies at least. In case of actual service, they would not be more than sufficient to serve as a hospital for the sick. He had seen a hospital in New Orleans, containing 800 sick, chiefly Kentucky and Tennessee militia. Another error which the gentleman from Maine (Mr. PARRIS) had fallen into, was the supposition that the troops might be stationed in the forts. The forts were at a distance, and had no communication with the city; hence the soldiers, intended for the defence and security of the city, would be of no service there. He could not doubt that the various considerations in favor of this bill would ensure a favorable decision upon it.

Mr. HARRISON moved to fill the blank with $7,968 dollars; which was agreed to, and the bill passed to be engrossed.

Revolutionary Officers.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, providing for certain surviving officers of the Revolutionary army; the motion by Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, to fill the blank with $800,000, pending.

Mr. BELL said that the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army claimed the performance of a promise of half pay for life—made to them by a resolution of Congress of October 21, 1780. They contended that this promise was performed only in part by the commutation of five years' full pay, which was subsequently given them as an equivalent for their half pay for life; and they now ask a second commutation to make up the alleged deficiency in the first. The committee to whom this subject was referred, has made a report in conformity to the views of the petitioners. This report alleges that the commutation of five years' full pay given to these officers as an equivalent for their half pay, was not an adequate compensation for it; and that there is now due to them a sum equal to two years' full pay. This bill makes provision for the payment of that sum. If the view which the committee has taken of this subject be correct, the claim of these officers is just, and ought to be paid. But I cannot yield my assent to the correctness of the facts on which the committee have founded their opinions, or to the justness of the conclusions which they have drawn from those facts. It is the object of the few remarks which I am about to make, to state the reasons which have brought me to a result on this question, directly the reverse of that to which the committee have arrived. The officers admit, that in consequence of an application from them, Congress in 1788 offered them five years' full pay as a commutation for their half pay for life—that they accepted this offer, received the obligations of the Government for it; and that those obligations have been since paid. But they contend that the acceptance and payment of this commutation did not discharge the Government from its promise, because, as they allege, they did not voluntarily accept this commutation, and that it was not an equivalent for their half pay for life. A sufficient attention to the facts will show that both these assertions of the officers which have been adopted by the committee, are unfounded. The direct evidence of a voluntary acceptance of the commutation by the officers, is of the most conclusive character. The officers solicited a commutation for their half pay. When five years' full pay was offered them as a commutation, they accepted it. This direct evidence of a voluntary acceptance, (and no evidence could be more conclusive,) is corroborated by indirect evidence deserving much consideration. The application to Congress for a commutation, and the nature and extent of the commutation offered, was undoubtedly known to every officer in the army. It was a subject of great interest to all, and must have been a subject of general conversation among them. It is impossible to believe, that, if any considerable number of the officers were dissatisfied with the commutation offered, they would not have remonstrated against it; and placed on the records of Congress some evidence of their belief that injustice was done them, as a foundation for a future application for redress. There is no evidence, nor even a traditionary rumor, that any of the officers were dissatisfied with the commutation given them. It seems to have been at the time so entirely satisfactory that not a single murmur of dissatisfaction was heard. For the next twenty-seven years, no complaint was heard from any one of this body of more than two thousand officers, who had accepted this commutation, that it was not a fair equivalent for their half pay, or that their acceptance of it was not voluntary. On what known principle of human action are we to account for this long silence, and the delay of these officers in asserting their claims, if they had believed them to be well founded? I can find no satisfactory reason consistent with the justice of their claims. During all this time, this Government was administered by their warmest friends, by their compatriots in the revolutionary struggle; by men whom they well knew would readily listen to their complaints, and promptly redress their injuries. These circumstances establish the fact, that the acceptance of the commutation of five years' full pay as an equivalent for the half pay for life, was not only voluntary, but satisfactory, beyond any reasonable doubt. It has been said that the acceptance of this commutation by the officers, could not be regarded as a free and voluntary act, because Congress required only the assent of a majority of the several State lines of the army. And it seems to be inferred that Congress intended by this means to compel the younger officers to accept as a commutation for their half pay, what was not in value an equivalent for it. This is a very weighty charge against a body of men whom we have been accustomed to revere as amongst the wisest and best men that ever conducted the great interests of our country. The charge, if well founded, must consign their names to infamy. But it is not well founded. They are not justly liable to this imputation. Their motives, in relation to this offer of a commutation for half pay to the Revolutionary officers, were fair, and their conduct just and honorable. The unworthy suspicions to which I have referred, must have arisen from a misapprehension of the motives which induced Congress to require the assent of the officers to the acceptance of the commutation offered by majorities of their respective lines. The circumstances disclose satisfactorily what these motives were. The officers had solicited a commutation or payment of a gross sum in exchange for the half pay for life, which had been promised them. Congress was willing to yield to their solicitations, but it was found difficult to effect this object, without exposing the one party or the other to injustice. The value of the half pay of no two of the officers was the same; and it was impracticable to apportion the commutation to each individual case. The officers as well as Congress, were satisfied that a commutation could be effected only by fixing upon an average value of the half pay of all the officers. This would secure the officers, as a body, against injustice, but it would not secure the Government; because if Congress offered this average value as a commutation, without an assurance that a considerable portion of the officers would accept it, it might happen that only the old officers, or those whose constitutions were broken by diseases or wounds, would accept it. These persons would have received a commutation far beyond what, in justice, they were entitled to. To guard against this injustice to the public, Congress said to the officers, We will give you five years' full pay, a fair average value of your half pay for life, if

MARCH, 1833.]

Revolutionary Officers.

[SENATE.]

so considerable a portion of you will consent to accept it as will afford a reasonable assurance that no considerable injustice will result to the public from our offer. This was the sole motive which induced Congress to annex to their offer the condition that the officers should decide upon the acceptance of the commutation, by majorities in their respective lines. The condition on which the offer was made, was just and reasonable. Its object was to guard against injustice, and not to do injustice. No possible injustice could result to the officers from this condition. It impaired none of the rights of the minority who should not see fit to accept the commutation. It was not compulsory, nor did it impose either forfeiture or penalty upon those who should reject the offer. Their promise of half pay for life remained equally obligatory upon the Government as before; and Congress remained bound to provide, and undoubtedly would have provided for its payment. All the evidence we have on this subject, leads to the conclusion that the officers accepted the commutation, not because they were compelled to accept it, but because they believed it to be an advantage to them. This is evident from the admitted fact that they readily and generally, if not unanimously, accepted it. The committee tells us that majorities in the lines of nine States accepted the commutation. How large those majorities were, does not appear; that they included all, or nearly all, the officers, is fairly presumable from the consideration that all did actually accept the commutation; and that there is no evidence that any objections were made to its acceptance. The officers of the four remaining States never acted by lines on the question of the acceptance of the commutation. They acted individually on this question, and every one of them, the young as well as the old, with the knowledge that they were at liberty, each one for himself, to accept or reject the commutation, did accept it. Can evidence of a voluntary acceptance of the commutation, more conclusive than this, be offered? It is believed to be impossible. Yet, in the face of all this evidence of the voluntary acceptance of the commutation of five years' full pay, in exchange for half pay for life, by at least more than three-fourths, if not all these officers, this bill provides a second commutation for all the revolutionary officers, without discrimination. I should be glad to know of the advocates of this bill, on what principle it is that those officers who solicited the commutation for their half pay, who voluntarily and individually, each man acting for himself, accepted it, believing it to be a fair equivalent for that half pay, is now to receive a second commutation. It certainly cannot be on the ground either of legal or equitable obligation, of which we have heard so much said. It has been said, that although circumstances induced the officers to receive this commutation voluntarily, yet if it was not an equivalent for the half pay yielded up in exchange for it, the Government remains under an equitable obligation to give them an additional commutation to make good the deficiency.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that the relation in which he stood to the honorable objects of this bill, would justify him in a few remarks upon the objections offered against it. But so long had the debate been protracted, he should have refrained from those remarks entirely, had not the speech of his colleague this morning convinced him, that some of the opposers of the measure acted under a total misapprehension as to a few of the material facts. The principles which should govern the measure, might well be presumed alike familiar to all; but the particular facts of the case surely ought to be better known to those, whose particular duty it had been to make a critical examination of them.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) had urged much, as an objection to the passage of this bill, that the committee themselves disagreed concerning the grounds on which its merits rested. While in truth, the only real difference among them had been, that one member dwelt more strongly on one reason, and another more strongly on another reason for its adoption.

But very far was it from the intention of himself, or his able friend from Georgia, (Mr. BERRIEN,) in advocating the claim on strict common law principles, to admit that it could not be supported also on principles the most liberal and equitable; while it was equally far, as he believed, from the views of the other members of the committee, (Mr. VAN BUREN and Mr. HARRISON,) who had so eloquently pressed the mere equity of the claim, to admit that it was not also well based on strict common law principles. On the contrary, if a radical difference had existed between them, it would still leave the measure as free from objection on that account as was left the opposition to it. For one gentleman formerly, (Mr. MACON,) and indeed, another to-day, (Mr. BELL,) had insisted on the statute of limitations in bar of the claim, while the Senator from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) properly and gallantly said he should scorn to take advantage of that statute. Again, the last gentleman had insisted, that the commutation act was legally binding and compulsory on the minority as well as majority; while my colleague to-day frankly acknowledges, that it was binding on nobody who did not individually and freely assent to its provisions. The difference between the opponents of the bill is therefore essential, while that between its friends is merely nominal.

Another mistake in fact has been urged from one or two quarters against the bill, namely, that a suit at law could not be sustained on the claim, and hence, it ought not to find favor. But does any claim ever come here, on which such a suit could be sustained? The chief reason that induces every private claimant to present his petition to Congress, is that he could not obtain redress in the courts of law; and if no claimant was to be listened to here, who could not succeed at law, we might sweep off, at one blow, our whole docket of private bills. Again, it has been asked, why did not these petitioners go to the Departments to have their claims audited and allowed, if they are valid? I reply, as before, if nobody is to be relieved here, who cannot get relief at one of the Departments, at once rub the sponge over all private applications; because the very reason for their appearance here, is that, by omissions in the existing laws, or doubts of the accounting officers, redress cannot be obtained at any of the Departments. If objections like these are to avail against the petition now under consideration, let them avail against all petitioners, and in the words of the gentleman from North Carolina, let all be directed to "eat out of one spoon." Why did we not say to the merchants in A. D. 1816, whose bonds were remitted, Go to your action at law, or go to one of the Departments? Why not say the same to the purchasers of public lands so liberally relieved a few years ago?

The annuity tables, when formed with care, are entitled to full confidence, and furnish sufficient certainty for moneyed calculations of the utmost importance in common life. They do not rest on conjectures, but on long and patient observation and on records. (See 35 Quart. Rev. 4th page.)

I have a table before me, where of ten thousand persons born on a given day, so far from all being swept away in seven years, or even in fourteen, (the time supposed by the other gentleman,) over one-half of the number are alive after thirty years. Again, of those alive after thirty years of age, instead of all disappearing after seven or fourteen years, one-half of them are alive after thirty-two years. The table is formed in a healthy country, and of that character will I show our own to be, notwithstanding the argument to the contrary to-day.

The hypothesis of the committee, that the average age of the officers in A. D. 1783, did not exceed thirty, was not assumed hastily, as intimated: it was not adopted without full inquiry, and has had the sanction of two able committees of the other House. Taking that then as a fact sufficiently well established for this purpose, the committee have not said, as my colleague through mistake supposes, that the officers would live only fourteen years. They merely mention fourteen years as the shortest term; but their whole calculations and arguments he would see, had he examined them with his usual care, are grounded on the position, that they were likely to live from 82 to 84 years. The committee, in coming to that result, do not say that they adopt implicitly the tables of Dr. Price, or do they even refer to him at all in their report. But two former committees in the other House, have taken his tables as their basis, and making proper allowances, have come to the same conclusion with ourselves. We have resorted not only to him, but especially to Milne on Annuities, which is now before me, and from which I have before read. I will take the liberty again to read, and from his calculations to repeat, that the data given by the committee are correct. [Mr. W. here read from Milne's tables.] These tables of course differ some years, as do those of Dr. Price, according as they are made in different latitudes; in large towns or the country, and within the last 60 years or before, on account of the introduction of vaccination, the improvements in education, and numerous other causes which reading and observation will suggest. A slight difference, when kept as to the different sexes, prevails likewise in all of these.—(2 Milne App. 765.)

But take the healthiest places in Europe, where these tables have been formed during the last half century, and the probable duration of life at 80 years of age is such, that an annuity for it, would not differ beyond a small fraction from 14 years' purchase. The tables at Carlisle are of this character. Not as many gentlemen, with a slight attention to the subject have supposed, that a person of that age would live only 14 years; but probably live about 84 years; and hence his annuity for that time be worth now in a gross sum 14 times its amount. Can my colleague seriously contend, that the committee have erred in supposing the healthiness of the country not equal to that of Europe, where the great mass of the people are well known not to be so well fed, sheltered or clothed? Or that republican institutions are less favorable to long life than monarchies? Or can he seriously contend, that these officers at thirty years of age were less likely to live long, than persons who had been in civil life? In reply, should I conjecture merely without any examination of this point, the conclusion would be rather more obvious and natural, that persons, hardened by exposure and severe exertion, would afterwards live longer than persons in ordinary life.

But without any claim on my part to unusual accuracy or deep science in these subjects, the committee have not rested their inferences on mere conjecture: they have not, I believe, adopted a basis "utterly improbable;" nor are they persons whose habits have led them in their official duties to "assume essential facts" without evidence. The invalid pension roll of the United States in A. D. 1825, consisted of 3,690, and exhibited only fifty-eight deaths. In A. D. 1826, of 3,805, and exhibited only forty-eight deaths. This averages about 1 in 70, and is among a class of persons, not, it is believed, less than 80 years old on an average; and of whom all have seen service and experienced bodily injuries. Yet it shows greater health than the healthiest tables, in either Price or Milne in Europe. Again, of the revolutionary soldiers on the continental line, who are placed on the pension list, more than 12,000 survive, after the lapse of 44 years since the peace. Thus, instead of the whole having been swept away in 7, or even 14 years, this large number remains after more than six times 7 years. Even of these, aged and decrepid as they are, only about one in 32 dies annually, which is a less mortality than the average British standard half a century ago, of one in 28 of her whole population. Again, the gentleman who last addressed the Senate, (Mr. BELL,) contends that if this country were as healthy as England, and the officers as healthy as common citizens of their age, 500, instead of 230, should now be alive. This is another illustration of the mistakes, attending doubtless on haste and partial examination, and not on any personal prejudice or censurable motives. The officers in A. D. 1783, are, to be sure, supposed to have been, on an average, 30 years of age; and it may be, that if all were in truth no more than 30 years old at that time, between 400 and 500 would or should now survive. Indeed, more than 230 may be alive at this time, though no more have been ascertained. But the gentleman forgets that a considerable number of them were in fact over 30; not a few 40, 50, and 60, and overlooks entirely, that the mortality in 44 years, among those 40 years old and upwards, would be nearly double more than the gain in life as to the numerous officers who were less than 30 years old.

MARCH, 1828.]

Prevention of Desertion.

[SENATE.]

In this great lapse of time, more than nineteen-twentieths of those only 40 years old, and the whole, save one or two of those over 40, would have passed the allotted age of man, and be altogether swept from existence; while only about three-fourths of those exactly 30 years old would have died, and nearly as many of those 21 or 25 years old would have died as those 30 years old. Hence the average ages, though a correct enough guide as to life in valuing half pay, only too unfavorable to these individual petitioners, is manifestly erroneous in ascertaining how many survive, when 44, instead of 34 years, has elapsed, and when not a proportion, but all of those over a certain age, have probably perished.

To return to the comparative healthiness of all our population in this country, where tables or bills of mortality have been kept: the number of deaths is manifestly much fewer than in the same population in England. A paper by Dr. Barton, in the 3d vol. Philo. Trans., 42d page, demonstrates that in Philadelphia the deaths were often only 1 in 45; and in Salem, Mass., 1 in 47; while in this city, I have the data before me, showing, that for the last six years they have averaged not 1 in 49. In the State of New York computations have been made with some degree of accuracy, that the deaths do not average over 1 in 72; and I have known many towns in New Hampshire, where they have been for many years less than 1 in 80.

The vote being taken on the motion of Mr. HAYNE, to fill the blank with $800,000, was decided in the negative.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to fill the blank with $500,000.

This question was also decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. EARLE, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

VOL. IX.—35

MONDAY, March 17.

Prevention of Desertion.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill to prevent desertion in the Army, and for other purposes, was taken up—an amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, as a substitute for the original bill, being under consideration.

Mr. HARRISON explained the objects of the bill. The increase which it would affect in the pay of non-commissioned officers and privates was absolutely necessary, as had been demonstrated by the great number of desertions which had taken place in the army for several years. The additional pay of the soldiers was graduated in such a manner, as to prove an inducement for them to remain in the service; and it was found, by far the greater number of those who deserted, were among the newly enlisted. This additional pay was also to remain in the hands of the Government, until the expiration of the terms for which they enlisted, as a pledge for their good conduct. The bill for which this was a substitute, was thought liable to objection on account of the increase of expenditure which it would require. But no such objection could be found with this, as the additional expenditure would not require a sum equal to that lost yearly by desertions. The average loss by the present habit of desertion was upwards of 62,000 dollars. The increase of pay provided for by this bill is 57,000 dollars. Thus, if the object in view should have been effected, $5,000 would be saved. There were two instances within the knowledge of the committee of individuals who had enlisted five times within 1825 and '6, in order to obtain the bounty money. By the arrangement now proposed, the soldier would have, at the end of his term of enlistment, a considerable sum of money. This was considered a great inducement to honest respectable young men to join the army, and would have a tendency to elevate the condition of the privates. As to the non-commissioned officers, he had, on a former occasion, endeavored to show that they were worse paid in our army, than in any of the armies in the European nations, from whom we borrowed our military system. In the French service there was an intermediate officer between the commissioned and non-commissioned officers, known as an adjutant sub-officer, who did the duty of our first sergeant and who were respectively paid. Indeed, all the non-commissioned officers were far better paid than ours. Comparing the pay of our officers with those in the English service, it was much in favor of the English. Besides, sergeants could be promoted: and in the Peninsular war, that great warrior, Lord Wellington, had two officers in each company, called color-sergeants, who were well paid, and the office was considered so desirable, that it was much sought after. It was true, the present bill proposed no such arrangement; but it was thought that, by increasing the pay, respectable men would be willing to enter the army. The fifth section of the bill proposed a new principle in our army; and the reasons for it, he would briefly state. Several of our subordinate posts were situated at a great distance from the commanding officer. The consequence was, that, often, when a soldier had been guilty of some trivial offence, he was necessarily kept in prison for a long period of time, until a Court Martial could be convened, or he could be sent to a distance to be tried. It was, therefore, thought advisable to allow, on such occasions, the commander of the posts to assemble Courts Martial for the trial of offences committed in the garrison. This was highly recommended by the inspectors of the army, in their examinations last year. There was another novelty in the bill which arose from a similar necessity. Where a sufficient number of commissioned officers were not stationed at a post to constitute a Court Martial, it was proposed to call in a non-commissioned officer to complete the number. He believed this was common in the French service. There could be no danger in adopting the system, and it would obviate many difficulties. Many non-commissioned officers were men of character and intelligence, and when their pay should have been increased, a higher grade of men would be willing to take the office, and the rank would be placed on a better footing. Besides, when they found a principle adopted in monarchical Governments, that would allow the advancement of the non-commissioned officers, they could safely rely upon its having been adopted for the benefit of the service.

The amendment reported by the committee was then agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that, for many years, Congress had gone on increasing the expense of the army, by beginning with the pay of the lower officers, and bringing it up so near to the next higher grade, that it soon became necessary to raise that also. He thought raising the pay of the first sergeants from 10 to 15 dollars was too great a change. He moved to fill the blank with 13 dollars.

The motion of Mr. CHANDLER was agreed to.

A motion of Mr. HAYNE, to strike out the section, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Internal Improvement.

The Senate considered the bill to grant certain relinquished and unappropriated lands to the State of Alabama, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee, Coosa, Cahawba, and Black Warrior Rivers.

Mr. McKINLEY said, that this bill had been presented by him, in anticipation of a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, which had since been received, and in accordance with which the committee had reported some amendments. It was scarcely necessary for him to urge upon the Senate, the importance of the proposed improvements; and he hoped, ere this, to have been able to lay before the Senate, the Report of the Engineer Department, upon the surveys which had been made last year. But the ill health of the person whose duty it was to draw up the Report, had prevented him from performing it. He would merely state, that the population above the large Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee River, had no advantage of the navigation of the river, except during a short period in each year, when the waters were uncommonly high. The plan of improvement was practicable, and promised most beneficial results. The large shoal was ten miles long; and the river, at that point, spread itself from one mile to two miles in width, obstructed by islands and rocks. The shore was a high bluff, and two or three streams emptied into the Tennessee, which would be sufficient feeders for the projected canal. The plan was, to throw a wall along the bluff, thereby forming a navigable canal. The expense for improving this passage must necessarily be great. There were other points of less importance, and which would cost, comparatively, but small sums. A single glance at the map must convince any one of the great importance of this plan to West Tennessee, Missouri, and Alabama. He hoped that the same kind of appropriation of lands would be made, as, during the last session, was made, for canals in Illinois and Indiana. He knew that there had been much controversy upon the powers of Congress to make improvements in the interior; and that the doctrine was held by some, that, although they had the power to improve the seaboard, by widening channels, erecting breakwaters, and clearing out harbors, they could not go into the inland sections of the country and perform the same offices, by improving rivers, making roads and canals, &c. It appeared that the hostilities on this question, arose out of the contest for State Rights. It was a question chiefly raised by the old States. But it was one in which the various sections of the country were not equally interested. It would be observed, that the very condition on which the new States were admitted into the Union was, that they should have no sovereignty over the lands. The lands were owned by the United States: we, of the new States, have no authority over them; and I should suppose that those who are the strictest in their construction of the constitution, would find no difficulty in granting the public domain for purposes like those pointed out in the bill. It was an every-day practice for the United States to prosecute individuals for trespasses on the land owned by the General Government—nor by these proceedings was it pretended that the sovereignty of the States was invaded. There seemed, therefore, no objection to the application of these lands to improving the country in which they lie. In the State of Alabama, the United States now held between twenty-eight and

MARCH, 1828.]

Internal Improvement—Rivers in Alabama.

[SENATE.]

twenty-nine millions of acres, the Indian title to which had not yet been extinguished. On the south side of the River Tennessee, in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, there was an immense tract of public lands, comprising nearly the whole of the county of Jackson. There were also large tracts on the north side of the river, occupied chiefly by the Indians. There could be no doubt that it was for the interest of the United States, that the access to and from those lands should be improved. It would open them to new and increased settlements, and from the extent and importance of the improvement proposed, it would stand among the first works of a national character.

Mr. NOBLE was understood to say that it was not customary to pass bills of this description without having the estimates to go upon. But, as to the constitutional power, he did not know how it was that the constitution read differently in Maine and Alabama. How was it that they had a perfect right to make a military road in Maine, and no shadow of power to make a canal in Alabama? He would ask what clause in the constitution authorized the construction of a military road? There was no such clause. But, then, it was done under the power of regulating the army. It was easy enough to construe the constitution when this road was to be constructed. When Kennebeck, or Kennebunk, or whatever it might be called, was interested, the leaves of the constitution, in which the gentleman from Maine's scruples were to be found, were frozen together by his northern predilections. It has been argued that the benefits of improvement had not been equally bestowed. The gentleman from North Carolina complained that his state had received nothing. But, said Mr. N., we cannot give them any thing if they will not ask it—although I believe there is a bill now before the Senate for an outlet, or an inlet, I do not recollect which, in that State. He was for it. He would vote for assistance wherever it was wanted. He was friendly to the wishes of Alabama; and would as soon vote for the canal they stand in need of as for the military road in Maine. He wished the gentleman from Maine would get up in his place, and enlighten him as to the difference of the constitution in one State and in another. For his own part, he considered the operation uniform. He did not wish to have the constitution always brought in, until it should at last be eaten up with talking, and be considered of little importance from everlasting recurrence to it. He believed that some of those whose consciences were so tender, might be sincere; but his principle was, to extend equal benefits to all parts of the country. He did not wish to be told, whenever appropriations were proposed, that there was no State but Maine in which the constitution operated, and that its particular province was somewhere about Kennebeck or Kennebunk. He wanted to extend the benefit of the constitution to all the different sections of the country. If not, abolish it at once, and get rid of this eternal dispute upon it.

Mr. CONN said, that he should deem it his duty to vote against this bill, as he did for those making appropriations for the Illinois and Indiana canals. The doctrine which he held, had been formerly expressed in this House, against appropriations by the General Government for the purposes of Internal Improvement. They were, he knew, unfashionable doctrines. But these considerations he now discarded; and put his opposition to the bill upon a different ground altogether. He objected to it because it was a direct violation of the compact entered into at the admission of Alabama into the Union. The grant of the Territory to the United States, was not an unconditional grant. What was the object of this bill? It was an unconditional grant to the State of Alabama of a quantity of land, for the peculiar benefit of that State. By the articles of cession between Georgia and the United States, it was agreed that those lands should remain as a common fund for the benefit of the United States, Georgia included; and it was added, in that instrument, that they should "be faithfully disposed of for no other purposes." The question then presented by this bill, was, does it violate the articles of cession? We are about to dispose of this land. How? Are we applying it to the common use of the United States, Georgia included; and for no other purpose? No. I say it is to be disposed for the benefit of Alabama, and for no other part of the country whatever. He knew that it would be said, that it was for the benefit of the United States, because it would increase the price of the public lands, and promote their settlement; and that Georgia would share in these advantages. That this was a fallacious method of reasoning, and similar to that which was always resorted to, when the violation of any compact was contemplated. He wished the gentleman who had introduced this bill to take up the articles of cession, and satisfy himself relative to the compact between Georgia and the General Government.

Mr. RUEGLES spoke in favor of the bill. He considered the improvements proposed by it as interesting to the whole Union, and compared it to fortifications, which might be erected for the defence of some particular city; but also contributed to the protection of the whole country.

Mr. MCKINLEY moved to amend, by inserting a provision for exempting all persons in the service of the United States, and the citizens of all other States in the Union, from tolls, unless authorized by an act of Congress; which was agreed to.

Mr. KING moved to fill two blanks in the bill, so as to enjoin upon the State of Alabama to commence the prosecution of the works within two years, and to complete it within ten years. Agreed to.

The bill having been reported to the Senate, was briefly advocated by Mr. BENTON and opposed by Mr. CONN; when the question being taken on engrossing, it was deciding in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Benton, Bouigny, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Smith of Maryland, Webster, White, Williams—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Macon, Parris, Seymour, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Willey, Woodbury—13.

WEDNESDAY, March 26.

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

The bill for the graduation of the prices of public lands, was taken up.

Mr. McKINLEY said: The great interest felt by the people of Alabama in the fate of this subject, made it his duty to offer, to the consideration of the Senate, his views upon the various provisions of the bill, connected with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. HENDRICKS.)

The bill contains, said Mr. McK. what I conceive to be a wise and salutary change in the mode of selling the public lands; and it is proposed by the amendment to confine the operation of the bill to the Territories of the United States, and to cede in full property to the States the public lands within their limits.

Sir, I am fully apprised of the difficulties I have to encounter on this subject. The strong partiality of the Senate for the present system has been too often manifested to leave a doubt on that point, but the difficulty and embarrassment is greatly increased in advocating the amendment, as I shall endeavor to show that the United States shall have no constitutional right or claim to the lands in the new States. Here I have to encounter the long preconceived opinions of many of the Senators, the influence of an established system, long in practice, and the force of precedent. Under these circumstances, it will not be surprising, if some of the doctrines, which duty requires me to advocate, should be regarded by some as wild, visionary, and untenable. Let that be as it may, they are the result of the most mature and deliberate reflection I have been able to give to a subject of so much political and pecuniary importance. I have long entertained the opinion that the United States cannot hold land in any State of the Union, except for the purposes enumerated in the constitution; and whatever right they had to the soil while the country remained under territorial governments, passed to the States formed over the same territory on their admission into the Union, on an equal footing with the old States.

A slight attention to the history and character of this Government, will satisfy the most sceptical, that the United States did not, as a Government, under the articles of confederation, acquire by conquest from Great Britain, any title to the waste and unappropriated lands (formerly called Crown lands) lying within the chartered limits of any of the parties to that league or compact. Whatever might have been the opinions or wishes of some of the States upon the subject, it is obvious that it was not the opinion of the Congress of that day, that the United States would (in the event of success attending the war in which they were then engaged) be entitled to these lands. If such had been the opinion of Congress, why did they pass the resolution of the 13th of September, 1780, asking that as a favor which they might demand as a right? On the contrary, it was then believed that the States would, in virtue of their sovereignty, succeed to all the rights of the crown over these lands, if they succeeded in the establishing their independence. And this doctrine has been fully sustained by the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases of Fletcher and Peck, and Johnston and McIntosh. As the resolution referred to, and the subsequent proceedings under it, form the basis of right now exercised over the public lands by the United States within the new States, it will be proper to examine the resolution, the cession by Virginia to the United States of her waste and unappropriated lands north-west of the Ohio River, the ordinance of Congress of 1837, and the cession by Georgia to the United States in the year 1802. By this resolution Congress requested the States having waste and unappropriated lands in the Western country, to make liberal cessions to the Union; and promised that the lands so ceded, should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which States should become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States. 1 vol. Laws U. S. p. 476.

Virginia, with that spirit of patriotism and liberality which characterizes all her public acts, granted this request, by conveying to the United States all her waste and unappropriated lands northwest of the Ohio River. But the same patriotism which induced this great sacrifice of interest on the part of Virginia, induced her to secure, as far as practicable, the sovereignty, freedom, and independence of the States thus to be created. And, therefore, in the act of the Virginia Legislature and the deed of cession, the grant is made upon this express condition: "That is to say, upon this condition, that the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into States containing a suitable extent of Territory; not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; and that the States so formed shall be distinct republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States." After the execution of this deed of cession, Congress thought proper, on the 13th of July, 1787, to pass an ordinance for the Government of the territory northwest of the Ohio,

MARCH, 1828.]

Graduation of the Prices of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

in which the terms and conditions expressed in the deed of cession are essentially altered, and the following restricted terms for the admission of these new States into the Union, are enacted: "The legislatures of these districts or new States shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil by the bona fide purchaser. No tax shall be imposed on the land, the property of the United States." "The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said territories as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor." By this article of the ordinance, Congress violated the compact with Virginia. The conditions contained in the act of the legislature and deed of cession, are entirely disregarded; and new, contradictory conditions imposed upon the people of the territory. Sir, Congress had no power to change or alter these conditions, not even with the consent of Virginia; because they were made for the benefit of the people who were to become citizens of these new States. Those who had purchased land from the United States, and settled there under this compact, and for whose Government this ordinance was intended, had a vested right in those conditions; which could not be divested by one or both of the original parties to the compact. Therefore, that portion of the ordinance was wholly void and inoperative, which changed the conditions of admission.

Sir, I have already shown, that all the States of the Union, at the close of the war, became sovereign and independent; and, in virtue of their sovereignty, were entitled to all the waste and unappropriated lands within their limits. I have shown that this was the opinion of the Old Congress: that it is the opinion of the Supreme Court. It follows, then, as a necessary conclusion, that some of the rights of sovereignty to which the old States were entitled, the new States have been deprived of, by extending their restricted conditions of the ordinance of 1787 to their admission.

All the writers on public law, the ablest jurists of ancient and modern times, agree that sovereignty is necessarily and inseparably connected with the territory and right of soil over which it is exercised. So essential is this right, that sovereignty cannot exist without it.—Vattel, 165—112—99. By the conditions on which the new States were admitted into the Union, they have been deprived of the right of disposing of, or in any manner interfering with the disposition of the public land, or any regulations that Congress may choose to make for securing to the purchasers any title it might choose to grant; they have been deprived of taxing the lands belonging to the United States, for any length of time they may choose to withhold it from sale; they have been deprived, forever, of the right of collecting tolls upon their own navigable waters, although they may improve their navigation at their own expense; and of the right of charging tolls for turnpike roads, which they may make between those waters. Under these circumstances, can any one say that the new States have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the old?

Sir, the creation of a sovereign State over this territory with the consent of Congress, was of itself a transfer of the whole title to the land, and right of domain of the United States to the new States. If it would not have had that effect, why annex these restrictions upon their sovereignty to the acts of admission? The very necessity which induced the United States to pass the ordinance of 1787, and the subsequent acts extending its conditions to other States admitted into the Union, proves that, without these restrictions, the new States would have been entitled to all the land within their limits, and all other rights of eminent domain. I have shown that the ordinance of 1787, was a violation of the compact with Virginia. I will now endeavor to show that the ordinance was repealed and superseded by that Constitution of the United States, even if it had been consistent with the compact with Virginia, and valid under the articles of confederation.

Before any of these new States were organized, or admitted into the Union, a new era in the political history of the United States occurred. The articles of confederation were found to be wholly incompetent to effect the national purposes for which they were designed; and it became necessary to new model the General and State Governments. The Constitution of the United States was formed in 1787, and adopted by the requisite number of States in 1788. By this constitution, the States conferred upon the Government of the United States all the national, and as much of the municipal sovereignty, as they deemed necessary for the great purposes of foreign intercourse and national defence. The residue of the municipal sovereignty was, by the 10th article of the amendments to the constitution, reserved to the States, or to the people. The States fearing what might be, and now is, called a liberal construction of the new constitution, might, by the influence of implication, result in a consolidated, instead of a confederated Government, suggested and carried this, among other amendments. By this amendment, it is expressly declared, that "The powers not delegated to the United States, by this constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." This provision plainly fixes the boundaries of national and State power: where one ends the other begins; and when taken in connection with the powers granted to the United States, and those prohibited to the States, furnishes an unerring rule of construction of the whole instrument; which, if adhered to, will forever keep the Federal and State Governments within their proper orbits; and the exercise of power by either, within its legitimate channels. It is impossible to avoid error of construction if the Constitution of the United States be regarded (as it most frequently is, by American statesmen) as furnishing the whole fundamental law governing the action of the Federal Government. The constitutions of the several States forms as much a part of the great code of constitutional law, as the Constitution of the United States. The latter is but an emanation of the former, and depends essentially for the character, extent, and exercise of its powers, upon a correct understanding of the powers reserved to the States. The States intended to grant no power to the United States, that they could exercise, separately, themselves. The creation of this Government was the result of necessity, and not of choice. There was no municipal power that the States could not exercise; and therefore it was not necessary to confer upon the United States any such power, except so far as it became absolutely necessary for the exercise of national power. If this view of the subject be correct, we must agree that the United States have no power to hold land in any of the States, to restrain the States from taxing the land, from controlling the navigable waters and public highways within their jurisdictions, unless such power is expressly granted by the constitution. The only grant of power upon this subject, is to be found in the enumeration of the powers of Congress, in the 8th section of the 1st article, in these words: "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district, (not exceeding ten miles square,) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." So much municipal sovereignty over the soil within the States, and no more, was deemed necessary for national purposes; and thus far, it has been found amply sufficient. The power to purchase land for the erection of "other needful buildings," than those specified, authorizes the purchase of land for navy yards, custom houses, court houses, jails, &c. Here, the whole power of Congress to hold land within a State of the Union, or to make compacts with a State for land, ends; and here, also, terminates the exclusive legislative power of Congress over land within the States; unless these powers can be derived from the power granted to Congress to admit new States into the Union. That is a simple and unconditional grant, in these words: "New States may be admitted by the Congress, into the Union." In the same section, Congress is restrained from erecting a new State within the jurisdiction of any other State, or forming a State by the junction of two or more States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the State concerned, as well as Congress. If the constitution is to be confined in its operation to its plain and obvious meaning; if to infer powers not granted, would be an illegal accretion of power to the United States, and an encroachment upon the reserved rights and municipal sovereignty of the States; then Congress have no right to annex any condition whatever to the admission of the new States into the Union, and such conditions are unconstitutional and void.

Sir, suppose it were within the competency of Congress and the States to enter into compacts, could they enter into such as would abridge the sovereignty of the States, and confer upon the United States the sovereignty thus surrendered? Vattel, in discussing this question, as between nations, says: "A nation ought to preserve itself, it ought to preserve all its members, it cannot abandon them; and it is under an engagement to support them in their rank as members of the nation. It has not a right, then, to traffic with their rank and liberty, on account of any advantage it may expect to derive from such a negotiation. They have joined the society for the purpose of being members of it; they submit to the authority of the State, for the purpose of promoting, in concert, their common welfare and safety, and not of being at its disposal, like a farm, or a herd of cattle."—Page 118. Again, 194, he says: "A treaty pernicious to the State, is null, and not at all obligatory, as no conductor of a nation has the power to enter into engagements to do such things as are capable of destroying the State, for whose safety the Government is entrusted to him. The nation being necessarily obliged to perform every thing required for its preservation and safety, cannot enter into engagements contrary to its indispensable obligations. In the year 1506, the States General of the kingdom of France assembled at Tours, engaged Louis XII. to break the treaty he had concluded with the emperor Maximilian and the archduke Philip, his son, because that treaty was pernicious to the kingdom. They also decided that neither the treaty nor the oath that had accompanied it, could be binding on the king, who had no right to alienate the property of the crown." High and respectable as this authority is, I will call the attention of the Senate to one still higher, the obligations of which operate directly upon our legislative power; it is the constitution itself. By the 10th section of the first article of which, the States are expressly prohibited from entering "into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, whatever. Every compact between sovereign States is a treaty. "A treaty, in Latin, fœdus, is a compact made with a view to the public welfare, by the superior power, either for perpetuity or for a considerable time."—Vattel, 192. "As a State that has put herself under the protection of another, has not, on that account, forfeited her character of sovereignty, she make treaties and contract alliances, unless she has in the treaty of protection expressly renounced that right. But she continues forever after bound by this treaty of protection, so that she cannot enter into any engagements contrary to it."

MARCH, 1828.]

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Sir, a just application of these principles of the law of nations, taken in connection with the prohibition in the States to enter into "any treaty," proves that the States of this Union have no power to enter into any compact with the United States, and much less with Congress, for any purpose whatever, except those enumerated in the constitution. By the law of nations, just referred to, it appears that a State, binding herself by a treaty of protection not to enter into treaties or alliances, is forever precluded from that right. The States of this Union have bound themselves by a much more sacred and obligatory instrument, not to "enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." Surely, then, they have no power to enter into compacts to abridge their sovereignty. If the constitution prohibits the States from making such treaties with the United States, it is equally prohibitory on the United States to enter into such treaties or compacts with the States. If the United States can enter into treaties or compacts with the new States for the acquisition of sovereignty, land, or money, not warranted by the constitution, she may do the same with the old States, and thereby change, amend, or destroy the fundamental law of the land by compacts with the States. These compacts, if valid at all, are the supreme law of the land, and as obligatory on all the people of the United States as the constitution itself. The States cannot, by any act of theirs, release themselves from their operation, they can pass no law violating them, nor can Congress. But, by the concurring consent of both parties, like all other contracts, they may be cancelled. Thus, then, the constitutional law may be changed, by the simple operation of making and cancelling a contract.

Sir, it has been said that these lands ought to belong to the old States, because they all contributed in conquering them from Great Britain, or contributed otherwise to their acquisition; that the acquisition of the crown lands was one of the inducements to the revolution; that they have been pledged for the payment of the public debt; and, therefore, the United States cannot, in justice to themselves, and good faith to their creditors, relinquish them to the new States. It has been shown that the successful issue of the revolution did not confer upon the United States, as a Government, the crown lands in the respective States, but that the States in which they lay, in virtue of their sovereignty, succeeded to all the previous rights of the crown. Such has been the opinions of the old Congress, of the Congress under the present constitution, and of the Supreme Court of the United States. The crown lands had, it is true, some influence in producing the revolution, if we are to credit the Declaration of Independence; but it was an influence wholly adverse to the arguments urged against this measure. The complaint in the Declaration of Independence against the king, on this subject, is in these words; "He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the laws for the naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage emigration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands."

Sir, the opponents of this bill are welcome to the full benefits of these complaints against the king of Great Britain, and their just application to the existing state of things here. These very complaints may now be justly urged by the new States against the United States. Is there not, now, an attempt making to discourage or prevent emigration to the new States, by refusing to pass laws for that purpose? And, if not, by raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands, the same effect is intended to be produced, by refusing to reduce the price to their real value. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report on the state of the finances, at the present session of Congress, has entered into a learned and labored argument, to show that the price of the public lands ought not to be reduced, because it would give too much encouragement to emigration from the old to the new States, and thereby prevent the great manufacturers from obtaining the labor of the poor class of society at a cheap rate. He admits that the population may be more rapidly increased by encouragement to emigration and agricultural pursuits; and he might have admitted, also, that the sum of human happiness, and the preservation of republican principles and our free institutions, would be better and more certainly promoted by the same means. But the amount of his argument is, that it is better to increase capital in the hands of manufacturers, by compelling the poor to labor for them, than to permit the poor to become landholders at a cheap rate, and pursue agriculture; although population would be thereby increased, and the true principles of Government be best preserved.

Sir, is not this a direct attempt on the part of the President of the United States, through his Secretary, to prevent emigration to the new States? Is it not the direct opposition of the Executive department of the Government against the passage of this bill? It has been before the Senate for several preceding sessions; if it passes, its effect will be to encourage the emigration of the poor class of society to the new States, where they may become landholders at a cheap rate, and rear their families in freedom and independence. The policy of the President and Secretary is, to deprive the poor of these great benefits; to force them into the service of the wealthy manufacturer; to prevent, as far as possible, the population of the new States, and diminish their political importance in the scale of the Union. Have not the new States good cause to make the same complaint, on the subject of the public lands, against the United States, that the colonies did against the king of Great Britain? But, sir, this attempt to arrest emigration to the West is vain and useless; the tide of emigration will roll on, in despite of legislation here, or opinions expressed elsewhere. So long as men are free, they will pursue their interest and happiness according to the dictates of their own judgments. So long as the lands are poor and unproductive, and agricultural products at their present depressed prices on this side of the Alleghany, the poor will—nay, they must—seek, on the other, richer and more fertile land, even if they are destined to be tenants there. It is better to be a tenant on rich land than a landlord on poor; it is better to be a free man in the West, than a slave to a manufacturer in the East.

The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BARTON) says the effect of the graduating principle of the bill will produce a rapid depreciation in the price of the public land, and a monopoly in the hands of speculators. The proposition in the bill is to fix the price of the land according to its quality. Is there any thing in this proposition dangerous to the interests of the United States, or unjustly favorable to the purchaser? There are millions of acres of land that have been offered for sale at public auction, and would not sell at the minimum price, that have remained unsold, some for more than twenty years, although it has been subject to entry, by any one choosing to apply for it, at two dollars an acre, until 1821, and since that time at one dollar and twenty-five cents. Is not this sufficient to prove that such land is not worth a dollar and a quarter an acre? If it is not worth a dollar and a quarter, is it wrong, is it doing injustice, to sell it for less? If land that has been in the market for twenty years, had been sold at first at sixty-two and a half cents an acre, it would have produced twenty-five per cent. more to the Treasury than it would now yield at a dollar and a quarter. Calculating the simple interest on the amount at six per cent. it doubles itself every sixteen years. Gentlemen say that these lands are pledged for the payment of the public debt. The debt is more than doubled by the interest, since a great deal of this land has been in the market, and it will be doubled again before it will sell for a dollar and a quarter an acre. Is this a judicious system of finance and economy? Is this the way to pay the public debt? I cannot perceive how selling land for its value will produce a rapid depreciation in its price. But if this effect could be produced by the passage of the bill, it seems to me impossible that the lands could be the subject of profitable speculation. Suppose individuals were to purchase up large quantities of these lands in the expectation of making a profit upon them. If similar lands continued to depreciate in the hands of the Government, would not those in the hands of the speculator depreciate in the same ratio? The longer the speculator held the land, the greater must be his loss, if the Government lands continue to decline under this system. Therefore, there can be no possible danger to the interests of the United States in that quarter.

Sir, the friends of the present land system are the last that ought to say any thing about speculation. Who is the great land speculator in this country? The United States is the greatest that ever was in this or any other country. She obtained from Virginia all her waste and unappropriated lands northwest of the Ohio River, under a solemn pledge to sell them for the common benefit of all the States, and apply the proceeds to the discharge of their war debts. This was expected to be done speedily, and sovereign, free, and independent States, erected over the territory ceded, as soon as there should be sufficient population. All these pledges have been disregarded; the public debt has not been discharged by this fund; the States created there have been deprived of their sovereignty; and now the lands are to be held up for high prices, to the great detriment of these new States. These lands have already produced to the Treasury upwards of twenty-two millions of dollars, and very large bodies of them remain unsold. In violation of the constitution, the United States purchased from Georgia all the country now forming the States of Mississippi and Alabama, which had previously been the subject of the most fraudulent system of legislative speculation. They paid nothing for it, but promised payment to Georgia out of the proceeds of the sales; compromised with the Yazoo company of speculators, promising payment in the same way. They issued stock to the amount of six millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, called Mississippi stock, delivered it in payment, and made this stock receivable in payment for the lands when sold; thus creating an immense artificial fund, not based upon the specie capital of the country, for the purpose of ensuring high prices for the lands, and enriching the treasury at the expense of the citizens. The result was as might have been expected. This Mississippi stock was thrown into the market, and at the sales of these lands was worth just as much as the hard dollars of the planters. The lands sold for unheard of prices: the citizens were many of them ruined by their purchases; their money redeemed this stock, and the United States pocketed a clear profit of upwards of eight millions of dollars by the sale of much less than half the lands, without the advance of a dollar of the purchase money. And not content with wholesale and retail speculation, they laid out towns where nature

MARCH, 1838.]

The late General Brown.

[SENATE.]

never designed towns should be, puffed them by their agents, and actually descended to peddling in the lots.

And now we are told that it is dangerous and immoral to encourage a system of speculation among our citizens. Sir, while the Government gives such examples of successful speculations to its citizens, they will not believe that it is demoralizing to speculate in land, and they will follow this illustrious example. If this system of land jobbing and speculation is pernicious to society, let the Government abandon it, and set an example of moderation, of justice, and fair dealing, by restoring to the new States their violated sovereignty. The territorial Governments, within which the constitution authorizes the legislative action of Congress, affords an ample field for the operation of the land system, without extending it to the States. And there this graduating plan will be found highly beneficial. The gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BAXTON) read, in his place, this morning, a statement showing the beneficial effects of a system like this in the State of Tennessee. There it produced large sums of money to the treasury, and no speculation among the citizens. None of the evils so much deprecated by the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BAXTON) resulted from the operation of this system in Tennessee. We may, therefore, fairly conclude they will not happen to the United States, if we adopt the same system. Another proposition contained in this bill will effect partially what the amendment proposes. After this system of graduating the prices shall have exhausted itself, by disposing of all land worth twenty-five cents and upwards per acre, the residue is to be subject to donations for one year to actual settlers, and whatever may be left after this operation is to be ceded in full property to the States. Should the amendment be rejected, the operation of the bill would, within some reasonable time, give to the States complete jurisdiction over the lands within their limits. Admitting, for sake of argument, that the United States have the right to hold these States as vassals and feudatories, would it be good policy, would it be generous, would it be consistent with our scheme of Government to do it? You deprive them of many of the essential attributes of sovereignty, control the internal police and economy of a Government called free and independent. They are deprived of the right of regulating the settlement and improvement of the country, in that mode which might be best calculated to promote their happiness and prosperity. They are deprived of the revenue derivable from the soil, the most certain and available source of revenue in any country. They are subject to the operation of the laws of the United States upon subjects purely municipal, which do not operate in the old States, and which they have a right to pass for themselves, or not, according to their sovereign will and pleasure. A majority of Congress represent the old States, and are, of course, wholly irresponsible to the citizens of the new, for any laws they may choose to pass on these subjects. They are ignorant of the peculiar wants and wishes of the people they are legislating for; and when those who represent those people bring their petitions and wants before Congress, their statements and representations of the actual condition of things, are often, to their great mortification, received here "with grains of allowance." The President of the United States has the discretionary power of bringing as much or as little of the public land into market, annually, as he chooses. In the exercise of this power, he may give a preference to the settlement and population of one State over another; or he may restrain the settlements entirely, for the purpose of carrying into effect the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not mention these as complaints against the Executive, but against the operation of such principles, because the same result might take place by the exercise of the same power by a majority of Congress, and the people interested be equally without remedy.

Sir, the Legislature of the State I have the honor, in part, to represent, taking into consideration these grievances, addressed to the present Congress a respectful memorial, proposing to purchase all the lands within her limits, that she might thereby acquire full sovereignty within her jurisdiction. This memorial I had the honor of presenting to the Senate, and upon which a committee was raised. A majority of that committee decided against selling the lands to Alabama, preferring the present so much eulogized system. If the United States refuse to give or sell to us what we believe we are constitutionally entitled to, we certainly have good cause of complaint, and will continue to complain until we obtain our rights.

THURSDAY, March 27.

The late General Brown.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, widow of the late Gen. Brown, was taken up.

Mr. HARRISON observed, that, having ascertained, shortly after the death of Gen. Brown, that he had left his family in a most distressed situation, dependent entirely upon connections who were illy able to support them, he had introduced, upon motion of leave, the bill which was then before the Senate. I did it, Mr. President, (said Mr. H.), under the conviction that it neither comported with the honor or the interest of the nation, to suffer the family of a man to whom it was so greatly indebted for its military renown, to retire from the seat of Government, at the moment, too, when the Legislature were in session, without the means of a decent support. I hold in my hand, sir, a statement, drawn up by the administrator of the deceased General, containing a particular account of the situation of his affairs. It is at the service of any Senator who may wish to peruse it. Without entering into particulars, I think it necessary to state, generally, that at the close of the late war, Gen. Brown was possessed of very considerable landed estates in the western part of the State of New York, but that he was considerably indebted in part for the purchase of these lands. He believed that, but for the cruel disease under which he so long lingered, he would have been enabled to extricate himself from his debts, and preserve a competent provision for his family. This opinion is corroborated by that of others who were well acquainted with General Brown's circumstances. Having little hope of being restored to such a state of health as would permit him to devote a portion of his time to his private affairs, Gen. Brown gave up his real estate, to be disposed of for the benefit of his creditors. A part of it still remains in that situation, but entirely insufficient to pay the debts for which it is bound. Another part, including the farm upon which he formerly resided, has been sold, and the latter purchased by his son-in-law, who is still indebted for a large portion of the purchase money. Besides his own debts, General Brown was bound as security for a considerable debt of a brother. The larger portion of this has been discharged by him, but a balance of some thousand dollars is still unpaid. I now offer to the Senate, (said Mr. H.,) and request the Secretary to read, two letters from the physicians who attended General Brown, in his illness, to show the nature of his disease, and the cause to which it is to be attributed. [The letters here read were from Doctor Lovell, Surgeon General of the Army, and Dr. Henderson, of this city. They both concur in the opinion that the disease, of which the General died, was produced by the sudden suspension of another, contracted in the army.] In addition to this testimony, (said Mr. H.,) I am authorized, by a gentleman of the greatest respectability, now in this city, (Governor Cass,) to say, that, in the year 1815, General Brown informed him that he derived the disease under which he was then laboring, from the wounds he received in the battle of Niagara.

SENATE.]

The late General Brown.

[MARCH, 1828.]

It will be seen, sir, (said Mr. H.,) that the Surgeon General asserts, that, if General Brown had lived, and retired from the Army, he would have given him a certificate for a full pension, under the existing laws of the country. There is, however, no law now in existence, under the provisions of which, his family could obtain relief; but I rely with confidence, that it will not be withheld, as the principle upon which it can be supported, strictly accords with those upon which the Government have heretofore acted. I can say with truth, Mr. President, (said Mr. H.,) that I would be one of the last men who would introduce into this country that system of sinecures and pensions which has produced so much misery in another quarter of the globe, and which, more, perhaps, than any other cause, obliges, in the language of our great countryman, Mr. Jefferson, "The European laborer to go supperless to bed, and moisten his bread with the sweat of his brow." There is, however, no danger of this, as long as our free institutions remain; as long as the other branch of the Legislature consists of the real representatives of the people, and this the representatives of the State authorities, themselves fairly and freely chosen by their fellow-citizens. Public opinion will always interpose an effectual check to exorbitant expenditures of the common treasury, or to any which is not strictly compatible with the genius of Republican Government. Our pension laws exhibit nothing which is at variance with these principles; nothing which a free country should blush to own. They contain moderate appropriations, as a requital for distinguished services and sufferings in the cause of liberty and the people.

As yet, sir, public opinion is far in advance of the Legislature upon subjects of this kind. As far as my observation has extended, no appropriation of money, for any object, is viewed with such decided approbation, by the American people, as those of the character contemplated by the present bill. Where was any measure hailed with more joy and satisfaction throughout the whole Union, than that which provided for the ease and comfort of the indigent soldiers of the Revolution? I had the honor, about the same period, to introduce into the other branch of the Legislature, of which I was then a member, a bill to extend the pensions granted to the widows and orphans of those who fell in the late war, to an additional period of five years, and I can say, with truth, that no act of my political life ever received more decided approbation from my constituents.

Mr. CHANDLER said that he was fully aware of the delicacy of the case, and the danger there was in opposing it. He was willing to do justice to Mrs. Brown, but he thought to pass this bill, would be to commence a pension system to which the gentleman from Ohio had said he was unfriendly. How many wounded soldiers were there under Gen. Brown, for whom no provision had been made? This was, he conceived, but a beginning, and he was averse to going into any pension system whatever. If a sum of money were necessary for the relief of this lady, he had rather that it should be paid by the members of Congress themselves; and, although not very able, he would contribute his proportion. This would be his own charity; but he did not think he was authorized to take the money out of the public treasury, and tax the very men, and their children, who had contracted the same disease in the same service. He knew it was not popular to oppose a grant for a female;

MARCH, 1828.]

The late General Brown.

[SENATE.]

but he could not, consistently with his own feelings, vote for such a measure.

Mr. NOBLE said, that he objected to the bill. When he was in the western country, he heard the epithet military chieftain at every corner. When I hear, said Mr. N., the philanthropy and benevolence of the country called into question, where shall I shelter myself from the imputation of illiberality? Or when a military chieftain is in the case, shall every man put his hand on his mouth and go home, allowing the military fever which now rages to consume every thing? Are we in such a case to be treated with facts from the history of Athens? Why, I will ask, what became of Athens? It became a tyranny; and so will this Government turn out, when once the constitution shall have been scorched, as it will be, if this military plan is pursued. General Brown's success did not form a debt. If that was all, the yeomanry of the country had equal claims. Their widows, when deprived of their husbands, felt as much as the wives of officers. He objected to making distinctions. All ought to be treated alike. When people talked of economy, they ought to begin to practice it here; and not go home and talk about it. He was willing to go heart in hand, to put people, when they were disabled in the service, on the pension list, but he could not agree to a measure so partial as this bill proposed.

The question then being on engrossing the bill for a third reading,

Mr. BERRÉN said he was called upon to record his vote on this question, and desired to state, very briefly, the reasons which would influence it. Whatever may be the result of this discussion, (said Mr. B.,) all will agree, that it becomes us to conduct it in a spirit of considerate respect for the sufferings of the afflicted lady, who is the object of the benevolent provisions of this bill. The sorrows of widowhood and of orphanage are sacred. I am persuaded there is no one among those to whom I address myself, especially that there is no one who has permitted himself, for a moment, to consider the really destitute condition of the family of General Brown, whose feelings would not prompt him to alleviate their sufferings. The refusal of any member of this House to give his assent to this bill, will arise, I am sure, from no indisposition to relieve them, but from a distrust of the power to do so, or from a belief of the inexpediency of establishing the principle which it proclaims. It becomes us, then, to examine, as calmly as we may, both the claim which is made upon us, and our own power to afford the relief which is solicited.

A gallant and gifted soldier, who often perilled life in our defence, and wasted health in the exposure incident to protracted warfare, has been recently summoned from among us, leaving his family in a state of utter and hopeless destitution. To the desolation of the heart, which belongs to widowhood and to orphanage, are too surely superadded, in their case, the horrors of instant poverty—the abrupt transition from comfort to want—it may be, the exchange of the greetings of respectful gratulation, for the chilling condolence of the world's cold charity—its protective kindness—its supercilious sympathy. The impulse which prompts to the relief of such sorrows, is innate, instant, irrepressible. We cannot be insensible to it, even in the cold exercise of legislative power. It is nature's own dictate, and it will be obeyed, unless controlled by the imperious obligations of conflicting duty. Do these obligations exist here? Must the warm, but often erring suggestions of the heart, be restrained and silenced by the calmer, colder, but more enlightened dictates of the understanding and the judgment? I am ready to yield—it may be a reluctant, but certainly an unqualified obedience to the latter—and yet I will confess it—it is due to truth to say so—that I would not surrender, without a struggle, the conviction which I feel, that the vote I am disposed to give, although it may spring from the impulses of feeling, is, nevertheless, consecrated by judgment.

Sir, I had, with this distinguished soldier, no intimacy of acquaintance, and of him no particular knowledge beyond that which is common to those with whom I am associated. The story of his life was, indeed, familiar to me, for it illumines the page of our national history; and the glory which he had carved out for himself, with his own good sword, has now become the common property of his countrymen. But there is little need, on this occasion, to invoke the feelings which belong to the intimacy of friendship; on the contrary, I would deal with this matter as coldly as gentlemen please—as a question of power, of justice, of policy.

The moment is not propitious, sir, at least, so far as I am concerned, to the discussion of a question of mere power—I do not propose it—but I would not shrink from it. I can yield to no one, in the sincerity of my disposition, to confine myself within the limits of our Federal charter; to preserve inviolable and untouched, the rights which are beyond its pale. But, if there be a power, which, more emphatically than any other, is given to the General Government, it is the power to provide for the national defence, in the hour of danger. It is given generally, and in detail—fully—freely—absolutely.

If the provisions of this bill be dictated by an enlightened policy, and consistent with a sound discretion, in the exercise of this power, the question of our authority to do what is proposed, is at an end. The position cannot be maintained, that the Department of the Government which is invested with the war-making power, is limited, in the remuneration of military service, to the simple fulfilment of its contract with the soldier. All Governments, in all times, have, from necessity, exceeded this limit. This Government has repeatedly exceeded it. It habitually acts upon a principle, which transcends it. What is the principle of your pension law? Your contract with these soldiers, you say, has been performed. On a recent occasion, you have solemnly decided that it has been fulfilled to the letter. Whence then do you derive your power to make them objects of your bounty? That bounty is extended to the wounded; to the relatives of those who have fallen in battle; of those, also, who have died, in consequence of wounds received, or casualties encountered in your service. What is the pervading principle of these acts? What the motive to their enactment? What but to cherish that military ardor, which leads to deeds of chivalry in the hour of coming danger—to nerve the arm of the soldier when he strikes for his country? Look to the case of Penelope Denny, sent to us, two years since, from the other House, and passed without a dissentient voice in this. You gave to the mother of a gunner, who had died in your defence, a pension for five years. You have provided by law for the widows and children of those who die by accidents or casualties, (I use the words of the law,) occurring in your service. Gen. Brown was as emphatically sacrificed in that service, as if he had fallen in either of those glorious conflicts which gave lustre to his name.

Mr. MACON said the pension law ought to be applied equally to all—to rich and poor. At present, there was a system of favoritism, not unlike to that of Great Britain, which was constantly referred to. Every season, some new cases were added to it. He knew that the feelings were always easily excited in favor of the defenders of our country; and he wished that provision might be made for them all, so as to give them enough to eat and drink, and what was decent to wear. This he thought the right system to equalize the operation of the pension law; and he must, therefore, vote against this bill.

The question was taken on engrossing the bill; and it was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Berrien, Bouigny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hayne, Johnston of Kentucky, Johnson of Lou., Kane, Knight, McLane, Marks, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Md., Thomas, Willey, Woodbury—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, King, Macon, Noble, Parris, Tazewell, Tyler, White, Williams—16.

FRIDAY, March 28.

Kenyon College—Grant of Land.

The bill granting a township of land for the benefit of Kenyon College, in the State of Ohio, having been taken up in Committee of the Whole, Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the bill, by providing for a similar grant for the benefit of Waterville and Bowdoin Colleges, in the State of Maine.

Mr. KANE said, that the bill under consideration had been reported upon the petition of the Trustees of Kenyon College, accompanied by a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, unanimously adopted by that body, enforcing the application. As strong (said Mr. K.) as was the claim of the petitioners, thus respectably recommended to a favorable hearing, there were other inducements to be found, in the circumstances of the origin of this institution, and of its progress to its present interesting attitude, which had operated more powerfully upon his mind. A few years ago, a reverend gentleman, now in this city, in his travels, which had been extensive, through the western country, discovering that the means for education were not commensurate with the wants of the rapidly increasing population of that great region of country, conceived the design of establishing a seminary of learning, in some convenient position, upon a plan as extensively useful, as the cheapness of the means of subsistence could possibly admit of. It was hardly necessary for him to remind the Senate, that in no country could the substantial of life be more cheaply obtained than in the State of Ohio. He believed it practicable, and experience had shown his belief to have been well founded, to reduce the expenses of an education at a regular college within the competency of the great body of the farmers of the country, and of men in ordinary circumstances, of other pursuits in life, to educate their progeny. With views thus benevolent, this pious and learned man (Bishop Chase) proceeded to Europe, and obtained from well-disposed and wealthy individuals there, thirty thousand dollars, to be applied to this object. From his own countrymen, he had obtained an additional sum of twenty-five thousand dollars. With such part of those funds as was not, by the donors, designated for particular professorships, a large tract of land had been purchased, in a central and healthy position in Ohio, and the title thereto had been vested in a corporation, which had perpetual succession. Buildings had been erected to a limited extent. Larger and more commodious edifices had been partly built, and must await the further aid of individuals, or of the Government, for their completion.

Mr. RUGGLES said, as he had presented the petition upon which this bill was reported, it would, perhaps, be expected of him, that he should say something in explanation of its object. The President and Trustees of Kenyon College, have, by their memorial, respectfully asked of Congress to grant them a township of land, to aid their efforts in rearing and building up a seminary of learning, which has been commenced under the most favorable auspices, and is now in a state of great forwardness. The funds which have been already acquired for this object, have been raised by the President alone, (Bishop Chase,) who has spared no pains, and omitted no exertions, within his power, to carry into effect this design. His great devotion to the success of this institution, for several years past, has led him to make great sacrifices of property, comfort, and happiness, to attain his object. He has succeeded beyond the most sanguine anticipations of his friends, and even beyond his own most ardent expectations. The donations already made, in Europe and in this country, amount to fifty-five thousand dollars, all of which are to be exclusively applied to the support of this institution. He now asks Congress to grant one township of the wild and unappropriated lands within the State of Ohio, to further assist him in the prosecution of this praiseworthy and patriotic undertaking. Mr. R. said he hoped the application would not be made in vain—he sincerely believed, that, when the Senate took into consideration the great and unparalleled exertion of this distinguished individual, in the cause of humanity, of morals, and of learning, they would not withhold the small assistance asked for.

MARCH, 1828.]

Kenyon College—Grant of Land.

[SENATE.]

Mr. R. said, the college, for which this donation was asked, is situated in the county of Knox, within a few miles of the centre of the State. A tract of eight thousand acres of land, very rich and fertile, has been purchased by a portion of the funds acquired, and on this tract the buildings of the college have been commenced. Its central position will furnish equal facilities to the inhabitants of every part of the State. This college has been incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Ohio, and the usual privileges have been conferred upon it. From the rapid progress already made in the buildings, its entire completion will be effected in a very short period of time.

There is always an interest created in the public mind to know something of those who devote their lives, and their best days, for the benefit of others, for the service of mankind. Mr. R. said he would make a plain statement to the Senate, of the great and extraordinary exertions of this distinguished individual, to build up this college, and, when it is considered that he has done so much, it cannot be thought inexpedient for Congress to do something. The President of this institution, is at present the Bishop of Ohio. He was, formerly, an Episcopal clergyman, settled as a preacher in the city of Hartford, Connecticut, by one of the most respectable and wealthy congregations in that portion of the Union. Had he been satisfied with a competent support through life, and desirous of living at ease, in pleasant and accomplished society, he would have remained with his congregation. But his mind was of a higher order; he was desirous of becoming more extensively useful to his fellow-citizens, and of enlarging the sphere of his benevolent exertions. In obedience to these high and honorable feelings, he determined upon emigrating to the western country. He left his situation with great regret, and similar feelings were manifested by all his friends and acquaintances at their separation. It is about ten years since he established himself in Ohio. His professional duties required him, for several successive years, to travel into every part of the State, and, almost, to every county within the limits of the State. Here he collected the dispersed and scattered members of his society, and organized them into churches. It was a work of great labor, and required his constant and unremitted exertions. While thus engaged, he became extensively acquainted with the citizens of Ohio, and of the situation and condition of the rising generation. He saw, with deep regret, the great deficiency that existed in the means of education; and having connected his destinies with the people of the West, he resolved to exert all his energies to collect funds and establish a college for the purpose of instructing the youth of the country. It was a task of no ordinary character. It required perseverance and firmness of purpose, which but few possess. He commenced the work and has triumphed.

In the prosecution of his object, the President of this institution, a few years since, visited England, for the purpose of soliciting contributions to enable him to build his college. He had been there but a short time before a great interest was excited in his favor, and many of the most distinguished personages of that country contributed largely. Lord Kenyon, whose name the college bears, took an active and decided part, and a similar feeling and sentiment were created in others. From those generous benefactors of learning and science he received thirty thousand dollars in money, books, and other articles necessary for such an establishment. These funds, so generously contributed beyond the Atlantic, laid the foundation of this institution. Nor have our own citizens in the United States, been less mindful of the great interests of education. More than twenty-five thousand dollars have been subscribed by the people of this country. The generous and the patriotic have everywhere lent their aid, and upwards of fifty-five thousand dollars have already been realized. This money has been applied to the purchase of land, to the erection of the necessary buildings, and placed in productive funds for the support of Professorships. One other fact ought to be mentioned. While the gentleman to whom reference has so often been had, was in England, many persons were desirous of making him some presents—of conferring upon him some distinct favors, all of which he declined receiving, lest an imputation might rest upon him that his object in visiting that country was for his own private benefit, and not that of the institution. He requested that all those presents, intended for himself, might be given to the cause in which he was engaged—they reluctantly yielded to his request, and gave them the direction he required.

Mr. PARRIS said, that, in the reply to suggestions of the gentleman from North Carolina, he would state, that both the colleges in Maine, to which a grant is proposed by the amendment, are chartered institutions; each being under the control of a Board of Trustees, perpetual in its duration, in which are vested all the lands, and other property, belonging, or in any way appertaining, thereto. They are not incorporated as sectarian institutions, no particular religious creed being required, by charter or by law, as a necessary qualification for their Presidents, Professors, or other officers. Gentlemen of different religious sentiments constitute their Boards of Trustees, and students of every religious denomination are indiscriminately admitted. A donation, therefore, granted under such circumstances, would not enure for the benefit of any particular individual or religious sect, or even exclusively for the State, but for all who may hereafter have occasion to resort thither for the benefit of instruction. The intimation of the Senator from Ohio, that the amendment has been offered for the purpose of embarrassing the progress of the bill, is most assuredly erroneous. The Senate could find another, and undoubtedly a sufficient reason for the proposition to amend. The public lands have become a fund, upon which all who are seeking for grants, either for charitable, benevolent, or local purposes, seem anxious to draw. Applications for these lands, for such objects, have been increasing from year to year, until now the proposition to relinquish the whole, for the benefit of the States in which they are situated, has been distinctly submitted, and elaborately advocated. It should be recollected, that the public lands are the common property of the nation, purchased by the joint funds, or conquered by the joint efforts, of all who composed the Confederacy at the time of their acquisition. It is not wonderful, then, that members from other States, which have derived no especial benefits from these lands; for whose institutions or improvements not an acre has ever been applied, should ask for some small, inconsiderable grants, for similar purposes within their own States. This consideration, Mr. P. believed, had influenced his colleague to propose the amendment, and it was with no small degree of surprise, that he perceived the opposition to that amendment arose principally from the friends of the bill. Gentlemen have compared the claims of Ohio with those of Maine; and, because, on the division of Massachusetts, her public lands were equally assigned to the two portions originally constituting that State, have drawn conclusions unfavorable to the proposed amendment. What bearing that argument can have upon the question, is not easily perceived. The public lands of Massachusetts were the common property of her whole population. A portion of that population is formed into a separate community, and being legally and equitably entitled thereto, receive a portion of the public funds, equal to its proportion of population. This new community has also a common interest with all the other States, in the public property of the Union. And can this interest be in any degree affected by the arrangements with Massachusetts? Most certainly not. As well might it be argued that no part of the public revenue should be expended in Maine, or munitions of war be deposited therein for her defence, because a portion of the personal property, including ordnance and military stores which she had heretofore owned in common with another State, has been assigned to her in severalty.

If the Senator from Ohio had turned his attention to another view of this case—if he had taken into consideration other facts which seem to have a bearing upon the question, he might well have come to a different conclusion. It ought not to be forgotten, especially in discussing this amendment, that one thirty-sixth part of all the public lands in the State of Ohio have already been granted for the use of schools therein, in addition to what has been given from time to time, for the endowment of colleges and academies. And what has Maine ever had from the public lands or public Treasury, for literary purposes? Not a dollar. While large grants have been made for various purposes to other States—for opening roads, constructing canals, educating the deaf and dumb, and other objects—the moment any effort is made to let in a State, which has shared nothing from this fund, what are we told, and that, too, by those who have been large participators and are still soliciting more? Stand aside, your claims are still to be deferred as of inferior merit. It is urged, as an argument in favor of this grant, that its effect will be to reduce the expense of education in the West, and that the benefit will accrue to those of that region who cannot now avail themselves of the advantages of a public education, for want of the necessary means. The same reason applies, with equal force, in favor of the proposed amendment, and another institution in Maine founded more particularly for the instruction of those designed for mechanical and agricultural employments, might, with great propriety, have been included. It is no less important in the East, than in the West, that the expense of education should be reduced; and if in the latter, in consequence of a milder climate or more productive soil, the expense of subsistence is less, it certainly takes nothing from the force of the argument in favor of the former.

Mr. TYLER would not have risen but for the reference made by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HARRISON) to William and Mary College, and the distinction attempted to be drawn in favor of Kenyon College, to the prejudice of similar institutions in Virginia. Extensive grants, it was true, had been made to William and Mary, by the King of England, yet it

MARCH, 1828.]

Kenyon College—Grant of Land.

[SENATE.]

rested also on the basis of private donations. But William and Mary was not the only literary institution in that State, which was indebted to private donations. The College of Hampden Sidney, which had been for many years highly prosperous, had been reared entirely from the subscriptions of individuals, never having received as he believed one dollar from the exchequer of the State. The same remark was equally true in regard to Washington College; and, as to the University of Virginia, although it had received considerable endowments at the hands of the Legislature, yet it also had received important aid from the contributions of individuals. If the right existed to make grants of the nature contemplated by the bill, he could not admit that any distinction existed, either in principle or policy, between the case of Kenyon College and those which he had named. If any one State in the Union had stronger claims than any other on the public lands, surely it would not be denied that Virginia was that State. She had surrendered an extensive empire, out of which had been carved important States. Those States might be justly considered to be her daughters, for whose benefit she had surrendered her lands—whilst she had placed herself somewhat in the situation of King Lear. But he did not ask an appropriation of a portion of the public lands to the colleges of Virginia. He did not believe that Congress had any right to make such appropriation either to them or to any other literary institution. On the contrary, he protested against the passage of the bill under consideration, because he believed there was a total absence of such power in Congress.

It might be considered that the proposition before the Senate was of little consequence. He did not think so. Immensely important consequences often flowed from apparently trifling causes. The proposition made by Mr. Madison, when he was a Member of Congress, to cause a survey to be made of a post road from Maine to Georgia; a proposition which, at the time, scarcely attracted the attention of the public; had been made the basis of the system of roads and canals. All the advocates of that system planted themselves upon that precedent with an air of triumph. The sympathies of Congress had been appealed to on behalf of the deaf and dumb, and land had been given. That was already quoted as a precedent justifying the passage of this bill. He thought that, if the present bill passed, the Government might fairly be considered as having acted upon a new doctrine pregnant with consequences the most fatal in their character to the sovereignty of the States. If Congress had the right to endow a college, it had an equal right to establish primary schools of instruction; and a system reared upon this principle would address itself as strongly to the interests of the States, as any other which had been acted upon. Nor were his fears upon this subject wholly imaginary.

The President, in his first message, had thought proper to recommend the establishment of a National University; and, acting upon the principle in extenso, a proposition, he believed, had been made in the House of Representatives shortly thereafter to establish primary schools throughout the Union. Were gentlemen prepared to set a precedent which would be carried to such conclusions? He wanted to know of what value the State Governments could be if this Government took into its hands the supervision of the highways and the education of her children?

Mr. BEXTON objected to clogging the bill with a new provision at that stage, after it had undergone all the ordinary forms, and had been discussed in Committee of the Whole, and was ripe for final decision. He objected, also, to running parallels between the claims of different States, and striking a balance which was to be liquidated by legislative acts. He conceived that every bill ought to depend upon its own merits, and not upon its associations, and that the one in question (for the benefit of the Kenyon College) ought to be left to run its course, free from the companionship of the way passengers which might attempt to join company with it. This bill was for an object, specific, notorious, and recommended by the favorable request of the Legislature of Ohio. A legislative request from a sovereign State ought, at least, to stand for something. The new States, he admitted, appeared, almost too frequently for their own dignity, at the bar of Congress, in the character of petitioners; but this case was not subject to that remark. It was an application in behalf of a literary institution, which had made its way, from small beginnings, to a point of eminent usefulness, and that chiefly by the great exertions of a single individual, the pious and learned prelate, Bishop Chase. The fact that the institution had been able to command so high a testimonial of regard from the Legislature of the State in which it was placed, would be conclusive that it merited the friendly consideration of Congress. The amount of aid asked was not considerable, whether we regarded the ability of the donor, or the meritorious nature of the donation. The United States had more land than she could sell for any terms, even the lowest. The township requested would make no diminution which could be felt or known. The benefit of it would accrue to future as well as to existing generations, to the people of any part of the Union as well as Ohio. Students may go there from any State, and receive the benefits of education on terms of unexampled moderation. If the new States, and Ohio among others, were the owners of all the vacant soil within their limits, it might be proper for them to sustain their institutions upon their own resources; but as the fact was, all the vacant soil belonging to the Federal Government, paying no taxes, bearing no share of the public burthens, there was certainly a moral obligation on this great landlord, an absentee in the worst sense of the word, to contribute to the advancement of their public object, whether for the improvement of the mind or the country, or otherwise. He knew it might be said that the United States had made an appropriation of land for schools; but he considered all such appropriations greatly overbalanced in this case, by the fifteen millions of dollars which Ohio had paid for public lands, by the taxes which she had lost, and by the increased value which the industry and capital of her citizens had cast upon the public lands. Mr. B. concluded with saying, that he need not descant upon the value of education in a free country. He would barely say, that the preservation of our republican institutions must depend as much upon the intelligence as upon the virtue of its citizens.

Mr. McLANE was desirous of so modifying the bill, as to make it more comprehensive, so that, if it were proper to pass it at all, it might embrace other objects than the particular institution provided for. He was unwilling that the bill should proceed in its present shape. It involved a subject of great magnitude, and proposed going further than we had ever gone before. Hitherto we had confined our donations of public lands to institutions for the education of the deaf and dumb. To be sure, these were institutions of a peculiar character, as well as it regarded the mode of instruction, as the unfortunate objects of their care; and on these accounts stood in need of aid, which might not be had from individual resources. On this ground he had hitherto stood, but this bill proposed to travel beyond that, and appropriate the public lands for the founding and endowment of an ordinary college. He did not know that he should be opposed to such appropriations, if the policy could be extended to all the States, and in such a manner as to promote the objects of education in each. He was unwilling to confine the favor to a single institution, in a particular State, without a prospect of extending its advantages to others. The whole subject was one of great importance, and he thought it incumbent on us to weigh it well before we acted definitively in any particular case. He thought we could not make this grant to Ohio, and refuse it to other States. The land was alike the property of the whole Union, though the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HARRISON) seemed to consider it the exclusive property of the new States. It had been acquired by the common funds, and for the common benefit of the whole, and if it were now to be given for the purposes of education, there was no reason why all the parts should not share equally. He saw nothing in this particular institution which entitled it to peculiar favor; he thought, too, when this policy was adopted, that it would be proper to give to such State its proper proportion of the land, to be applied as in its own judgment might be proper to the several institutions within its limits. Mr. McL. would, therefore, move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of making donations of land to each of the States, for the support of colleges within those States.

Mr. BARTON opposed the bill. The State of Ohio, in his opinion, had no special claim to this donation; and that State had already received its full share of land for the purposes of education. He thought, if the lands were to be applied in this way, they ought to be applied equally to all the States in the Union. There were a hundred institutions in the country with equal claims upon Congress.

Mr. HAYNE said that this bill had been considered, by the Senator from Ohio, as making an appeal to the good feelings of the Senate—and another gentleman had gone so far as to say, that, to vote for it, would only be an act of proper courtesy to those at whose instance it had been introduced. Such is the guise, Mr. President, under which a measure is ushered into this House which involves one of the most important principles that could possibly be submitted to our consideration; and which, should it be sanctioned, will establish a precedent that cannot be followed up to its legitimate consequences, without undermining the very foundations of the Federal Government. Sir, in matters of mere courtesy and good feeling, I should be disposed to go as far as any gentleman here; and towards the new States, I have never cherished any sentiments but those of kindness. But, when it is proposed to extend the jurisdiction of this Government to the subject of education, within the limits of the several States—when we are called upon to stretch the constitution, so as to embrace that large class of subjects which appertain to the improvement of the moral and intellectual condition of the people within those States—are we to be told that the decision of a question of such immense magnitude depends entirely upon the courtesy and good feeling of this House? Gentlemen insist that we must confine our inquiries strictly to this bill, which merely proposes to grant a township of land to a college in Ohio. But why do so, sir? Is it because gentlemen are unwilling to have exposed to open view the magnitude of the question involved in it? Is it because they apprehend that the grant of a single township to Ohio will be considered a small matter, while a similar provision for every State in the Union would excite the vigilance, and alarm the fears of those who look with distrust on all extensions of the powers of the Federal Government, and especially over subjects which peculiarly belong to the individual States? But, sir, can any gentleman wink so hard as not to see that this bill does, in truth, involve the question, whether the Federal Government shall take the subject of education into its own hands, and appropriate the national funds to that object? I put it to the candor of the Sen-

MARCH, 1828.]

Kanyon College—Grant of Land.

[SENATE.]

stors of Ohio to say, if this bill should pass, will they—can they—refuse a similar grant to Missouri or Kentucky, or to any of the new States? And when education shall be amply provided for, by grants of the public property in all of the new States, will they refuse similar grants to “the good Old Thirteen?” Can they refuse it to Virginia, who generously and magnanimously surrendered, without price, the very domain out of which this grant is to be made, and who surrendered it, too, on the express condition that it should be applied to the equal benefit of all the States? Grant it to Virginia, and surely it cannot be denied to any other State in the Union. Will either of the Senators from Ohio now rise in his place and tell us, that he will vote against any such proposition? I know they will not. Such a declaration would be the death-warrant of this bill. Then, Mr. President, I am justified in assuming, (what is in truth beyond a question,) that the passage of this bill must, of necessity, eventually lead to the grant of at least 25,000 acres of the public lands to every State in the Union, for the purposes of education. The question is therefore now fairly brought up, whether it is constitutional and expedient for the Government of the United States to take this subject under their care. I am in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) to recommit the bill, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of making a similar grant to every State in the Union, because it looks the subject fairly in the face, and presents the true question, which we are now called upon to decide; and because, if we are to make a grant to any one State, I am clearly in favor of making similar grants to all.

But, sir, I have no hesitation whatever, in entering, at this stage of the business, my protest against the extension of the jurisdiction, and the appropriation of the funds of the Federal Government, to purposes of education within the several States. I know that all measures for the promotion of benevolent objects find an advocate in the bosoms of most men, and that the idea that the national funds should be appropriated to the improvement of the condition of the people, (whether by cutting roads and canals, enlarging the boundaries of science, or cultivating the minds and morals of the community,) is one very apt to be cherished by all those benevolent persons, who, when a good end is to be accomplished, never trouble themselves with an examination into the evils which may grow out of the measures adopted for its accomplishment. To such men, the bare suggestion that the constitution opposes a bar to the prosecution of any just or benevolent scheme, is regarded as a profanation of the sacred character of that instrument. But, sir, we, who, though charged with the duty “of seeing that the Republic sustains no detriment,” find ourselves restrained within the limits of a strictly delegated authority; who perceive, and feel, and are compelled to acknowledge, that the liberties of this country can only be preserved by a strict adherence to the constitution; we, who know that, to extend the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over matters clearly reserved to the States, will finally overthrow this beautiful fabric of Government, which now stands the admiration of the world; we, sir, in the exercise of our high and sacred trust, cannot be influenced by any consideration but the preservation of the liberties entrusted to our care. It is our duty, sir, to exert a vigilant control over every department of this Government, and to resist every temptation to overleap the bounds of our authority. Sir, I am not more firmly convinced of the unparalleled excellence of our institutions, than that they must be of short duration, if this Government shall long continue to exercise jurisdiction over matters which belong to the States. By the very form and structure of our Government, the jurisdiction over all matters of a domestic or local nature is reserved exclusively to the States. To the Federal Government belong those powers which concern the foreign relations of the country—such as the question of peace and war, our commercial relations, and others of a similar character. While this great division is strictly adhered to, and good faith is observed on both sides, harmony will exist—but, when the Federal Government shall undertake, with its patronage, its influence, and its revenue, to invade the States—to interfere with, to regulate, and to control, their domestic concerns—then will begin that mighty struggle, the issue of which will decide whether this shall become a great consolidated Government, (with all power centred here,) or continue a Confederacy of free and independent States. It will be a struggle between liberty and despotism: for, surely, no man can be so infatuated as not to perceive that the destruction of the sovereignty of the States must inevitably lead to despotism here. But, sir, it is not my purpose to enter into the discussion of the constitutional questions involved in this bill. My purpose is merely to rouse the attention of the Senate to the importance of this question—to put them on their guard against suffering what I must consider as an alarming extension of the powers of the Federal Government, to creep into our legislation, in the humble and imposing garb of a charitable donation to a literary institution. Sir, this Government has already gone too far in assuming jurisdiction over subjects which either do not belong to them at all, or which they could only exercise under limitations which have been wholly disregarded. Let us look for a moment at the powers which Congress have already assumed, as well as the extent of that which we are now called upon to exert. The Federal Government has taken under its charge the whole subject of internal improvements within the several States, without restriction or limitation. We are now surveying the country, from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, nay, beyond the Mississippi, to the very frontiers of Mexico, with a view to the establishment of a magnificent system of internal improvement. We have already appropriated millions of dollars, and millions of acres of land, to these objects, and have already actually surveyed the routes of roads and canals, which it would take the whole revenue of the country, for twenty years, to construct, and yet the surveys are not completed. Roads and canals for military and commercial purposes, and for the transportation of the mail, have been laid out in every direction. But these, we are told, are all national. Sir, I should really be glad to know what gentlemen mean by a national road or canal. If those only are national, in which every State has an interest, then, certainly, very few of that description have yet been surveyed; and if all are national in which any portion of the people have any interest, then all are of this character. In the latitude assumed on this subject, it is certain that the power of the Federal Government is limited only by its will, and may be exerted to the extent of the whole resources of the country; and it will, I fear, be found, in its exercise, to be a power not to unite, but "to divide the States, by roads and canals." Having assumed to yourselves unlimited jurisdiction over internal improvements, your next step was to take under your care the subject of charities. Townships of land have been granted to Kentucky, Connecticut, and other States, for the benefit of the deaf and dumb. This has been done, because these unhappy persons were unfortunate. But are not lunatics equally unfortunate? Is there a form of human misery better calculated to excite all the sympathies of our nature, than a family of helpless children, left in a state of orphanage, without the means of support? Are the aged and the sick, and the destitute of every class and condition, to be excluded from your bounty, if misfortune alone is to be the ground of your interference? Sir, it is clear that, on the same principle on which you have undertaken to provide, out of the national funds, for the deaf and dumb, you may take all the charities of the country into your own hands, and build up a system of national poor laws as oppressive as that of Great Britain. But now we are called upon to take another most important step. We are to make a grant to private persons, to enable them to establish a college. It is not a grant to the State of Ohio, but to a corporation, consisting only of a few private individuals. A great deal has been said of the benevolent character and distinguished talents of the right reverend gentleman who is at the head of Kenyon College; and the excellence of the system adopted at that institution has been highly eulogized. Sir, I accede to all that has been said on these points. But, if you make a grant to one college in Ohio, will you not be called upon, and can you refuse, to make it to others? And when you have passed through all the respectable colleges in the United States, must you not take up the common schools, and provide also for them? In short, at what point are you to stop? It is to my mind perfectly clear, that, if you pass this bill, you may, on the same principle, be called upon to provide for all the literary and scientific institutions in the Union. Sir, if the subject-matter is fairly within your jurisdiction, it will be better to adopt a grand system, at once, for the advancement of education in every State of the Union. My objection rests on the ground of your having, under the constitution, nothing at all to do with the subject.

Mr. MACOON said that it was of little consequence whether the bill passed with or without the amendment. Either way, it would demonstrate that, whenever a door was once opened, they never shut it. It began with the deaf and dumb, and it is going on, so that, before long, it will embrace every thing. I don't like to hear members talk about the constitution, said Mr. M. It is useless. I have taken my leave of it some years ago. This donation is for a college established by a meritorious individual. But, if we look to the merits of individuals, where shall we stop? Is this the only establishment in the United States which merits assistance? Yale College has always been highly spoken of, and that has as good a claim as this. I do not know whether this is a State institution, or whether the States manage these establishments in the North and West—but, in the South, the State puts them up and supplies the funds. If you begin with this institution, where will you end? Do you not believe that it will open a door for the entrance, with a petition, of every State in the Union? It will bring the States to Congress, where they never ought to come. These things appear small in the beginning, but they grow in consequence as they go on. As to the desire for education, it is universal; there is not a man in the United States who has as much knowledge as he covets. The argument that education is a blessing, has never been denied. But was it to be managed by Congress? As they went on to increase the powers of the National Legislature, they made it more unwieldy, and increased the friction of the machinery. All the States would ask for assistance, if it was given to one. There was formerly a college in Maryland, and it was burnt down, and all the property was destroyed, but the land; and they had never been able to put it up again; but it remains as it was. Whether this was to be a sectarian college or not, he did not know; but he was against the donation, on all considerations, as setting a bad example.

The motion to recommit was decided in the negative.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and on the 31st of March it was read a third time, passed, and sent to the House of Representatives.

MARCH, 1828.]

French Colonial Trade.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, March 31.

French Colonial Trade.

The bill to regulate intercourse with the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe, was read a second time.

Mr. WOODBURY said it was unnecessary for him, at this time, to offer any thing beyond a brief explanation of the origin and operation of this bill. It will be recollected, said he, that, in 1825, the British Government, by an Order in Council, opened many of their ports in their West India colonies to all the world, on certain specified terms. Those terms it is not important to enumerate, except that the measure was required to be met by other nations, within a particular time, by commercial regulations of a liberal and reciprocal character. The history of the attempt by this Senate to reciprocate the measure, is fresh in the remembrance of all, and the consequences as well as the causes of the failure of that attempt need not now be repeated. But the French Government early seized upon the opportunity offered by the British order, to extend the commerce of her dependencies, and met it by the French ordinance of February, 1826. That ordinance has recently been placed on the tables of all the members of this House; and its provisions, equalizing the duties on tonnage to vessels of all nations that enter Guadeloupe and Martinique, and imposing a very low tariff on many important articles of export from this country to those islands, are now familiar to all.

The present bill is intended to reciprocate, in a friendly spirit, the provisions of the ordinance. Mr. W. said he could conceive of no objection to its passage, unless gentlemen should apprehend that some important cause, during the last two years, has prevented any steps being taken to meet the ordinance, which ought still to prevent any; or that the bill goes further in its indulgences than the ordinance.

As to the first supposed objection, Mr. W. remarked, that he held in his hand a communication from the Department of State, in answer to inquiries by the committee, and which would be read, if any member desired it, assigning certain reasons for the delay. It appeared by this communication that the ordinance was presented to this Government, by the resident French Minister, as early as June, 1826. It is stated that no special demand was then made, as to what should be done in relation to it; that the President doubted his power to meet it by proclamation under our statute of January, 1824, concerning the removal of discriminating duties; that its publication was noticed in some American newspaper, by the State Department, soon after it was received, though, Mr. W. said, it had not been his fortune to see it republished in any of the Northern commercial papers, or in those printed at the seat of Government; and that nothing since had been done, or had publicly transpired, concerning the ordinance, till, on a resolution of the vigilant Senator from Maryland, it was communicated to this body. All know, that, after having been thus communicated, it had been referred to the Committee on Commerce, and they seeing no reason why the ordinance should not be promptly met, by a grant of similar privileges to the commerce of those islands, had reported the present bill.

The committee deemed it necessary to act speedily, as the long delay to reciprocate the measure had given rise to a report which, he trusted, would not be verified, that the privileges, so far as regards American vessels, had been, or were about to be, withdrawn. They deemed the trade also of sufficient importance to this country to require early and sedulous attention from the constituted authorities, in its preservation and improvement.

Mr. SULLIVAN said that the bill under consideration received his approbation in committee, and would receive the support of his vote in the Senate. He considered the ordinance of France as a measure adopted by that Government with a view to its own interest, and without reference to the accommodation of other powers. The decree itself shows this, by the omission in it of such provisions as are found in the acts of our own, and every other Government, which are contemplated to be met by, or to depend on, the acts of another party. It is a temporary act, said Mr. S., revocable at the pleasure of the French Government, and must have been so considered by this Government, to whom it was not then even suggested that a corresponding act on our part was required or expected. The supposition that a knowledge of the existence of this decree had been kept a secret in the Department of State, Mr. S. said, was erroneous. Although he had not heard of this decree himself, until since the commencement of the present session of Congress, and, under an apprehension that its existence might not be generally known, he had forwarded several copies of it to commercial sections of the country, yet he did not do this with any expectation of giving information to those who are usually engaged in trade to those islands, as he could not believe them to have been so long ignorant of it; for these voyages are made every few months, and, if the rates of duties, or privileges of trade, were essentially altered by this decree, no master or owner of a vessel, which had been at those islands since it took effect, could be so regardless of their interest as not to have a full knowledge of it. Mr. S. said that, very soon after hearing of this decree, he found that it had been published in several newspapers; one of which publications he had seen in a Baltimore paper (he believed it was the Commercial and Daily Advertiser) of the 26th of June, 1826, extracted from the Norfolk Beacon of the 24th June, which publication was made over the name of the French Consul, and gave all the particulars of the decree. The date of this publication, Mr. S. believed, was the very day on which it was received by our Government; so that they could have given no more publicity to it than they must have seen had already been done by an officer of the French Government.

Mr. S. said he knew it was the practice of the Government to publish our own laws, or those of a leading character; but he did not know whether it was, or was not, their practice to publish those of foreign Governments; he had, however, understood that such was not their practice; at any rate, it could not have been necessary in this case, seeing that it had already been done by an officer of the Government from which the act had emanated. Mr. S. said the Senator from New Hampshire had misapprehended the amount of duty on rice, in stating it to be 7 per cent. He would find it to be 7 francs per 100 kilogrammes, which is equal to 65½ cents per hundred weight, or about 20 to 25 per cent. on its prime cost; but, whatever may be the rates of duties, they are to be the same on importations in our vessels, as in those of France, which should satisfy us on this point. [Mr. S. here enumerated the kind and amount of the several articles exported to these colonies the last year, giving an aggregate amount of 900,000 dollars.] Mr. S. suggested to the Senate (without offering any amendment) that the proviso of the bill did not authorize the President to annul it, while any one of the privileges granted by the decree existed, or while any one of the articles enumerated in it, were admitted into the French islands.

Mr. WOODBURY remarked that he had inadvertently stated the duty on rice at 7 per cent. At 7 francs the hundred kilogrammes, it would amount to from 18 to 20 per cent.

Mr. BRANCH rejoined, that, with the highest respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. SILLMAN,) he very much questioned whether the Senator himself was satisfied with the reasons assigned for the suppression of this truly important information. For he now considers it to be our duty to pass the bill on your table, and thus place the trade of the two countries on the basis of equality. Had the gentleman been in possession of this information at the last session, would he not have considered it to have been his duty to have advocated the passage of a similar law then? Most assuredly he would; for all must admit that, if it is right and necessary to legislate now, it was equally so then. Why, then, has this ordinance, this new tariff, of duties on the trade with Guadeloupe and Martinique, been withheld from the American Congress? Mr. President, the cause is but too apparent. Believe me, sir, the people of this country are too intelligent to be blinded in this way; a short retrospect will enable them to understand the policy and views of those at the head of our Government, and properly to appreciate their motives. The disclosure was calculated to reflect on themselves, and to throw their own conduct into discredit. Mr. Clay says that the French ordinance was published in some one or two of the newspapers of this country in 1826, which, however, no person that we know of, or the committee, could find, ever saw, or can now find. Admit it, however, to be true, is it a sufficient reason why the President of the United States should not have officially communicated the intelligence to both Houses of Congress? Is this the proper course for the Chief Magistrate to pursue? For an officer, whose constitutional and sworn duty it is to give all proper information, from time to time, to the Congress of the United States? No, sir, this cannot have been the true reason for withholding the facts from Congress. It is a mere subterfuge, disreputable to the American character. They have, by their own showing, said Mr. B., acted in a manner which merits the severe reprehension of the people of this country.

Mr. TAZEWELL would suggest to the Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, (Mr. WOODBURY,) who introduced the bill, of which he entirely approved, whether there was not some hazard that this bill, in its present shape, would repeal the construction which the Executive had given to the law regulating the commercial intercourse between this country and France herself. The Senate had seen, from a communication made by the Secretary of State, that, in the exercise of the discretion vested in the Treasury Department, on the arrival of some French vessels from France, via Martinique, doubts arose whether they were to be regarded as coming from France or from Martinique. There was a wide difference as to the duties to be paid in either case; but the proper officer of the customs had been directed to consider them as coming from France; thus placing them in the most favorable situation. Suppose, said Mr. T., a vessel bound from France to Martinique, with a cargo of claret, sells, on her arrival there, a part of her cargo, and with the balance arrives in the United States, will she, if this bill passes, be regarded any longer as a vessel from France, or from Martinique? Might not the passage of this bill be regarded as confirming the Executive construction, and so subject such vessels to greater duties than are now imposed on our own vessels, under similar circumstances, and thus subject our navigation to greater losses than any benefits to be derived from the bill would produce? Mr. T. thought the bill had better be so amended as to guard against such a possible result.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill, by inserting, in the fifth line, after the word "islands," the words "or of France." The object of this amendment, Mr. S. said, was apparent. He had understood that French vessels coming from France, via Martinique and Guadeloupe, have been admitted into our ports on the terms of the convention; and this being the case, why, said he, leave the matter to construction? Why not word your law so that it may be expressed? If the bill passes, and goes out to the world in its present shape, it will be considered that vessels coming here from the French colonies, originally from France, will be subject to alien duties; and France will then have cause to complain. Why not, said Mr. S., make the matter so plain as to be understood by everybody? France, said he, employs very few colonial vessels: her colonial trade is principally carried on by vessels coming from old France, and touching at their colonies for cargoes, which they bring to our southern ports. The French trade is very important to us; it had quadrupled itself since the convention was entered into. That convention, said Mr. S., was very odious to the French merchants, particularly to those of Bordeaux; for he believed himself warranted in asserting that, since our vessels had been admitted into the ports of France, on the same tonnage duties as French vessels, nine-tenths of the trade was in our hands. Sir, said Mr. S., a new administration has come into power in France; we not know what their views are; but we do know that the views of Villele were of the most liberal kind. He was going on gradually to place the trade of the whole world on terms of the most fair and perfect reciprocity. He did not know, as he had just observed, what might be the policy of the new French Ministry; but the merchants of Bordeaux were using every exertion to abrogate the convention. They say, that, since it was entered into, the Americans monopolize the whole trade.

MARCH, 1828.]

French Colonial Trade.

[SENATE.]

Of all countries, said Mr. S., I wish to conciliate France. She is important to us in a political point of view—important to us in a commercial point of view. Our exchanges with her are highly advantageous, as she takes from us our cotton, tobacco, rice, and other staples, and, in return, we get from her many articles much cheaper than we can get them from England. From the view he had taken of the subject, he could not but hope that this amendment might prevail.

Why, said he, leave that to construction, which we can make express? Why not make our law such, that France may be perfectly satisfied?

Mr. McLANE said, that he was not very decided in his objections to the amendment, but he considered it not altogether consistent with the bill, and rather a departure from practice; and on those grounds he should be gratified if the mover would withdraw it. The bill was not framed with a view to the direct trade; and no provision that they could insert would affect the convention between this country and France. The bill is solely applied to the regulation of the colonial trade. The arrangement which was to be made by this amendment in relation to the direct trade, was, he considered, settled by treaty. Whether vessels coming from France, and touching at the colonies, should be admitted here, was not the question under discussion. The Government has already decided that their construction of the convention is favorable to their admission. On that subject, therefore, nothing could be done, and nothing was needed. It was already settled by treaty. If the French have this right, Congress could not prevent it. If they have not, it ought not to be given to them, and Congress ought not to interfere. Suppose that France were to put a different construction on the convention to-morrow, by which this privilege, granted to them by our Government, should be denied to us in return? We should then be bound by our law. We could not then control any unexpected act of the French Government, because we should have tied up the hands of our Executive by this bill. At present, the construction of the convention by our Government, was, that, if a vessel leaves part of her cargo at the islands, she may come here with the remainder, and her voyage is not considered as broken. But, if she takes in a new cargo, her voyage is broken, and she is not allowed to come here under the terms of the convention. If, however, the amendment were to be adopted, she may do so. Hence, the provisions of this bill, so amended, would interfere with the terms on which the direct trade has been settled between the two countries. He, Mr. McL., thought it would be unwise to do this. We were proceeding gradually in the adjustment of our trade with France, with whom we now have a fair understanding. He thought, therefore, that nothing ought to be done which would confuse or interfere with that perfect arrangement of the intercourse on fair and reciprocal principles. These were briefly the views which induced him to wish that the amendment might not be adopted.

Mr. SILSBEE said that the bill, as reported by the committee, not only fully reciprocated all that was granted by the French decree, but went even a little further. That decree did not permit the importation into Martinique and Guadeloupe, of all our products, but an enumerated list of them, from which flour and some other articles were excluded; whereas the bill now under consideration permits the importation into this country, from those colonies, of any and all their produce which may be permitted to be brought here from thence, in their vessels. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland will authorize the importation from thence, of any of the produce and manufactures of France which may have been previously deposited there, which will be giving to these colonies, and without equivalent, greater privileges than are enjoyed either by France or England, under the existing treaties with them. The produce of these French colonies cannot be imported into this country from France, yet, if this amendment prevails, the produce and manufactures of France may be imported from these colonies; this was, Mr. S. believed, what never had been done by this Government, except under treaty stipulation and for a fair equivalent. Mr. S. said, that he had understood that our trade with France was probably now the subject of negotiation between the two Governments; and, said Mr. S., would it be wise or sound policy to interpose a measure like this, and thereby derange the progress of negotiations? It has just been said that a leading object with France, in her trade with this country, is to get her produce and manufactures into this country, on favorable terms: if this be the case, the proposed amendment would give to the French Government a great advantage in negotiations which may now be pending. It might give to France all that she wanted. And it was certainly bad policy, when we were endeavoring to make an advantageous arrangement, to make such an offer in advance, without knowing whether any equivalent would be received for it. France may say, we have already a right of introducing our produce and manufactures into the United States, through the colonies, and therefore do not wish to negotiate on that subject. The possibility of interrupting an arrangement which could be made so much more satisfactorily by treaty than by legislation, ought to be avoided.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is unnecessary, and is confounding two things, which are entirely distinct in their nature. The bill was carefully prepared by the committee, with a perfect knowledge of the whole subject, and it embraces every thing proper to meet the terms of the French ordinance.

The direct trade between this country and France is regulated by a convention, and it has been settled that the vessels of either may touch at any colonial or foreign port for information, without a deviation from the direct voyage. But, if a French vessel touches at the colonies, and breaks bulk, it is a deviation, because the French colonies are excluded from the operation of the convention; but this trade will fall within the operation of this bill. It is, therefore, unnecessary to connect what properly belongs to the construction of the convention, with the regulations of the colonial trade.

This ordinance is temporary in its character—it is revocable at the will of the sovereign; and we have had no evidence that it was intended to be permanent. There can be no indisposition in this Government to reciprocate the terms of it. But the gentleman from Maryland is entirely mistaken in his views of France, in passing this regulation. Navigation is not the object of France. She knows that she cannot contend with us. It is trade—the exchange of productions, to which she looks. The gentleman says we have nine-tenths of the carrying trade since the operation of the convention; and then says, France had the interest of her navigation in view, in passing the ordinance, which is to equalize the duties. It is true, as the gentleman says—the trade has vastly increased; and it is this increasing trade—not navigation—that induced her to promulgate this ordinance. France, feeling that we have some advantages in navigation, requires of us other commercial advantages, as an equivalent; and now the gentleman urges the passage of this bill, as an object of great importance, to conciliate the shipping interest of France. Sir, France wants our markets. Her object is, to get from us what she wants, in exchange for what she can give us. She knows, that the moment the duties are equalized, our national advantages will give us the carrying. She finds her advantage and her equivalent in the valuable and increasing trade. The shipping interest will not be conciliated by this bill. What can they anticipate from the operation of a principle which the gentleman says they are dissatisfied with, and which, he adds, gives us nine-tenths of the carrying trade?

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, if the gentleman would desist, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HAYNE said he should suppose that the very fact of our being about to pass this law now, furnished a sufficient reason why we should have passed it a year ago, if we had then possessed the information we have now. The gentleman from Louisiana says, that the French Government, in issuing this ordinance, had acted with regard only to its own interests; but, said Mr. H., can there be a doubt that the duties on American produce, carried into the French islands in American vessels, have been reduced in a manner highly favorable to us? Can it be doubted, that such reduction of duties on American tonnage was calculated to benefit the American farmer and ship-owner? And, farther, can there be a doubt, if we do not reciprocate, that we will be holding out an inducement to the French Government to rescind the ordinance? He must say, that it was unfortunate—he would use no harsher term, in this debate, than unfortunate—that this matter had not been laid before Congress by the Executive, and that a bill, meeting the liberal views of the French Government, had not been passed a year ago. He took it to be the true, he might say, the settled policy of this country to reciprocate every act of foreign Governments, which had a tendency to put our commercial intercourse on a more liberal footing. This we had done, in some instances, by treaties, and in others by legislation. He took it for granted that the French Government, in issuing this ordinance, had been influenced by a due regard to their own interests, but it by no means followed that they would adhere to the policy of imposing low duties on our produce, if we persevered in imposing high duties upon theirs. There was no fact in this case to show (as the gentleman from Louisiana had contended) that the French ordinance was merely temporary, or that it was not expected of us to reciprocate it. If it has continued unrepealed to this day, notwithstanding our omission to take the smallest notice of it, we might well regard it as a permanent regulation; but if it had been temporary, the reason would only be strengthened, why we should have reciprocated it without delay.

APRIL, 1828.]

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Mr. TAZEWELL said he should not vote for this bill, but for the proviso which it contained. This would enable the Executive to meet the contingency of the French Government repealing its ordinance. He had information, upon which he entirely relied, that, at this very moment, such a contingency had probably occurred. Should this prove to be the case, it was necessary that our regulations should conform to those established by France in reference to this subject; and the power to produce such a conformity on our part, was given to the Executive by this proviso.

The event, which the intelligence he had referred to, rendered so probable, (a change of the policy of France since the promulgation of this ordinance,) had occasioned him to reflect upon the causes which might have contributed to its production; and amongst these causes he could see none so probable, as the inattention of the United States during so long a period, to meet the overtures made to us by France in this ordinance. The history of the transaction, as he understood it, was this:

In the summer of 1823, Great Britain, not having concluded any satisfactory arrangement with the United States in relation to her colonial trade, passed a law, whereby the ports of her colonies were closed, after a certain day, to any nation who did not reciprocate with her the provisions of that law, and opening them to any nation who should do so. The Executive of the United States, although in possession of this act of Parliament, failed to submit it to Congress, as he ought to have done. In consequence of this, the time limited by the act expired without any reciprocal aid being passed by us. Great Britain then finding herself in a different situation from that which she had before occupied in relation to the United States, gave effect to her own statute, and her West Indian ports were so closed to the vessels of the United States.

France acted with more discretion; and, in February, 1826, adopted this ordinance, by which the British act of Parliament is reciprocated by her. The effect of this ordinance, however, is, to open the ports therein mentioned to the vessels of any nation. The United States, therefore, might have entitled themselves to its benefits as well as any other power. To enable, as well as to induce them to do so, in June, 1826, the Baron de Mareuil, the French Minister at Washington, communicated this ordinance to our Government. The Minister, afterwards, expressed to our Secretary of State a wish, which the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce has read from the despatch containing it, that the liberal provisions of this ordinance should be reciprocated by us.

Mr. MACON said that the publication of the French ordinance at Norfolk and at Baltimore did not give it that credit to which it would have been entitled had it been published here, in papers which have extensive circulation, and which are authorized to publish the laws of the United States; especially had it been said that the information was communicated by the Department of State. It was natural to suppose that the obscurity of the papers in which it was published, rendered the information doubtful.

[The question being then taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, it was determined in the affirmative; and the next day the bill was read the third time, passed, and sent to the House.]

TUESDAY, April 1.

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

The bill to graduate the prices of public lands, was taken up, Mr. HENDRICKS' amendment still pending.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said that nothing but a deep conviction of the importance of the subject now before them, could justify him in occupying the time of the Senate, after the luminous remarks of the Senator who introduced the bill, (Mr. BENTON,) and others who have so ably supported it. The great object of legislation is the happiness of the people; and a measure calculated to give every man a home of his own, and without diminishing the resources of his neighbor, should find an advocate in every patriot and philanthropist. It is a measure, said Mr. J., which is calculated to strengthen the sentiment which unites the citizen to his Government and to his country. The interest which it involves is not merely local. The most needy from every State in the Union will enjoy its benefits; and my own constituents being contiguous to the States and Territories in which these lands lie, have a claim on my efforts to advocate the measure. It is not from a desire to be heard, for it is with great reluctance that I venture to tax your patience, but it is in the discharge of that claim that I presume to give my views; not in detail, but in some general remarks, which I hope may be the less tedious upon a subject so exhausted, and yet so inexhaustible.

If I mistake not, about eight States and Territories have memorialized Congress, by their Legislatures, upon the subject of this graduation in the price of the public lands, and, in addition to those, numerous petitions have been presented from the citizens of several of these States, calling for the same measure. The deep solicitude thus manifested by so respectable a portion of this Confederacy, calls for a rigid investigation of the subject. The interest which this proportion has excited, is prima facie evidence of its correctness. I am aware that it has been imputed to selfishness on the part of the new States and Territories. There is scarcely a measure of the Government, however national in its character, but what is more immediately interesting to one particular section of the country than to another; and the charge of selfishness would lie with equal propriety against that section. If a harbor is fortified, or even a light-house erected, the vicinity of its location is more immediately benefited by it, than places remote from its establishment; yet the measure is national, and no person envies the neighborhood that receives more immediate benefit, nor charges its Representative with selfishness in advocating the measure. Upon the most thorough investigation which I have been able to give of this subject; in viewing its bearings upon the whole country; in regarding its intrinsic merits, and the universal diffusion of its benefits, I am compelled to pronounce it a national measure, divested of the character of selfishness.

This Government, for upwards of forty years, has been the proprietor of extensive domains; and during the same period, these domains have every year occupied much of the time of Congress. For the disposal of these lands, Congress have, at different times, adopted three different systems. The first exposed the lands to sale for one dollar per acre, payable in certificates of stock of the national debt. This system continued for about fifteen years, and was abandoned. It had been resorted to as a convenient method of sinking the national debt, but proved abortive. The next system was that of credit. The minimum price was fixed at two dollars per acre; and, on the payment of one-fourth of the purchase-money, a credit was given upon the residuary of two, three, and four years, without interest, and extended to five years with interest. Under this system debts were incurred by individuals to the Government, which increased from year to year, till they amounted to the enormous sum of twenty millions of dollars. It was then perfectly obvious that the payment of this large amount within five years, was utterly impossible; and an attempt to enforce it would ruin thousands of families of the most meritorious, because the most industrious and enterprising of our citizens, and without benefiting the public. Relief was very properly provided, by permitting each one to retain what he had actually paid for, and relinquish the remainder. The defects of the system having been thus demonstrated, it was abandoned. The present system was then adopted, which reduces the minimum price of the public lands to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and requires the money to be paid in hand. The operation of this system, though more beneficial than either of the others, is still defective. It leaves many families destitute of a home, because, without land on which to raise the means, they are unable to purchase at the present rate, while so many millions of acres lie waste, inviting them to labor, and promising them an ample reward.

The bill before us proposes so to graduate the price, as to reduce it after next November to one dollar per acre; after a lapse of two years from that time, to seventy-five cents: and thus continuing a reduction of twenty-five cents every two years, till it shall sink to twenty-five cents per acre; and then to give to the actual settler the privilege of purchasing a quarter section of one hundred and sixty acres for eight dollars. After this, it proposes to relinquish the remainder to the State in which it shall lie.

About 140,000,000 of acres of public lands have been surveyed and offered at public sale. About 20,000,000 of acres have been purchased, and about the same quantity, has been appropriated to military bounties, benevolent institutions, and purposes of education; leaving 100,000,000 now in the market, equal to about sixty acres to every family in the United States. Some of these lands have been in the market forty years; some twenty, and all for several years. During this lapse of time, every purchaser has made his selection of the most valuable tracts; and what now remain are the cullings of the original domains, the whole of which have been offered at public sale, and from which four-tenths have been taken by choice of the purchasers. The public having thus received the advantage which the fertility of select portions of public lands could afford, and individuals able to purchase, having made their selection, the sales are become sluggish on account of the refuse being held at the same price. The proposition is now to graduate the price of the refuse lands according to their value, and the ability of the less opulent, though not less meritorious citizen, to provide for himself and family a home and a support.

We have a virtuous and industrious population among us, who are willing to cultivate these lands, if they may be permitted to call their labors their own; and if the wealth and resources of the nation in any degree consist in the improvements of the country, only speak the word, and they will raise the nation to opulence unexampled. The forest will bow to the husbandman, and your wilderness will smile like Eden. Their habits urge them to the work, and a waste domain, almost boundless, invites them to its banquet. The laboring poor, in a country like ours, constitute the strength and glory of the nation. We must accommodate our measures to the peculiar genius of our citizens, and not follow the polluted footsteps of despotic Governments. It is not with us as with them, where the poor may be reduced to a dependence upon the lord of the manor, and bow submissively to his pleasure, because he gives him leave to toil. An American may be poor, but he cannot be servile. He may be without property, but you cannot deprive him of his independence. We have too long followed bad example, in a course calculated to break his spirit, if the spirit of an American could be broken. We have seen him immured in prison for his misfortune; but the barbarous practice has only demonstrated the proposition, that an American soul is above degradation. Place him in the most abject circumstances, and he will still be your equal, and make the consciousness of it reciprocal. We have no moneyed aristocracy in our country; and the perpetual revolution of property, where entailments are not tolerated, is a certain pledge that we never shall. The poor of one generation are the rich of the next generation. Families wax and wane as certain as the moon. It then becomes the interest of every person to provide for the comfort of the poor. In so doing, the most opulent are providing for their own posterity; and while we retain affection for our offspring, we shall glory in the idea that poverty cannot degrade. It is a certain guarantee for their independence, under every reverse of fortune. If God, the poor man's friend, has given him a noble mind, and placed him in circumstances under which its independence cannot be broken, the same beneficent Providence has provided us the means of making him happy, by the same act which will at once give strength and riches to the nation. Adopt the measure now proposed, and there is not a man in the Union so poor but that he may cultivate his own land, and plant his family upon his own domain.

APRIL, 1828.]

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

The most inflexible virtue is found among the most penurious of our citizens. When luxury has enervated both the physical and moral powers of the voluptuary; when our cities become the nurseries of corruption, virtue will still find a welcome abode in the hearts of our industrious yeomanry. On them depend the integrity of our Government and the permanency of our institutions. Policy and justice unite in pleading their cause. They constitute a barrier against foreign invaders and domestic usurpers, alike formidable to both. In aristocratic Governments, the nobility must be provided for; and when a commoner is ennobled, an estate is settled upon the title to support its dignity. Here, every American is a nobleman. Every man is born a peer. His nobility is more permanent than wealth. It consists of independence of mind; and, to support his dignity, is only to maintain that independence. Place within his power the means of obtaining a propriety in that land which his own honest hands will cultivate, he asks no greater wealth than what his industry will acquire. His residence will be permanently fixed. His attachment to his country will be strengthened. His temptations to vice will be fewer and weaker. He will feel it more his interest to be a patriotic citizen and a useful man. He will develop the latent resources of the country, and disclose ample stores of treasures before concealed. His family will be happy, and his children will rise to industry and virtue. If we expect to survive our liberties, we may indeed reserve our public domains for the endowment of future dukedoms; but, for myself, I make no calculation for such an event; and, except for such an event, I can scarcely conceive the object of retaining these lands. If we expect future generations to enjoy them, the present generation are willing to improve them for the future. I would now ask, can the Government make a better disposition of them? If we desire an increase of national wealth, this measure will gain it in the highest degree. If we would increase the happiness of the nation, this measure will carry felicity into the families of thousands. If we could strengthen that patriotism which Americans already feel above any other people, this measure will effect the object. While every man, under his own vine and fig-tree, will enjoy the fruit of his labor, you will scarcely find a fugitive in our country. If national strength is an object, experience proves, that, where a propriety in the soil is combined with all the charms of liberty, a people will prove unconquerable.

We have now, west of the Alleghany mountains, a population of about 3,000,000 inhabitants, and their character for every excellence that can grace a free and independent people, may challenge a comparison with any equal population on the face of the whole earth. It is chiefly composed of emigrants from the old States, bringing with them all the virtues of their fathers and their brethren, and remaining uncontaminated by the effeminacy of luxury or the splendors of wealth. In the late war they proved themselves worthy of their ancestors, and of the country which they so gallantly defended; and they are this day, as I trust they will long remain, an example of the blessings of that state in which each man is the proprietor of the spot which he inhabits. Give the facilities which this measure provides, and you will perpetuate these blessings. Nor can I conceive a reason why we should refuse, unless it is that the wilderness may remain a wilderness, and its latent treasure undisclosed.

It may be objected that the measure will induce emigration from the older States. On this point I would ask the father, with his fifty acres converted into a garden for the comfortable support of a numerous family, if he would wish to confine all his children to his own little spot, by depriving them of superior advantages in another State? Would he not rather have a prospect of independence before them? The evils of emigration are ideal. Its evils have never yet appeared; nor have its ideal evils been defined. I would ask any gentleman to point them out; to put his finger on the map and mark the place, either in the old State or in the new, which has been injured by emigration. Man is naturally inclined to cleave to the spot which gave him birth, till he can improve his condition by changing it; and, when emigration will increase his happiness, it is an advantage and not an injury. As the population of the old States multiplies, they who cannot procure a comfortable settlement at home, find it in the new. A population, which would otherwise become penurious and fugitive, are settled in the enjoyment of competency; and thus the tide of emigration becomes as beneficial to the old States as to the emigrants themselves. It also strengthens the interest which each section of the Union feels for the prosperity of the whole. It perpetuates the ties of consanguinity; a pledge of union that will remain secure, when clashing interests and discordant passions might otherwise threaten its dissolution.

In every old State there will be a kind of floating population, depressed by misfortune, without a home, and without employment. Many of these seek a subsistence in the Army and Navy, and many become vagabonds in a land of freedom and plenty. For this crying evil the measure before us provides a happy remedy. If you prefer for your posterity the life of the independent farmer to that of the fugitive and the vagabond, or to that of the private soldier or the sailor, adopt this measure, and you place the fortune of industry within his reach.

It has been objected that a reduction of the price will encourage speculation; that capitalists will monopolize immense domains, to the exclusion of the industrious poor. This objection has been so ably considered, and so conclusively answered by the Senator from Illinois, (Mr. KANE,) that I need not dwell upon it. His arguments must, I think, have carried conviction to every dispassionate mind where doubts were before entertained. The defeat of speculators in the military bounty lands to soldiers of the last war, will admonish capitalists to beware of such speculations. Even if a wealthy speculator should venture to purchase many thousands of acres, he could not hold them up at an advanced price, because purchasers could procure what they wanted of the public, upon terms as favorable as his original purchase; and before he could turn them to any considerable account, the interest of the purchase-money, and the annual taxes, would double their original cost; and when no entailments exist, when no primogeniture rights are recognized by our laws, they would be so subdivided by descent among his heirs, before any considerable appreciation of their value would give him an undue ascendancy, that no possible injury could arise.

The principal objection, and I presume the only weighty objection in the minds of the gentlemen to the measure, is that of its bearing upon the finances of the country. On this point, the estimate set upon our public lands is proven, by actual demonstration, to be entirely fallacious. The statements of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) who has given such a lucid and unanswerable exposition of this subject, are calculated to remove this delusion. What, I would ask, have the sales of those lands done for our public coffers? They were set apart for the payment of the public debt, and their whole net proceeds have not paid one-tenth part of the interest of the national debt, from the commencement of their sales to the present day. The gross amount of receipts into the Treasury, for sales of public lands, within forty years, is about 35,000,000 of dollars, and the expenses of surveys, sales, and contingencies of various kinds, have exceeded 80,000,000 dollars, so that the whole net proceeds are less than five millions, not far exceeding 100,000 dollars a year. If the expenses of the two Houses of Congress should be taken into the account, for the time occupied in legislating upon these lands, the printing of documents and volumes of books upon the subject, with many incidental items, not set down to this head, it is doubtful whether they have yielded one cent of clear revenue to the Government. Where, then, can be the utility or the policy of pursuing the old systems in relation to them, when by a different policy they may be made a source of happiness to thousands, and of immense benefit to the whole nation?

A prominent feature in this bill, which ought, in my humble opinion, to recommend it to universal support, is the provision which is proposed to make in favor of the actual settler. If a person can receive land at a reduction of twenty-five cents per acre, on condition of becoming a permanent settler upon it, he will always purchase of the Government in preference to a speculator, because it will be his interest to do so. If, after all these lands have passed the order of inspection and selection, for a limited number of years, the actual settler can procure a sufficiency for a home, and a support to himself and family, at five cents an acre, as the bill proposes, the advantages will be incalculable. The country will be enriched by the industry of a class whose misfortunes will otherwise render them a burthen rather than a blessing to the country. The refuse lands, which will otherwise lie waste, only to increase the distance betwixt improvements, and so render more inconvenient all useful business, will be rendered fruitful by cultivation. The settlers will escape many temptations to vice and dissipation. They will form a bulwark of defence to the nation. Their patriotism, and the republican simplicity of their manners, will be a protection to our liberties. They and their families will be virtuous and happy. Manufacturing towns and villages will grow up spontaneously among them, equal at least to the wants of their own settlements, and requiring no other protection than what the produce of these refuse lands will be certain to afford.

FRIDAY, April 4.

Payment of Interest to States.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the bill making further provision for the payment of inter-

APRIL, 1828.]

Payment of Interest to States.

[SENATE.]

est on moneys expended during the late war, for the public defence, by the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, was taken up.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to amend the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee, so as to make the payments heretofore made, applicable in the first case to the extinguishment of interest. He gave a history of the claims which the States had preferred, and contended that the law to which this bill is a supplement, was intended to effect the same object which would be attained by adopting this amendment. The United States, by reimbursing the money, had adopted the principle that the debt was properly created, and by the act of Congress directing interest to be paid, had avowed the principle that the States ought not to sustain a loss by providing those means of defence which the safety of their lives and their property required, and which the United States ought to have furnished; but which the total want of means made it impossible for her to furnish. The only just principle which applied to the case, was to indemnify the States from loss by the operation. The erroneous construction put upon the law of Congress by the Third Auditor, had defeated entirely this object. In Maryland, the amount loaned to the United States was borrowed by the State, and before the reimbursement by the United States, the State had paid off that loan by a transfer of United States six per cent. stock. In some of the other States the amount loaned to the United States had been derived from the sales of stock owned by the State, and bearing an interest. In these cases the States lost the interest to the same extent as if they had borrowed the money at the given rate of interest, and had paid that interest regularly. In Pennsylvania, the State had funds in the Treasury, and by advancing it to the United States, was compelled afterwards to borrow, on interest, to raise money to supply the place of it, thus experiencing the same loss in the result. The Auditor, however, felt himself bound by the letter of the act of Congress, and had not allowed interest in any case, except where the States had paid interest on the specific fund, which furnished the means of advancing to the United States, and only so long as payments were made to discharge that interest. In the case of Maryland, for illustration, (and the principle is the same in regard to the other States,) interest ceased to be allowed to her so soon as she disposed of her United States stock, and paid off the loan, although the very act of disposing of that stock caused to her the loss of the dividends on it, equal and rather more than equal, to the interest she claimed. Yet, the money lost being dividends, and not interest paid out of her Treasury, the Auditor did not feel authorized to pay interest beyond that period. The amendment of the committee fully provides for this mischief, and properly enacts, that, where loans or advances have been made, interest shall be paid from the time of the advance to the time of payment.

The amendment of Mr. C. was decided in the affirmative—16 to 11.

Mr. TYLER moved an amendment, that the rate of interest should be the same as that paid by the States for money raised for the benefit of the United States; which was explained by Mr. T., who stated that, when Virginia was called on to raise money to carry on the war, her treasury was empty, and she resorted to loans; at that time the funds could not be obtained lower than 7 or 8 per cent., which was paid. He could not doubt for a moment that the United States would see the justice of paying the rate of interest given by the State for this money, which was expended in no prodigal spirit, but with a patriotic desire of aiding the great cause in which the country was then engaged.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had no objection to the amendment, with a limitation, so as to confine the amount of interest, over the legal rate, to the period during which it was paid. After the exigency was over, the rate of interest would be the legal rate. He, therefore, wished the amendment might be modified, so as to fix the limitation to the time during which the extra interest was paid.

Mr. TYLER agreed to the suggestion, and modified his amendment accordingly.

Mr. CHANDLER thought there ought to be but one rate of interest in all these payments. There never was, he believed, an instance, in which the United States had paid more than legal interest. The moneys paid by the States had been sometimes paid advantageously, as they had applied their depreciated bank notes to the public service.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that legal interest was different in different States. In some it was eight, in others seven, and in others six per cent. The principle on which this bill was founded was that, when the United States applies to the States to advance money, the expense to which those States are subjected, by complying with the requisitions of the General Government, ought to be refunded.

Mr. TYLER's motion to amend was agreed to.

Mr. HAYNE observed that a new principle seemed about to be adopted, and he thought it ought to be applied uniformly to all the States. He should, therefore, move to insert South Carolina after Virginia, so as to extend this provision of interest to that State, as well as to others.

Mr. COBB said that the principle on which the Government had hitherto refused to pay interest on advances of money was this: that, although a balance was due the claimant, yet the time that intervened between the existence of the debt and its being presented for payment, and on which interest would be demanded, was caused by the delay of the claimant, and not from any fault on the part of the Government. But, said Mr. C., it is well to inquire how this money was expended on which these States ask interest. Why, so it is: Virginia took the money to carry on the war. She did not borrow the money to give to the United States. But it was expended by her own officers; and until their accounts were presented at the Department, the Government could not know what amount was due to Virginia. So it was with South Carolina. Until the State officers presented their accounts, and proved their claims, the Government could not adjust them; and, as this delay was no fault of the United States, they did not consider themselves bound to pay interest during this delay of bringing in the accounts. He believed it was the same with Maryland and the other States provided for by the bill. The United States has always been willing to pay the demands as soon as presented with sufficient vouchers. But the Senate was now about to establish a novel principle, which he warned them to avoid, as it would establish the principle of paying interest on all claims that might be presented, and which might have remained unliquidated for a series of years, which he thought was peculiarly dangerous.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to amend the bill by inserting an additional section, providing for the payment of interest on moneys advanced by Rhode Island; on which some conversation occurred between Messrs. BARNARD, KNIGHT, COBB, and CHAMBERS.

Mr. BARNARD rose to say one word to the gentleman from Georgia. The time, as he thought, when interest ought to commence on these loans, was when the sums were disbursed from the State treasuries. It made no difference whether the money was disbursed by the United States officers, or the State officers, whether for the pay of the regular troops or militia, or both. If it was the duty of the General Government to provide these funds, then undoubtedly the General Government was bound to pay the sums with interest from the time they were issued from the hands of the States. The payment of the principal was a tacit acknowledgment that the claim for interest was just and valid. The gentleman from Ohio has said that it is against the principle established by the Government. But, said Mr. B., this case seems an exception. The States applied to the Department for the interest on their advances, and they were refused; but on application to Congress it was allowed.

Mr. COBB said: The conduct of the Government had uniformly been, when a State came forward with a claim, to pay the principal on the account being proved. This was the established course, and would be found to have been practised invariably in the early period of the Government. In the case of Rhode Island, that had been the course. The principal was paid, but no interest. It was so in the case of South Carolina, and so in the case of Virginia; the moment they brought forward proof that these sums were expended for the general defence, they were paid. And now the question is, whether the Government is bound to pay interest on claims not yet proved.

Mr. HAYNE said, that the gentleman from Georgia had taken up the wrong theory; and, of course, the conclusions which he draws from his premises is erroneous. He had presumed that the Government was always ready to discharge the principal. This, however, was not to be presumed; because, if the General Government was ready to pay it, why did they call on the States to raise the money? The States were called on to put their hands into their treasury and disburse this money, because the United States had not the funds required to carry on the war. History recorded the fact that the treasury was exhausted, and could not raise the funds. Mr. H. observed that he had a few days since read a letter to the Senate, of the Secretary of War to General Pickney, in which the declaration was made, that the treasury was exhausted; and that the General must take every means in his power to raise funds. But, supposing the accounts had all been paid at the time those of Rhode Island were adjusted, what, he would ask, would have become of the interest due from the time the advances were made? But the true reason why they were not then settled was, that the Government was not able to meet them. They were able to pay the small sum due to Rhode Island, but not to pay off the whole mass at once. The gentleman from Georgia had said that the States had delayed to send in their accounts. This was not the reason why they were not paid immediately after the war. It was the accumulation of business on the hands of the Department, which it took years to settle. If, then, the States were delayed in the settlement by the General Government, there was no reason why interest should not be paid on their claims during that period of delay. There was one error running through the whole opposition to the bill. It was, that these sums of money were expended by the States for their own immediate defence. But it was not so; for the money advanced by South Carolina went to the north and west, and assisted to defend those frontiers. The advance was made for the benefit of the whole community: and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WILSON) had said, with great truth, that all sacrifices for the general good ought to be paid out of the common fund of the country. Mr. H. said he conceived the principle to be well established, that, wherever individuals or States advanced money for the use of the General Government, it was to be paid with interest from the public treasury. It had universally been done in advances made by individuals. He admitted that it was not done where advances were made by a public officer; because it was considered that there would often be a large amount of the funds of the Government in his hands, which would balance any advances made by him. He had a few days since

APRIL, 1828.]

Duty on Salt.

[SENATE.]

been induced to examine the acts as far back as the year 1770, and found that, in every instance, where individuals advanced money for the use of Government, interest had been paid. He would instance one case, which was a sample of many others. It was that of Christopher Green, of Rhode Island, who, in the year 1770, had advanced a sum of money for the release of certain prisoners. Immediately after the war, the sum paid by him was refunded; and in 1792, a bill to pay interest on the amount passed Congress. The justice of the principle he believed no one would doubt; and the practice had been so universal, that he thought it hardly necessary to go farther in support of the bill.

The amendment offered by Mr. KNIGHT having been modified, on motion of Mr. WOODBURY, so as to include New Hampshire, was agreed to.

Mr. MACON said that the reason why the accounts were not settled earlier, was that the money was not paid to the officers of the United States, but to their own officers, which made it necessary to send agents to the Department to explain their vouchers. Now, because this money was expended by the State officers, a bill paying them interest must be passed; and it must be shingled up by adding all the States one by one. We are growing wiser every day. We are always going back, and finding that all that was done in former times was wrong. All former principles were erroneous. Can a Government get along in this way, continually overturning all that was done before? A decision of a case was never sufficient. Claimants came here, and got all they could; and then they came again, and got the rest. No Government could get along so. We cannot have officers enough to settle the accounts brought against us, if they must be settled over and over again. No Secretary of the Treasury can make his calculations, if we go on in this way; for we cannot come at any near estimate of the money that Congress will vote away, and every year unsettle what was done the year before.

The amendment, as amended, having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate.

The question being on engrossing the bill, it was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Chambers, Hayne, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Knight, Marks, Ridgely, Robbins, Sanford, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Tazewell, Tyler, Webster, White, Woodbury—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bateman, Branch, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Hendricks, King, Macon, Noble, Parris, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Williams—17.

MONDAY, April 7.

Duty on Salt.

Mr. HARRISON moved to take up the bill to reduce the duty on imported salt, which was agreed to.

Mr. VAN BUREN moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. COBB said that the course taken by the Senator from New York appeared to him very extraordinary. This bill was brought forward at an early period of the session, and had been repeatedly postponed on account of the very gentleman from New York. And now, at a late day, when it is brought up, that gentlemen moves its indefinite postponement. It was curious that this was the only bill that proposed to repeal a tax which was paid chiefly by the people of the Southern States. He could not but express his surprise at the course taken by the gentleman, nor did he think the reason given for it at all sufficient. If this bill was to be postponed to give fair weather to the tariff bill, when that bill should come into the Senate, he thought the proposition partial and unjust.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he rose merely to say that he hoped this bill might not be discussed. He believed that every Senator had made up his mind upon the subject. If, however, those opposed to the bill saw fit to express themselves, he hoped the friends of the bill would not follow their example, as the opinions of the friends of the measure were thoroughly fixed.

Mr. HARRISON observed, that he thought it would not be denied that a tax on a necessary of life, as was that to which the bill referred, which took from the poor man as much as from the rich man; which made the same demand upon the tenant of the humble cottage, as upon the possessor of the splendid chateau, was in utter hostility to the principles of our Government. Which of these principles, said Mr. H., is more sacred, which more necessary for the legislator constantly to keep in view, than that which directs that, in the assessment of the public burthens, the demand should be proportioned to the ability to pay? If this principle is not regarded; if the taxes are levied upon the person, and not upon the property of the citizen; or, which is the same thing, upon the necessities of life, of which the poor man consumes as much as the rich one, what becomes of that boasted equality which is the basis of our Government? It is in vain that you secure to your citizens their other rights, that their persons and their property are inviolate, that the elective franchise is unrestricted, and the offices of Government open to all, if this principle is adopted, and acted upon to any extent. If you tax the food of the laboring man, all the liberty that will be left to him, will be that of choosing his master; for, go where he may, he will still be the slave of his employer.

But, Mr. President, said Mr. H., this duty upon salt is opposed to another important principle. It is a tax, and a heavy tax, on agriculture. Upon that interest, which is more important than any other, and on which, indeed, all the others depend. Salt is largely used on every farm, but to the grazier it is essentially necessary. No one can prosecute this branch of agricultural industry, in the Western country at least, with tolerable success, unless he can procure the article at such a reasonable price as to enable him to use it freely. And the condition of his stock will always be in proportion to the quantity used. Its beneficial effects are felt in more than one way. It saves food; for, the animal which is well supplied with this article will fatten upon food of a coarser quality, and which, without it, would scarcely sustain him. It serves instead of shelter. In the cold rains of winter, the Western grazier gives a double portion of salt to his unhoused stock, (and few are supplied with covers;) its cordial and invigorating effects upon the stomach of the animal, enabling it to resist the inclemency of the weather. It saves labor. With a good supply of salt one or two men can keep together a herd of cattle or a flock of sheep, grazing in the wilderness, with more ease than ten can without it. So strong is the force of habit in the brute creation, as well as in their lordly master, that it will bring together the widely scattered flock and herd, precisely at the time and place where they had been accustomed to receive their ration of this necessary condiment.

It may be asked, sir, how a tax of this description could ever have been laid, or submitted to, in a Government like ours? It was commenced, said Mr. H., as soon as the present constitution went into operation, when our finances were in a most desperate condition. Being an indirect tax, the people have felt its weight without exactly understanding it. As soon, however, as the affairs of our treasury were in such a condition as to permit it to be done, the duty was entirely removed. This happened in the year 1807. It was again imposed at the commencement of the late war, but the representatives of the agricultural interest were with great difficulty prevailed upon to adopt it, and only from the understanding that it was to be considered as a war duty, to be taken off as soon as peace was restored. A very distinguished citizen of South Carolina, Mr. Cheves, and who was at that time a leading member of Congress, has authorized me to say that such was the fact. Under various pretences, the duty has continued until this time.

Mr. MACON said, that the Government was not the same now, as when he and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) first came into Congress. He thanked the gentleman from Ohio for bringing this bill forward; and would appeal to the candor of the gentleman from New York, whether the State he (Mr. MACON) represented was in a condition to bear the burthen of this tax. The people did not complain, and probably sent fewer petitions to Congress than any other State; but they felt it severely. There were certain things which ought not to be taxed in any country—things that entered into the plain food of the poor and laboring classes, and which were necessary to sustain life. He had generally found, that, when the Senate did not want to pass a bill, it was argued that it would not be taken up in the other House. But that was no objection on this floor. The Senate was not to decide for the other House. When the bill came before them they should decide for themselves. This duty seemed to him in the light of stock which Congress had got out of the people, and which they were determined to hold on upon. If this bill were to pass in the Senate, and be rejected in the other House, it would make no difference in his opinion. I do not believe that the arguments of Mr. Anderson's book, quoted last year by the gentleman from New Hampshire, can be controverted. Neither do I consider that a more perfect exposition of the odiousness of this tax can be made, than was last year made by that gentleman, (Mr. WOODBURY.) This article goes into every meal we eat. Not a mouthful goes down the poor man's throat which is not seasoned with it. And why should not the duty be reduced? Because those who are engaged in the manufacture would get a less price. But, is even our food to be taxed, because a few individuals own salt springs? He deprecated the principle which was fast gaining ground, of legislating partially in favor of one class of the community, which would have the effect, if not opposed, of establishing an oligarchy among us. What, said Mr. M., must unite the country? A fellow-feeling for all parts of it. If a single citizen's rights were touched, every man ought to feel as if the case were his own. But it could not be held that, if they got a road made for the benefit of one part of the country, and neglected another, there could be a fellow-feeling between them. Sir, said Mr. M., I will appeal to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MACON here addressed himself to Mr. VAN BUREN) if he did not find every thing in ruins in the State I represent, when he passed through it—and whether the tariff has not destroyed us? I am glad the gentleman went there; and I hope he will go again. In the war, North Carolina was very much oppressed by the loss of commerce, and other injuries. And now she is equally burthened with this protective system. The principle of protection had been carried too far. When I was young, this word, protection, had a bad sound to me; and it is quite as bad now. It seems to mean that, where there is any place highly favored by nature, more must be done for it than for any other. This duty has been truly called a "war-tax." Nobody knows better that it is so, Mr. President, than you do. And I told you, on a former occasion, that I would never vote for a bill that had salt in it. Is this Government partial? What would you say of a parent that would feed one-half of his children, and let the other half starve? Salt sells now, in the market towns, higher than it formerly did in the interior of the country. It has been sold for 12½ cents, and the duty is now 20 cents per bushel; and the measure in those days was good—not your 56 lbs. It is a heavy article, and the transportation of it inland makes it cost, in many places, over 50 cents per bushel. The duty of 20 cents was first put on at the commencement of the war. Part of it was afterwards taken off. But it is now 20 cents. Those who voted for it then, said they would vote against it when the war was over. It is said that it is an article which cannot be smuggled—and is that a reason why it should be taxed? Is it good reasoning to say that, because laces and silks can be smuggled, they must not be taxed as high as an article of necessity to the poor? They don't enter into the consumption of the poor man. Sir, said Mr. M., I have always considered this system of high duties as the strife of private interest against the public good. It had been said to the South, a few years ago, "only pass our tariff bill and your cotton will rise." But it has not. I don't know that they promised us a rise on tobacco. But we were told that it would increase the consumption of cotton. How does it turn out? With every kind of protection, instead of our manufacturers underselling the foreigners, the foreigners undersell us. They go away with good prices. He saw, by a Boston paper, not long since, that the prices had not fallen. The promise was, however, that every thing should fall; and it reminds me of the maxim that, "while the grass grows the steed starves." He thought he should die before there would be any fall. Sir, I think, said Mr. M., that we are so frightened about foreign products, that we would be almost willing to starve ourselves, and go naked, rather than eat and wear them. The full intention of this system seems to be, that we are to have nothing but what is made in this country. Sir, if the Southern States had looked as sharp after their own affairs as the North have, where would the great export trade have come from? In nothing ought equality to be more strictly observed, than in taxation. But everybody knows, that if you collect in one part of the country, and expend in another, you do not deal equally. It was an old-fashioned opinion, with him, that the maxim which directed that everybody should be let alone, and do that which they could do best, contained a sound doctrine. Free trade and sailor's rights, was formerly the motto of our system; but now, every point must be settled by law. He had hoped that this bill would pass; but his hopes were now very faint. Whether it did or did not, he should always be of opinion that justice required its passage.

APRIL, 1828.]

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

The bill was laid on the table.

WEDNESDAY, April 9.

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

The bill to graduate the price of public lands was then taken up, the substitute offered by Mr. BARTON being under consideration.

Mr. BENTON stated the objects of his bill to be, first, to benefit the public treasury, by accelerating the sales of the public lands; and, next, to benefit the new States by procuring for them, within some reasonable time, the use of all the soil within their limits, for the purposes of settlement, taxation, and general jurisdiction. The sales, he said, were too slow at present to answer these purposes. They scarcely advanced at all, and certainly made no sensible impression on the mass of the public lands. The Federal Government held 260 millions of acres in the States and Territories, to which the Indian title had been extinguished; about 50 millions more to which it had not been extinguished; about 90 millions on the Upper Mississippi, between the State of Illinois and Lake Superior, and about 700 millions west of the Mississippi, and east of the Rocky Mountains; making 1,100 millions of acres of undisputed public domain, exclusive of our territorial claims and possessions in the valley of the Columbia River and on the coast of the Pacific Ocean. Of this immense mass, not more than 20 millions of acres have been sold by the Federal Government in a period of 40 years; and only 82 millions of purchase money paid into the Treasury; from which is to be deducted $2,165,000 for the expense of surveying; $1,155,000 for the expenses of selling; $35,000 per annum for the expenses of the General Land Office; $3,392,000 for the expense of holding Indian treaties for the extinction of Indian titles; and annuities, chiefly permanent, amounting at present to about $240,000 per annum. The gain to the Treasury would be but little from such sales; and as to the new States and Territories, a simple question in the Rule of Three would show that it would take 520 years to extinguish the Federal title within their limits, at the rate the sales had been going on for the forty years past, and about 2,000 years more to complete the sales to the head of the Mississippi, and to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. Having stated these results, Mr. B. suggested to the Senate that 520 years was rather too long a period for the new States to remain without the privilege of taxing and cultivating the lands within their limits; rather too long for the public debt to remain unpaid, and for the people of the old States to continue to raise money from other sources to pay its annual interest.

Mr. B. then took up the bill, and stated the nature of its several provisions. He said that it consisted of four distinct clauses, comprised in five sections; and that each clause presented a separate question for the consideration and decision of the Senate. The first clause applied the graduation principle to the lands which had been heretofore offered at public sale, and remained unsold at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre; the second clause applied the same principle to the lands hereafter to come into market; the third clause proposed donations of small tracts to actual settlers; and the fourth made provision for the cession of the refuse lands to the States in which they lie, for the promotion of the great cause of education and internal improvement.

Having stated the nature of the different clauses in his bill, Mr. B. went on to examine these clauses in the order in which they stood, and to show their practical effect upon the public lands and the public Treasury. For this purpose he took up the first clause, which applied the graduation principle to the lands now in market, and said that the proper decision of it required a knowledge, first, of the quantity, and, secondly, of the quality, of the lands, to which it would apply. As the author of the bill, he felt it to be his duty to give to the Senate full and correct information upon those points, and he should do so with all the brevity and precision which the magnitude of the subject would admit of. He had been collecting this information for many years, and without pretending to the minute accuracy of a clerk stating an account, he would confine himself to round numbers, and assure the Senate that his statements would be found to be sufficiently correct and particular for all the practical purposes of the statesman and the legislator.

On the first point he would say, that the number of acres on which the first clause of the bill would operate, was about 80 millions, and he verified this statement by showing from printed documents, and manuscript memorandums, taken from the General Land Office, that the quantity of public land surveyed, was 140 millions of acres; the quantity sold was 20 millions; the quantity given away, reserved from sale, or not brought into market, was 40 millions; leaving the aforesaid quantity of 80 millions of acres for the application of the first clause of his bill. So much for the quantity. On the second point, Mr. B. would say, that he had a great deal of personal knowledge of the quality of these lands. They lay in seven States and three Territories; and of each of these, except one territory, that of Michigan, he had a personal knowledge from travelling and visits; and although the soil of the whole of them might be characterized as rich, yet, as the fattest animal must have bones and offal, and inferior parts, so the richest country must have its rocks and hills, and sterile spots. This was essentially true of the States and Territories, which contained the public lands; and of the relative proportions of good and bad, those to the South possessed much the largest alloy of bad. In every State and Territory these lands had been picked; in the forks of the Ohio and Mississippi, chiefly under the laws of the United States; and in the others, for a long time, under the bountiful dispensations of foreign sovereigns, before they became subject to the more rigorous system of the Federal Government. The eighty millions unsold was the residuum of the repeated pickings and cullings, by sales and donations, for periods of ten, fifty, and a hundred years, under four different sovereignties, and might be assumed to be at least one-half unfit for cultivation, and worth nothing at all, and the other half alloyed in all assignable proportions with mixture of bad land, and hardly worth an average of forty or fifty cents per acre.

But the bill meets with several objections; at the head of which stands one of a novel and extraordinary character, not connected with the merits of the question, but growing out of supposed injuries which it is to inflict upon the old States. It is said that the bill will have the effect of drawing off the population of these States, diminishing the weight of their political influence, sinking the value of their lands, and retarding the progress of their manufactures.

These are strange objections, Mr. President, to be urged in a country blessed with a constitution founded on the rights of man. They would come well from feudal lords in the old baronial times of Great Britain, or from the masters of the serfs and vassals of Russia and Poland to the present day; but they grate harshly upon my ear—they harmonize badly with the feelings of my bosom—coming from American statesmen, and intended to restrain the free inhabitants of the old States from bettering their condition by removing to the West. Admitting all the evils apprehended, and it would still be an invalid objection; for the people have a right under our constitution to go where they please; even to expatriate themselves, and go into foreign countries in pursuit of wealth or happiness. It is their own privilege to go or stay, and no rightful power resides in this Government to restrain them. But the evils will be much less than seem to be apprehended, even in the parts of the Union from which the objections chiefly come. Emigration has never depopulated a good country. The chasm made by one person moving away is always filled in such a country by another coming in, and usually a richer one. Political influence is not diminished, but increased, by such emigrations. Of this the two halls of Congress furnish abundant proof. Lands in the old States will certainly not produce less in consequence of such removals. The prolific principle of the soil will still be the same; and if it sells for less, it is also bought for less. The thing balances itself. The buyer gains what the seller loses; and as the seller is to be the emigrant, the advantage remains with the one that remains in the country. In many places, the price of land is as low now in the old States as my bill proposes to make it in the new ones. My friends tell me that land fit for cultivation, and with some improvement upon it, and convenient to all the advantages of established institutions, can be had now in

April, 1828.]

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

North Carolina for one dollar per acre. In Virginia, I see from the assessment of 1817, when the price of real estate there, as elsewhere, was double what it is now, that a large county, bearing the name of one of her Senators, here present, (Tyler,) and containing as many acres as the Federal Government has ever sold in Missouri, was assessed at 68 cents per acre, improvements and all; that another county, of about the same size, bearing the name of another of her Senators present, (Tazewell,) was assessed at 33 cents per acre; and three others at the respective prices of 24, 23, and 18 cents per acre. Gentlemen will say these are inferior lands. I answer, that the prices in my bill also apply to inferior land, and that so far as price is concerned, there will be no inducement for emigration from old States to new ones. To the south of the Potomac, and in all the slave-holding States, emigration is more beneficial than otherwise. The poor are not needed there. Slaves perform all the menial services, and do the principal part of the labor. In the non slave-holding States, and especially in the manufacturing districts, it is somewhat different. There the poor are wanted for tenants, for day laborers, for domestic servants, and to work in the manufactories. To such States it might be some disadvantage to lose their poor; but it is a loss which they have no moral or lawful right to prevent, by passing laws to restrain their removal. But, Mr. President, I will drop these objections. I do not think it would be justifiable in Senators from old States to vote upon such considerations; and of course it is not becoming in me to presume that an argument is necessary to prevent them from doing so.

I will proceed to the next objection, which is also of a novel and extraordinary character, and seems to have its origin in a benevolent inclination to save the people of the new States from the consequences of their own folly. It goes upon the supposition that the price of all the land held by individuals, will be sunk to the scale of prices fixed in the bill, and that these landholders will be injured in their property to that degree. This is the ostensible nature of the objection; but it may be that it has a different object; that its real design is not charitable, but insidious; and that it is intended to excite these landholders against the bill. In the first point of view, it is, to say the least of it, a very unexpected ebullition of superserviceable benevolence, which the individuals referred to will resist and repudiate. They have no need, and it is no compliment to their understandings to suppose that they have any need for such intrusive guardianship. They know that their lands will produce as good crops after as before the passage of the bill. Many of them will want to purchase lands at the graduated prices. All will know that individuals are now selling second and third rate land for the same prices mentioned in the bill, and every one is conscious that population gives value to land, and that their own will rise in value in proportion to the settlement and improvement of the country.

The third objection that I shall notice is the one so incontinently repeated, that no one will buy until the lands fall to the lowest price. This, Mr. President, is the same objection which was made to the graduation principle in Tennessee, and which, for several years, retarded the establishment of the system there. When it was established, the objection was discovered to have no foundation. This we learn from the letter of Mr. Mitchell, of the House of Representatives, the author of the system in Tennessee, and the statement of Mr. Smith, the entry taker in one of the districts. These papers have been printed by order of the Senate, laid upon our tables, and are presumed to be read by every member. I will not, therefore, consume the time of the Senate in reading them over, amply as their contents would repay that trouble; but I must take leave to present a second time, the table of sales actually made in the Hiwassee district, a district of only forty miles square, and which proves the utter fallacy and total inapplicability of the objection. The following is the table:

Amount of land entered in the Entry Office of the Hiwassee District, Tennessee, and amount of cash received from the 2d February, 1824, to the 2d February, 1828.

Price per acre.	No. of acres.	Cash received.
$ 1 50	100,000	$150,000
1 00	53,000	53,000
0 50	90,000	45,000
0 25	80,000	20,000
0 12½	56,000	7,000
0 01	132,000	1,200

$276,200

Such is the triumphant answer which actual experiment gives to this objection. It was the experiment of one district; but the result was the same in others, for the law was co-extensive in its application with the existence of the State lands. But even without this experimental answer, the objection would have vanished before an argument. Instead of waiting for the lowest price, many would be tempted to give more than the land was worth, either to save a quarter section which was necessary to complete the size and form of their estate, or to supply it with wood, or a stream of water, or a stone quarry, or a sugar orchard, or to keep off a bad neighbor, or to form a settlement for a child, or to keep open an outlet for stock. Such was the natural progress and order of things. He that wanted a piece of land that suited him would cheerfully embrace the first opportunity of taking it up for its real value, lest another should forestall him in the purchase, and make him afterwards pay more than the value. To suppose otherwise, and to assert, as this objection implies, that the people of the new States and Territories would wait with each other for four years, until the price of all land fell to 25 cents per acre, is to suppose the existence of a universal combination, as impossible in practice as it would be dishonorable in conception. And, after all, it could end in no advantage; for when the lands had fallen to twenty-five cents, the actual settlers would have the preference, and the purchasers would have to stand off until they were satisfied, and then the contest would begin among them; for if two or more applied at the same time, for the same tract, they would have to bid for it, and the price might be run up higher than ever.

The fourth objection to my bill is found in the apprehension of speculators. It is the same old objection, Mr. President, which had its effect for a while in Tennessee, as we learn from Messrs. Smith and Mitchell, and which was completely falsified by the event there, and is ready to be overthrown by argument here. Sir, there can be no such thing as speculation in wild land, in the present state of America. A speculator buys to sell again. His plan is to buy low, and sell high; but in the present condition of America, although he may buy low enough, yet he will soon be forced to sell still lower. What chance is there for wild land to rise? The United States own eleven hundred millions of acres, for which she cannot find purchasers. Mexico and Canada have more than they can give away. The old States and the new States are full of improved land, offered for sale on the most reduced terms. You see ten sellers for one purchaser. The old speculators of 1817-'18, that is to say, the few that have escaped ruin, cannot sell their lands, and are, in fact, the real authors of this objection. The body of the people do not make it. They laugh at it. They know that the laws of entail and primogeniture are abolished, and that the greatest landholder of the present day is only the trustee for other people's children; that his posterity, and the posterity of his present tenants, will exchange positions in two or three generations, perhaps in one generation; and, as for present purchases, they know that they can rise as early, ride as fast, get to the office as soon, and show as good money as any speculator. If it comes to bidding, they can bid as high. If it comes to drawing lots, they stand as good a chance as any man for the long straw. In a word, sir, the people are not afraid of speculators. They know there is no such thing. The objection has been tried upon them, and they laugh at it.

The fifth objection supposes that the Federal Government will not get the value of its lands under my bill. I demand, sir, if it gets the value under the present system? And I answer no! I assert that it gets nothing under the present system; that the thirty-two millions of dollars received in forty-two years, for twenty millions of acres, has been sunk, and double sunk, and five times over sunk, in the payment of interest on the public debt while this sum was collecting, and in the expenses of the system. I say that it will get quickly under my bill, what it gets at all; that an average of fifty cents per acre, received in four or five years, for the refuse lands, will be worth more to the Treasury than $1 25, received for the same lands, would be worth thirty or forty years hence. But I dismiss this calculation as one of inferior and subordinate consideration. I look to the cultivation of the lands, more than to their sales. It is the cultivation of the soil which enriches the country; and in this point of view, the country is always a gainer when any portion of the public lands is passed from the Federal Government, which cannot cultivate them, into the hands of private owners who can. As a proof of this, look to the duties which have been received on imports, which imports are founded on the exports which are the products of the soil. You will see them amounting, in thirty-seven years, the period that the present constitution has been in force, to $575,000,000. Yes, sir, to five hundred and seventy five millions of dollars! And this source of revenue, instead of being exhausted by one year's cultivation like the revenue from the sale of the lands, which can only be received once, is perennial and eternal, renewing itself incessantly, and augmenting, from year to year, with the increase of wealth and of population. Surely it is our policy to increase this bountiful source of revenue, and for that purpose to give a quarter section of land to every inhabitant that will cultivate it.

I cannot dismiss the objections which have been made to the graduation clause of my bill, Mr. President, without noticing one which I heard in Missouri, but which has not been enforced by any speaker on this floor. It was the objection of a tanner who supplied his rats with bark from the public lands, and who, after running over all the worn out objections about speculators, etc., admitted that his true objection was altogether of a different nature: that if the bill passed all the land would be bought up, and he would get no more "public bark" to tan with.

I now proceed, sir, to the donation clause, and admit at once that its primary intention is to better the condition of the poor. I know it to be written in that book which is the epitome of all knowledge, "that the rich ruleth the poor, and the borrower is the servant of the lender." I know, too, that it is said by my venerable and venerated friend from North Carolina, (Mr. Macon,) that Governments are not made for the poor, but against them; that the rich get the benefits and the poor get the burthens of Government; and I know that this severe remark has much foundation in the history of mankind, yet it has not always been so. There have been exceptions, and especially in that great republic, whose name, after the lapse of two thousand years, still shines as a leading star in the firmament of nations. It was not so among the ancient Romans. With that heroic people, although the Government was

APRIL, 1828.]

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

chiefly in the hands of the Patricians, yet the poor had an interest in their country, and that interest was founded in their share of the public lands. When a conquest was made, half the lands were immediately set aside for gratuitous distribution among the poor; the other half was put up to sale for the benefit of the public treasury. Besides this fundamental law, we read in the history of that great people, of occasional donations of land to 20,000 poor families at a time. Many laws were made for the protection of their lands—as the Licinian law, which secured their possessions for several hundred years, and for the enforcement of which the Gracchi lost their lives. It was this interest in the soil of their country, which made the love of that country so strong a passion in the breast of the Roman citizen. It was this which made every Roman glory in the name, and hold himself forever ready to fight and die for his country. And cannot the same cause produce the same effect with us? Congress is charged with providing for “the common defence” of the nation, and she expends millions upon the fortifications of the seacoast, and upon the equipment of ships for the sea. And may she not give land for the defence of the western frontier? Great Britain is now filling Upper Canada with freeholders, at a great expense to the crown. One hundred and fifty acres of choice land to each emigrant—expenses of removal—provisions for one year—seed-grains for the first crop—farming tools, and household utensils, a cow, at the cost of £4 10s. sterling: such are the inducements which England holds out for the settlement of Upper Canada. And why? For the obvious purpose of strengthening herself against us in that quarter: and shall we not strengthen ourselves against her in the opposite quarter? And by the same means? The defence furnished by patriotism and valor, has been called “the cheap defence of nations,” and so in fact it is. A brave people, devoted to their country, is its cheapest, as well as its surest, defence. Of this defence, it is in the power of this Government to avail itself to any degree. It may have as many warriors as it pleases on its frontier. It has hundreds of millions of acres of vacant land in the frontier States and territories, and some hundred thousand citizens without freeholds. Let it give them land; let it give them an interest in their country; a home for their wives and their little ones; and they will never be found without a horse and a rifle; without a willing mind, a courageous heart, and a strong arm, when that country demands their service. Let not the character of these people be judged by the infamous British publications, to which too many of our statesmen look for information of their own country. I have one of these publications, which I have reserved to read in this place, that I might bear witness, on this elevated theatre, before the whole American Senate, to its base and libellous character. It is from the British Quarterly Review, No. 61. Listen to it:

“We affirm, without fear of contradiction, or of error, that there is not to be found, on the face of the globe, a race of men so utterly abandoned to vice and to crime, so devoid of all fear of God, and regard towards man, as the outsettlers of Kentucky, Ohio, and other back States.”

Now, Mr. President, I affirm, without fear of error, and with utter contempt for all contradiction, that a baser libel was never published, against any people, than this which I have read. It has been exposed by one who knows its falsity, (Governor Cass, of Michigan, in the North American Review;) and I add my voice to his, and from personal knowledge. I have known the people of the frontier States from my boyhood—have travelled among them, and lived among them; and can truly say, that, for all the manly virtues—for integrity, fair dealing, courage, generosity, and hospitality, they are proverbial and unrivalled. The benighted stranger never knocks at their gate in vain: the traveller never quits their house hungry: locks and bars are not necessary for the security of cribs and barns: the mail needs no guard: the solitary unarmed traveller, in a journey of a thousand miles, enjoys a safety by day and by night, which he would look for in vain in the streets of that capital of Great Britain, from which issued the infamous libel which I have read to you. It is the people of these frontier States to whom we are chiefly indebted for the glories of the late war. It is to them we are chiefly to look in future wars. They are with us “the cheap defence of the nation.” And shall they not have an inheritance in the land of their fathers? Shall they not have a home, as well as a grave, in the land which they defend? Shall we part with no ground but for gold and silver? Shall we consider money more valuable than patriotism? Shall we act upon the principle which I have heard asserted on this floor, that the man who cannot pay $100 for eighty acres of land is not worth having for a citizen? Sir, I know better. I know that an immense proportion of the inhabitants of new countries never see the day when they are masters of 100 silver dollars, to be paid down for a piece of land. Early marriages, the cares of family, current expenses for indispensable objects, accidents, misfortunes, and losses, prevent the accumulation of such a sum—small as it may seem to those who are in the habit of handling money, but great, in fact, to him who gets nothing but by the labor of his hands, and whose first earnings go to the daily support of his wife and his children. Poverty is not always the effect of vice or laziness. Many are born poor, and remain so; many are born rich, and become poor through misfortune; and, to all, the change of condition from tenant to freeholder, is the most difficult part of their lives. Let the Federal Government make that change for them. It can do it for hundreds of thousands, and be none the weaker or poorer, but richer and stronger on account of it. Great and meritorious are the services of the poor. They are soldiers in the time of war, and cultivators both in war and peace. Their daily labor is the perennial source of food to man and beast. Daily do they moisten the earth with the sweat of their brow. Shall that sweat continue to fall upon ground which is not their own? Shall they remain without land under a Government abounding with land? Shall they be compelled to choose between the hard alternatives of being trespassers or tenants, all their lives? Shall they see forever this Federal Government, after constituting itself sole purchaser of land from Indians, resolve itself into the hard character of speculator and monopolizer, and make "merchandise" out of God's first and greatest gift to man?

The cession clause, Mr. President, to which I now proceed, is the fourth and last clause in the bill. Its nature has been explained. The other clauses being adopted, the adoption of this one would seem a matter of course. It could no longer be an object to keep up offices in the old districts, to sell the miserable refuse which would remain unsold for a year, after having been offered at twenty-five cents per acre. The expense would not justify it. The only question would be between giving them up to the States for beneficial purposes, or suffering them to lie idle for hundreds of years, under the barren sceptre of the Federal Government. That, with me, would be no question at all. The States, with the advantage of local knowledge, and near superintendence, could make them available in promoting education and improving the country: in the hands of the Federal Government, they would be a harbor for wild beasts, and nuisances to the country for hundreds of years. I dwell particularly, Mr. President, on this idea. These refuse lands are the sources of disease and death. I have in my hand the statement of an officer whose habitual correctness is above all praise—a gentleman who hides superior merit in a subordinate station—one who takes pains to conceal more science than any other gentleman of my acquaintance can show—I speak of Col. McRee, Surveyor General in Missouri, whose report upon the inundated lands of Missouri and Illinois was made under your instructions, and printed by your order—I have, I say, his statement in my hand, which shows 1,096 ponds, lakes, and marshes in these two States, on an area of four millions of acres, or the one-twentieth part of their surface. They cover several hundred thousand acres of land. The most of them belong to the Federal Government. They are nuisances to the country, and nuisances which the local authorities have not the means to abate. They are the source of sickness and death to the neighboring inhabitants; even to those who have bought land from the owner of the nuisance. Many such, after years of contention with noxious and pestilential air, spending their money, and losing many members of their family in the vain conflict, have been compelled to move away, abandoning their possessions without rent or sale. Sir, I consider it as plain language, not amounting to metaphorical, to call these 1,096 ponds, lakes, swamps, and marshes, so many Federal Garrisons, manned by innumerable and invisible agents of destruction, in the shape of various diseases, for the extermination of the inhabitants. The American Bottom is the chief seat of these 1,096 garrisons, and melancholy is the havoc which they have made upon it. Who has not heard or read of this incomparable and unrivalled bottom, called by pre-eminence, American? And how faint and inadequate is the conception which any description can give to those who have not seen it! Figure to yourself, Mr. President, an alluvial bottom, ninety miles long, and averaging five miles wide, washed on one side by the Mississippi, fortified on the other by a lofty rampart of limestone rock; divided and subdivided in its whole extent into woodland and prairie; the wood filled with vines and wild fruit; the prairies covered with grass and flowers; the soil rich, like the Delta of the Nile, and too loose, too light, to hold the streams of water which gush from the rampart of rock, or fall from the high country above, and which are swallowed up in their vain attempt to reach the river; situated under the temperate latitude of 37 and 38, opposite to the flourishing market town of St. Louis, and within four days' sail of New Orleans: figure to yourself these objects, and you then have an outline of the American Bottom, which your own rich imagination may fill up, in its happier days, with fields almost black with dark green corn; other fields yellow with ripening wheat, barley, rye, and oats, reflecting the rays of a brilliant sun from their level golden uniform, and waving surface; orchards loaded with young fruit; vines with grapes; vast herds of cattle wading up to their sides in the tall prairie grass; and all this in an atmosphere fragrant with the fresh perfume of innumerable flowers and blossoms. This magnificent bottom was the first abode of the French in the valley of the Mississippi. Its settlement, by the followers of La Salle, about the year 1680, was coeval with the settlement of Philadelphia. Before the peace of 1763, which transferred the Canadas and Illinois to the British Crown, it was the seat of a numerous population, which supplied New Orleans with provisions, and sent three companies of militia to assist in the destruction of Braddock, at Fort Duquesne. Kaskaskia was then a rich and flourishing town; Cahokia, Prairie de Rocher, and Prairie de Pont, were gay and smiling villages; Fort Chartres, with its numerous and brilliant garrison, gave security to the inhabitants, and imparted life and animation to their innocent joys. But, since then, how changed! The transfer of the Illinois to Great Britain, gave the first blow to its prosperity. Fort Chartres lost its numerous garrison. The Jesuits, who had a college at Kaskaskia, led many of their flock to the Spanish side of the river, and founded St. Louis and Ste. Genevieve. The

APRIL, 1828.]

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

expedition of General Clark, in '78, scared off others; and, to crown all these causes of emigration, came the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory, and for the exclusion of slavery from it. The French are attached, Mr. President, to their slaves. They call them by kind and gentle appellations, "mon ami," "mon enfant," "ma fille," are not unfrequent terms of address to their "bond men" and their "bond women." The fear of losing this species of property, under the new ordinance, gave the last impulsion to the emigrating spirit, and the greater part of the remaining slaveholders followed their countrymen across the Mississippi, or down it to New Orleans. At the arrival of the Americans, as we were called, upon the acquisition of Louisiana in 1804, the population was found to be three-fourths gone; and at Kaskaskia, Fort Chartres, and the villages, the traveller was astonished at the sight of ruins in the heart of the New World. But the bottom had too many attractions to be overlooked by emigrants. Our people began to settle upon it, and to apply their energies to its cultivation; but they also have been compelled to remove. The pools of water, formed by reflux currents from the river, or by rains from the hills, has taken possession of the low parts, and formed permanent lakes by the deposit of the tenacious clayey sediment which came from the cultivated lands. The population was too weak to drain them, or to fence out the river by levees, at the low places. The State authorities lacked the power or the means to do it. The Federal Government, to whom all these nuisances belonged, like an Irish landlord, living in London, was ignorant of their existence. The very water which forms these lakes and ponds, was supposed by it to be land, and is offered for sale at the minimum price of one dollar twenty-five cents the superficial acre. The consequence is, that the American Bottom is less populous now than it was at the period of the acquisition of Louisiana; less so than it was when I first saw it, twelve years ago, and becoming less populous every year. The stagnant waters encroach upon the people, and the people retire from before them. The Federal Government owns these nuisances, and will neither abate them, nor contribute its proportion among other landholders, to have them abated. They increase in size and number, and are becoming the lords of the bottom: but if the cession clause in my bill should take effect, the clause which I am now pressing on the attention of the Senate, this sad picture may soon be reversed. These nuisances, and their proximate domain, would change owners, and, in the change, they would get a master on the spot to treat them as they deserve. They would soon cease to be garrisons, either State or Federal, metaphorical or real, for the destruction of people's lives. Wise laws would be passed by the State Legislature, founded in local knowledge, adapted to the evil, and executed by persons interested in their success. Ponds, lakes, and swamps would disappear; their pestilential airs would vanish; health would be restored to the American Bottom; and, with it, an unalloyed enjoyment to the planter and farmer of this terrestrial Paradise. I have confined what I have to say, Mr. President, upon the subject of these nuisances, to the American Bottom alone, not because it is their only seat, but because I wished to strike the imagination, and fix the attention with one eminent example of this evil, which would do for a thousand lesser instances. But they are not limited to that bottom. These nuisances are found in ample number, differing in magnitude, not in nature, upon the margins of all the creeks and rivers in all the States and Territories, from the Gulf coast of Louisiana, Alabama, and Florida, to the Lake shores of Indiana and Michigan. They extend from Detroit to New Orleans. They are the property of the Federal Government, and everywhere they are sources of disease. Will the Federal Government hold on to them forever? Will it continue to wave its barren sceptre over pestilential swamps and marshes, as well as over desert prairies, flinty hills, and sterile ridges?

TUESDAY, April 22.

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill for the graduation of the price of the Public Lands was taken up; and, the question being on engrossing the bill,

Mr. DICKERSON observed that he should consider himself unfaithful to his trust, if he did not to the last, oppose the bill under consideration—which he considered as in a higher degree than any bill heretofore brought before Congress, to wrest from the old States their undoubted rights, to destroy the confidence that ought to subsist between the old and new States—and to sap the foundation of the compact by which they are held together.

The bill applies to eighty millions of acres; if they bring nothing into our Treasury, it will be folly to expect any thing from the residue of our public lands. These lands are the common stock of the United States. Those that have been ceded by certain States, have been ceded expressly as a common stock. Those that have been purchased, have been purchased out of the common fund. Our public-lands have cost us more than thirty-three millions of dollars, besides probably an equal sum in protecting and defending them. And are we now about to relinquish the pecuniary advantages which were anticipated from those lands which we have acquired and protected at such immense expense? On the part of the State from which I have the honor to come, I can never assent to this arrangement.

New Jersey has a vested right to a share of those lands, from which she did hope to obtain some remuneration for her heavy losses and expenses in carrying on the Revolutionary war.

New Jersey acquired no crown lands within her boundaries by the Revolution. She never owned any part of her soil, except by purchase—never taxed the lands of the proprietors. But the gentleman from Indiana says there has been no moment when New Jersey could not tax these lands. She has the power to tax these lands, but it cannot be done with strict justice, inasmuch as there was an agreement some eighty or one hundred years ago, upon certain concessions as to the sale of these lands, that they should not be taxed. A sense of justice has prevented any attempt at taxation.

New Jersey has submitted to her condition without murmuring. She has asked but little, and received nothing. I did, by instruction, ask a donation of lands for an asylum of the deaf and dumb, established in that State. The boon was a small one, but it was refused. Since which, I have voted against donations of lands, and shall continue to do so till some equitable principle shall be adopted for the regulation of such donations.

The question being taken on engrossing the bill, it was rejected, by YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Cobb, Eaton, Ellis, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, McKinley, Noble, Ridgely, Rowan, Ruggles, Tazewell, Thomas, White, Williams—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Chase, Dickerson, Foot, Hayne, Knight, McLane, Macon, Marks, Parris, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Tyler, Van Buren, Webster, Willey, Woodbury—25.

WEDNESDAY, April 23.

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

Mr. MACON said that he considered that the question was never taken on the first section of the bill to graduate the price of public lands, disconnected from the rest of the bill. He was in favor of the first section, and therefore moved to reconsider the vote on the bill, with the view of striking out all but the first section.

Mr. WEBSTER said he thought a motion to reconsider, for any particular purpose, was rather novel.

The Chair said, that the motion for reconsideration ought to be distinct.

The motion was then laid on the table.

FRIDAY, April 25.

Survivors of the Revolution.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY, the bill providing for certain Surviving Officers of the Revolution was taken up.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that when, on a former occasion, the bill had been before the Senate, it had expressed, by three several votes, on different sums proposed, its disapprobation of the form in which the bill was then presented. He had understood, at that time, that, if the Senate did not grant the claim then advanced, they would retire and not urge their claim again. It was, however, now brought forward, and in a manner which rendered it far more objectionable than formerly. It was an accession to the pension system of the country, and he believed that the amount of money which it would eventually call for, would far exceed any computation that the committee had made. He also objected that some of the officers were men of wealth, and stated that he knew one who was worth $50,000.

Mr. BERRIEN considered the objections of the gentleman from South Carolina applied rather to the conduct of the friends of the bill, than to the claim itself. Mr. B. did not recollect that any pledge was given that the claim should not be further urged; but he did recollect, that one of the advocates of the bill declared that the officers would not consent to be placed on the pension list. He would repeat what he had said before: that he had arrived at a conviction that these officers had an equitable claim on the Government; and he, therefore, was disposed to acquiesce in any plan, by which they should receive it, in a form not revolting to their feelings. As to the objections of the gentleman from South Carolina, that these officers were men of wealth, he would ask if that was a good reason for not granting the claim? He stated that some of them had large fortunes. I should be happy, said Mr. B., to know that these men who have served their country so faithfully, were in the enjoyment of the blessings of competence. But it was not so general as to have any effect on the large mass of those for whom this bill provided. In reply to the objection that this bill would swell the pension list, he would remark, that, as it was a debt for the payment of which the faith of the Government was pledged, the manner in which it was discharged was not of the least importance. As to the supposition that the amount of pension would exceed the calculations of the committee, Mr. B. stated, that the number of officers was known, and the apprehensions of the gentleman from South Carolina would not be realized.

Mr. WOODBURY said in reply to the objections offered by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, that, at a former period a meeting had been called of the surviving officers of the Revolution, at Baltimore, at which a Committee of Correspondence was appointed, to correspond with individuals in every State in the Union. This correspondence had taken place, and from the data obtained, the number of those officers had been found to be about two hundred and thirty-five—this, with the knowledge of the number of officers at the close of the Revolution, afforded satisfactory evidence that the number could not essentially vary from this estimate. There could be no large error in this computation. As to any pledge having been given, that this claim should not be urged again, after its rejection, in the form originally proposed, he knew nothing that could be so construed, with the exception of a remark made by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. VAN BUREN.) He had stated, that they would withdraw their memorial if the only grant that could be obtained was the insertion of their names on the pension roll. And, as stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, on the other side of the House, the pride of these claimants revolted at the idea of being placed on the list of pensioners as mere paupers, when they considered that they had a claim on the Government under a promise formerly made by Congress. Under these circumstances a plan had been projected, on a further meeting of the committee—still retaining the ground of the rights of these memorialists, by which they might be spared from the degrading necessity of taking an oath of their poverty—an act which would have wounded their feelings to no useful purpose; and the Senate could not, he thought, refuse this slight token of regard to the honorable pride of these veterans. The present arrangement would require a sum far less than would have been demanded, had these officers been placed on the pension list from the commencement.

APRIL, 1828.]

Survivors of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, observed, that the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) seemed to fear that frauds would be committed under this act; and that unworthy objects would reap the benefits of the bill. But this was out of the question, as no individual could be embraced by this measure, who had not been on the commutation roll, and received the commutation. These individuals could easily be ascertained, so that there was no fear of the frauds the gentleman seemed to apprehend.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that he had only supposed that other persons would come in. He did not attribute fraud to any one.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, continued. It amounted to the same thing. No one could by possibility come in, but those for whom the provisions of the bill were intended. He thought the objection, that some of these officers were rich, had no application to the bill. There might be one or two instances of the kind; but what had they to do with the aggregate? As far as his knowledge extended, it was not the case. In Maryland he knew that the officers of the continental line needed the pension. In that State the Cincinnati met every year, and at those meetings the death of every member was reported—this was the case in every State where there were Cincinnati. So that the numbers of the survivors could easily be ascertained. Where there were none other means could be used to obtain the information required. There could not, therefore, be any difficulty in ascertaining the individuals entitled to the benefits of the bill. He had stated before, that the computation of those who had been in the army three years at the end of the war, had been correctly made, when the pension list was first agitated in Congress.

There was no difficulty in making out the list—but the computation was destroyed afterwards, by introducing those who had served nine months.

Mr. CHANDLER inquired if those who received the commutation were the only class for whom this bill provided. He should like to know why those who served three years, should be preferred to those who served six years, and retired previous to the close of the war. The former lost by the depreciation of the currency, no more than the latter.

Mr. WOODBURY, in reply, said, that the officers for whom this bill provided, not only lost, in common with all the other officers, the depreciation on their pay, but they also lost the reduction on their half pay. It was so with the soldiers. The bill applied to those only who, having been promised a bounty of eighty dollars, lost not only the depreciation upon their monthly pay, but the depreciation on their bounty.

Mr. VAN BUREN made some remarks, on rising, which the reporter could not hear. He thought there would be no end to the objections which this bill was doomed to meet. It seemed to be argued that there was an impropriety in pressing this claim in its present form. And, on this head, he would say a few words. These officers found their claim upon the commutation of the half pay for life which Congress had promised them. There are other considerations, which it is not now necessary to urge. He then detailed the circumstances under which the memorial of the officers had been brought forward, but in a tone of voice which was not distinctly heard in the gallery. On proposing to the officers the acceptance of a place on the pension list, they said that all who had been driven by dire necessity to that resort, were there already. The present plan did not propose to give what they or their friends considered them entitled to; but, it afforded some relief to their necessities, and was an approach towards the payment of a debt formed under the most imposing circumstances, and to the payment of which, the memorialists were entitled by the highest and strongest considerations.

Mr. MACON said, that, at first, this claim had been put forth on legal grounds, which were maintained by the first lawyers in the Senate. Now, that ground appeared to have been abandoned, and he supposed the claim was founded on a debt of gratitude. Even granting that such a claim existed, and that, at any other time, it would be proper to grant it—this certainly was not the right period for making any such grants. There never was a time when the distresses of the people were greater. In his part of the country, it was greater than at any previous period, even than during the war. Money was never scarcer than now. He knew we could borrow; but we had not it in the Treasury to spare. Mr. M. also urged that there were other classes of people, who suffered from the ravages of war, and lost all their property. On these grounds he was opposed to this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER expressed himself dissatisfied with the reply which the gentleman from New Hampshire had given to his inquiry. When the officers who had served six years retired, they had lost on their pay. But here was another class, who, after having served a shorter period, and received five years' additional pay, with some depreciation, were to receive full pay for life. He thought it unjust and partial; and it could easily be perceived, that the officers and soldiers, who served six years, would complain. Therefore, while we are about it, why not provide for the whole?

Mr. HARRISON said, that the friends of this bill were assailed on all sides, and in the most contrary manner, by different opponents. Some gentlemen complain that the bill goes too far, while others, like my friend from Maine, reproach us that we do not go far enough. The provisions of this bill are not limited, because we do not think that there are other classes of officers to whom the country owes gratitude, who served a shorter period. But it was the peculiar nature of the claims of these officers which limited the bill to them. It seemed rather unfair that the advocates of this measure should be assailed at once by complaints for doing too much, and for doing too little. The argument so often used by his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) that the Government could not pay the whole amount of the depreciation on the pay of the army, was a sufficient reply to the opposite objection of the gentleman from Maine. It had been well said by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) on a former day, that the Exchequer of the world would not supply the funds to defray the losses to which the gentleman from North Carolina has alluded. But, when that gentleman speaks of the losses of other classes, and the sacrifices of property which individuals suffered, would he compare the losses of these men who shed their blood, and risked their lives in the service, to losses of property? Would he compare the blood of an ox to the blood spilt by these devoted patriots? He hoped not. The bill provides for that class of men who suffered most, and who received a pledge which was never fulfilled.

Mr. WOODBURY replied to the questions put by Mr. MACON. There were none of the officers provided for by this bill who had not served three years. He was very frank to confess another fact, which was, that it had been ascertained that the officers who served the shortest period were those who now resided in the Southern States. If the discrimination was made, it would be in favor of those who resided in the northern States. The committee had thought that all those who served to the close of the war ought to be provided for, without making distinctions in favor of those who served longer than others.

Mr. HARRISON called for the yeas and nays on the question of filling the blanks, which was sustained.

Mr. COBB said, that if he understood the object of the present bill, it was to give the full pay of a captain for life, to these officers, and two years' pay as a previous gratuity. I (said Mr. C.) shall vote against it; and I wish to explain why I shall do so. If this is a grant made upon the ground of a debt, there is no reason why it should not be extended to the legal representatives of those who have died, as well as to the survivors. I ask whether the present bill does not deal partially? Whatever may be said by the friends of the measure, I certainly did understand, that, when this question was settled a month since, by three several votes—the friends of the bill signified the determination of these officers not to accept of pensions. The gentleman from New York informed us, that they would not consent to be placed upon the pension list. Well, sir, it is now said, that they are to receive full pay for life—and will they say that this is not accepting of a pension? that this is not an extension of the pension system? They made the declaration that these gentlemen were above accepting a pension. But now we find these high-minded modest officers of the Revolution, discovering that the bill can pass in no other form, not averse to become pensioners. The features of this bill (said Mr. C.) appear to me to be more offensive now than formerly: for, if any thing was to be given, it ought to have been given as a donation. The present plan extends the pension principle too far. And as he had been always against donations, viewing them as he did, as unconstitutional, he hoped the Senate would be inclined to consider this matter thoroughly, before they consented to carry the pension list of the country to such an enormous extent. He had perceived that the bill had been skilfully managed. Its advocates had watched the proper opportunity for calling it up; and had been peculiarly careful that the Senate should be full, when it came on for consideration. They had called it up, and laid it down again, as the Senate had been full or empty; and now it is pressed because all the members happen to be present. Still, he hoped this measure would not be passed upon without deliberation. He thought that this subject had a farther scope than its mere intrinsic merits would indicate. He thought that the Presidential question was, to a great extent, made to depend on this bill. The friends of the administration advocate it, because the President recommended it in his Message—and the members of the opposition are in favor of it, because, should they oppose it, their conduct would be the ground for reproach from their opponents, and would afford an argument against them. This bill was the most extravagant feature of this session, which was by far the most extravagant Senate in which he had ever served. They had given away immense tracts of land—they had given away vast sums of money; and they had enlarged all those powers which were considered by many, as dangerous and unconstitutional. In that part of Georgia in which he lived, but little more than half crops of cotton had been made in the last year, and he had seen a document from one of the commercial cities of the south, by which it would seem that the exports of cotton, of the crop of 1827, would be from 100,000 to 200,000 bales less than those of the year preceding. Is this the time then for extravagant expenditure? Is this the time for spending money? There was no fear that these applicants would come upon the poor list. They were not in so bad a condition as many thousands of those who fought with them, and performed equally meritorious services; but whose claims were forgotten. He felt bound to oppose this bill as unjust, inexpedient, and a wanton expenditure of the money of the people.

APRIL, 1828.]

Survivors of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

Mr. Foor merely rose to state the grounds on which he should oppose the filling of the blank as proposed. He was a member of the committee on pensions—and many hard cases had come before them, in which it was proposed to go back in granting pensions—and in one instance only had the committee consented to go back. And he would ask whether the Senate would adopt a principle, which had never been acknowledged, in favor of these officers, which had been refused in many instances where individuals were poor and suffering?

Mr. HARRISON rose to make but a single observation in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia. If there was a scramble upon the floor of the Senate, as that gentleman intimated—if the majority of the Senate were in favor of the bill, he thought it a fair inference that they acted from a knowledge of the wishes of their constituents; it was a fair conclusion that the majority of the people were in favor of the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER said: It had not been my purpose to take any part in the discussion of this bill. My opinions, in regard to its general object, I hope, are well known, and I had intended to content myself with a steady and persevering vote in its favor. But, when the moment of final decision has come, and the decision is so likely to be nearly equal, I feel it to be a duty to put, not only my own vote, but my own earnest wishes, my fervent entreaties to others, into the doubtful scale.

It must be admitted, sir, that the persons for whose benefit this bill is designed, are, in some respects, peculiarly unfortunate. They are compelled to meet, not only objections to the principle, but, whichever way they turn themselves, embarrassing objections also to details. One friend hesitates at this provision, and another at that; while those who are not friends at all, of course, oppose every thing and propose nothing. When it was contemplated, heretofore, to give the petitioners an outright sum, in satisfaction of their claim, then the argument was, among other things, that the Treasury could not bear so heavy a draft on its means, at the present moment.

The plan is, accordingly, changed—an annuity is proposed—and then the objection changes also—and it is now said, that this is but granting pension, and that the pension system has already been carried too far. I confess, sir, I felt wounded,—deeply hurt—at the observations of the gentleman from Georgia. So, then, said he, these modest and high-minded gentlemen take a pension at last! How is it possible, that a gentleman of his generosity of character, and general kindness of feeling, can indulge in such a tone of triumphant irony towards a few old, gray-headed, poor, and broken warriors of the Revolution! There is, I know, something repulsive and opprobrious in the name of pension. But, God forbid that I should taunt them with it! With grief, heartfelt grief, do I behold the necessity which leads these veterans to accept the bounty of their country, in a manner not the most agreeable to their feelings. Worn out and decrepid, represented before us, by those, their former brothers in arms, who totter along our lobbies, or stand leaning on their crutches, I, for one, would most gladly support a measure which would consult at once their services, their years, their necessities, and the delicacy of their sentiments. I would gladly give, with promptitude and grace, with gratitude and delicacy, that which merit has earned, and necessity demands.

Sir, what are the objections which are urged against this bill? Let us look at them, and see if they be real; let us weigh them, to know if they be solid. For, sir, we are not acting on a slight matter. Nor is what we do, likely to pass unobserved now, or to be forgotten hereafter. I regard the occasion as one full of interest and full of responsibility. Those individuals, the little remnant of a gallant band, whose days of youth and manhood were spent for their country, in the toils and dangers of the field, are now before us, poor and old, intimating their wants with reluctant delicacy, and asking succor from their country, with decorous solicitude. How we shall treat them, it behooves us well to consider, not only for their sake, but for our own sake also, and for the sake of the honor of the country. Whatever we do, will not be done in a corner. Our constituents will see it—the people will see it—the world will see it.

Let us candidly examine, then, the objections which have been raised to this bill; with a disposition to yield to them, if, from necessity, we must; but to overcome them, if, in fairness, we can.

In the first place, it is said that we ought not to pass this bill, because it will involve us in a charge of unknown extent. We are reminded that, when the general pension law for Revolutionary soldiers passed, an expense was incurred, far beyond what had been contemplated; that the estimate of the number of surviving Revolutionary soldiers proved altogether fallacious; and that, for aught we know, the same mistake may be committed now.

Is this objection well founded? Let me say, in the first place, that, if one measure, right in itself, has gone farther than it was intended to be carried, for want of accurate provisions, and adequate guards, this may furnish a very good reason for supplying such guards and provisions, in another measure, but can afford no ground at all for rejecting such other measure altogether, if it be in itself just and necessary. We should avail ourselves of our experience, it seems to me, to correct what has been found amiss; and not draw from it an undistinguishing resolution to do nothing, merely because it has taught us, that, in something which we have already done, we have acted with too little care. In the next place, does the fact bear out this objection? Is there any difficulty in ascertaining the number of the officers who will be benefited by this bill, and estimating the expense, therefore, which it will create? I think there is none. The records in the Department of War and the Treasury furnish such evidence as that there is no danger of material mistake. The diligence of the chairman of the committee has enabled him to lay the facts connected with this part of the case, so fully and minutely before the Senate, that I think no one can feel serious doubt. Indeed, it is admitted by the adversaries of the bill, that this objection does not apply here, with the same force, as in the former pension law. It is admitted that there is a greater facility in this case, than in that, in ascertaining the number and names those who will be entitled to receive that bounty.

This objection, then, is not founded in true principle; and if it were it is not sustained by the facts. I think we ought not to yield to it, unless, which I know is not the sentiment which pervades the Senate, feeling that the measure ought not to pass, we still prefer, not to place our opposition to it on a distinct and visible ground, but to veil it under vague and general objections.

In the second place, it has been objected, that the operation of the bill will be unequal, because all officers of the same rank will receive equal benefit from it, although they entered the army at different times, and were of different ages. Sir, is not this that sort of inequality which must always exist in every general provision? Is it possible that any law can descend into such particulars?

Would there be any reason why it should do so if it could? The bill is intended for those, who, being in the army in October, 1780, then received a solemn promise of half pay for life, on condition that they would continue to serve through the war. The ground of merit is, that, whensoever they had joined the army, being thus solicited by their country to remain in it, they at once went for the whole; they fastened their fortunes to the standards which they bore, and resolved to continue their military service until it should terminate, either in their country's success or their own deaths. This is their merit and their ground of claim. How long they had been already in service is immaterial and unimportant. They were then in service; the salvation of their country depended on their continuing in that service. Congress saw this imperative necessity, and earnestly solicited them to remain, and promised the compensation. They saw the necessity also, and they yielded to it.

But, again, it is said, that the present time is not auspicious. The bill, it is urged, should not pass now. The venerable member from North Carolina says, as I understood him, that he would be almost as willing that the bill should pass, at some other session, as be discussed at this. He speaks of the distresses of the country, at the present moment, and of another bill, now in the Senate, having, as he thinks, the effect of laying new taxes upon the people. He is for postponement. But it appears to me, with entire respect for the honorable member, that this is one of the cases least of all fit for postponement.—It is not a measure, that, if omitted this year, may as well be done next. Before next year comes, those who need the relief may be beyond its reach. To postpone, for another year, an annuity to persons already so aged—an annuity, founded on the merits of services which were rendered half a century ago; to postpone, for another whole year, a bill for the relief of deserving men, proposing not aggrandizement but support; not emolument, but bread—is a mode of disposing of it, in which I cannot concur.

But it is argued, in the next place, that the bill ought not to pass, because those who have spoken in its favor have placed it on different grounds. They have not agreed, it is said, whether it is to be regarded as a matter of right, or matter of gratuity, or bounty. Is there weight in this objection? If some think the grant ought to be made, as an exercise of judicious and well-deserved bounty, does it weaken that ground that others think is founded in strict right, and that we cannot refuse it without manifest and palpable injustice? Or is it strange, that those who feel the legal justice of the claim should address to those who do not feel it, considerations of a different character, but fit to have weight, and which they hope may have weight? Nothing is more plain and natural than the course which this application has taken. The applicants themselves have placed it on the ground of equity and law. They advert to the resolve of 1780, to the commutation of 1788, and to the mode of funding the certificates. They stand on their contract. This is perfectly natural. On that basis, they can wield the argument themselves. Of what is required by justice and equity, they may reason, even in their own case. But, when the application is placed on different grounds; when personal merit is to be urged, as the foundation of a just and economical bounty; when services are to be mentioned; privations recounted; pains enumerated; and wounds and scars counted; the discussion necessarily devolves to other hands. In all that we have seen from these officers, in the various papers presented by them, it cannot but be obvious to every one, how little is said of personal merit, and how exclusively they confine themselves to what they think their rights under the contract.

APRIL, 1828.]

Survivors of the Revolution.

[SENATE]

I must confess, sir, that principles of equity, which appear to me as plain as the sun, are urged by the memorialists themselves, with great caution and much qualification. They advance their claim of right without extravagance or overstraining; and they submit it to the unimpassioned sense of justice of the Senate.

Mr. Foor observed, that this bill, from the commencement of its discussion at an early period of the session, until the present moment, had been before the Senate, under peculiar circumstances; and, to him, extremely embarrassing; held fast by the chairman of the committee, and strongly fortified against amendments, by motions merely to fill the blanks. The original bill embraced a certain portion of the officers only, to whom half pay for life had been promised; but on their own application, this half pay had been commuted for full pay for five years; and it was contended that the United States were under a legal obligation to make further provision for these officers. Mr. F. said he had voted against filling the blank in the original bill, with every sum which had been proposed; and should have voted against even the smallest sum, for the exclusive benefit of these officers. He never could consent to degrade the soldiers of the Revolutionary army, by elevating the officers; they were not mere mercenary hirelings, like the soldiers of ordinary standing armies. Many of these soldiers were of the best blood of the country—equal to the officers—and fighting side by side for their dearest rights. It was a common cause—and one spirit pervaded the whole. The officer was most fortunate; he had a commission, and could at any time resign and leave the army. And, sir, we all know the origin of the half pay, and the commutation for five years' full pay. The soldier could not resign; he could not compel Congress to increase his pay, by threats to resign and disband the army. These officers were as well paid on their first contract for service as the soldier—which indeed was poor enough. But the soldier was compelled to serve out his enlistment upon the terms of his contract. How is the case with the officer? Was not half pay offered for life, to prevent resignation? And this commuted, at their request, for five years' full pay, amounting to twice the original sum contracted for their services? And does this form a ground for this claim for additional compensation? Mr.

F. declared that he never should vote for any additional compensation to the officers alone, but would assure the chairman he was ready to go with him in making any suitable provisions for these Revolutionary heroes, which would do equal justice to the soldier as well as the officer.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, replied to some of the remarks of Mr. WEBSTER. He considered that these claims could not be established in a court of equity, and remarked that the panegyric bestowed by the gentleman from Massachusetts on the conduct of the officers at the close of the war, was not entirely deserved, as there had been, to a certain extent, a revolt among them, which nothing but the presence and influence of Washington had overcome. Besides, he maintained that the officers could not better themselves by any course of violence. There was nothing left of which they could possess themselves, the country having been ravaged, and the property of the citizens having been destroyed. He repeated what he had said in relation to an individual among the claimants who was worth a large fortune.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that there were but twelve of these officers who were residents in Maryland, yet, were he to vote against this bill, he might be certain of never being returned to Congress again. His constituents were in favor of it. They were desirous that something should be done to smooth the way to the grave of these veteran servants of the country. There might be one gentleman in South Carolina who was possessed of a fortune, but this was no reason why the other claimants should be neglected, nor did it alter the justice of the claim. There was not one of these officers who resided in Maryland that was possessed of property. There was, formerly, one rich officer in Maryland, who had lately died. But he would not have received this annuity, had he been living. I say this annuity, because it is not, as it has been denominated, a pension.

Mr. WHITE said, that if this was solely an equitable claim, the legal representatives of deceased officers had an equal right to claim the provision, as the surviving officers. For this reason he had not voted against the bill in its former shape. It was now placed in a position in which he could conscientiously record his vote in its favor. He should, therefore, state, as concisely as possible, the grounds on which his vote would be given. He considered this was a gratuity to the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, in consideration, that a promise made to them by the Government had not been complied with as far as was intended. If this was intended as a gratuity, it did not extend to the legal representatives of the deceased. But, sir, said Mr. W., I see in existence the men who have rendered these services to their country. I see them in want, and I cannot refuse to succor them. They have conferred benefits upon the country, upon which we cannot place too high an estimate. Those services have not been compensated according to a former promise of the Government. This compact has been fulfilled in form, but not in substance. Others may have served the country with equal fidelity and zeal, but not having the promise which these men had, their claims are placed on other and weaker grounds. They cannot have an equal claim with these officers. I have always considered, said Mr. W., that the victories achieved by these men over the enemy were not their greatest victories. The greatest of their triumphs was that which they achieved over themselves, their wants, and interests, when, at the close of the war, they delivered up their arms, and retired to the private walks of life, trusting in the justice of their countrymen, and fully believing, that, when the time arrived, they would receive the compensation pledged to them by the Government. That time has arrived. We are now able to render this tribute of justice. And if it were the last dollar in the Treasury, I would give it for this purpose. This opinion is, I think, founded on principle. It may be said that I am actuated by feeling; but, if so, it is a feeling which I think I ought to entertain. As to any other motives, I do not entertain them. I came here dressed in no man's livery; but as the representative of a sovereign State, to act according to my conscience and the will of my constituents alone. Any imputation to the contrary I cannot admit, as I should feel myself degraded by allowing myself to act on other grounds; and I should think it beneath me, to look upon the decisions of Senators as arising from any other views.

Mr. MACON moved to lay the bill upon the table, which was negatived, 22 to 20.

On motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the bill was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed, as amended.

MONDAY, April 28.

Adjournment of Congress.

The resolution submitted on Friday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, authorizing the appointment of a committee to meet a committee on the part of the House, to fix upon a period at which Congress shall adjourn, was taken up.

Mr. MCKINLEY moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was negatived—22 to 13.

Mr. MACON moved to appoint a committee to meet the committee appointed by the House under the resolution of the House to fix the period of adjournment, and to select the business to be acted on; which was agreed to—20 to 17.

Survivors of the Revolution.

The bill for the relief of certain Revolutionary officers and soldiers was taken up again; and, having been further amended, on motion of Mr. WOODBURY, the question occurred on striking out, and inserting the amendment offered by the committee, as amended, which was agreed to without a division.

The question on engrossing being then put; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Bateman, Bell, Berrien, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Harrison, Hayne, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, Marks, Parria, Robbins, Rowan, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Van Buren, Webster, White, Willey, Woodbury—30.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Ellis, Foot, Hendricks, McKinley, Macor, Noble, Ridgely, Ruggles, Smith of S. C., Tazewell, Tyler, Williams—17.

WEDNESDAY, April 30.

Time of Adjournment.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the committee appointed to join a committee from the other House for the purpose of fixing upon the time for the adjournment of the two Houses, reported the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses on Monday, the 26th May next.

Cumberland Road.

On motion of Mr. MARKS, the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road (to erect turnpike gates on the road) was taken up, and the amendments reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, supported the bill, and read a letter from the postmaster general, enclosing a letter from a mail contractor, detailing the bad state of repair of some sections of the road.

Mr. MARKS argued that the road would be ruined if suffered long to remain in its present condition. It would be little better than to allow the road to return to its wilderness state, to neglect repairing it through another winter like the last. There were three courses that might be taken. The United States could make appropriations for the repair of the road; they could erect toll gates; or to turn over the whole matter to the States in which the road lies. If the latter course were pursued, there was no certainty that the States would undertake to keep the road in repair, as they looked upon the road, having been made by the General Government, as a work of a national character, and Congress as bound to provide for its repairs. The question before the Senate was, whether Congress should allow a work which had cost two millions of dollars, to fall

MAY, 1828.]

The Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

into decay for want of repair, or would take measures to perpetuate the benefits of the road. It was true, that the work done last year was becoming dilapidated and going to ruin, while they were going on with the other parts of the work. There was no gentleman present, he believed, who would not be convinced of the necessity of doing something to prevent the road from going to destruction. He knew that it had been argued that Congress had not the power to do this; but, he considered, that, as it had been decided by repeated votes, that Congress had the right to make the road, it could hardly be maintained that Congress had not the right to repair it.

Mr. BRANCH objected that the Senate had no power to originate a bill for the levying of taxes.

Mr. MARKS replied that it was not the design of the bill to bring any thing into the public coffers, as all the money collected from tolls would be expended in repairs upon the road.

Mr. BENTON objected to the late period at which this bill had been taken up. He said he held in his hand a set of resolutions, which he thought would meet the views of the friends of the bill. He, therefore, moved to lay the bill upon the table until to-morrow, when his resolutions would come up for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON objected to the resolutions, and considered that the tendency of their introduction would be to retard the bill, and probably to postpone it until next session.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he wished this bill tried on its merits; because, if it was rejected, the Senate would virtually say that they would vote money for the repair of the road. He had no choice as to the manner in which the object was effected. One way or another the road would doubtless be repaired, as it could not be supposed that they would allow all the expense which the road had cost to be lost for want of repair.

Mr. MACOX thought the Senate was going rather too fast. He rose to ask the President whether it was competent to the Senate to frame an act upon a bill of this kind; whether it was not a bill which ought to originate in the other House?

The Chair observed that it was a question of great magnitude; he should be desirous of referring the decision of the question to the Senate. Whether the Senate had the power to frame such a bill, under the constitution, was a point of some doubt and much importance.

Mr. KING doubted whether the President was competent to decide the question, as it was a constitutional point, and not a question of order.

The Vice President said he was by no means covetous of the duty of deciding.

Mr. HENDRICKS expressed a wish that the bill might not be postponed, and that it might be disposed of without a constitutional argument. The constitutional question had often been decided by the Senate, and he thought its agitation would be useless now.

The President said he would be governed by the Senate. The reason why the Chair had supposed that the question came under the rules of order, was, that those rules had regulated the practice of the body. The article of the constitution to which it referred, established that certain bills could not be framed in the Senate, and hence the Chair was of opinion, that a question as to the power given in this respect, would come under the regulation of the business of the Senate. He might be in error, but such was his impression.

The Vice President again rose, and stated that the question presented a new point of order. It appeared to him that the decision would not turn upon the constitutionality of the bill, but upon the practice of the Senate. He wished the Senators to consider the question.

The bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The Vice President gave notice, that, when the bill should come up, as it presented a new point, and as the constitutional question was one of great magnitude, he would submit to the Senate whether or not it came within the rules of order.

MONDAY, May 5.

The Tariff Bill.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the bill to increase the duties on certain imported articles was taken up, and the first amendment reported by the Committee on Manufactures.

Molasses.

The following amendment was considered; and, on motion of Mr. PARRIS, the question was divided, so as to decide first on striking out—

Sec. 3, line 20. Strike out the words "ten cents," and insert "seven cents and a half," so as to read, "on molasses seven cents and a half per gallon."

Mr. ROBBINS spoke at considerable length against the duty upon molasses, as unnecessary, inexpedient, and oppressive, an odious tax upon a necessary article.

Mr. DICKERSON defended the imposition of the duty, and argued that it would lead to the production of the article in the country.

Mr. BENTON advocated the duty on molasses as an indirect encouragement to the landed, or farming interest. It would enable the distillers of the Western country, who used pains to compete with those in the Eastern States, who distilled from molasses. Among other remarks, Mr. B. said that whiskey was the healthiest liquor that was drank, as men were known who had been drunk upon it for forty or fifty years, while rum finished its victims in eight or ten.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that he understood the gentleman from Missouri that a man might be drunk on whiskey for forty years. This was the reason why he would vote against the duty, as he was in favor of that liquor which should soonest despatch the drunkard.

Mr. PARRIS expressed himself averse to the duty on molasses, which he looked upon as far more injurious to Maine, than it could be beneficial to Missouri. Mr. P. then gave some details in relation to the trade carried on by the State of Maine with the West India islands, and contended that this duty would act as a death blow to that trade.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, defended the measure, as extending to the West its share of protection. He did not consider that the State of Maine would suffer, as her tonnage would be employed in carrying the molasses of Louisiana, instead of that of the West Indies. If the bill was amended and sent back to the other House, and should there be lost, he wished to know who would assume the responsibility.

Mr. PARRIS replied briefly to Mr. JOHNSON. He felt no anxiety as to the responsibility for having caused the bill to be lost. His constituents would be severely injured by it. Indeed, had a measure been framed for the express purpose of bearing down the interest of the State of Maine, it would not have been more successful. As to a responsibility of any other kind to which the gentleman might allude, he felt no anxiety. He maintained that Louisiana could not supply the West India trade in the article of molasses, or yield a market for the productions of Maine.

The question being then put on striking out, it was decided in the negative.

Vermicelli.

The amendment at the 22d line of the 3d section, to insert "on vermicelli 50 per centum," being next—

Mr. DICKERSON explained this proposition. The article was not as unimportant as by some it might be supposed. He mentioned the fact of a manufacturer in the State of New Jersey, who exported large quantities.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, the gentleman from New Jersey will not even let us have our soup in peace. That, too, must be taxed. He will think of taxing the air we breathe next. This article was to be taxed, because there was a manufacturer in New Jersey who appeared to be doing very well, as the gentleman said that he exported large quantities.

Mr. BENTON said he would detain the Senate but a minute and a half; and he intended to tell a story instead of making a speech. When the tariff of 1824 was under discussion in the other House, a gentleman, whom he did not then know, but whom he afterwards learned was a member of Congress, came to him in his seat, and asked whether there were not caves in Missouri in which Epsom salts were found. He (Mr. B.) answered doubtfully—and the gentleman said he had at home a small manufactory of the article, and he argued that the caves in Missouri and his manufactory entitled the article to be protected. When the gentleman from New Jersey proposed this duty, because there happened to be a manufactory of vermicelli in New Jersey, his (Mr. B.'s) mind recurred to this circumstance, and he could not but ask whether there was any member of Congress interested in the business?

Mr. DICKERSON assured Mr. BENTON that no member of Congress had any concern in the manufactory of which he had spoken.

The amendment was rejected, 18 to 24.

TUESDAY, May 6

The Tariff Bill.—Lead.

The bill increasing the duties on certain imported articles was then taken up, together with the amendment offered by Mr. KANE, to lay a duty on lead in pigs, bars, or sheets, three cents per pound; on leaden shot, four cents per pound; on red or white lead, dry or ground in oil, five cents per pound; on litharge, and lead manufactured into pipes, five cents per pound.

Mr. KANE explained the object of the amendment.

Mr. PARRIS opposed it, and made some statements relative to the amount of the importations of the articles named.

Mr. BENTON spoke in favor of its adoption. He said he was a member of the Senate in 1824 when the existing tariff was enacted, and was in favor of a higher duty upon lead and its manufactures, at that time, but was prevented from making any motion to that effect by the admonition, often repeated, that the whole bill might be lost, if alterations were attempted. That tariff has been in operation four years, and except for the duty on lead, it had proved itself to be of no advantage to the State of Missouri. Being again under revision, and heavy duties proposed on many articles consumed, but not manufactured in Missouri, he considered it due to that State, and to the State of Illinois, to endeavor to obtain further protection for one of their principal staples, the article of lead; and the amendment now under consideration, having been well considered by himself and the Senator from Illinois, (Mr. KANE,) he could say that the duty on the crude article, and all its manufactures, was adjusted upon a full view of their relative connection and dependence on each other, and were believed to be fair and equal. The amendment had a further recommendation in including litharge, and several manufactures of lead, which were omitted in the tariff of 1824, and left open a door to various evasions of the act.

Mr. B. considered lead as one of the articles of domestic production on which the system of protecting duties might be legitimately carried to the prohibitory point against its foreign

MAY, 1828.]

The Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

rial. It was an article of prime necessity in time of war, absolutely indispensable to our security and independence as a nation, and susceptible of being produced at home to the full extent of any possible demand. He would not repeat what everybody knew about the variety, the extent, and the richness of the lead mines in the State of Missouri and on the Upper Mississippi. It was sufficient to say that past discoveries authorized the belief that innumerable fresh discoveries may be made; that the supply of the article will increase in full proportion to the demand for it; and that the ultimate product may be set down as boundless and inexhaustible. This being the fact, there could be no valid objection to the absolute exclusion of the foreign article. The amendment, however, does not go that length, but probably may operate as a prohibitory duty in the lapse of some years.

Mr. B. said that the reasons for granting this increased duty on lead, were, first, to secure to the United States an ample, certain, and regular supply of an article, indispensable in time of war; and next, to enable the States of Missouri and Illinois, in which this article abounded, to meet the additional burthens which this new tariff, if it became a law, would impose upon them. Lead furnishes the main part of these means. It will serve for remittances in payment of these woollen and cotton goods, which we are hereafter to receive at an augmented price from New England, and of course we should have augmented means of paying for them. Our ordinary productions of corn, wheat, pork, beef, whiskey, and tobacco, would be in no demand there, even if they could bear the expense of transportation, as the present complaint of New England against old England is, that she takes no provisions from her, of course New England will take none of these articles from us, and we must either pay for her woollens in gold or silver, which we must get from the South, or in such articles as will bear transportation. Lead and shot are among the few articles produced in Missouri and Illinois, which will bear transportation to New England, or which will command the money which will have to be carried there; and as these States are to buy their woollen goods from her at a greatly augmented price, it is but distributive justice that they should have augmented means of paying for them. With this view, and to obtain something like the monopoly of the American market in furnishing it with lead, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. KANE) and himself had agreed upon the terms of the amendment now under consideration. It specified a higher duty on lead and shot, than had been offered and rejected in the House of Representatives. That duty was only 50 per cent. on the existing duty; the present amendment proposed 100 per cent. It might be thought high; but he could say that it was not too high for the benefit of Missouri and Illinois; and if rejected, there would be nothing in the bill to induce him to vote for it.

Mr. B. concluded with saying, that the mineral district in Missouri was at present in a languishing state. The Government had lately reserved about 500,000 acres of land there, from sale, making a desert in the heart of the country; the old French and Spanish claims were yet unsettled; that the upper strata of mineral was much exhausted, and the lower could not be got at without much expense, and considerable skill in mineralogy; that many of the miners had gone off to the new mines on the upper Mississippi, and that the increased protection which the amendment contemplated was essential to the extensive revival of mining in Missouri, and the restoration of a large district to its former prosperity. If this amendment should be adopted, and if a bill for the sale of the reserved lead mines which he had introduced, and passed through the Senate in the fore part of the session, should succeed in getting through the House of Representatives, then might the mineral region in Missouri become the centre of an immense attraction, the theatre of vast enterprise, the seat of unnumbered manufactories, the focus of incredible wealth, a market for a prodigious consumption of merchandise and provisions; and the whole country can be made to rejoice in the profusion of benefits which it would disburse around.

Mr. ROWAN said that he should vote against the proposed duty upon lead, and as it was a Western product, and we might be supposed, on that account, to be inclined to support it, he felt it his duty to give some of the reasons which would induce him to vote against it.

He begged leave, however, to premise, that he was individually opposed to the whole system. He was opposed to the tariff, as a system of bounties, for the encouragement of certain classes of industry. He considered the protection, which it extended to one class of industry, as a correspondent depression upon other classes. Its professed object was to tax one part of the community for the benefit of another. Its operation is to impoverish one class of laborers, for the purpose of enriching another—or rather to tax the laboring, and more especially the agricultural portion of the community, to enrich the capitalists—to increase the poverty of those already poor, to enhance the wealth of those already rich—as a system, calculated to accelerate that state of wealth, in the hands of the few, which is incompatible with the happiness and liberty of the many—as a system, the tendency of which, is to inflict upon the people of this country the poverty, wretchedness, and vassalage, which characterize the people in Governments less favorable to liberty than ours.

He was not, he said, opposed to the tariff as a system of revenue, honestly devoted to the objects and purposes of revenue—on the contrary, he was friendly to a tariff of that character; but when perverted by the ambition of political aspirants, and the secret influence of inordinate cupidity, to purposes of individual, and sectional ascendancy, he could not be seduced by the captivation of names, or terms, however attractive, to lend it his individual support.

It is in vain, Mr. President, said he, that it is called the American System—names do not alter things. There is but one American system, and that is delineated in the State and Federal Constitutions. It is the system of equal rights and privileges secured by the representative principle—a system which, instead of subjecting the proceeds of the labor of some to taxation, in the view to enrich others, secures to all the proceeds of their labor—exempts all from taxation, except for the support of the protecting power of the Government. As a tax necessary to the support of the Government, he would support it—call it by what name you please—as a tax for any other purpose, and especially for the purposes to which he had alluded—it had his individual reprobation, under whatever name it might assume.

It might, he observed, be inferred from what he had said, that he would vote against the bill. He did not wish any doubts to be entertained as to the vote he should give upon this measure, or the reasons which would influence him to give it. He was not at liberty, he said, to substitute his individual opinion for that of his State. He was, he said, one of the organs here, of a State, that had, by the tariff of 1824, been chained to the car of the Eastern manufacturers—a State that had been from that time, and was now groaning under the pressure of that unequal and unjust measure—a measure, from the pressure of which, owing to the prevailing illusion throughout the United States, he saw no hope of escape, by a speedy return to correct principles—and seeing no hope of escaping from the ills of the system, she is constrained, on principles of self-defence, to avail herself of the mitigation which this bill presents, in the duties which it imposes upon foreign hemp, spirits, iron, and molasses. The hemp, iron, and distilled spirits of the West, will, like the woollens of the Eastern States, be encouraged to the extent of the tax indirectly imposed by this bill, upon those who shall buy and consume them. Those who may need, and buy those articles, must pay to the grower, or manufacturer of them, an increased price to the amount of the duties imposed upon the like articles of foreign growth or fabric. To this tax upon the labor of the consumer, his individual opinion was opposed. But, as the organ of the State of Kentucky, he felt himself bound to surrender his individual opinion, and express the opinion of his State.

If upon this, or any other subject, he should substitute his own, for the well-known will of his State, he should feel that he had been faithless to her interests, and unfriendly to the principles of our republican institutions. He had no doubt but the people of the State which he had the honor to represent, were, like him, opposed to taxation for any individual or partial purpose—for any purpose but the support of the Government. They would submit to and pay any tax cheerfully, for the protection of all, but not to enrich a few. But they are reduced by the operation of this American System, as it is falsely called, to the condition of the planter whose farm, fences, and houses, are endangered by fire from the forest. They, like him, must fire against the encroaching fire. The exercise of will is not left them—they are under the influence of a dire necessity. He must, therefore, as their humble organ, vote for this bill; and would, on the same principle, vote for this duty on lead, if he could do it without disparaging his Government. The mines of lead, with the exception of a few Spanish grants, which he had been told were nearly exhausted, belonged to the United States. To suppose that the Government to whose strength we all look for protection, so weak as to need protection against foreign competition in the manufacture and sale of this vulgar metal, was not, he thought, very respectful to the Government. He might be told that the Government leases its mines, and that the lessees, and not the Government, would be benefited by this duty. His reply was, that when you raise the price of lead, you raise rents. This would be inevitable. The competition between the lessees would necessarily produce this result; and thus, while the consumers of this necessary and useful article would be taxed, the manufacturer of it would not be benefited. The tax would go to the Government, and not to them. The western section of our country would not be benefited. It would be unjust; for the tax thus levied upon the consumers of that article, would be drawn from that region into the Treasury, and like all the very large sums which, under the tariff of 1824, and under the sales of the public lands, have been drawn from that quarter, would be laid out upon the seaboard. Not intending, he said, to take any part in the discussion of this bill, he had taken this occasion to intimate the course he should pursue upon this measure, and to express, very briefly, some of the reasons by which he was influenced. He had forbore to go into detail. He had not attempted to depict the evils which had been inflicted upon the Southern and Western States by this new system—a system peculiar to aristocrats and to monarchists—kinds of Government to which it naturally led, and to the support of which, it was as natural and necessary, as it was alien from and abhorred by republics. He repeated it as his opinion, that his State was driven to the acceptance of this bill, not as a good, which she approved, but as the softener of an evil, from which she cannot escape, and which, without the mitigation which it tenders, she is unable to bear.

The amendment was adopted.

MAY, 1828.]

The Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Furs.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by a provision laying a duty of 83½ per centum, ad valorem, on furs.

Mr. DICKERSON opposed the motion.

Mr. BENTON entered into a detail of the extent and value of the Northwestern fur trade, and the necessity under which the fur traders labored for protection from British competition.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the amendment by substituting 45 per cent. instead of 83½.

Mr. BENTON accepted the modification.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the amendment, by inserting 50 per cent. ad valorem, on foreign manufactured fur hats. He observed that, at present, furs were admitted duty free, and there was a duty of 80 per cent. on imported hats. If a duty were laid on furs, and the duty on hats remained the same, the manufacturer must give up making them.

Mr. BENTON asked whether there was not, at present, a prohibitory duty on foreign hats?

Mr. DICKERSON said that great numbers were still imported.

The motion was then rejected, 15 to 24.

On Mr. BENTON's amendment, the question was decided in the negative.

FRIDAY, May 9.

The Tariff Bill.—Indigo.

Mr. BENTON proposed an amendment, to impose a duty of 25 cents per pound on imported indigo, with a progressive increase at the rate of 25 cents per pound per annum, until the whole duty amounted to $1 per pound. He stated his object to be two-fold in proposing this duty, first, to place the American system beyond the reach of its enemies, by procuring a home supply of an article indispensable to its existence; and next, to benefit the South by reviving the cultivation of one of its ancient and valuable staples.

Indigo was first planted in the Carolinas and Georgia about the year 1740, and succeeded so well as to command the attention of the British manufacturers and the British Parliament. An act was passed for the encouragement of its production, in these colonies, in the reign of George the Second, the preamble to which Mr. B. read, and recommended to the consideration of the Senate. It recited that a regular, ample, and certain supply of indigo was indispensable to the success of British manufactures; that these manufactures were then dependent upon foreigners for a supply of this article; and that it was the dictate of a wise policy to encourage the production of it at home. The act then went on to direct that a premium of six pence sterling should be paid out of the British Treasury for every pound of indigo imported into Great Britain, from the Carolinas and Georgia. Under the fostering influence of this bounty, said Mr. B., the cultivation of indigo became great and extensive. In six years after the passage of the act, the export was 217,000 lbs., and at the breaking out of the revolution, it amounted to 1,100,000 lbs. The Southern colonies became rich upon it; for the cultivation of cotton was then unknown; rice and indigo were the staples of the South. After the revolution, and especially after the great territorial acquisitions which the British made in India, the cultivation of American indigo declined. The premium was no longer paid; and the British Government, actuated by the same wise policy which made them look for a home supply of this article from the Carolinas, when they were a part of the British possessions, now looked to India for the same reason. The export of American indigo rapidly declined. In 1800 it had fallen to 400,000 lbs.; in 1814 to 40,000 lbs.; and in the last few years to 6,000 or 8,000 lbs. In the mean time our manufactories were growing up; and having no supply of indigo at home, they had to import from abroad. In 1826 this importation amounted to 1,150,000 lbs., costing a fraction less than two millions of dollars, and had to be paid for almost entirely in ready money, as it was chiefly obtained from places where American produce was in no demand. Upon this state of facts, Mr. B. conceived it to be the part of a wise and prudent policy to follow the example of the British Parliament in the reign of George II., and provide a home supply of this indispensable article. Our manufacturers now paid a high price for fine indigo, no less than $2 50 per pound, as testified by one of themselves before the Committee on Manufactures raised in the House of Representatives. The duty which he proposed was only 40 per cent. upon that value, and would not even reach that rate for four years. It was less than one-half the duty which the same bill proposed to lay instantaneously upon the very cloth which this indigo was intended to dye. In the end it would make all indigo come cheaper to the manufacturer, as the home supply would soon be equal, if not superior to the demand; and in the mean time, it could not be considered a tax on the manufacturer, as he would levy the advance which he had to pay, with a good interest, upon the wearer of the cloth.

Mr. B. then went into an exposition of the reasons for encouraging the home production of indigo, and showed that the life of the American system depended upon it. Neither cotton nor woollen manufactures could be carried on without indigo. The consumption of that article was prodigious. Even now, in the infant state of our manufactories, the importation was worth two millions of dollars; and must soon be worth double or treble that sum. For this great supply of an indispensable article, we were chiefly indebted to the jealous rival, and vigilant enemy, of these very manufactures, to Great Britain herself. Of the 1,150,000 lbs. of indigo imported, we bring 620,000 lbs. from the British East Indies; which one word from the British Government would stop forever; we bring the further quantity of 120,000 lbs. from Manilla, a Spanish possession, which British influence and diplomacy could immediately stop; and the remainder came from different parts of South America, and might be taken from us by the arts of diplomacy, or by a monopoly of the whole on the part of our rival. A stoppage of a supply of indigo for one year, would prostrate all our manufactories, and give them a blow from which they would not recover in many years. Great Britain could effect this stoppage to the amount of three-fourths of the whole quantity, by speaking a single word, and of the remainder by a slight exertion of policy, or the expenditure of a sum sufficient to monopolize for one year, the purchase of what South America sent into the market.

Mr. B. said he expected a unanimous vote in favor of his amendment. The North should vote for it to secure the life of the American system; to give a proof of their regard for the South; to show that the country south of the Potomac is included in the bill for some other purpose besides that of oppression. The South itself, although opposed to the further increase of duties, should vote for this duty; that the bill, if it passes, may contain one provision favorable to its interests. The West should vote for it through gratitude for fifty years of guardian protection, generous defence, and kind assistance, which the South had given it under all its trials; and for the purpose of enlarging the market, increasing the demand in the South, and its ability to purchase the horses, mules, and provisions which the West can sell nowhere else. For himself he had personal reasons for wishing to do this little justice to the South. He was a native of one of these States (North Carolina)—the bones of his father and his grandfathers rested there. Her Senators and Representatives were his early and his hereditary friends. The venerable Senator before him (Mr. MACON) had been the friend of him and his, through four generations in a straight line; the other Senator (Mr. BRANCH) was his schoolfellow; the other branch of the Legislature, the House of Representatives, always showed him in the North Carolina Delegation, the friends of him and his through successive generations. Nor was this all. He felt for the sad changes which had taken place in the South in the last fifty years. Before the revolution it was the seat of wealth as well as of hospitality. Money, and all that it commanded, abounded there. But how now? All this is reversed.

Wealth has fled from the South, and settled in the regions north of the Potomac, and this in the midst of the fact that the South, in four staples alone, in cotton, tobacco, rice, and indigo, (while indigo was one of its staples,) had exported produce since the revolution, to the value of eight hundred millions of dollars, and the North had exported comparatively nothing. This sum was prodigious; it was nearly equal to half the coinage of the mint of Mexico since the conquest by Cortez. It was twice or thrice the amount of the product of the three thousand gold and silver mines of Mexico, for the same period of fifty years. Such an export would indicate unparalleled wealth; but what was the fact? In place of wealth, a universal pressure for money was felt; not enough for current expenses; the price of all property down; the country drooping and languishing; towns and cities decaying; and the frugal habits of the people pushed to the verge of universal self-denial, for the preservation of their family estates. Such a result is a strange and wonderful phenomenon. It calls upon statesmen to inquire into the cause; and if they inquire upon the theatre of this strange metamorphosis, they will receive one universal answer from all ranks and all ages, that it is Federal legislation which has worked this ruin. Under this legislation the exports of the South have been made the basis of the Federal revenue. The twenty odd millions annually levied upon imported goods, are deducted out of the price of their cotton, rice, and tobacco, either in the diminished price which they receive for these staples in foreign ports, or in the increased price which they pay for the articles they have to consume at home. Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia, may be said to defray three-fourths of the annual expense of supporting the Federal Government; and of this great sum annually furnished by them, nothing, or next to nothing, is returned to them in the shape of Government expenditure. That expenditure flows in an opposite direction; it flows northwardly, in one uniform, uninterrupted and perennial stream; it takes the course of trade, and of exchange; and this is the reason why wealth disappears from the South, and rises up in the North. Federal legislation does all this; it does it by the simple process of eternally taking away from the South, and returning nothing to it. If it returned to the South the whole, or even a good part of what it exacted, the four States south of the Potomac might stand the action of this system, as the earth is enabled to stand the exhausting influence of the sun's daily heat by the refreshing dews which are returned to it at night; but as the earth is dried up, and all vegetation destroyed in regions where the heat is great, and no dews returned, so must the South be exhausted of its money, and its property, by a course of legislation which is forever taking from it, and never returning any thing to it.

Every new tariff increases the force of this action. No tariff has ever yet included Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia, within its provisions, except to increase the burthens imposed upon them. This one alone presents the opportunity to form an exception, by re-

May, 1828.]

The Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

living and restoring the cultivation of one of its ancient staples, one of the sources of its wealth before the revolution. The Tariff of 1828 owes this reparation to the South, because the Tariff of 1816 contributed to destroy the cultivation of indigo; sunk the duty on the foreign article, from twenty-five to fifteen cents per pound. These are the reasons for imposing the duty on indigo, now proposed. What objections can possibly be raised to it? Not to the quality: for it is the same which laid the foundation of the British manufactures, and sustained their reputation for more than half a century; not to the quantity: for the two Carolinas and Georgia alone raised as much fifty years ago as we now import, and we have now the States of Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi, and the Territories of Florida and Arkansas, to add to the countries which produce it; not to the amount of the duty: for its maximum will be but forty per cent., only one-half the duty laid by this bill on the cloth it is to dye, and that maximum, not immediate, but attained by slow degrees at the end of four years, in order to give time for the domestic article to supply the place of the imported; and after all, it is not a duty on the manufacturer, but on the wearer of the goods; from whom he levies, with a good interest on the price of the cloths, all that he expends in the purchase of materials. For once, said Mr. B., I expect a unanimous vote on a clause in the tariff. This indigo clause must have the singular and unprecedented fatuity of a unanimous voice in its favor. The South must vote for it, to revive the cultivation of one of its most ancient and valuable staples; the West must vote for it through gratitude for past favors—through gratitude for the vote on hemp this night—and to save, enlarge, and increase the market for its own productions; the North must vote for it to show their disinterestedness; to give one proof of just feeling towards the South; and, above all, to save their favorite American system from the deadly blow which Great Britain can at any moment give it, by stopping or interrupting the supplies of foreign indigo; and the whole Union, the entire legislative body, must vote for it, and vote for it with joy and enthusiasm, because it is impossible that Americans can deny to sister States of the Confederacy, what a British king and a British Parliament granted to these same States when they were colonies and dependencies of the British crown.

SATURDAY, May 10.

The Tariff Bill.—Indigo.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to discharge from the special orders the bill to alter the several acts levying duties on imports; which having been agreed to, the general orders preceding that bill were postponed, on motion of Mr. DICKERSON, and it was taken up. The motion of Mr. BEN-

RON, adding ten cents to the present duty on indigo, and 25 cents per annum afterwards, until it amounts to one dollar per pound, being under consideration—

Mr. MACON addressed the Senate in a speech of two hours in length, supporting the provision, and treating at large of the general policy of the bill, and its operation on the various sections of the country. He contended that the benefits of the system had been confined to the people of the Eastern States, and that the South had suffered severely under its influence.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to divide the question. He was disposed to protect the article, and he wished that the first part should succeed. Fifty cents per pound appeared to him to be quite sufficient, and he thought the amendment as it stood proposed too high a rate of duty. He asked that the question be taken by yeas and nays on the first part; which were ordered.

Mr. DICKERSON said that the proposition now advanced would add to the duty 25 cents in one year, which he thought far too rapid. The article was not now produced in any great quantity—certainly not sufficient to supply the consumption of the country; nor would it be in the course of one year. He was entirely willing that the article should receive an ample degree of protection. In doing this, however, common justice would point out that it ought not to be done so as to injure the manufacturer. If it was brought on suddenly, injury must be sustained by the manufacturing consumer, which would not be felt if the progress of the duty was gradual. The average price of the indigo imported was one dollar seventy-one cents. The duties now proposed on it would be about fifty-eight per cent., while the duty proposed on wool would be fifty-one per cent.; making, on the raw material and the dye, a charge disproportioned to the protection of the manufactured article. It was true that the coloring matter used in a yard of cloth was very small, but it would be felt very sensibly. The additional duty on the manufactured article was only forty-five per cent., and could not, consequently, bear any great decrease, by way of duty on the materials of their fabrics. [Here Mr. D. made some statements as to the amount of indigo imported, which our Reporter cannot accurately state.] Believing that the manufacturers could not bear this duty, unless a correspondent advance should be made on the duty on cloths, because indigo could not be produced in sufficient quantities at present, he was of opinion that fifty cents on the pound would be as much as the blue cloths could bear. He therefore moved to amend the amendment, by striking out, and inserting five cents, until it arrives at fifty cents, instead of one dollar.

Mr. BENTON said that it appeared by the evidence before the other House, that the first dye used by the manufacturers was of an inferior description, and that they afterwards made use of a fine dye. Three-fourths of the indigo used came from the British and Spanish East Indies; and it was testified that the fine quality cost about $2 50 per pound. That from Guatemala was of an inferior kind, and cheaper; taken together, the two descriptions of indigo imported amounted to a fraction less than one million of dollars. If the amendment offered by him (Mr. B.) was adopted, there would be no necessity for importing the inferior kind, and perhaps not to a great extent, the best. Now, the rate of his amendment was far from being exorbitant. On the fine indigo, of which the greatest amount was consumed, the maximum of duty was forty per cent. This certainly was reasonable, when the duty on woollens was seventy per cent., giving thirty per cent. in their favor. By this new proposition the duty on indigo would become twenty per cent., just half the additional protection enjoyed by the woollens on the passage of this bill. If this proposition was to succeed, it would be better and fairer to face the South at once, and say that they shall receive no benefit and no protection from this bill. The friends of the American system had better at once declare to the South that they have no lot or portion under that system. Better give them a direct refusal at once, that they may understand the exact extent of the American system, and whether it includes merely that portion of the Union in which its friends are interested.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, thought it was extraordinary that this proposition should be opposed, and on the grounds on which it was objected to. We are to do nothing which shall not be for the benefit of woollens and iron, and aid no other interest for fear it will conflict with them. I recollect, said Mr. S., that I told the friends of the tariff system in 1816, that the British were about doing the same thing, in relation to their woollen manufacturers, as was proposed by this system; and that it would be, in the end, much worse for the manufacturer than it then was; but they would not believe me. I was not mistaken, however, and it was easy to come at the fact. We got the papers from England, in which the matter was discussed. Then the friends of the system said that it was our policy to oppose and compete with Great Britain. It does not now seem that the same doctrine is held, for they are not willing to extend it to all the articles of this country's production. He objected entirely to the manner in which this bill was got up. Here was one interest opposing another, and a measure proposed which he did not think could be justly arranged by Congress in current legislation. Such a tariff ought to come from the Treasury Department to be well digested, and provide for all the different interests without injuring any. It was, it seemed, quite satisfactory to some, so long as it did sufficient for the woollens. That appeared to be all that was wanted. The bill, in his opinion, had not been sufficiently considered as to its consequences on the country. In the other House it should have been inquired into and reported upon by the Committee of Ways and Means. I see, said Mr. S., that the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. DICKERSON) smiles significantly, as much as to ask whether I suppose he would trust the bill in the hands of its enemies. This, however, is my opinion. I do not think that woollens alone are to be protected at the expense of other important articles.

Mr. HAYNE said he was opposed to this bill in its principles as well as in its details. It could assume no shape which would make it acceptable to him, or which could prevent it from operating most oppressively and unjustly on his constituents. With these views, he had determined to make no motion to amend the bill in any respect whatever; but when such motions were made by others, and he was compelled to vote on them, he knew no better rule than to endeavor to make the bill consistent with itself. On this principle he had acted in all the votes he had given on this bill. He had endeavored to carry out to its legitimate consequences what gentlemen are pleased to miscall the "American System." With a fixed resolution to vote against the bill, he still considered himself at liberty to assist in so arranging the details, as to extend to every great interest, and to all portions of the country, as far as may be practicable, equal protection, and to distribute the burthens of the system equally, in order that its benefits as well as its evils may be fully tested. On this principle, he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, because it was in strict conformity with all the principles of the bill. As a Southern man, he would ask no boon for the South—he should propose nothing; but he must say that the protection of indigo rested on the same principles as every other article proposed to be protected by this bill, and he did not see how gentlemen could, consistently with their maxims, vote against it. What was the principle on which this bill was professedly founded? If there was any principle at all in the bill, it was that, whenever the country had the capacity to produce an article with which any imported article could enter into competition, the domestic product was to be protected by a duty. Now, had the Southern States the capacity to produce indigo? The soil and climate of those States were well suited to the culture of the article. At the commencement of the revolution our exports of the article amounted to no less than 1,100,000 lbs. The whole quantity now imported into the United States is only 1,150,000 lbs.; so that the capacity of the country to produce a sufficient quantity of indigo to supply the wants of the manufacturers is unquestionable. It is true that the quantity now produced in the country is not great.

In 1818	only 700 lbs. of domestic indigo was exported.
In 1825	9,955 do.
In 1826	5,289 do.

Mar, 1828.]

The Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

This proves that the attention of the country is now directed to the subject. The Senator from Indiana, in some remarks which he made on this subject yesterday, stated that, according to the principles of the American system, (so called,) protection was not extended to any article which the country was not in the habit of exporting. This is entirely a mistake. Of the articles protected by the Tariff of 1824, as well as those included in this bill, very few are exported at all. Among these are iron, woollens, hemp, flax, and several others. If indigo is to be protected at all, the duties proposed must surely be considered extremely reasonable, the maximum proposed being much below that imposed by this bill on wool, woollens, and other articles. The duty on indigo till 1816, was 25 cents per pound. It was then (in favor of the manufacturers) reduced to 15 cents. The first increase of duty proposed here, is only to put back the old duty of 25 cents per pound, equal to an ad valorem duty of from 10 to 15 per cent.—and the maximum is only from 40 to 58 per cent. ad valorem, and that will not accrue for several years to come. With this statement of facts, Mr. H. said he would leave the question in the hands of those gentlemen who were engaged in giving this bill the form in which it is to be submitted to the final decision of the Senate. He did not wish to be considered as taking any peculiar interest in this question, in any aspect but this: that he wished his constituents to be made to understand whether the American system means a system for the exclusive benefit of particular employments, and particular States, or whether it is to be carried out to embrace every branch of industry in the country—whether the manufacturers were the only class in the country who are to enjoy the protection of this system.

Mr. KNIGHT said that this was an additional tax on the manufacturer, without, as he conceived, any benefit to anybody. We have no evidence that the article is produced, or will be produced, in any quantity fit for use in this country—that so onerous were the duties already on the materials used in coloring, that the British manufacturer, with whom we had to compete, was enabled to put his colored goods into the market at 12 mills less per square yard than the American manufacturer can do; in other words, that the duties paid by the American manufacturer on materials for coloring amounted to 12 mills the square yard more than they cost the British manufacturer.

Mr. DICKERSON did not doubt the capacity of the Southern country to produce all the indigo required for the consumption of the country. It was a valuable article, and its production ought to be encouraged to a reasonable extent; but it could not be carried beyond that without injuring the manufacturers. The reason why the culture of indigo had not received greater attention, was, he believed, because the capital of the South had been turned to cotton; and that being now the direction of the capital of the country, he believed no great amount would be immediately turned to indigo, and, therefore, that the high duty would be a hardship to the manufacturer, without a corresponding benefit to the agriculturist. He believed that, for some years, the South would choose to sell their cotton to those countries whence the indigo was brought, to raising large crops of the latter. He hoped it would in a few years be produced, and he did not doubt it would; and, as the production progressed, it would be right to extend the duty on the blue cloths, and, in a corresponding degree, upon indigo.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that he did not know but the proposition was a fair one—as fair as could be expected from the quarter whence it came. But the object of the gentleman from Missouri was to create a sudden excitement, by which the agriculturist would be induced to go at once into the production of indigo, so that, in a few years, no indigo would be imported. At present we get our indigo chiefly from Bengal. And it was interesting to know how it was purchased. For every pound that is imported we pay specie, for it can be purchased in no other way. We cannot find, in return, a consumption of our produce, which is an additional consideration in favor of the protection of the home product. Some time next year the Bengal ships would be on their return, and, in the mean time, the effect of the excitement which the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri would have given in favor of its culture, would have operated to a considerable extent, and in five years you will not be under the necessity of importing the article at all. Mr. S. moved to divide the question, so as to take the vote first on striking out; which, the question being taken, was decided as follows:—Yeas 23, nays 23.

The vote being equal, the Chair voted in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the amendment, by striking out "one dollar," and inserting "fifty cents," making the increase of duty proposed by Mr. BENTON, stop at the latter amount.

On this motion a question of order arose, which was debated at some length by Messrs. KING, VAN BUREN, DICKERSON, WEBSTER, MACON, HARRISON, WOODBURY, BRANCH, and CHANDLER.

The question, which was admitted to be a doubtful one by Mr. Jefferson, in his Manual, whether, after having refused to strike out a portion of a bill, the part proposed to be struck out was amendable, was submitted to the Senate by the Chair, and the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. DICKERSON then renewed his motion.

Mr. WEBSTER said, in relation to the duty proposed on indigo, that he considered 25 cents per annum too sudden an augmentation, and one which, he thought, would outrun the production. He should think five cents per annum a reasonable increase, and accordingly moved to strike out 20, so as to make the increase of duty 5 cents per annum; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON moved to amend the amendment, by inserting 10 cents for the first year, 5 cents for the second year, and 10 cents for each successive year, until the duty shall amount to fifty cents per pound.

Mr. BENTON moved a call of the House, as there were three or four members absent from their seats.

Mr. CHANDLER opposed it on the ground that it had never been practised in the Senate; which statement was corroborated by the Chair.

The motion was waived.

Mr. DICKERSON said, although he was willing to allow the gradual increase of the duty to 50 cents per pound, yet the amendment was not what he designed. The advance for the first year was too great, as ten cents on the quantity imported next year would be more than $120,000. It could not be expected that any indigo would be produced in one year, although it might in two or three years. Yet, although no good would at once be experienced by the agriculturist, the duty falls on the manufacturers immediately. For this reason he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that his difficulty, in relation to this proposition, was only want of information. It had been introduced last night, at a late hour, and no time had been afforded for examination as to the quantity produced, or as to the quality of the domestic article. As to the Bengal indigo, on the way to this country, this duty will have the effect to raise its price in the market, at once. Little benefit will be derived by the planter, while it will lay a heavy tax on the manufacturers.

Mr. BENTON said he was astonished to find the Representatives of sister States refusing to three States a protection which was granted by a monarch: for a bounty had been given by Great Britain when we were her colonies, on this article. The gentleman from New Jersey was now endeavoring to shift his ground, which was always a most dangerous attempt.

To change one's front—whether in military or in legislative manœuvres, was always more or less dangerous. But it now comes out. The article is found now, not to be of sufficiently good quality for the American system. We must have Bengal indigo, which is brought from the British East Indies and Manilla, equally under the influence of Great Britain. So that it now appears that this same system, in relation to which we were formerly told that it was to oppose Great Britain, is dependent on that country; this very Great Britain, which we have been told de die in diem, must be opposed by the American system, is to have the preference, in the production of indigo, to our own citizens.

The gentleman from Massachusetts shows us, by this, that the American system depends on the British Government for its existence. I say, sir, that this is a fair inference. For I have proof which is better than the opinions of gentlemen, however high their stations, but who do not happen to be indigo dyers, that this article can be produced in perfection in this country. I have the authority of indigo dyers for this assertion. But do we want better proof of this, than that the bounty was given by the British Government on American indigo, and that the British factories were built up on American indigo before the revolution! The export, at the commencement of the war, into England, was about the same as the import into this country now. If the present plan is adopted, at the end of 4 or 5 years, the duty will be 20 per cent. It is contemptible—it is an insult to the South. It shows them that they can only receive the benefits of the system far below the rate of protection which is extended to the manufacturer. They are to be allowed 20 per cent. on the article in five years, while the cloths of New England are placed at 70 per cent. instant. Through a variety of questions this motion had been followed up. Even in the agonies of death it was hunted down by the friends of the American system. And now we are told that it will occur too soon—that it must be deferred to a later period. This, then, is the American system, extending to but one or two interests, and leaving others untouched. I expressed a hope last night that the friends of the tariff bill would give the only proof to the South in their power, that they too were included in the American system. It seems, however, that this paltry boon is to be refused. I beg gentlemen to spare their strength, as I have motions yet behind that will require all their energies. It seems to me unconscionable that the manufacturers should desire to grasp the whole 70 per cent. upon their productions, and refuse to do a little for the agricultural community. Now I ask, whether the friends of the American system do not, by their decision upon this motion, show clearly that it depends upon Great Britain for its existence? It is the inevitable conclusion, from their own arguments. They have their choice of the horns of the dilemma—and they have chosen this. The American system then depends upon Great Britain, and she will doubtless cherish it with kindness and affection.

The question being taken on adopting the amendment as amended, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the bill, by inserting a clause laying an additional duty of 5 cents per annum on the pound of indigo, until it arrives to 50 cents; which was decided in the affirmative.

EVENING SESSION.

Cordaga.

The motion offered by Mr. SMITH, of Mary-

MAY, 1828.]

The Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

land, to lay an additional duty of five cents on cordage, was discussed by Messrs. WEBSTER, DICKERSON, and SMITH, of Maryland.

Mr. ROWAN said, that it seemed at first that the duty on hemp would be of no importance to the agriculturist, because it could not be produced in this country. But now it appeared to be of sufficient importance to swell the price of hemp itself, and call for a duty on cordage. He should vote against the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that the gentleman supposed that this duty would not add a single blade to the product of the domestic article. Yet, it will increase the price of manufactured hemp. And the question is, whether you will purchase the foreign manufactured article, or that manufactured in this country. Does he not see, that, if we lay a heavy duty on raw hemp, it will be a bounty on the foreign manufactured article, unless that is taxed also? Does he not see, that, if we intend to keep the manufacture of hemp alive in this country, we must lay a duty on the foreign manufactured article? He merely rose to make this statement, because he thought the gentleman under a misapprehension of the intention of his motion.

Mr. PARRIS said, that the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) is correct, and ought to have its weight, unless this article be already protected. To show whether that is the case, a statement of a few facts only would be necessary. The existing duty on cordage is $89 60 per ton. The duty contemplated by the bill on imported hemp, will be $60 per ton, when it shall have arrived at its ultimatum; thus giving the domestic manufactured article an advantage of nearly $30 per ton over the same article of foreign manufacture. This would seem to be sufficient protection. If gentlemen think so, they will negative the amendment. Only one other fact need be stated. There is not, now, nor has there been for years, a pound of foreign cordage used on American tonnage. It is imported only for exportation as an article of trade. During the last year, the importation of this article exceeded 1,500,000 pounds; the principal part of which was from Russia, and of course encumbered with the same expense for freight, insurance, &c., as the unmanufactured hemp. The exportation of cordage, for drawback, during the same year, somewhat exceeded that quantity, principally to Cuba, Brazil, and Chili. Mr. P. said, as he was opposed to the increased duty on hemp, he should uniformly vote against any additional duty on manufactures from that article.

Mr. ROWAN said he rose to acknowledge that he had taken an erroneous view of the operation of this amendment. He was convinced, from the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the effect of the duty on cordage would be beneficial to the hemp-growing interest of this country, and, as he was always ready to admit any erroneous impression, he should now consider himself bound to vote for the amendment.

The motion was rejected.

Raw Wool.

Mr. BENTON moved a progressive duty on wool on the skin, to make it entirely prohibitory in four years.

On this motion a debate ensued, in which Messrs. BENTON, DICKERSON, CHANDLER, and HARRISON participated.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said that he did not rise to discuss the question, but to show that it was idle to go on with the debate at present. Within the last thirty-four hours the Senate had been in session twenty hours, which had been entirely employed in the discussion of the tariff bill—the strikings out, and the puttings in. Such continued labor might do for others, but he had neither the nerves nor the lungs to go farther in this fatiguing business. He considered that it was too much for the human frame. He therefore moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WOODBURY moved that the hour of adjournment be noted on the journal; and asked the yeas and nays. The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative.

MONDAY, May 12.

The Tariff Bill.—Raw Wool.

The bill altering the acts imposing duties on imports, was again taken up; and the motion of Mr. BENTON, to prohibit the importation of raw wool, by gradual advances, so as to go into effect in the year 1832, being under consideration, the question was put, and decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON then proposed to amend, by inserting a provision, laying a duty of ten per centum per annum on wool unmanufactured, until it shall amount to 50 per centum ad valorem, and 5 per centum afterwards, until it amounts to 70 per cent.

This motion was briefly discussed by Messrs. BENTON, SMITH of Md., HAYNE, and DICKERSON; when the question was taken, it was negatived.

Molasses.

Mr. BENTON moved that a duty of six cents per gallon, in addition to the duty of ten cents in the bill, be laid on imported molasses, to take effect on the 30th day of June, 1830, so as to make the whole duty on that article amount to sixteen cents per gallon after that time. This proposition he supported in a speech of considerable length, in which he went back to the first proposition under the Federal Government to impose a duty on molasses; and showed that it was then considered as a duty on sugar. This statement he confirmed by a recurrence to the first tariff of 1790, reported by a Committee of the House of Representatives, of which Mr. Madison was Chairman, in which brown sugar was dutied at one cent per pound, and molasses at eight cents per gallon; and the two duties held to be equal, as a gallon of molasses was admitted to be equal in weight, and superior in saccharine matter, to eight pounds of brown sugar.

Both were treated as duties upon sugar; one in its granular, and the other in its fluid state; and the House of Representatives sustained that idea, and voted the two duties as reported. But in the Senate this equality was altered, upon the earnest representation of the New England members, that molasses was used principally for distillation, and not as a substitute for sugar in that section of the Union; and the duty was reduced, under this belief, from eight to two and a half cents per gallon. Since that time this idea has prevailed; and in the enactment of subsequent tariffs, molasses has nearly escaped all duty, while brown sugar has twice been subjected to an advance of duty, and each time to an advance of one hundred per cent. upon its original amount. The tariff, now in force, levies three cents a pound on brown sugar, and only five cents a gallon on molasses; the tariff now under consideration proposes an advance of only five cents a gallon on molasses; and the amendment proposed only contemplates a further advance of six cents, to take effect two years hence.

Mr. B. said that he was induced to revive the original idea of taxing molasses as sugar, by a piece of information which had been given to the Senate a few nights ago by the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) in the debate on New England rum, in which that liquor was treated as the antagonist of Western whiskey, and the foreign material out of which it was made, was shown to be the rival of domestic grain, and of course entitled to no favor from a legislature professing to be a friend to the American System. That Senator, in the course of that debate, declared, upon this floor, that this was a mistake; that molasses in New England was used principally on the table, and not in the stills; and that of the ten millions of gallons annually imported into that section of the Union, not more than two millions were distilled into rum. This would leave eight millions of gallons, equivalent to sixty-four millions of pounds of brown sugar, to be used as sugar; and shows that the New England statesmen of the year 1790, however correct at the time, were prodigiously mistaken as to the future distillation of molasses; and that this mistake led the Congress since that day, into a great error; an error which has pervaded our legislation ever since, destroyed the equality of the sugar tax, and deprived the Treasury of an immense revenue. But that mistake is now corrected. The important fact is now admitted, that four-fifths of the molasses imported into New England, are consumed as sugar; and the knowledge of this fact suggests grave questions to the American statesman in reference to our revenue, the equal distribution of our taxes, and the preservation of a market for our domestic sugar and molasses.

Mr. B. would briefly touch these great questions, and leave many of their results to be pursued and developed by the minds of others.

1. As it concerns the revenue.—The Treasury, he said, was an enormous loser. Eight millions of gallons of molasses were equal to 64 millions of pounds of sugar; this quantity of sugar, at the present rate of duty, would pay $1,920,000; its equivalent in molasses, under the existing duty of five cents per gallon, has only paid $400,000; under the proposed duty in the bill, it will only pay $800,000; and even if carried to 16 cents, will still pay but $1,280,000. The result was, that the Treasury had heretofore lost upon this item, $1,520,000 per annum; that it was destined to lose under the operation of the bill as it stood, a further annual sum of $1,120,000; and even if his amendment should be adopted, the annual loss would still be $640,000. This loss, though great, would still be so much less than that now suffered, that Mr. B. would be willing to compromise upon it, and leave to his New England brethren the quiet enjoyment of so great an advantage, until the time came round for a general revision of the tariff and an extensive reduction and equalization of duties consequent upon the extinction of the public debt.

2. As it concerns the equal distribution of the public taxes.—The tax upon brown sugar is one of the heaviest that is imposed. That article is dutied at three cents a pound, which, with the merchant's profit upon that sum, makes it cost nearly four cents higher in the pound. The aggregate tax for the last three years, shows an average of two millions and a quarter of dollars per annum. This is a tax upon a necessary of life; it is a tax upon an article consumed by the poor; it is a tax chiefly paid by the people of the Middle, Southern, and Western States; for they cannot use molasses as a substitute. Their interior position forbids the extensive use of an article which is spoilt and wasted in a long overland transportation. The commercial tables prove this fact, for while New England alone annually imports ten millions of gallons of molasses, all the rest of the Union put together—the eighteen other States and three territories united, only imported three millions of gallons! This proves the fact that molasses is but little used as a substitute for sugar, outside of New England; it proves the fact that the present great revenue derived from brown sugar is chiefly paid by citizens of other parts of the Union; and it presents the question to the American statesman, how far it is right in itself, how far it is consistent with the principles of our confederacy, how far it is just towards the inhabitants of the Middle, Southern, and Western States, to devolve the burthen of the sugar tax upon them, and relieve the

MAY, 1828.]

The Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

New England people from it, by continuing the vast inequality of duty upon the granularly and the fluid state of the article?

Mr. B. here addressed himself directly to a Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MARKE,) who had allowed his feelings, a few days before, to carry him so far as to throw out a very odious imputation on the Committee of the House of Representatives, which had reported the Tariff bill of the present session. That imputation was to this effect: that the increased duty on molasses was put into the bill for the purpose of poisoning it; and preventing the New England members from voting for it. Mr. B. repelled this imputation, as a satire upon the New England members, whose patriotism it would seem to rate so low, and as an unjust and disorderly attack upon members of the other branch of the Legislature; and said to the Senator who had made it, that he would confront him with very eminent authority from his own State, the speech of Mr. Fitzsimmons, a distinguished member of Congress from the State of Pennsylvania, in the year '90, who supported Mr. Madison in his proposal to place an equal duty on sugar and molasses; and supported him on the express ground, that the people of Pennsylvania should not, by his vote, be made to pay more tax on their sweetening than the people of New England paid on theirs.

Mr. B. concluded with a compliment to the vigilance, sagacity, perseverance, and unity of action, which had enabled the New England members, heretofore, to appropriate to themselves all the benefits, and leave to others all the burthens of the different tariffs. He did not blame them for it. Their paramount duty was to their constituents, and they discharged that duty with a zeal and assiduity worthy of all praise. But he should blame himself if he did not profit from their example. His paramount duty was to the people of Missouri; and this duty required his best exertions to protect her staples, and to equalize, if possible, the burthens and the benefits of the present tariff. This was all that he was aiming at, either in the present motion, or in the motions made, or to be made by him; and he wished it to be so understood by all concerned.

The motion of Mr. BENTON was decided in a negative.

Woollen Blankets.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the duty on woollen blankets. In support of this motion Mr. B. observed, that blankets were an article of necessity, required by every body; but mostly by the poorest people. They were also required for slaves, and Indians, and, indeed, no class could do without them. There had always been a distinction between the duty on blankets and other woollen goods, in the various tariffs, on the ground that they were of prime necessity. There was another reason which might be urged for removing this duty. It was, that the manufacture was not competent to the supply of the consumption of the country, and, as the duty would only benefit a few individuals, while the poorer classes suffered in proportion—as the Senate had refused to put any further duty on wool, he thought it would be but reasonable to take off the duty on blankets. Another reason in favor of this motion, was, that blankets were essential in the Indian trade. At present the British brought them across the lines, while they also introduced their furs into this country free of duty. This was very bad policy: for, had these furs been taxed $87\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the revenue would have gained a million of dollars, and our trade have received ample protection. If the duty was continued, it would be a great injury to the revenue, and act, besides, as a heavy imposition on the poorest class of our community. He should be glad if the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures would give the amount of the manufacture of the article in this country, and its increase since 1824. The duty was not such as was given to the grower, when a paltry protection was extended to him, which was always gradual, but came down instantly upon the consumer.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, wished to know whether the manufacture had increased since 1824. At that time Congress laid a duty of 25 per cent. on the article, and he wished to know what had been its effect.

Mr. DICKERSON did not think the manufacture had increased to a very great extent. But the country was amply capable of producing the whole of the consumption.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made some further remarks, to show that the duty levied in 1824, had not operated effectually to increase the manufacture of blankets.

Mr. EATON opposed the motion, and read a statement of a Commissary to show the operation of the duties of 1824, on the price of the article, from which he argued, that a beneficial effect had been produced by the duty. The price had very sensibly decreased within a few years, which, he believed, must have been produced by the competition in our country, and the increase of the manufacture.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks in reply, attributing the fall of the prices, as was understood, to the reduction, by Great Britain, of the tax on wool imported into that country.

The proposed amendment was negatived.

Furs.—Hemp.—Silks.—Cotton Bagging.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend, by inserting a provision laying a duty on furs, of all kinds, of $33\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. according to the value.

Mr. BENTON remarked, that, when he proposed this duty, formerly, it was supposed that it would injure the manufacture of hats. But as one ounce of fur only was now put into a beaver hat, this duty would make but $8\frac{1}{2}$ cents addition on each hat, while the revenue would be one hundred thousand dollars. He hoped the manufacturing interest would not spring forward to prevent so important a provision.

The question was decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill in the 8d section, by adding to the duty on hemp "ten dollars per ton, annually, until it amounts to ninety dollars," which motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to amend the bill, by inserting, "on all manufactures of silk, from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, 80 per cent., and on all manufactures of silk, from countries this side of the Cape, 20 per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. WOODBURY said the effect of this motion would be, to leave the duty as it now was, on the manufactures of silk this side of the Cape of Good Hope. But, on those from beyond that Cape, it raised the duty five per cent. At this period of the session, he would occupy the attention of the Senate only a few minutes in stating the probable effect of the amendment, should it prevail. By the change of duty, the whole impost on silks, annually, would be somewhat raised for a time. This might increase the zeal already excited in this country for the culture of silk, and thus tend to encourage enterprise and improve skill. Should the change alter in time our importations, and introduce into the market more of the silks of Europe, and less of those from India and China, 'till the former entirely engrossed the market, the effect would prove highly beneficial both to our agriculture and navigation. The commercial men in this body were very conscious, that the discrimination in duty of five per cent. between silks from India and Europe, introduced in the tariff of 1824, had very considerably augmented the importations of those manufactured nearest home. Without troubling the Senate with a statistical detail, the year ending in September, 1826, exhibited an importation of almost five millions worth of this article from Europe, and of only a little more than three millions from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. All who heard him, and had reflected on the subject, were aware that the silks from India were paid for mostly in specie, and employed but little navigation directly, while those from Europe were chiefly obtained in exchange for cotton, tobacco, and other staple articles of agriculture, and gave occupation directly to a much larger amount of tonnage. Another effect would probably be, that the duty on some of these articles abroad would be lowered, with a view to reciprocate our friendly discrimination in favor of European silks. From one power especially, and that was France, we might not only hope this; but it would give to her some substitute for the diminution occasioned by other parts of this very bill, in our present trade for woollens from that country. Should any objection be made to an increase of this impost, it might also be replied, it was a tax on what was in some degree a luxury, and chiefly used by the wealthy, while this same bill taxed very highly a great number of the first necessities of life, used by the humblest classes of society. He would only add, at this time, that the change now proposed was in exact conformity with the recommendation of the Committee on Manufactures, in 1824; and the experience of three years had shown the benefits of the discrimination so fully, that no further argument was wanted, he thought, to verify their recommendation in its fullest extent, and induce us to make the whole discrimination then advised, not only by the committee, but by the Chamber of Commerce in the first commercial city in the Union.

Mr. DICKERSON said it appeared that the object of the amendment was to increase the discrimination. He agreed that the effect had been to reduce the amount of silk imported from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and he thought that the present duty was producing the change so rapidly, it was not necessary to increase the discrimination.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to make a single remark, as to the operation of the discrimination, and to propose to the gentleman from New Hampshire to fix some period at which the additional duty should commence, or it would operate severely on the merchants whose ships had already been sent to the East Indies for silks. The importers of this description of goods might suffer great loss, unless the amendment were so modified as not to go into effect until a period late enough to save their orders, already sent, from its operation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks in relation to the importance of our trade with France. He considered it to be our interest to be on the best terms with that country, as she took our articles in return—and it was but fair to give to her an advantage in the silk trade, over China, where we were obliged to pay specie—although he had wondered that our merchants did not export cotton to the latter country, as the experiment had been successfully made in one instance, which he mentioned.

Mr. BENTON was decidedly in favor of the proposed amendment. He was in favor of this discrimination, when it was proposed in 1824, and the beneficial effects produced by the discrimination of five per centum, imposed at that time, encouraged him to carry the principle to the point now proposed. At present we got our chief supplies of silks from France, England, and the East Indies. From the latter place, we purchase for gold and silver; from the two former, for the products of our soil. We pay for French and English silks in cotton, rice, and tobacco; and our statistical tables show us that our exports, in these articles, to one of the European powers, France, has increased nearly threefold since 1824. It is the part of a wise and prudent policy to keep that increase on the rise; and the doubling the discriminating duties in favor of European silks, will contribute to effect that object. So much

MAY, 1828.]

The Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

for agriculture. On the other hand, the navigating interest will be benefited by the same policy. It takes but little tonnage to carry the gold and silver to China, which brings back, say three million dollars' worth of silks; but it would require at least 30,000 tons of shipping, the freight on which would be worth $400,000, at a cent and a half per pound, to carry as much cotton to France or England as would purchase the same amount of silks in those countries. Thus the interests of commerce, of agriculture, of the landholder, and ship owner, are both concerned in fostering the silk trade with France and England, in preference to that from beyond the Cape of Good Hope; and every interest is concerned in promoting a trade which consumes the product of the country, in preference to one that carries off its gold and silver.

Mr. WOODBURY modified his amendment on the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER so as to make its operation commence on the 8d day of June, 1829, and

It was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved to amend the bill, by striking out the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th lines of the 8d section, which embraced the duty on cotton bagging, for which he gave as one of his reasons, the fall in the price of cotton; since the duty had fallen so that it was felt severely by the planters.

Rejected.

Miscellaneous Articles.

Mr. TAZEWELL moved to amend by striking out the duty on steel, lead, leaden shot, litharge, orange mineral, and sugar of lead.

Mr. T. said, that he had made the proposition for the purpose of making a single remark in opposition to the duty. All the lead mines in this country, of any value, were the property of the United States. It seemed to him an extraordinary policy that the Government should increase the duty for the purpose of adding to its own profits. He had raised the question in order that it might be settled whether it was proper that the Government should tax the people in this manner for its own profit.

The motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend, by levying a duty on oranges, limes, and lemons, as he observed, to protect the products of Florida.

Rejected.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend, by levying a duty of 50 per cent. ad valorem, on olives, sweetmeats, and castor oil.

Rejected.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend, by striking out the duty on imported spirits; decided in the negative.

Mr. SILSBEE moved to insert a duty on imported umbrellas. [Mr. S. also presented a memorial of manufacturers of the article, praying for an additional duty.] The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., moved that the date

"30th of June" be stricken out, and the '1st of September' inserted, (the time at which the bill goes into operation;) which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill, by adding a proviso, exempting all books, tracts, &c., for Bible and other religious societies, from the payment of the duties on such articles.

Rejected.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend the bill by striking out that portion of the 8th section, which points out the duty of the appraisers, and empowers them to fix upon the value of importations independently of the invoices.

On this motion discussion arose, in which it was opposed by Messrs. DICKERSON, BARNARD, VAN BUREN, and SANFORD, and supported by Mr. WEBSTER.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the question was decided in the negative.

Mr. WOODBURY proposed the following amendment in relation to the duty on molasses: add at the end of 8d section 20th line, the following words: "except such as the holder thereof shall give sufficient bond shall not be distilled; and, on all such, 5 cents per gallon."

Negatived.

The question then occurred on ordering the bill to a third reading, and the yeas having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Benton, Boulogny, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Foot, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson of Ky., Kane, Knight, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren, Webster, Willey—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Cobb, Ellis, Hayne, Johnston of Louisiana, King, McKinley, Macon, Parris, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith of Md., Smith of S. Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, White, Williams, Woodbury—21.

TUESDAY, May 13.

The Tariff Bill.

The bill making alterations in the several acts imposing duties on imports, was read a third time, and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. HAYNE spoke at length in opposition to the bill, and entered a solemn protest against it, as a partial, unjust, and unconstitutional measure, and concluded by moving an indefinite postponement of the bill; on which the question being taken by yeas and nays, it was decided in the negative.

The question then occurring on the passage of the bill, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Benton, Boulogny, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Foot, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson of Ky., Kane, Knight, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren, Webster, Willey—26.

NATS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Cobb, Ellis, Hayne, Johnston of Louisiana, King, McKinley, Macon, Parria, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, White, Williams, Woodbury—21.

So the bill was passed, and returned to the House of Representatives, for concurrence in the amendments.

THURSDAY, May 15.

President Pro Tempore.

The Secretary having given notice of the absence of the Vice President from the Chair, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tem.; and a ballot having been taken, Mr. MACON was declared to have been elected.

Mr. MACON rose, and returned thanks to the Senate for the honor conferred on him but wished to decline serving.

Mr. TAZEVELL then moved that Mr. Macon be excused from serving as President pro tem. This motion having been agreed to another ballot was taken, and

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was duly elected; and, having been conducted to the Chair, by Messrs. MACON and HARRISON, briefly addressed the Senate; making acknowledgments for the confidence which had been reposed in him, and the honor conferred upon him, and which had been entirely unexpected on his part. It was so long since he had occupied the Chair, that his knowledge of the rules of order were, perhaps, less perfect than, from the length of his service in Congress, might be supposed, and he might often ask for the aid and forbearance of his fellow-Senators; but he could assure them that he should discharge the duty of the Chair with fidelity and impartiality.

FRIDAY, May 16.

Brevet Rank.

The bill to abolish Brevet rank in the Army of the United States was read a second time.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed a desire to hear the reasons for this measure.

Mr. HARRISON replied, and read a report upon the subject. The number of Breveted Officers in our Army was very great, so much so, that the system was considered an evil by the officers themselves. The bill would have no effect on officers already Breveted, or those who were now entitled to Brevets. He observed that the task which had been imposed on him as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs had been a very disagreeable one; as, take whatever course they might, it was not supposed that they could give entire satisfaction.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that the subject was new to him; and he thought it required consideration. As he understood the gentleman the bill had the same effect on those who had served ten years, as on those who were entitled to the Brevet for the gallantry of their exploits. He saw the difficulty of the subject which had been mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio. It might be, that those who were already Breveted were of opinion, that the system should be done away. But what do those under them say? This wanted inquiry.

The bill was laid on the table.

TUESDAY, May 20.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to take up the bill to authorize the subscription to stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company; which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HENDRICKS, in reply to some remarks of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed that this was not a western measure. Not one dollar would be expended west of the Alleghany mountains. So far from this being the case, by the express language of the bill, the canal was to terminate at Cumberland. This being the fact, it was not fair to argue that they were pressing western measures, in preference to others, upon the notice of Congress. He did not, however, think, as others did, a long series of years would elapse before it would pass the Alleghanies. He believed that in a few years, the stock of the company would become as valuable as that of the Erie Canal, and that it would be supported by subscriptions from every quarter. It had been assumed that this measure was commenced by Congress. This was not the case, as it had emanated from the Legislature of Virginia, which passed an act to incorporate the company in 1824. Since that period other confirmatory acts had been passed. Mr. H. here detailed the various acts in relation to the object under consideration. He then gave a succinct history of the various surveys, and their results, which were highly favorable to the project. He referred to the result of the Erie and Champlain canals; and expressed an opinion that the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal would become as valuable as in those works. He considered it highly important, as forming a bond of union between the east and the west.

Mr. MACON observed that he had but a few words to say on this subject. He had said, some time since, that the constitution was dead and gone, and he should not speak of the constitutionality of the measure. He should also say nothing of its effect upon the public debt, because a public debt was now considered a public blessing. He looked upon this bill in the light of a partnership to be entered into by the Government with a number of individuals; and, said Mr. M., before I enter into partnership with a man I should like to know who he is, and what is his standing. I should ask, beforehand, is he able? is he good at the bank? is his reputation fair? But Congress was about to go into this partnership without knowing who they are to be connected with. He thought the corporations of the District of Columbia were now sufficiently taxed without going into farther embarrassments. But the Government would have to bear the burthen, as in the case of the Cumberland road, the expense on which would last as long as the Government itself. He had offered a resolution, in the early part of the session, on the subject of that road, but it had never been reported on. He wanted to get rid of the Cumberland road altogether. But it was said that the work could not go on unless Congress subscribed the million; so that it appeared that the whole depends on getting the United States by the hand. They had but a few days since passed a most enormous tariff, which must have some effect on the revenue—to what extent he did not know; but, at any rate, it did not seem to be the time for entering into other grand projects. As to the canal stock in the State of New York, he thought it belonged to the State, and that there were no stockholders, which made quite a different case from this. He knew no other consideration on which it could be supported, but the design to keep up the public debt forever. That appeared to be the object. There were many reasons against the project; but he would only mention Pennsylvania was about to make another canal; Baltimore was about making a railroad which would affect the same section of country through which this canal was to pass; so that they would interfere with the subscriptions to stock in this company, and it would be a long time before subscriptions by private individuals to any great amount, would be made.

MAY, 1828.]

Duty on Wines.

[SENATE.]

He did not believe in artificial regulations to bind together the different sections of the country. They must be bound together by love. A durable public opinion cannot be bought. The moment you cease dealing out the price for this sentiment, it stops. Good will and a fellow feeling must do it. He was sorry to perceive that those who formerly voted with him, and were able to discuss the subject, had, in this instance, abandoned their ground.

WEDNESDAY, May 21.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

The bill was taken up, to authorize the subscription to stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on engrossing the bill, on motion of Mr. EATON, it was decided in the affirmative, by YEA.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bouigny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Foot, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Webster, Wiley—29.

NAY.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Hayne, Macon, Parris, Sanford, Smith of South Carolina, Tasewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury—17.

FRIDAY, MAY 23.

Duty on Wines.

The bill to reduce the duty on imported wines was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOODBURY observed that he had made some preparation to give a full view of the benefits likely to result from a revision of the present duties on wines, but this was not a period of the session when such a view could be useful. The bill now before us must be taken as it is, and the principles on which it rests be received without discussion, or no time will remain for any change whatever to be made in the existing tariff. He would then merely state the material alterations effected by this bill, and the probable effects, from its passage, on our commerce and revenue. It reduced the duties on Madeira one-half, because it was now so enormous as to have destroyed a large portion of a valuable commerce with that island. This was fully developed in the documents that had been laid on our tables this session, but which there was not time or perhaps necessity now to read. The wines of France and Germany that before paid the same duty with Madeira, were now required to pay only 80 cents per gallon, because the quantity of that description imported was small, and the trade for them mostly a barter trade, highly advantageous to this country. The duty on claret, in casks, was lowered to 10 cents per gallon, but still it was as high, and, indeed, higher, on the first cost of claret, than the duty on Madeira. This last wine had become almost a necessary of life in the southern part of our Union, and an increase of the use of it, by a reduction of the duty, would increase the exchange market for some of our most valuable staples, such as cotton, tobacco, and rice. The changes thus far did not differ very essentially from those contained in the bill which passed the Senate last year. But the next, and, in his view, one of the most important changes, was in doubling the present duty on non-enumerated wines. By the present law it is 15 cents per gallon; last year 12 cents was proposed; by the bill before us, 30 cents per gallon. These non-enumerated wines included something like 88-40ths of the whole importation of wines into the United States during the last three years. Thus, in 1825, the whole quantity was 2,688,640 gallons, of which the non-enumerated wines were 2,078,569 gallons; in 1826 the whole was 2,780,574, and the non-enumerated 2,047,637; and in 1827 the whole 2,767,893, and the non-enumerated 2,043,254. Gentlemen will thus see that only 15 cents per gallon has been paid on about 88-40ths of all the wine imported, while, by the proposed bill, 30 cents per gallon would be paid. This change will not only prevent frauds caused by bringing in wines of high value at a low duty, under names not enumerated in the present tariff, but will tend to equalize the duties much nearer than they now are, according to the first cost of the different kinds of wine.

He would say no more, under the pressure of business now on our tables, except to state that the whole revenue on wines would be increased between one and two hundred thousand dollars by the present bill, provided precisely the same importations took place hereafter, as during the last few years, and provided the calculation be made on the same quantity of non-enumerated wines. The revenue on wine was last year, $711,790. But compute the duties on the same importations according to the proposed tariff, and without altering the quantity of non-enumerated wines, and the revenue would be over 820,000 dollars. But under this bill, doubtless, the non-enumerated wines will be much less in quantity; and yet the friends of this bill believed the whole importations would be much augmented under its provisions, and the revenue in that way still improved. Considering, then, the probable benefits to agriculture, navigation, and revenue, from the proposed changes, and that it was now too late for any amendment to be safely made, he trusted the bill would meet with little or no opposition.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that the Senate had within a few days passed a bill increasing the duties on articles of necessity. As this was an article of luxury, and was chiefly used by the rich, he was opposed to taking off the duties, either on non-enumerated or on any description of wines. He asked the yeas and nays on the question; which being taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Bouligny, Branch, Chambers, Cobb, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, McLane, Macon, Ridgely, Robbins, Silabee, Smith of Maryland, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Webster, Williams, Woodbury—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Chandler, Chase, Dickerson, Knight, Marks, Noble, Parris, Ruggles, Seymour, Willey—10.

Office of Maj. General and Brevet Rank.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill from the other House, to abolish the office of Major General in the Army of the United States, was taken up.

Mr. HARRISON offered an amendment, in substance, to abolish brevet rank.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was disposed to vote against the amendment under any circumstance. Within three days of the close of the session, it seemed improper to insert new matter in a bill from the House, which they had not time to act upon. He saw no difference between sending a new bill to the House, and sending, as an amendment to a bill, a subject which was entirely new to them. The rule was adopted, that no new bill should be acted upon during this period, to prevent hurried legislation. But this mode would be an evasion of that rule. He was not informed upon the subject, and did not understand it sufficiently to act satisfactorily to himself.

Mr. HARRISON withdrew his motion to amend.

The question occurred on ordering the bill to a third reading, which was decided by YEAS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, McLane, Macon, Noble, Parris, Rowan, Sanford, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Bate-man, Bouligny, Chase, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston of Lou., Knight, McKinley, Marks, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silabee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Webster—20.

So the bill was lost.

SATURDAY, May 24.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON the joint resolution from the other House, relative to the printing of the two Houses, was considered.

The object of the resolution was explained by Mr. DICKERSON to be to economize space and expense. As the printing was now executed, a whole page was taken up in the title, and the documents had otherwise much blank space, which it was the object of this resolution to save. The printing of the yeas and nays in small letter, and the arrangement of the documents in consecutive order, would contribute very essentially to this object, etc. By correcting this mode of arrangement, they would be rendered more accessible, besides saving a considerable annual expenditure.

The resolution was ordered to a third reading.

Suppression of the Slave Trade.

The bill for the suppression of the slave trade was taken up.

Mr. HAYNE remarked, that he had yesterday addressed himself to those gentlemen who had charge of this bill, for information as to the large appropriation in the first section, of 30,000 dollars. That information he had not received, and he now asked it again.

Mr. KING said, that this sum had been fixed upon, after a full investigation, by the Committee of Ways and Means, of the other House. On inquiry, he had heard, that the sum was much larger as first proposed; but that the committee had cut it down; and, at its present amount, was not sufficient to send out those slaves already in the country. He trusted that no gentleman would require an exact estimate of the expenses to occur under this appropriation; because it could not be given, as they must depend on unforeseen circumstances. The items could not be anticipated, and the committee took the gross amount, and made the appropriation to cover it. This was the universal practice, and was perfectly proper, as, if the expenditure was over the amount given, the objects could only be executed as far as it went; and if below, it would remain in the Treasury, to be applied to the next year's appropriation. The money could not be applied to other objects; because proper and legitimate purposes would absorb it. If gentlemen disliked the principle on which this provision was made, the repeal of the general law would meet their object. But he thought this bill should not be obstructed. The provision on the second section for the Marshal of Alabama, was founded on a just claim. He had acted under the general law, and he could not obtain expenses which he had incurred under that law, unless by the bill. He hoped that no objection to the general law would stop the progress of this measure.

May, 1828.]

Close of the Session.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CHANDLER asked whether a report had been received of the mode in which the expenditure for this object had formerly been made?

Mr. KING said, that an account of every item had been rendered. He knew that a certain sum had been applied to the Colonization Society, which was considered an improper appropriation; but that ought not to operate on the passage of this bill.

Mr. HAYNE did not rise to oppose the passage of this bill, but to protest against the manner in which it had been brought before the Senate. It had been presented here with no paper, with no document, with no estimate. They had no evidence to go upon. This was what he objected to. He knew that the gentleman from Alabama was not a member of the committee to which it was referrible; but he had endeavored, without much success, to obtain information. Mr. H. had no doubt that the claim of the Marshal of Alabama was a just one; but he objected altogether to the method of introducing the payment of an individual claim into a bill nominally to suppress the slave trade. This amalgamation of objects embarrassed him extremely. He must vote for the bill, or he should aid to deprive the Marshal of Alabama of a compensation to which he was justly entitled. He repeated his objection to this mode of legislation, and said he should vote for this bill; but, said he, if I live to come back to the Senate next year, I pledge myself to take measures to obtain a most rigid examination of the manner in which the expenditure has been made.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out the first section, providing $30,000 to restore negroes to the coast of Africa.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that the appropriation was absolutely necessary to carry into effect the object of the law. The gentleman from Alabama had stated correctly the difficulty in making out the estimates for purposes which must be contingent, from their very nature. It was not a case where cost and charges could be computed at the outset. The sum pointed out by reasonable probability, had been fixed upon, and that had been cut down in the other House. As to the claims of the Marshal of Alabama, the pledge of the Government had been contracted to pay the expenses which he had incurred. He hoped the bill would pass.

The question being then put on the motion of Mr. MACON, it was rejected, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Miami Canal.

Mr. RUEGLES moved that the Senate take up the bill to aid the State of Ohio to make the Miami Canal from Dayton to Lake Erie.

Mr. COBB opposed it, on the ground that there was not time for discussion upon a subject so important. Congress had already given 175,000 dollars this year for roads in Ohio.

Mr. RUEGLES said, that the objection did not come with a good grace, from the gentleman from Georgia, who had consumed much time during the last week. He did not wish to prolong debate, and was willing to take the vote at once upon the bill.

Mr. COBB said, that the gentleman from Ohio had found out that he (Mr. O.) had occupied much time during the week, and he deserved a leather medal for the discovery. In the discussion of the canal bills he occupied no more time than his duty made incumbent upon him. If the gentleman alluded to the Executive business of the week, he (Mr. O.) had certainly not consumed much time in debate in secret session. He repeated his objections to taking up the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER said it was too late to take up a bill of so much importance, and which contemplated a large gift of land to the State of Ohio.

Mr. HARRISON said that, if the gentleman would take the trouble to examine the bill, he would find that the gift of land was to the United States, and would make their lands in the State of Ohio much more valuable. The bill was ordered to a third reading, by YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston of Louisiana, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silebee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Willey, Williams—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Hayne, Knight, McLane, Macon, Sanford, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Woodbury—14.

MONDAY, May 26.

Close of the Session.

Mr. WOODBURY moved that a message be sent to the President of the United States, to inform him that the Senate had concluded its business, and to ascertain whether he had any further communication to make; which was agreed to.

Mr. MACON moved that a message be sent to the House of Representatives, to convey the same information; which was agreed to.

SENATE.]

Adjournment.

[MAY, 1823.]

Messrs. MACON and WOODBURY were then appointed a committee to wait upon the President.

Adjournment.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing that they had appointed Messrs. WRIGHT, of Ohio, and DICKERSON, of New York, as a Joint Committee, on the part of the House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress was now ready to adjourn.

The committee on the part of the Senate then joined that from the House, and waited on the President, and, shortly after, Mr. MACOX, from the Joint committee, reported that the President had instructed them to inform the Senate, that he had no further communications to make to Congress.

The Senate adjourned, sine die.

DECEMBER, 1827.]

First Proceedings in the House of Representatives.

[H. OF R.]

TWENTIETH CONGRESS.—FIRST SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.*

MONDAY, December 8, 1827.

The House was called to order by MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, Clerk of the House, precisely at twelve o'clock, and the Roll of the House being called over by States, it appeared that there were present two hundred and seven Members, out of two hundred and thirteen, and two delegates from Territories: Whereupon, the House proceeded to ballot for a SPEAKER.

Mr. SPRAGUE and Mr. HAYNES being named Tellers, reported the following as the result of the balloting:

For ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia,	104
For JOHN W. TAYLOR, of New York,	94
For P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia,	4
Scattering votes,	8

ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia, having received a majority of the whole number of votes, was declared to be duly elected.

On being conducted to the Chair, the SPEAKER addressed the House in the following terms:

"GENTLEMEN: In accepting the distinguished honor which you have been pleased to confer upon me, I am penetrated with feelings of profound respect, and the deepest gratitude, and I receive it as the most flattering testimony of your confidence and favor. The office of Speaker of this House has been justly considered one of high and exalted character—arduous, in relation to the abilities necessary to its execution, and severely responsible and laborious. Its honor is to be measured by no ordinary standard of value. The individual, therefore, who shall fill this chair to his own reputation, and the advantage of the House, must be distinguished alike by knowledge, integrity, and diligence; he should possess an impartiality which secures confidence; a dignity that commands respect; and a temper and affability that disarms contention. From his general character and personal qualities, he must derive a

* LIST OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Maine.—John Anderson, Samuel Butman, Rufus McIntire, Jeremiah O'Brien, James W. Ripley, Peleg Sprague, Joseph F. Wingate.

New Hampshire.—David Barker, Jr., Ichabod Bartlett, Titus Brown, Joseph Healey, Jonathan Harvey, Thomas Whipple, Jr.

Vermont.—Benjamin Swift, Daniel A. A. Buck, Jonathan Hunt, Rollin C. Mallary, George E. Wales.

Massachusetts.—Samuel C. Allen, John Bailey, Isaac C. Bates, B. W. Crowninshield, John Davis, Henry W. Dwight, Edward Everett, Benjamin Gorham, ———— Hodges, John Locke, John Reed, Joseph Richardson, John Varnum.

Rhode Island.—Tristram Burges, Dutee J. Pierces.

Connecticut.—John Baldwin, Noyes Barber, Ralph J. Ingersoll, Orange Merwin, Elisha Phelps, David Plant.

New York.—Daniel D. Barnard, George O. Belden, Rudolph Bunner, C. C. Cambreleng, Samuel Chase, John C. Clark, John D. Dickinson, Jonas Earl, Jr., Daniel G. Garnsey, Nathaniel Garrow, John I. De Graff, John Halloch, Jr., Selah E. Hobbie, Martin Hoffman, Jeromus Johnson, Richard Kees, Henry Markell, Henry C. Martindale, Dudley Marvin, John Magee, John Maynard, Thomas J. Oakley, S. Van Rensselaer, Henry R. Storrs, James Strong, John G. Stowe, John W. Taylor, Phineas L. Tracy, Gullian C. Verplanck, Aaron Ward, John J. Wood, Silas Wood, David Woodcock, Silas Wright, Jr.

New Jersey.—Lewis Condict, George Holcombe, Isaac Pierson, Samuel Swan, Hodge Thompson, Ebenezer Tucker.

Delaware.—Kensay Johns, Jr.

Pennsylvania.—William Addams, Samuel Anderson, Stephen Barlow, James Buchanan, Richard Coulter, Chauncey Forward, Joseph Frey, Jr., Innes Green, Samuel D. Ingham, George Kremer, Adam King, Joseph Lawrence, Daniel H. Miller, Charles Miner, John Mitchell, Samuel McKeon, Robert Orr, Jr., William Ramey, John Sergeant, James B. Stephenson, John B. Sterigere, Andrew Stewart, Joel B. Sutherland, Espy Van Horne, James Wilson, George Wolf.

Maryland.—John Barney, Clement Dorsey, Levin Gale, John Leeds Kerr, Peter Little, Michael C. Sprigg, G. C. Worthington, John C. Weems, Ephraim K. Wilson.

Virginia.—Robert Allen, Mark Alexander, William S. Archer, William Armstrong, John S. Barbour, Philip P. Barbour, Burwell Bassett, Thomas Newton, John Randolph, William C. Rives, John Roane, Nath. H. Claiborne, Thomas

power that will give force to his interpositions, and procure respect for his decisions. He must conciliate the esteem of the enlightened body over whom he presides.

"These, gentlemen, are some of the leading qualifications necessary for this arduous station. I certainly do not possess them. I know my own inability too well to believe that I shall be enabled to meet the expectations of my friends, or discharge the high trust reposed in me, in a manner suitable to its dignity and importance. Bringing with me but little knowledge or experience, I shall, no doubt, often err, and stand in need of your utmost forbearance. Let me hope, on such occasions, you will scan my conduct with candor and liberality, and extend towards me the same kind indulgence which has heretofore characterized your conduct to the Chair. All that I can promise, will be a devotion of my time to your service, and an independent discharge of my duties in a plain and manly way. My gratitude for a distinction so little merited, shall stimulate me to supply, by diligence and application, what I want in knowledge and ability; and, however I may fail in other respects, I shall endeavor, at least, to entitle myself to the suffrages of zeal and impartiality.

"I need not admonish you, gentlemen, of the magnitude of your trust, nor say any thing as to the manner in which it ought to be discharged. We must all be sensible, that, in the deliberations and proceedings of this House, the character and permanent interests of our common country are deeply involved. It was in the organization and purity of this branch of the National Government, (endeared to their warmest affections,) that our fathers believed they had provided the best security for the principles of free Government, and the liberty and happiness of the people. Virtuous, enlightened, and patriotic, this House may justly be regarded as the citadel of American liberty.

"Animated, then, by a virtuous and enlightened zeal, let us endeavor to realize the just expectations of our constituents; and let our proceedings be characterized by a cool and deliberate exertion of the talents, fortitude, and patriotism of the House, as the surest and best means of sustaining the honor, and promoting the welfare and happiness of our beloved country."

Davenport, John Floyd, Isaac Leffler, Lewis Maxwell, Charles F. Mercer, William McCoy, Alexander Smyth, Andrew Stevenson, John Talliaferro, James Trezvant.

North Carolina.—Willis Alston, Daniel L. Barringer, John H. Bryan, Samuel P. Carson, Henry W. Conner, John Calpepper, Thomas Hall, Gabriel Holmes, John Long, Lemuel Sawyer, A. H. Shepherd, Daniel Turner, Lewis Williams.

South Carolina.—John Carter, Warren R. Davis, William Drayton, James Hamilton, Jr., George McDuffie, William D. Martin, Thomas R. Mitchell, William T. Nuckolls, Starling Tucker.

Georgia.—John Floyd, Tomlinson Fort, Charles E. Haynes, Geo. E. Gilmer, Wilson Lumpkin, Wiley Thompson. [One vacancy.]

Kentucky.—Richard A. Buckner, James Clark, Henry Daniel, Joseph Lecompte, Robert P. Letcher, Chittenden Lyon, Thomas Metcalfe, Robert McHatton, Thomas P. Moore, Charles A. Wickliffe, Joel Yancey.—[One vacancy.]

Tennessee.—John Bell, John Blair, David Crockett, Robert Desha, Jacob C. Isaacks, Pryor Lea, John H. Marable, James C. Mitchell, James K. Polk.

The oath to support the Constitution of the United States was then administered by Mr. NEWTON, (the father of the House,) to the SPEAKER, and then by the SPEAKER, successively to all the Members from the several States.

On motion, it was

Resolved, unanimously, That MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, Clerk to the late House of Representatives, be appointed Clerk to this House: and that JOHN OSWALD DUNN be appointed Sergeant-at-arms to this House; that BENJAMIN BURCH be appointed principal Doorkeeper, and OVERTON CARR, Assistant Doorkeeper to the same.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. LOWRIE, their Secretary, acquainting the House that a quorum had been formed, and that the Senate was ready to proceed to business.

A committee was then appointed, consisting of Messrs. VAN RENSSELAER and EVERETT, to join the committee which had been appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that quorums of the two Houses have assembled, and that Congress are ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make.

The daily hour to which the House shall stand adjourned, was fixed at twelve o'clock, M.

TUESDAY, December 4.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that they had performed that duty, and had received for answer that the President would make a communication to them, in writing, at twelve o'clock this day.

Mr. JOHN ADAMS, the Private Secretary of the President of the United States, soon after came in with the Message. (See Senate Proceedings, page 467.) The Message was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. 6,000 extra copies Ohio.—Mordcaai Bartley, Philemon Beecher, William Creighton, Jr., John Davenport, James Findlay, William McLean, William Russell, John Sloane, William Stanbery, Joseph Vance, Samuel F. Vinton, Eliasa Whittlesey, John Woods, John C. Wright.

Louisiana.—William L. Brent, Henry H. Gurley, Edward Livingston.

Indiana.—Thomas H. Blake, Jonathan Jennings, Oliver H. Smith.

Mississippi.—William Hale.

Illinois.—Joseph Duncan.

Alabama.—Gabriel P. Moore, John McKee, George W. Owen.

Miscourt.—Edward Bates.

DELEGATES.

Arkansas Territory.—[Vacant.]

Michigan Territory.—Austin E. Wing.

Florida Territory.—Joseph M. White.

DECEMBER, 1827.]

Bank of the United States.

[H. OF R.]

thereof were ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

WEDNESDAY, December 5.

The late Mr. Young.

Mr. WICKLIFFE rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have risen to propose the resolution which I hold in my hand, as a testimony of respect due to my deceased friend and colleague. It may be expected of me that I should say something in reference to the character of the man for whose memory I ask of this House an expression of their respect. To those with whom he was associated for the last two years, as a member of Congress, no commendation from me can be necessary. It was in the walks of private life I have known him longest and best, and it was there his virtues and usefulness were most conspicuous. I move you that the House come to the following resolution.

Mr. W. then presented a resolution for wearing the mourning usual on such occasions, in testimony of respect for the memory of the late William S. Young; which was unanimously agreed to.

THURSDAY, December 13.

Bank of the United States.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of that portion of the stock of the Bank of the United States which is held by the Government of the United States, and the applications of the proceeds thereof to the payment of the public debt.

In offering this resolution, Mr. B. said, he wished to accompany it with a few remarks, not with any intention of now discussing the merits of the measure it proposed, but chiefly with the view of drawing to it the attention of the House, and especially of the Committee of Ways and Means, to which the resolution must be referred. The House were aware that the Government holds at this time stock of the Bank of the United States, to the amount of seven millions of dollars, which stock was at present worth in market about 23½ per cent. advance above its par value. If the whole of this stock should now be sold by the Government, it would net a profit of one million and six hundred thousand dollars above the nominal amount of the stock. Such being the case, he thought it deserved the serious consideration of the House, whether it would not be a prudent and proper measure now to sell out that stock. It had been said, Mr. B. observed, by one of the best writers on political economy with whom he was acquainted, that the pecuniary affairs of nations bore a close analogy to those of private households—in both, their prosperity mainly depended on a vigilant and effective management of their resources. There is, said Mr. B., an amount of between seventeen and eighteen millions of the stock of the United States now redeemable, and an amount of nine millions more, which will be redeemable next year. If the interest paid by the United States on this debt is compared with the dividend it receives on its stock in the Bank of the United States, it will be found that a small advantage would be gained by the sale of the latter in this respect; since the dividends on bank stock are received semi-annually, while the interest on United States securities is paid quarterly; this, however, he waived as a matter of comparatively small moment. It must be obvious, he said, that the addition of one million six hundred thousand dollars to the available funds of the United States will produce the extinguishment of an equivalent amount of the public debt, and consequently relieve the interest payable thereon, by which a saving would accrue of about one hundred thousand dollars per annum.

The resolution was laid on the table.

THURSDAY, December 20.

Bank of the United States.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, moved the consideration of the following resolution, offered by him some days since, and now lying on the table:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of that portion of the stock of the Bank of the United States which is held by the Government of the United States, and the application of the proceeds thereof to the payment of the public debt."

The motion prevailed.

Mr. BARBOUR said, that, at the time he had had the honor of presenting this resolution to the House, he had accompanied it by some general remarks, intended only to convey an outline of those views in which the resolution was founded. Having since understood that it was desired, by many gentlemen, that the policy of the measure it recommended should be discussed without delay, and presuming that the opinion which the House might express at this stage of its consideration, was to be received as decisive of its future destiny, it was his purpose now to go somewhat more at large into the reasons which had induced him to offer this proposition for consideration. But before he presented these views, he would take leave to make one or two passing remarks, which he owed in justice to himself. He had heard it pretty clearly intimated, since the presentation of this resolution—nay, he had seen it so intimated—that this might possibly be what was denominated a measure of the opposition in this House. Some ambiguous voices had reached his ear, which seemed to imply that, in bringing forward this proposition, he had been influenced by some motive, and had cherished some purpose, other than those which had been avowed; and that the measure he advocated, was itself the result of concert, and of an understanding among those who were denominated the opposition members. It was but an act of sheer justice to himself to declare, that, while on every proper occasion, in relation to measures which might be viewed as affecting what were called party politics, he should openly, frankly, and fearlessly, express the opinions which he really entertained, and should, as openly, as frankly, and as fearlessly, pursue his convictions, whether they did or did not coincide with those of others. It never had been a part of his character, or his course, and it never should be, to approach any object he had in view by indirection; his motives he would openly avow; the opinions he held he would frankly express; what he did he would ever do in open day; he trusted he never should learn, as he had not hitherto learned, the by-paths of either moral or political obliquity. He disdained to be influenced by considerations which he was ashamed to avow. He despised the idea of getting at the object he might have in view, in any way but by meeting it in the face, and stating his opinions or his purpose just as it really was. Under the influence of such feelings, he now utterly and positively disclaimed any such motive, purpose, concert, or understanding, as that which had been attributed to him. So far was he from this, that, as far as he had received any intimation of the opinion of those gentlemen, with whose general political principles he agreed, as to the proposition he was about to offer, he knew that some of them were opposed to it. It was no more than justice to himself to say, that the measure proposed by the resolution, be it right or wrong, whether salutary or pernicious in its tendency, was the offspring of his own mind. He had not mentioned it to more, in all, than half a dozen of his friends, and out of this number two disapproved of it.

We shall have fallen on evil times, indeed, said Mr. B., if a member of this House might not in the integrity of his heart, rise in his place, and offer for consideration a measure which he believed to be for the public weal, without having all that he said and did imputed to some hidden motive, and referred to some secret purpose which was never presented to the public eye. He again solemnly disclaimed all such motives, and every such purpose. To what he had already said, he would go so far as to add, that, even in the last annual report received from the Secretary of the Treasury, there was an allusion to the very subject which he had brought forward.

It will not be denied by me, said Mr. B., that a state of circumstances might be conceived to exist, in which an attempt to sell this amount of United States bank stock would be productive of very considerable depression of its market price. But the question now to be considered by the House is not what might happen under a given posture of conceivable circumstances, but what is likely to happen in the actually existing state of things. The only ground of such depression, if any, must be the large increase of supply, while the same demand, and no more, continues to exist. Such a state of things would impinge upon the general principle I first stated, by altering the proportion between demand and supply. But no such state of things will exist, should the present proposition prevail; for there is, and has been, for these three years past, a diminished quantity of Government stock to be sold, and an increased amount of means to buy it, both occasioned by one and the same cause, namely: the paying off of large portions of the public debt by the redemption of United States stock.

During the year 1825, we paid of the principal of the public debt more than seven and a half millions; in 1826, more than seven millions; and during the present year, 1827, we shall have paid more than six and a half millions more; making in all an amount of twenty-one and about a quarter millions. The Secretary of the Treasury, however, informs us in his report, that five millions of this debt has been paid by the issue of a new stock. It will therefore be proper to deduct this; and the result will be, that, in these three years, there have been actually paid off more than sixteen millions of the public debt. To this let me add, that, according to the statements relative to the sinking fund, and the present condition of the funded debt, there will be paid, in the year 1828, seven millions more; and in the years 1829 and 1830, an amount even beyond this, (being enlarged by the increased activity of the sinking fund, from the circumstance of a large amount now devoted to interest becoming applicable to the principal of the debt.) Reckoning, then, that, during the years 1825, '6, and '7, sixteen millions have been paid, and that, in 1827, '8, and '9, twenty-one millions more will have been paid, here will have been an amount of thirty-seven millions of the public debt of the United States paid off in six years.

Have any violent shocks been produced by this operation? Has any derangement resulted in the financial arrangements of the country? Has United States stock fallen? I apprehend not. And why? For the reason I have stated, and which I now apply to the proposition before us, and from which very extensive consequences necessarily follow, going to show that the effect of the payment of very large amounts of the public debt is not to diminish, but to increase, the price of the residue. When, in the British Government, their sinking fund was established, in the year 1786, it was held necessary to fix a maximum for its operation, lest too great an amount of money should thereby be thrown into the market. It will be my endeavor to show that, with us as with them, the effect of paying off the debt produces an abundance of money, and therein an abundance of the means of purchasing the bank stock which the same operation has thrown into the market. While the former owners of the public stock have in their hands money which seeks investment, the sale of the bank stock will furnish an admirable mode by which this may be accomplished. Applying the principle with which he set out, Mr. B. remarked that it would be apparent that, if any depression was to result, it would rather be produced by paying the debt in money than by exchanging it for bank stock. By redeeming the national stock, money, which was before safely invested, is thrown into the market, and naturally seeks some new employment. Now, I propose, said Mr. B., while this is done, to carry into the market an equal amount of stock in which that money may be invested again. Do gentlemen apprehend a depression in the price of stock? Why? Because, say they, there will be too large an amount of it for the money which is prepared to be invested in it. But my proposition, to its whole extent, goes to pay off so much of the public debt, and thereby to furnish the means of purchasing—in addition to which, seven millions more will be derived next year from the operation of the sinking fund. The conclusion, from a view of these facts, would seem to me to be, that it is next to impossible that a depression can be produced in the price of bank stock by an operation which, while it exposes that stock to sale, supplies, at the same time, the means and the inducements for purchasing it.

DECEMBER, 1837.]

Bank of the United States.

[H. or R.]

Mr. BARNES next rose. He said, when it is recollected that the resolution now under consideration affects an institution, whose capital of thirty-five millions of dollars is used as a circulating medium among the respective States, and between these United States and foreign countries, it cannot create surprise that a universal panic should pervade our commercial cities; for, until this question is decided, United States bank stock is valueless as a means of remittance, more especially to Great Britain, where, as exchange fluctuates, large portions of it are frequently transferred. The argument, based on the supposed profit to be realized from this sale, will be found to resemble statues of marble resting on pedestals of ice—the moment it is ascertained that the Government has dissolved its connection with this national institution, by the transfer of its stock, it is perfectly immaterial what amount of capital may be set afloat by the extinction of the public debt—that confidence which we shall have withdrawn from it, will pervade all money lenders, and, before a sale of one share can be effected, the market price will fall to par. The honorable mover of this resolution frankly avows, that he was originally opposed to the charter; and that he still continues hostile to its renewal; if his proposition is adopted, will it not be fairly inferred, that the policy which dictated the sale of the stock, is to be maintained by a refusal to renew the charter, and, consequently, the value which the stock in the market derived from an impression that the Government, having an interest in its prosperity, will be favorable to a prolongation of its existence, ceases the moment that sale is decided on. It is asserted that, at the present selling price of stocks, money really produces but $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum; admit this position, and then United States bank stock, producing 6 per cent. on its cost of \$100, ought not to be sold under \$180 per share. Mr. B.'s impressions were, that as it is desirable to pay off, forthwith, the loans paying 6 per cent. interest, the amount, consequently, can readily be obtained at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. As the bank divides six per cent., a sale of its stock under \$188 $\frac{1}{2}$ per share, would be so much lost in its real value. Mr. B. here asked if the exigencies of the nation required any extraordinary effort to pay off the national debt, the amount of which was nominally 67 millions, in reality but 47? For this identical 7 millions of bank stock, which we hold in exchange for 7 millions 5 per cents issued to the bank, is a set off against that portion of the debt. And 13 millions 8 per cents, (which under no circumstances, was it probable the Government would pay off, while a single internal improvement remained unexecuted, or any taxes were levied upon the people,) there remains but 47 millions to be discharged, which, by the regular operation of the sinking fund, would be extinguished in less than seven years; and, it is not desirable to the creditors of the nation, or to the nation itself, that it should be paid off more rapidly.

Mr. McDUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, expressed his thanks to the gentleman from Virginia for his fairness, in proposing this modification. He thought, with the gentleman who had preceded him, that it was important the question should be decided on its merits, and all-important that it should be decided as soon as possible. He thought that, in a fiscal view of the question, the gentleman from Virginia, in laying down his premises, had overlooked the well-established principle that, even in individual competition, where a market is more than supplied with any given commodity, the price of that commodity always falls in proportion to the excess of the supply. He had clearly shown that there existed a surplus capital in the United States, from the Government having paid off sixteen millions of the public debt. This very surplus of money in market, Mr. McD. argued, entered into the price of the stock. If, on the contrary, there was a scarcity of cash in the market, the stock would not bring its par value. As to the fact demonstrated by the gentleman's calculations, that the real value of money, in the United States is at present not more than three and a half per cent.; it had no bearing at all on the present question. Whenever the Government comes into the market, all the principles resulting from the relative state of demand and supply, operate with ten fold power. The Government is a mammoth seller or a mammoth buyer. When the Government comes into the market as a buyer, it raises the price of stock beyond all proportion, as, when it comes in as a seller it depresses it beyond proportion. It was upon this principle, that though money be actually worth, as the gentleman says, only three and a half per cent., the Government when it passed a law to exchange its six per cent. stock for a stock of five per cent., irredeemable at a later period, could not get it; whilst, if the Government were to go into market and borrow, to-morrow, the whole sixteen millions it has paid off, the stock it would issue, would, in two days' time, be at eight or ten per cent. advance.

Mr. McD. said that it was, therefore, always to be regretted that Government should come into market, because its presence there involuntarily produced a great effect upon the market in every way.

Mr. McD. then made some statements to show that refined arithmetical calculations were not proper data in all cases to legislate upon. He presumed that it would be admitted as a general proposition, that the stock of the Bank of the United States is certainly worth as much to Government as it is to individuals. To the latter, its value, regulated upon principles which cannot err, is now twenty-three per cent. above par. If it is of that value to individuals, it is, upon the same principle, of the same value to Government. Why? The Government receives six per cent. interest upon the stock in the bank, whilst it pays only five per cent. on the same amount of its own stock. The difference, therefore, is one per cent., or, on the whole amount of its interest in the bank, seventy thousand dollars per annum clear profit, besides its interest in the balance, which the bank always reserves to meet contingencies. If, then, you sell your stock in the bank, supposing you can sell it at the present market price, you make according to the gentleman's calculation, a present gain of one million six hundred thousand dollars, whilst you annihilate a capital, which will produce to the end of time, if the bank continues to exist, a revenue of seventy thousand dollars a year. But, so far from being able to dispose of the stock at the present advanced price in the market, Mr. McD. believed, that, if this resolution were now to pass, the stock of the bank would be at once reduced to par, in the market, upon mere pecuniary calculations: And why? Mr. McD. here entered into calculations to show the effect, upon the value of the stock, from any intimation of a disposition on the part of the Government to restrict its existence to the duration of its present charter, and traced its present high price in the market to the general confidence that the charter would be continued. The effect of bringing the Government shares into market, Mr. McD. resumed, would be to reduce the price of the stock to par, if not below par. What, then, would be the effect of this measure?

We sell our stock at par, said he: do we enable ourselves, by doing so, to pay off, as the gentleman supposes, any portion of the national debt? No: for the seven millions we should receive for our bank stock would only go to pay to the Bank of the United States the seven millions we owe for that stock. The only operation which would really and effectually extinguish any portion of the debt of the United States, would be a sale at the profit of one million six hundred thousand dollars, which the gentleman calculates upon, under the erroneous notion that so large a portion of stock would command the present market price. But, if we sell the stock at its par value, as Mr. McD. had assumed that we should do if we sell at all, then, instead of gaining the sum calculated, we should actually lose the identical sum of one million six hundred thousand dollars. For the gentleman had himself shown that the stock was now worth twenty-three per cent. above par: and if it were so disposed of, as to yield only its value at par, the difference would certainly be lost to the United States.

Mr. DRAYTON then rose, and expressed great reluctance to trouble the House, which he should not have done, had a few of the objections to the proposed measure, which he considered of the most weight, been advanced by either of the gentlemen who had preceded him. He agreed that the question was one of great importance, and that it should be speedily disposed of. The arguments of the honorable mover of the resolution were certainly very ingenious; but he had not adverted to what he thought ought to be the primary consideration in a discussion of this nature, and one which was of much greater consequence than any consideration merely pecuniary.

The first question to be settled was, whether or no the proposed scheme would redound to the pecuniary advantage of the United States? That it would do so, constituted, in point of fact, the only argument of the mover; and, if such were the case, and there existed no countervailing objection, the measure should doubtless be adopted. But if, on the contrary, it should appear that the plan was attended with no pecuniary advantage whatever, then, the honorable member himself would confess that it ought to be rejected. The gentleman had made some calculations of profit, which seemed to him, to be sure, very plain; but it would be found, on examination, that, instead of profit the reverse would ensue. The present value of money is four per cent. The Government can obtain whatever amount it wants, at this rate of interest. He did not rely upon the fact that Government could get money at a cheaper rate than others; but Canal Companies had actually issued stock at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per centum, and the premium on that stock reduced the real interest to 4 per centum. This, then, he assumed as the interest at which money could be borrowed, where the security was good. Now, if the Government received, at this period, six per cent. on its stock in the bank, it got an interest exceeding the common rate by precisely 50 per cent. Any other investment of its funds would bring only four per cent. This brings six, so that the Government gets the common interest of money on one hundred and fifty dollars, for every hundred dollars it has invested in this stock. By selling, the Government would lose the difference between twenty-three dollars and fifty dollars on every hundred, supposing the stock to remain at its present advance, so that, admitting the public faith not to be at all shaken by the sale, still a greater benefit would be realized, by continuing to hold it. But there could be no doubt that a very great depression would be produced by the sale of seven millions of this stock. The honorable member from Virginia says that price depends, in all cases, on the proportion between supply and demand. The principle, with some limitation, is, no doubt, correct; but that is not the question before the House. The question for us to weigh, said Mr. McD., is, whether a stock which now sells at one hundred and twenty-three per cent. in consequence of the confidence that the Government will continue to be a stockholder, would remain at that rate when it was known that Government would not so continue. If that is the cause of the present high price, take away the cause, and the stock must fall. How low it would fall, could not exactly be known; it might fall to par—even below it. The consequence of this would be to deprive the Government of a great amount of money, on which it now realizes twenty-three per cent., and by which it might pay a debt of eight millions, by an advance of only six and a half millions. It was perfectly well known, that when once public confidence in any moneyed institution is shaken, the consequent depression is not governed by a settled mathematical rule, but by the feeling and fears of the holders, and it not unfrequently happened, that, by such a panic, the stock which had before been the highest actually became the lowest in market. Mr. D. said, that he thought he had satisfactorily shown, that Government would not be a gainer, but very probably a loser, by the operation now proposed. But it ought to be demonstrably certain, that some gain will result, before we went into a moneyed operation of such magnitude and extent. What possible combination of circumstances could have a stronger effect in depressing the price of any public security, than that the Government, within any known or ostensible cause, should suddenly withdraw all its interest in it. It was a stronger case than had ever existed.

DECEMBER, 1837.]

Bank of the United States.

[H. OF R.]

Yet the mere pecuniary calculation of profit and loss did not constitute the strongest objection to the measure proposed. It was a matter of far more consequence that the character of a nation for fidelity to its contracts, express or implied, should be sacredly preserved, than that it should gain any pecuniary amount whatever. He should not apply the strict rules of ethics, or the doctrines of a common law, to a case like this, but merely the rules of common sense and common honesty. When the charter was given, and the Government agreed to take seven millions (which was one-fifth) of the stock, to receive a bonus of fifteen hundred thousand dollars, to require an annual statement of accounts, to obtain very valuable facilities in the transmission and exchange of its funds, and have all the duties of twenty-four Commissioners of Loans performed gratis, it was surely by no means a strained, but on the contrary, a necessary and incontrovertible conclusion, that the Government was never to place that institution in a worse situation than when its charter was granted. It was under this impression, founded on the mutual advantages derived from the arrangement, both to the bank, and to the Government, that the stock had risen to its present price. If now the Government shall, by its act, shake the public confidence in this institution, it will virtually violate its pledged faith, for the problematical and doubtful purpose of gaining a trifling sum of money.

FRIDAY, December 21.

United States Bank.

Mr. BARBONE's resolution for instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill authorizing the sale of the seven millions of the United States Bank stock held by the United States, was taken up.

Mr. GORHAM said, the question now before the House had been offered and discussed by the mover mainly, if not solely, on principles of mere finance. It had been argued as a question of money—of national profit and loss. If this were all, it might soon be settled. But if, as it appeared not improbable, this motion was connected with deeper and ulterior purposes and views, of a political kind, it ought to be settled still sooner. If there was something more behind; if any purpose was cherished of making the present pecuniary proposition a mere introduction to a system of measures in relation to the connection of Government with the National Bank, then the sooner such a purpose and system were met the better.

The gentleman had, it was true, advocated the sale of this stock solely as a fiscal operation; but, from his acquaintance with that honorable gentleman's character, opinions, and previous political course, he could not but be strongly inclined to think, that the present measure had more of a political, than a financial aspect, and looked toward a complete separation of the Government from the bank, if not the total abolition of that institution. As, however, the question had been put on mere fiscal grounds, he would ask the attention of the House, while he offered his views of it as a measure of pure finance.

The honorable mover of the resolution founded his argument on the fact, that the stock of the Bank of the United States stood at present in the market, at an advance of 28½ per cent., and he proposed to go into the market with the whole amount of the stock held by the Government, expecting to sell it at that price, wherever the requisite capital is to be found.

In order to judge the probability of his being able to do this, it was necessary to inquire, in the first place, what were the elements which entered into this advanced price of the stock?

The gentleman had compared the stock of the United States Bank with that of the stocks issued by Government for the payment of the public debt, and which bore the respective interests of three, four, and five per cent., and in this comparison gone on the assumption that the stock of the Bank, at the winding up of its present charter, would be worth its par value.

Mr. G. granted that, during the continuance of the charter, so long as all the operations of the bank proceeded in their regular course, this basis of comparison was a fair one. But, if, at the expiration of the limit of the present charter, the concerns of that institution must be finally concluded, it was wholly unfair and fallacious. Did the gentleman really believe, that, at the end of the eight years, (should the charter end, and not be renewed,) the holders of its stock would get the money for it? This was, indeed, the case with the Government stocks; as soon as the period at which they were redeemable arrived, the holders received in cash, at the Treasury, the full par value of whatever amount they might hold. But, when the vast concerns of such an institution as the National Bank were to be wound up, a very different state of things occurred. There would be, to be sure, a contingent fund for the payment of a stock; but of what would it consist? Of cash? Far from it:—of debts, chiefly bad, of property, in short, of all sorts of shapes, and which would require a board of trustees to settle it, after the bank had ceased its legal existence. Long before such a bank reached the end of its charter, it must prepare for that event: it must curtail, and gradually terminate entirely, all its discounts, months before that time: and would its stock feel nothing of the effects of such a state of things. When the old bank expired, were its stockholders instantly paid? So far from this, it was ten years after before the final dividend was declared. And would any gentleman tell him that the stock of such an expiring institution, was as good as stock on which the holder was sure to receive the par value in cash the moment it was redeemable? True, the property, of every kind, held by a bank, belonged to the proprietors of the stock; doubtless it was theirs of right; but it was theirs, in fact, only when it could be collected: and experience proved that, at the winding up, there always occurred a great loss upon it, if not in money, at least in time, which, to most stockholders, was the same thing. It usually proved a mere wreck and remnant. And so well was this understood, that, when it was known that the charter of the old United States Bank was not to be renewed, its stock, which had stood as high as 140 per centum, fell to 90 per centum in market. As to the condition of the present bank, Mr. G. said it was impossible he should know them: but one thing he did know, and so did everybody else, that great mismanagement of its concerns had at one time taken place, and great losses had consequently been sustained. How such an amount of loss had been covered up, so as to admit of the present dividends, he knew not; but for one, he was inclined to believe that those losses had not, to this day, been recovered from, and that, on examination, it would be found there was still a deficit in the funds of the Bank.

From what he had stated, he thought it must appear that the present dividends made by the Bank did not constitute the only element of the price its stock at present held; but that there was another, and a very important element, that entered largely into it, viz., the expectation that the concerns of the Bank would continue to go on, and that, when the present charter should expire, the institution would still be continued under a new one. This was the general expectation of all who held its stock, of all who bought it. And why should they not, said Mr. G., expect this at your hands? Have you done nothing to create such an expectation? To answer this question, let us look for a moment at the past history of this institution. You have done, and you have undone; you have built up, and you have pulled down; you have made experiments on the want and on the possession of such a thing, until at length, I had believed it was a point conceded, an opinion in which sensible men of all parties were agreed, that such a Bank was a necessary machine in the State—an engine which entered as an elementary part into the operations of a well-ordered Government. I know that doubts are held, and have been loudly expressed, as to the constitutionality of a National Bank: I hold such doubts to be very unfortunate, and am myself free from the least share of them; but I did understand, that even those who believed no provision for such an institution to be contained in the constitution, were themselves obliged, by the pressure of experience and of facts, to acknowledge, that it was an engine, essentially and indispensably necessary to the application of the power of the Government to the public good.

Mr. STEWART rose merely to present one or two objections to this measure, which had not been adverted to by other gentlemen. The great object of the proposition, as avowed by the mover, was, to hasten the extinguishment

DECEMBER, 1837.]

Bank of the United States.

[H. OF R.]

of the national debt, by selling the Bank stock, and thus increase the means of the Treasury to accomplish it. If gentlemen will look at the effect of the sinking fund of ten millions of dollars on the national debt, it will be obvious to every one that, instead of increasing, we shall be compelled to diminish the present sinking fund, and arrest the rapid progress we are now making, which will shortly lead to great financial embarrassments.

What is the situation of the public debt, as exhibited by the Treasury report laid upon our tables a few days since? And what will be the effect of this proposition upon it?

On the first of next month, the whole of the national debt will be	$67,413,000
Deduct the 3 per cents	13,296,000
Leaves	$47,117,000

Which could not be redeemed when above 65—they were now at 87, and would necessarily continue to rise in the market as the other stocks were absorbed, and the capital sent abroad seeking investment.

By selling the Bank stock at its present value, $8,600,000, and applying the proceeds, with the annual sinking fund of ten millions of dollars, to the national debt, it will be found that, at the end of the year 1830, there will remain less than $2,600,000 of the public debt redeemable; consequently, there must remain idle in the Treasury, of the sinking fund,

In the year 1831,	a surplus of	$7,400,000
1832,	"	5,061,000
1833,	"	11,896,600
1834,	"	18,981,000
1835,	"	23,561,000

These large balances of the sinking fund will annually accumulate in the Treasury, there being no portion of either principal or interest of the debt to which they can possibly be applied. These sums must then remain idle and useless in the Treasury, unless, indeed, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) will consent, as I am quite sure he will not, to apply them to the work of internal improvement—to the construction of roads and canals.

The gentleman (Mr. BARBOUR) suggests, in an undertone, said Mr. S., the reduction of the sinking fund. This will be necessary whether the motion of the gentleman be adopted or not.

Excluding the Bank stock and the three per cents, it will be found that, by the operation of the present sinking fund, there would, at the end of the year 1830, be only $4,356,000 of the national debt redeemable; consequently, there would be—

In the year 1831,	a surplus of	$5,644,000
1832,	"	8,304,000
1833,	"	10,138,000
1834,	"	17,173,000
1835,	"	21,802,000

When the last portion of the debt will be paid off, and this vast balance of the sinking fund will be left on hand.

Such will be the result of the operations of the existing sinking fund, even should the proposition be rejected. These large accumulations of money in the Treasury must occur—it is unavoidable, unless you reduce the sinking fund to $7,000,000. He had made a calculation by which it appeared that the whole of the public debt (the bank stock and three per cents excepted) would be completely extinguished in 1835, when the last portion of the debt became redeemable, by a sinking fund of $7,000,000, and leave a surplus at the end of that time of $185,000; in 1836 seven millions of the bank stock could be paid off if deemed expedient.

By thus reducing the sinking fund to $7,000,000, $3,000,000 would be annually released from the public debt, which could be applied to a system of internal improvement, producing the most happy effect upon the national prosperity. It would not postpone the final payment of the debt, but only throw forward the surplus of the redeemable debt in 1828 and '29 upon the years 1831, '83, and '84, when very small portions of the debt would be redeemable; and thus the whole of the sinking fund would be kept actively and profitably employed until the final extinction of the debt in 1835. Hence, Mr. S. contended, whether the proposition be adopted or not, it was the dictate of a sound and enlightened policy to reduce the present sinking fund from $10,000,000 to $7,000,000.

But the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) suggests to me the reduction of the duties. To this Mr. S. said he could not assent; the duties were imposed for purposes of protection, and not for revenue: they were imposed to protect our national industry—to protect domestic manufactures from the ruinous effect of foreign competition. He could not, therefore, consent to their repeal. He would collect the revenue for one important object—the protection of our manufactures—and send it back to the people who paid it, for another equally important object, the improvement of their country.

Mr. FORT said he rose with a view to advocate the resolution, but in doing so, he felt great difficulty and great embarrassment, as he must follow the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who had given to the subject the investigation of a master, and had presented his view of it in so ingenious and eloquent a manner. He thought the argument of that gentleman had not yet been refuted; he had rested his calculations on a mathematical basis, but they had not yet been met: those who had attempted to meet them had not drawn their topics of argument from the deductions of arithmetic, that sure, unerring guide, which never deceives those who rely upon it, nor leads to a false conclusion. The gentleman, said Mr. F., has given a comprehensive view of the whole subject—he has treated it with the skill of a master, and who shall venture to follow him? The subject was confessedly one of great obscurity: it has puzzled zled the wise, and the fool need not be ashamed to confess his ignorance of it. Yet he thought it might be still farther simplified. What was the nature of this institution? when was it chartered? and for what purpose? and what was the condition of the national currency when it first went into operation? The currency was in a broken and confused situation—the various kinds of paper were made payable at short distances of time, and credit was very generally impaired. To remedy this state of things, and to aid the Government in its financial operations, a National Bank was created, with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars. This amount was thought to be very large, and fears were entertained that so much stock would never find purchasers at its par value. Those who felt these apprehensions reasoned from principles which had been now so ably laid down in relation to the proportion between demand and supply. To aid in the disposal of this stock, the Government took it to the amount of seven millions, and received from the bank a bonus of $1,500,000. (On this subject some dispute had arisen, but it had finally been decided that the bank had a right to give this sum.) What was the result of the experiment? Twenty-eight millions of the stock was thrown into the market in one day. Was there any difficulty in finding purchasers? Did the stock sell? It was a time of great pecuniary distress: did this prevent the sale? The whole amount was bought up almost as soon as it was offered in market. What a comment did this fact furnish on the present fears of gentlemen! When it is proposed to sell, we are told the market will be glutted, and down goes the stock. Nay, as soon as the proposal is heard of, down will go the stock. But can you, at this time, glut a market with seven millions, which so long ago, took twenty-eight millions without the least difficulty? We are told that the value of stock is a moral consideration—that its value depends much on whether the charter is to continue; and that, if this is not likely to be the case, it will be of the less value, because there is a difficulty in closing the concerns of the Bank. But if the holders of stock are under an erroneous impression as to the probability of the charter's being renewed, the sooner they are undeceived the better. Is it not due to them at once to say, that Government is under no obligation to renew it? Certainly. When the period for its renewal comes, those who shall occupy seats in this House shall judge of the propriety of renewing; not from any obligation they are supposed to lie under to renew it, but from considerations drawn from their views of the good of the nation. The gentleman from Massachusetts has told us, that, before the old Bank expired, its stock rose to 140 per cent. by the mismanagement of the institution. If this be so, what security have we, that the bubble will not again burst? What certainty have we, that the present advance of 23½ per cent. is not also the consequence of some mismanagement? Who are the dealers in stock? and why do stocks rise and fall, so that by their fluctuations, whole fortunes are often swept away? The reason is plain: There are a few persons who know the causes of changes in price, while the great mass of the holders know nothing at all of the matter, and are left to the mere mercy of events. But, if the Bank is really so situated that the nation can know nothing of its concerns, the sooner we get rid of it the better. The nation is a mere stockholder in the Bank, it has, as such, all the rights of any other stockholder, and may sell out its interest whenever it may think it most expedient to do so. But, what right have we to suppose that the holders of the stock do not themselves know its true value? The selling off of our portion of the stock can have, if any, but a very trivial effect. Our selling out of our stock cannot justly be interpreted as a proof that the Government have withdrawn their protection from the Bank; there is no gentleman here who thinks of touching the charter during the period it has to run—and the buyer of the stock knows this. He goes into the market with his wits about him. Do gentlemen suppose that the buyer of this stock is in ignorance of what is transacted here? And why do they suppose he will fear to purchase it; if, while 7 millions of the public stock is taken out of it, by paying so much of the public debt, the same amount is thrown into it by the sale of our bank stock? Surely, by such a transaction, the market will virtually be left as it is at present. I am willing to allow that the stockholders purchased with the understanding that the Government would continue to hold its stock in the Bank. It certainly was not to be anticipated that the Government would sell out during the present year. But the question of its value is a matter of very simple calculation. According to the security of payment, and the rate of interest paid, so will be the price of the stock in market. Our citizens are not going to be deceived. We have thrown enough in the market to test its value, and that value is well ascertained.

Mr. HAMILTON said that, after the discussion which the subject had received, and all that had been said, and so well said, he should not have been disposed to protract, in any degree, a debate, out of which little practical usefulness was likely to arise, if some observations, looking to ulterior consequences of no small moment, had not fallen from some of the gentlemen who had entered into the discussion, which he thought did not belong either to the crisis or to the subject itself. He should, otherwise, have contented himself with a silent vote in the negative, however highly he respected the motives of the mover of the proposition, and have rested the vindication of the vote he was about to give on the unanswerable argument which his colleagues and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. GORHAM) had presented of this subject.

DECEMBER, 1827.]

Bank of the United States.

[H. or R.]

But gentlemen had not stopped where this question properly ended; the course which they had taken in their argument, had seemed almost to imply, that the decision of the present question had, if not a direct, at least a remote connection with a larger and more important inquiry in relation to the policy of a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States. Now, for one, he wished this kept entirely out of view; and he protested, in limine, against either the discussion or vote of the House on the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia being considered as an indication of the feelings, much less a commitment of the opinion of this body, to which no such question even indirectly belongs, and which the best interests of the country requires should be an open question, to be decided by those who are to come after us, with a knowledge amplified and corrected by the experience of eight years to come. He was aware that it would be a large, he might almost say a momentous question, perhaps in a period of peace the most so of any which was likely to agitate this confederacy for the next quarter of a century. He was aware that this gigantic institution, the Bank of the United States, would be brought to a strict account; that it would be inquired how it had discharged the high purposes for which it was created; whether it had, indeed, given us a uniform currency, copious and healthful; whether it had equalized the exchange of the country, and had applied, at the periods it was most wanted, a remedy to one of the severest evils that can befall a community at all advanced in civilization and the arts—a decreasing circulating medium. These were questions he, for one, was willing to leave with those who would be called upon to decide them, as well as the vast and complicated relations, constitutional and political, which belonged to the whole topic.

It was true that his colleague (Mr. McDuffie) had expressed his satisfaction that the gentleman from Virginia should have indicated his belief that the charter of the Bank of the United States would be renewed. He, Mr. H., would not say that such a sentiment was not founded on enlarged consideration of national policy, but he would undertake to say this, that, without public sentiment in the State from which they both came, underwent some change, before this question came up for consideration if he and his colleague entertained such opinions then, he rather thought their constituents would be apt to depute some other agents than themselves, to represent their sentiments on this subject, however highly and justly the constituents of his friend and colleague appreciated his (Mr. McDuffie's) public services. The truth was not to be concealed, that in all those States in which the income of the Government vastly exceeds its local expenditures, the operation of the Bank of the United States is felt with more or less severity and inconvenience; on the other hand, in those States where the Government spends locally a greater part of what it collects, the operation of this institution is not only comparatively innocent but beneficial. South Carolina happens, unfortunately, to be in the former predicament, out of that very condition of things which he had indicated, and, although the Bank of the United States was a mere instrument, it was very natural for those who were writhing under the exhaustion, to find fault with the organ of suction itself, and in the agony arising from taking the medicament not to be entirely satisfied with its sanative influence.

There was another point in this discussion against which he would enter his protest, and that was the influences that were employed from abroad, for begetting an extraordinary sensitiveness in this House that any allusion to the Bank of the United States, and the connection of the Government with it, was a most serious derangement of the financial condition of the country. Some gentleman seemed to think this subject was only to be touched by the practised hand of a fundholder; that a man of plain sense and common honesty was not to approach it; and above all, it was eminently mischievous for the Representatives of the people to entertain such a discussion, or inquire into our interest in this co-partnership, forsooth, because the speculations on 'Change might be suspended for a day or two, and some over-grown stock jobber realize two or three per cent. less than he otherwise would. He knew well that a plethoric fundholder was one of the most sensitive mortals upon the face of the earth; that he considered the barometer of 'Change Alley, of almost as much value as the scriptures; and a fall in the price of stock nearly as severe a calamity as the entire loss of the sacred writings. Cobbett has humorously told us, that nobody can touch a ruffle in the brocade of the Old Lady in Thread-needle Street, as he calls the Bank of England, without giving her a fit of hysterics and setting the whole country in commotion. We seem to be coming to the same state of things. But this is not all: my friend from Virginia cannot introduce a matter involving a mere financial question of profit and loss, without being charged with a party plot of the worst omens.

Now, sir, although this gentleman has quite wit enough to contrive, and quite firmness enough to carry into effect, a tolerable conspiracy on all proper occasions, he has too much honesty to be engaged in any that are not in harmony with the purity and integrity of his whole life; and quite too much wisdom to undertake a conspiracy, without previously providing conspirators, which he seems to have overlooked in this matter; yet, depend upon it, that many an old fundholder, roasting his feet before the fire, will tremble in his flannel for his plum, and no doubt exclaim—there, you see how it is the moment these Jackson men have got possession of the House; away goes the Bank of the United States "sky-high," and we shall next see the "military chieftain" after his election, making his way, sword in hand, into the vaults of the Bank, and seizing its coffers as his especial portion of the booty after the strife and victory. Be quiet, gentlemen. Be assured we do not mean to run our heads against the Bank of the United States—and this our vote will show.

But, sir, to be serious, I am far from thinking that it is an evil to those who permanently invest in the stock of the United States Bank, to know that the policy of that Institution may sometimes be discussed here, however prejudicial it may be to the interest of those who speculate in its scrip.

If our silence at any time when we ought to speak gives an artificial appreciation to this stock, it is the widow and the orphan, and those who are the victims of their own ignorance and the knavery of others, who suffer, and who will be sure to suffer, if any false deductions are made from the sentiments which the House is about to pronounce on the single proposition before them.

That I am opposed to the resolution of the gentleman, I need scarcely repeat, and for reasons which are at once connected with considerations that carry with them somewhat the force of a moral obligation; reasons which were stated with unanswerable force by my colleague, (Mr. DRAYTON,) which may be comprehended in a single sentence, to wit: that it entered into the consideration of the 1,500,000 dollars which the Bank paid the United States as bonus, that this co-partnership should continue during the duration of the charter.

I say, then, let this institution go on unembarrassed by either our fears or prejudices; let it enjoy all those advantages for which it was honestly and faithfully paid a full equivalent. And whilst we are provident of the present, let us be uncommitted as to the future.

Mr. WEEMS said he had yesterday opposed the motion for adjournment from his anxiety to see the question disposed of, and had not intended to say a word in the debate; but since it had been discussed to day, it had presented itself to his mind in a double aspect. One of these views had been, in a great measure, anticipated, by the gentleman from South Carolina, who had just taken his seat; he would therefore curtail what he had intended to say on that head. He joined heartily in the protest against any pledge being derived from the decision of the present question, as to what this House would do when the question of renewal of the Bank charter should come before it. He held that the House would be under no obligation derived from this source, but perfectly free and unfettered as to granting or refusing. He was opposed to the resolution; not, however, because he held the sale of stock to be any violation of a contract with the Bank. The contract of Government with the Bank contained two specific obligations; first, that the Government shall supervise the manner in which its affairs are conducted. This stipulation was separate and independent; it was introduced because the United States were to make all its deposits in this Bank. But a second stipulation was, that the Government should have a share in the direction, as it continued bound to superintend also the liberties and interests of the American people. Should a mammoth institution like this be left without any special guardianship or control, it might possibly become an instrument in the hands of some ambitious aspirant to put a crown upon his head and ruin the freedom and happiness of his people. The next stipulation was, that the United States should hold one-fifth part of the stock of the Bank. As a stockholder, however, she has clearly a right to sell out whenever she shall deem it expedient for her fixed interest to do so. We are told in the volume of truth, "all things are lawful to me, but all things are not expedient." The sale was lawful, but he was opposed to it as not being expedient—and of this he did not despair to convince the gentleman from Virginia from the arguments he had himself employed. That gentleman had shown that the price of the stock depends upon the abundance of the means to purchase it, and the difficulty of other investment, and had correctly insisted that if while United States stock is diminished by redemption of the Public Debt, the means of other investments are supplied by throwing so much Bank stock into market, no great difference in the state of the market was justly to be apprehended. There might perhaps be a temporary depression in the price of this stock, but it would be only temporary and transient; to so much of the gentleman's argument he entirely agreed. Another point of the argument was, that, in proportion as the Public Debt was paid off, the opportunities of investment enjoyed by the public creditors, ought to be increased. This also was true as a general position. But were they not abundant, and daily increasing? This was a moment of vast speculation in undertakings of all sorts. The stocks in market were almost innumerable: Manufacturing associations, canal companies, road companies, &c., &c., were all competitors for the loose and floating capital of the nation. This was, therefore, a most unpropitious moment at which to offer our stock for sale. The modes of investments were already possessed—and, according to the gentleman's own doctrine, in relation to demand and supply, the stock could not be expected now to hold its price. But should Government wait till these several stocks were in a good degree taken up, the United States Bank Stock might be offered with much better prospects of a profitable sale. Instead of 23 per cent., it might then bring 50, and even 60 per cent. advance.

"The Question" was now loudly demanded from all sides of the House.

DECEMBER, 1827.]

Old Sedition Law.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BARBOUR rose to make some concluding remarks :

As to the general principles which had been advanced on the other side, he would not detain the House save by a single remark ; and that was, that if he could for one moment believe, that, by introducing the present measure, he was in the remotest manner touching the pledged faith of the nation, the resolution would have fallen still-born from his hand. That faith which holds together the moral as well as the political world, he would never violate. Complaints had also been made, that, by effecting such a sale, the Government would treat the Bank unjustly. This, also, was what he would never be guilty of ; but was this complaint well founded ? Gentlemen spoke of the great advantages conferred by the Bank on the Government, and speak as though we were under obligations of gratitude to that institution. Obligations of gratitude ! And are we, as stockholders, to be bound on this consideration ? The benefits have at least been fully reciprocated. Nay, the deposits alone of the immense funds of the nation were an abundant compensation. We place in the hands of this institution an annual amount of twenty millions of dollars. Now, it was perfectly well known to all persons conversant in banking operations, that cash in the vaults of a bank forms almost as efficient a fund on which to proceed, as the stock itself. It is true this amount is liable to be called for by its owners at any moment : but it generally happened that, while sums were drawn out by some, they were deposited by others, and that one so nearly balanced the other, that the specie in the vaults had very truly been said to change its owners much more frequently than its place. The Government, too, can borrow money at five and four and a half per centum, and might even get it at four per centum. The Bank had secured by its charter the important privilege of receiving six per cent. interest on all the notes discounted by it, which privilege was secured for twenty years. And though the rate of stock may be diminished by the mismanagement of the institution, that is not to be charged to the Government, and does not enter into the consideration of gratitude. Besides, this Bank is a kind of monopoly of the advantages derived from Government : for the Government is bound to charter no other Bank within the United States, unless in the district of Columbia. Mr. B. concluded, with declaring that though he would never be the conscious instrument of violating in any manner the faith of the Government, he did not think that the Bank could make any just complaint so long as it continues to get more than an equivalent for all the advantages ever derived from its institution.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, yeas 9—nays 174.

So the resolution was rejected.

MONDAY, December 24.

Old Sedition Law.

Mr. HAMILTON submitted the following :

Whereas a law was passed by the Congress of the United States, approved on the 14th July, 1798, entitled "An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States ;" which said act is commonly known by the name of the Sedition law ;

Be it resolved, That the said law was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, by "abridging the freedom of the press."

Be it further resolved, That, as several persons were indicted, convicted, and suffered in pecuniary penalties under this law, that the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to report a bill which shall make full provision for refunding to the said persons the amount, with lawful interest, of the fines which they may have paid to the respective Marshals of the District Courts empowered to levy and receive the same. And in case of the death or the absence from the United States, of any of the said parties, then to their legal representatives, or such person or persons as may be duly authorized to receive the same.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of asking the House to consider, at the present moment, the resolutions which he had just had the honor of submitting. His object was rather to indicate the time at which he should ask such a consideration : for he was aware that the resolutions covered too much ground, and involved too many delicate considerations, both of principle and expediency, to be precipitately discussed.

He hoped that, as an act of justice which he owed to himself, he might be permitted to avow, that, in moving in this matter, he was influenced by no desire to make the past subservient to any purpose of contemporary excitement. The resolutions were introduced because he believed that the parties who had suffered in pecuniary penalties under the Sedition Law, were just as much entitled to have the fines which they had paid refunded to them, as an ordinary suitor in a Court of Justice was to have a sum of money refunded to him which he had paid, either through fraud or mistake, and, in his humble opinion, the only effectual mode of offering a fit atonement for the violation inflicted on the constitution, by the passage of the Sedition Law, was to make full indemnity to those who had suffered by its enforcement.

The question was one purely of abstract justice and constitutional law, and, as such, he desired to present it. He challenged the fullest discussion and freest opposition, and had no hesitation in declaring that, if, in the light which the debate was calculated to elicit, he should be convinced that he was sustaining, on principle, an untenable position, he would be the first to relieve the House of all further trouble in regard to the resolutions, by moving to withdraw them. But, believing precisely the reverse, all he asked was an equal frankness on all sides of the House, that the question might be met, not blinked or shunned, and finally, openly, and manfully, set at rest forever.

He would, therefore, for the present, move that the resolutions be printed, and lie on the table, and it was so ordered.

THURSDAY, December 27.

Revolutionary Land Warrants.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. MINER, was taken up and read.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the number of Military Land Warrants due to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war, which remain in his office uncalled for, designating the number of warrants and quantity of land due to the line of each State, respectively. And that he also state what number of such warrants have issued from the War Department within the last five years."

Mr. CONDUCT suggested a doubt of the prudence of such a measure as the resolution proposed. If the information sought for was to be published, the interests of those whom the gentleman wished to benefit would be exposed to injury, and a scene of speculation take place such as every one would deprecate.

Mr. MINER observed, that the names of persons entitled to Military Bounty Lands were not asked for by the resolution, and would not, of course, be given. The information sought was, the number of warrants due to each Line on the Continental Establishment, and the number of warrants issued during the last five years. At the last session, Mr. M. said, he had taken occasion to draw the attention of the House to this subject; and on his motion a resolution was adopted, authorizing a committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for soldiers to apply for their warrants. A bill was reported, and a law passed for that purpose. At that time he learned and stated the extraordinary fact, that there were no less than six hundred land warrants due to the Pennsylvania line alone. The presumption was a fair one, that there was a proportionate number due to the line of every other State, existing at the Revolution; in the aggregate making some thousands of warrants, embracing some of the first lands in Ohio. In this point of view, it would be seen to be a matter of considerable importance. My purpose, said Mr. M., in asking information in this precise form, was to attract the attention, and awaken the interest of many members, to the subject. Each gentleman, from the old thirteen States, seeing the number of warrants still due to his own State, would, of course, feel a more lively interest in the matter, than he would do to learn, merely, the aggregate number of warrants due to the whole army. As it regarded Pennsylvania, he felt a deep interest in the subject; six hundred military land warrants, distributed among her old soldiers, or their representatives, would carry comfort to many a cottage. It was their due. It was the price of their toil and blood, and ought not, in his opinion, to be withheld from them longer. No private individual would feel justified, if he had title papers, or property of another in his possession, of which that other person was ignorant, in remaining silent, and keeping possession, because the owner did not ask for that which, though his own, he was ignorant of. No, sir, an honest man would take pains to inform the rightful owner—to bring home to him a knowledge of his rights. Mr. M. thought it our duty to do so. It could be rationally accounted for, that such a large number of land warrants remained due, only on the supposition that the persons owning them, were ignorant of their just claims: near half a century had passed away; the soldiers living were old and poor; it was time knowledge, and thereby justice, should be brought home to them. That it was ignorance of their rights prevented application for their warrants, was partially proved by a fact which had been stated to him. A gentleman in Maryland, highly respectable and intelligent, did not obtain a warrant due him, ever since the Revolution, until within three or four years accident having brought him to a knowledge of his right. If intelligent men were ignorant, the poor and unlettered soldier might be presumed also to be uninformed of his just claims. Should this resolution pass, said Mr. M., and the information sought be obtained, it was my intention to propose another measure, that is, to give information in every State of the names of persons entitled to land warrants. But heretofore the War Department had, and very wisely, kept such information to itself, lest speculators should purchase up the soldiers' rights for a mere trifle, and obtain all the benefits themselves. If information should be publicly given, this must be effectually guarded against. To provide such safeguard, at the same time that information, without which the soldiers could never obtain their rights, was a part of his plan. He would provide by law that no transfer should be valid for five years, nor then, unless approved by the Governor of the State where made, as the guardian of the soldiers' rights. With such provision, he thought the name of every person entitled to a warrant might safely be made public. But this matter for future consideration. No such publication was now contemplated—no such information was now asked for. The information sought by the resolution could neither benefit the speculator, nor injure the soldier. It would be general, and of a character he thought useful and proper.

Mr. McCox opposed the resolution, as likely to be productive of more harm than good. Should the Secretary of War publish the names of these warrantees, it would lead to something worse than speculation; it would produce fraud and forgery. He could not see the use of calling for such a list. It may be inspected by any member at pleasure, on the books of the Department. Let gentlemen examine it there, and if they found the names of any of their own constituents, they would convey the information to them in a private manner, and thus avoid the dangers which would necessarily attend a publication of the names to all the world.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Removal of Indians.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, presuming the gentleman who moved the resolution was not aware that a similar call had been made a few sessions ago, called his attention to that fact; and, referring him to the documents then received from the Department, moved that the resolution lie on the table, at least till the gentleman could have an opportunity of examining them. The motion prevailed.

THURSDAY, January 3, 1828.

Mr. BELL moved the following:

Resolved, That the Committee of Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an armory on some point on Harpeth River, in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said, as the resolution was intended only to direct the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to the subject embraced in it, he did not present himself before the House for the purpose of making any general remarks upon the expediency of establishing an armory upon the Western waters, nor with any view, in detail, of the grounds upon which he would urge the situation of that particular district of the West, for such an establishment designated in the resolution. But, said he, as in offering it, I do not intend to pay a mere compliment of the season to the interests of that section of the country which I have the honor to represent, I beg leave now to state, that, if the subject shall be thought of sufficient consequence to engage the serious attention of the committee, (and, in my judgment, it deserves a place in their deliberations,) I expect to be able to show, that the country upon the lower branches of the Cumberland, and upon the south side of it, combines all the advantages desirable in a site for an extensive manufactory of arms, common to those places, which have hitherto been brought to the notice of this House, under more favorable auspices. I expect also to show, that this part of the country possesses other advantages which are peculiar and exclusive; and I will, in due time, take the trouble upon myself of embodying the information necessary to this effect.

That I may not be thought too sanguine in my estimate of the condition, both national and adventitious, of the section of country alluded to, permit me to state one fact, which, I am sure, our Atlantic brethren will not be unconcerned to hear. Within the last four or five years, the manufacture of bar iron in Middle Tennessee, has increased in such a degree, that the produce of the works upon the Juniata, which formerly found an extensive and profitable market in that country, is now rarely to be met with in our shops, and the Swedes iron, which, though the product of the industry of another hemisphere, and burthened, as it is, with duties, has been afforded in our market lower than the Juniata, is also fast disappearing. In truth, however ill-adapted the population of that State may be to other manufactures, that of iron must flourish, both by reason of the superior quality of ore which abounds there, and the diminished, and still diminishing value of that kind of labor which is almost exclusively employed in reducing it. In the same tract of country, water power susceptible of application to all kinds of machinery, exists to every necessary, and even desirable extent. Fossil coal, too, is found upon the banks of the Cumberland, and, as the means of transportation by water, to every point upon the Mississippi and its branches, at this time accessible from other quarters, are not restricted from this point, I am persuaded it will be found, upon inquiry, that no greater mistake could be committed, than to suppose, either that the principal materials consumed in an armory, or that all the essential articles of subsistence could not be afforded upon as low terms there, as at any other place in the Western country. There are other considerations connected with this subject, which, in my opinion, should give this point on the Western waters a decided preference over those which seem to have been more attended to; but these I will not now urge, nor even mention. Such a course, I apprehend, would be likely to provoke an immediate discussion, which would be premature, and might be useless. The suggestions already thrown out, are designed not so much to make any impression upon the House, as to elicit a full inquiry on the part of the committee, and the character of the gentlemen placed upon that committee, gives me the assurance that the proposition contained in the resolution will receive a candid and impartial examination.

The resolution was agreed to.

FRIDAY, January 4.

Removal of Indians.

Mr. HAILE said, that he had some days since laid on the table of the House a resolution in reference to the removal of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, which he desired now to call up for consideration.

The resolution was read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to enable the Choctaws and Chickasaws to explore the country beyond the river Mississippi, and to provide the means for the support of such Indians who are disposed to emigrate, and are willing to embrace the benevolent objects designed by the Government.

To this resolution Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, offered an amendment, when it was before the House on the 11th December, to include the "Pattawattamie and Miami Indians," and the question recurred on this amendment.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, (Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs,) stated that the committee had the subject of that resolution now before them, and were preparing a report upon it, which they intended shortly to present to the House.

Mr. HALE observed, that his resolution had, he believed, been offered previously to any other, on the general subject of the removal of Indians, and he had been told by those gentlemen who had offered amendments to it, that they would consent to withdraw those amendments, in order that his might be considered separately. The honorable Chairman of the Indian Committee was not, he apprehended, fully acquainted with the situation of the two tribes to which his resolution referred. In 1820, there had been guaranteed to the Chickasaws and Choctaws, by the Government of the United States, a large tract of land west of the Mississippi; but, since that treaty, no steps had been taken to carry this pledge into effect. On the contrary, 8,000 whites had encroached upon their territory, and were driving them back, at the same time that every inducement had been held out to them by the Government, to obtain their consent to emigration. Under these circumstances, the tribes referred to, had peculiar claims on the attention of the Committee of Indian Affairs, and he wished that committee to report to the House, whether, in their judgment, the tract guaranteed by the treaty, was to be given, as it had been promised, or some other tract in lieu of it.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, having no objection to the object of the resolution, and not being desirous of throwing any obstacles in the way of its adoption, withdrew the amendment to it which he had before offered.

Mr. FLOYD, of Va., believed this was the first time an appropriation had been asked from this House to enable Indians to go into the wilderness to explore it. He had thought that the object of the system adopted by the General Government, with respect to the Indians, was to civilize those people, and to get them out of the wilderness. As the reverse, however, seemed intended by this resolution, he was opposed to its adoption.

Mr. HALE said, that Government had made a treaty by which they were bound. If solemn treaties were to be considered as of any avail, and the Government meant to act in good faith, these Indians ought to receive what had been promised them. It was with a view to this end, that he had offered the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Coast Transportation of Slaves.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means do inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the 16th section of an act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port, or place, within the jurisdiction of the United States, etc., as requires that the owner or captain intending to transport a slave, coastwise, from one port to another, in the same State, shall previously deliver to the Collector a manifest, specifying the name, age, etc., of said slave, and swearing that the said slave had not been imported since the year 1808, and that he was held to service by the laws of the State.

Mr. MITCHELL said that, without some explanation of the facts referred to, the resolution must be, in a great measure, unintelligible. In 1807, Congress, in pursuance of a clause in the constitution on that subject, passed an act suppressing the slave trade. The 10th section of that act required that, when a slave arrives in any part of the United States, in a vessel of more than 40 tons burthen, the captain and owner must unite in an oath that the slave had not been imported since the 1st January, 1808. This ceremony was accompanied with fees to the collector of $1 50, and if the parties failed to comply with this requirement of the act, the vessel was to be confiscated, and the captain to pay a fine of $1,000. At the time this act passed, these requirements were wise and proper; because, at that time, our whole coast swarmed with vessels engaged in the slave trade; but the object of this and other acts had been fully accomplished, and that trade might now be pronounced, so far as we were concerned, to be completely suppressed. The last accounts received from our station in Africa, declared that the English and American branches of the trade had ceased. All those formerly engaged in it, had, by the severity of our laws, been expelled from the country, and no such trade was now carried on in any part of our coast. The act to which he referred, therefore, while it imposed a very severe tax on the people of the South, was, under the present state of things, productive of no benefit whatever. Its operation was harassing and oppressive. If a gentleman wished to go with his servant from Charleston to Beaufort, the captain is under the necessity of giving, in his manifest, an account of that slave. His oath, and that of the owner, must be submitted to the collector, though that officer should know ever so well the fact to be substantiated; and, if a gentleman sends his slave up and down, fifty times in the course of the year, the same ceremony must be gone through. This is trouble and expense, without any useful end.

Mr. M. said, that, though he was himself a slaveholder, he was as warmly and sincerely opposed to the slave trade as any gentleman from the Northern States possibly could be,

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[H. OF R.]

and could he be convinced that such a provision as this was necessary to the putting down of that traffic, he would be the last man to oppose it; but he was convinced that it was wholly unnecessary, and as it interposed a vexatious embarrassment in the intercourse between the Southern States, he was desirous of seeing it repealed; but wished to obtain the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means on that subject.

Mr. MEBOER said, that, without intending to express any opinion upon the subject of the inquiry which the gentleman from South Carolina was desirous to institute, he could not refrain from correcting the erroneous impression which he seemed to have formed, that the slave trade was abolished. On the contrary, he believed that it was now carried on to as great an extent as at any former period of its history; and to some extent, though precisely to what, by American capital, he would not undertake to determine.

The resolution was then adopted.

Canal in the Territory of Michigan.

Mr. WING offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sum of money for examining and determining upon a suitable route for a canal across the peninsula of Michigan, to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Lake Erie.

Resolved, also, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating, for the purpose of making said canal, tracts of land on each side of said route, equal in quantity to those heretofore granted for constructing the Illinois and Indiana Canals.

Mr. WING said that, as the importance of the resolutions might not at once be apparent to the House, he would ask the indulgence of a moment, whilst he briefly stated a few of the reasons which have indicated the propriety of the present inquiry. The difficulties and dangers which attend the passage of our north-western lakes; the exposures to which the lives, the health, and the property of individuals, as well as the property of the Government, are subjected; the frequent losses which are sustained, both by the public and by individuals, in encountering a navigation of nearly eight hundred miles in extent, from the head of Lake Erie to the head of Lake Michigan, which is difficult, if not dangerous, even in the most favorable seasons of the year; indeed, the utter impracticability of navigating some of our most northerly lakes and straits, during the winter months, Mr. W. said, all conspired to render it an object of no inconsiderable moment, not only to the inhabitants of that country, but to the Government itself, to effect as speedily as possible, a safe channel of communication across the peninsula of that territory.

This object once accomplished, together with that of the Illinois Canal, for the construction of which the Government has already made a large, if not an ample provision, you not only avoid the necessity, in time of war, as well as peace, of transporting every description of property, destined for the supply of your northwestern and western ports, through a long chain of narrow straits, which bring you within musket shot of the British shore; as well as the dangers of a boisterous lake navigation, to which I have just adverted; but you have at once a safe and easy inland communication, upon nearly the whole line of your northern and northwestern frontier, extending from New York to the Mississippi.

I present this subject, Mr. Speaker, the more confidently, because it is not trammelled by those constitutional objections which have been heretofore urged against similar propositions from the States. The whole route of this contemplated canal is within the limits of a territory, over which the United States exercise the exclusive sovereignty; and within which the United States are the principal owners of the soil. To such as may not have adverted to the subject, who are not intimately acquainted with the geography of that country, and the facilities with which the object may be accomplished, the item of expense might, at first, seem to be an objection. Careful examinations, however, have been made by a number of our most scientific and intelligent citizens, who hesitate not to say, that a canal may be constructed across that peninsula, at less expense than any one of similar extent which has ever been attempted in the Union.

If, therefore, to facilitate the intercourse between the different sections of the United States; if to render the transportation of property both cheap and safe; if to enhance the value of the public domain, by improving it, and thereby inviting it to a healthful and enterprising population; if to give stability to your frontier settlements in that quarter, and add strength to an extended and defenceless frontier, be legitimate objects for Congressional legislation, and worthy the consideration of the Government—then, sir, I may indulge the hope that the resolutions which I have had the honor of submitting, will be favorably received by the House, and will obtain a direction to that committee from whose investigations, not only the citizens of the territory, whom I have the honor to represent, who feel a deep interest in the subject, but the Government itself, may anticipate beneficial results.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

The remainder of the day was spent in debate upon a bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive. This was a private bill, providing for remunerating the claimant for the lost time of a slave impressed into the service of the United States, at New Orleans, and who was wounded, and also for hospital charges.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that the Committee of Claims assume it as a principle, that the United States Government is not bound, in any case, to pay for slaves injured or lost; because they are not considered as property. A principle like this, (said Mr. L.) is one of the most serious importance, not only to my constituents, but to all those who are interested in this species of property, throughout a large and very important portion of these United States. Slaves not property! What are they then? If not property, they are free: if they are not our property, we have no right to their service: if they are not property, the whole foundation on which the constitution of this Union rests, is shaken. And is it by a by-blow like this, that so important a principle is to be established! I trust not. I trust that the representatives of those States who are so happy, yes, sir, I say so happy, as not to possess any of this species of property, will not, by sanctioning such a principle, lay a foundation for that discontent, for that jealousy, for that division, and for all those most serious consequences, which must result from such a decision. The sum in this bill is nothing; it is not to be spoken of—it is not for that I now address this House; but I should basely betray the duty I owe to those who have entrusted their interests to my hands, did I not protest against the admission of a principle like that advanced in this report. Indeed, sir, it can scarcely be believed, that the Committee of Claims intended to establish it. The terms on which we entered into the social compact, and without which it would never have been formed, the laws which have been passed, and the treaties made under it, must all have prevented their coming to this conclusion; and, independent of these, the laws, not of the Southern States only, but in those very quarters of the continent where such an opinion seems now to be held—the laws of those States would have taught them, that this opinion could not properly be held. How long is it since, in those very States, the laws which considered them to be as much property as any other article, have been repealed? In New York, within the year—in other States, they still exist. It would be well, therefore, for gentlemen who might be inclined to favor the doctrines of this report, to look at home, and see whether, by voting for it, they do not sustain a principle as much at war with the laws of their own States, as it is with the Constitution and laws of the United States. With all this evidence before them, I can scarcely believe it to have been the deliberate intention of the respectable committee, to declare that slaves were not the property of their masters; yet, whatever may have been their intention, their language is but too plain; the whole tenor of the report admits of no other conclusion. I move you, therefore, an amendment to the bill.

[The amendment of Mr. L. went to introduce a clause allowing the claim for the injury done to the slave, and for medical attendance on him.]

Mr. WHITTLESBY, a member of the Committee of Claims, and who had reported the bill under consideration, spoke in reply. He said he extremely regretted that the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. LIVINGSTON) had thought proper to exhibit, in the discussion of this question, so much spirit and warmth of feeling. It is a question, said he, that ought to be decided dispassionately, on its own intrinsic merits, without awaking sectional feelings or jealousies; and he trusted that his (Mr. L.'s) appeal to Southern gentlemen to rally round his standard, would not, on this occasion, be responded to by them. He might assuredly have abstained from charging the committee with falsehood, and with having introduced into the report any sentiment or expression, which has necessarily provoked this debate. The committee studiously avoided touching the question which the gentleman apprehends is so vitally important to the slaveholder. The whole of his argument is based on false premises, and his deductions are of course erroneous. He takes it for granted, that the committee have said "that slaves are not property." In this he is mistaken; there is no such position taken in the report. They have said, that "slaves are not put on the footing of property, and paid for, when lost to the owner in the public service." Can the gentleman disprove the truth of this assertion, by recurring to a single case, where the Government has paid for a slave lost in the service? When the gentleman appeals to the passions of the committee, and presses upon its consideration that the Committee of Claims have, in this instance, advanced new and alarming doctrines, it behooves him to look into former reports, and ascertain from them the sentiments of former committees, when deciding on similar questions. The Committee of Claims gave to this subject the most unremitted attention, and did not content themselves with examining the printed reports, but they also carefully examined all the manuscript reports, from the commencement of the last war; nay, they went still farther; they sent to the Register of the Treasury, and inquired of him whether there were any instances, during the Revolutionary war, where slaves had been paid for by the Government, and the answer was, there were none. It cannot be supposed that, during that long and arduous struggle, when the whole energies of the country were put in requisition, there were no slaves in the service, nor that some of them were not slain in battle, or otherwise lost to the owners.

He denied the right of the Government to impress slaves, and said, therein the interest of the master was amply protected. He said, the country was to be defended by free men, and he would advocate no principles which would enable them to stay at home, and send their slaves into the ranks of the army, or which would compel the Government to impress them. Slaves can no more be impressed than minors—who are not liable to perform military duty; but suppose a minor, in the time of imminent danger, was in the service, would his parent or master, if an apprentice, have any claim on the Government for a remuneration for his loss, if such minor was killed or wounded in battle? No one would pretend that he would; and why not, if the master is to be compensated for the loss of, or for injury done to, his slave? The service of the minor is not the less valuable because he is white, and the parent or master is ordinarily entitled to it. The discussion of these topics is at all times unpleasant, and, in this instance, it is wholly unnecessary and gratuitous. So far as my information has extended, those in the non-slaveholding States have for their brethren in the South the kindest feelings; they consider slavery to be a national evil, and are disposed to relieve the country from it, so far as meets the acquiescence of the slaveholder, and no farther.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[H. or R.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON said: The gentleman says I have misunderstood the committee, and that they do consider slaves as property. Well, sir, if so, why have they not allowed compensation for their injury? But have I misunderstood the committee? Have they not carefully employed, throughout their report, in every case (but one) where they speak of the slave of M. D'Auterive the word servant, and carefully avoided the word slave? [Here Mr. L. quoted the report.] Now, the gentleman tells us that the committee have nowhere said that a slave is not property.

But they have said expressly, that they have not been considered by the Government as property which ought to be paid for when taken for public use. And the addition to the phrase in which it is said that they are not property, cannot qualify it so as to lessen the effect of that allegation, and the sentence has precisely the same meaning as if it had read thus: "Slaves have never been considered by the Government as property, and therefore are not to be paid for." If they are property, of any description whatever, they must be paid for when taken for public use. The constitution makes no distinction. It embraces all private property, of whatever nature. If Congress could distinguish and say this species of private property shall be compensated for, that shall not, the provision of the constitution would be nugatory, and every species of property might in its turn become the subject of an exception. We must, then, argue upon the report, not upon the explanation of it given by one of the members who made it.

Mr. FOSTER said he rose for the purpose of bringing to the notice of the House a single fact. The gentleman from Louisiana had put the matter on its true footing. If this slave had been impressed and lost, those who impressed him must be held to pay. This principle, so far from never having been acknowledged or acted upon by this Government, had been expressly acknowledged and acted upon in a very memorable instance. The gentleman from the Committee on Claims said, that payment had never been made by this Government for slaves lost, and had quoted a string of precedents to prove it; but of all the cases cited by the gentleman, only one had any bearing on the present bill, and that was the case where the sickness of the slave, contracted in the service, was not certainly proved to have been the cause of his death; but it was this doubt only that was the true reason why the slave had not been paid for, and not any doubt whether the slave was to be reckoned as property. But the instance to which he had at first alluded, was one that could not be denied or doubted. In our treaty with Great Britain, this Government openly claims payment for slaves forcibly taken away, and the claim has been allowed, and large sums paid by the British Government on this very principle. If this is not an acknowledgment of the principle by this Government, I am at a loss to conceive what can be; and surely our own Government is as much bound by it as the Government of a foreign country.

Mr. MCCOR (of the Committee of Claims) said, that this was a delicate subject, and he could not help thinking that the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana was, in its practical tendency, more injurious to the interest of the Southern States than that advocated by the Committee. The Government (said Mr. McC.) does not pretend any legal right to take and use this species of property, and he was not willing to coerce its employment. He was one of those who would not willingly have a single slave in or about the Army at all. He thought our soldiers should all be freemen. That Government in its treatment of slaves considered them as something more than property. The constitution does the same—it considers them not only as property, but as persons also. The Government has no authority whatever to call slaves into the public military service. There may be justice in some cases in allowing for their loss: but he, for one, had rather see all the slave owners of the South suffer some loss than grant claims of this kind, and thus sanction the principle that Government has a right to impress slaves into the service. He knew that the States in which this kind of property existed had their own laws, by which slaves were made property in the most complete sense of that term. But these were not laws of the General Government. The Government has no control over slaves—and he would rather lose a slave entirely than admit that the General Government had a right to take it. So far was the Government from pretending to this, or admitting the principle now contended for when the law of 1816 made provisions for property lost in the late war, a gentleman from one of the Southern States proposed an amendment, which went to include this species of property with other descriptions of it: but the House, on full consideration, rejected the amendment. This fact had a strong influence on the decision of the Committee of Claims. They took the law of 1816 as their guide—and they found pleasure in thus being able to avoid the decision of the abstract question. The subject had not been lightly considered by the committee. He would conclude by repeating his conviction that the House would do more injury to the slaveholding States, by sanctioning the principle that the General Government have the right to impress a slave, than by refusing the present amendment.

Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, thought that, instead of cherishing a wish to avoid the question involved in the amendment, it was, on the contrary, very desirable that it should be fully presented for decision. Let it be considered, let it be fully debated, and let it be finally acted on. He thought somewhat differently from his honorable friend from Louisiana, as to the present case, not presenting all the points necessary to ensure a full and correct investigation: but if the facts are as stated by the member from Louisiana, and not contested by the member from Ohio, then the case is fully made out; but he apprehended, having once paid some attention to this question, that the record evidence will not support the issue proper to be made. But, yielding in this my opinion, or rather my knowledge of the facts to that of others, and inasmuch, too, as this point is not contested in the report, I will assume, that all that is requisite is embraced; and when the decision has gone forth to the country, let it be distinctly understood that all the material facts sustain the issue.

I shall, therefore, proceed, not fearing nor anticipating consequences. And, sir, could it be presented to Congress for adjudication or legislative regulation, whether the slave was the property of the master or not, I could readily conceive that the most appalling consequences would ever attend its progress here; and, sir, though I have all the confidence that patriotism can demand, in the action of this House or Congress, acting within its legitimate sphere of delegated powers, yet, sir, the very act of its transcending that limit, would destroy that confidence. It matters not that this step should be on a point connected with this particular class of rights, delicate as it has ever been considered, and on which the jealousy of so large a portion of the people of this country is properly excited, or whether it should be on any other. The first act of assumed unconstitutional right here, is in violation of the charter that binds us together, and therefore becomes a usurpation, and any usurpation is alarming, whether in this Government or any other, but more especially in this.

Is, then, the question to be raised here, whether this class of people is property? Sir, it cannot, nor will not, I hope, be gravely asked or answered; and to my mind it is only involved by your granting the indemnity, or by your refusal of it. If granted incidentally, it is decided; though intrinsically you gave no greater validity to a right already perfect and complete: but if refused, you withhold from a portion of the people of this Union, that which you have repeatedly granted to another portion, and prevent the fifth article of the amendments of the constitution from having due force and execution; for, with other things, it declares, "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." If you refuse this "just compensation," we must either say that you violate the constitution, or else you decide that slaves are not property. Are you then prepared to make such decision? I think not. And, although the member from Ohio gravely insists that slaves are persons; yet he has not clearly denied that persons may not be property. Sir, what is it we look to, to ascertain what is or what is not property? It is to law.

We are told that there is no authority to impress a slave; that it is in violation of law; that this is a species of property above the law. I grant it, sir, and the very same principle I claim as equally applicable to any description of private property. Can gentlemen point me to a code of law regulating impressments? None such exist. The very term indicates its character. Its law is power, and its action necessity. It is not, nor never can be, based upon right; and the very clause of the constitution, which I have before recited, gives not the right, but recognizes the power, and enforces remuneration. This clause was not ingrafted into the constitution, to delegate to the Federal Government a power not previously possessed, but to compel the fulfilment of the demands of justice—a power inherent in all Governments from necessity called into action. All Governments claim the power, but few grant the indemnity: ours, based upon principles of stern justice, provided for the indemnity, in its fundamental law, but left as it ever should be left—the regulation of the power to be controlled by the exigencies of the case; and these never should be less than the sternest necessity. Sir, all impressment is above the law: all impressment is a trespass against individual right; necessity, therefore, becomes the law, and its operation should only be, when, for the benefit of the whole it becomes necessary to sacrifice individual interest. Sir, in the case before you, I cannot anticipate a denial of the existence of such necessity: if it ever did exist anywhere, it surely did exist on this occasion. The case then is made out; the strong arm of the Government has been exerted to take from a private citizen his individual property. Can your justice deny the compensation which your power enables you to withhold? The impressment was from necessity; the indemnity is from the law.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, said that he had not fully understood the case for which this bill is to provide. The gentleman from Alabama had expressed some doubts as to the main fact, which was the impressment of the

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterion.

[H. OF R.]

slave. This Mr. M. considered as the point on which the decision must turn. If Government impressed the slave, Government must pay for his loss of time; but, if his master voluntarily took him into the ranks, he must submit to the loss. He hoped, therefore, that the bill might be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, in order that fuller testimony as to the main point might be exhibited to that committee.

Mr. STRONG said, that he had risen for the purpose of recurring to a fact, in legislation, which seemed to have escaped the notice of gentlemen. It was a singular circumstance, in relation to our slave population, that, up to the year 1814, there was no law which protected them from military service. Previous to that year, the law of enlistment permitted officers to enrol "effective able-bodied men," but in December, 1814, the law was changed, and since that time none may be enlisted, but "free effective able-bodied men." Before that time, slaves might be enlisted, but since that time they cannot. The inference is of deep interest to all the slaveholding States. If it be a fair inference from what he had stated, that the intentment of our previous Legislatures had been that slaves should form a peculiar species of property, which was placed without the reach of military law, so that they, like horses, oxen, and other chattels, might not be taken for military use; then the explanatory statute of 1814 would lose its effect, if the doctrine, now advanced by gentlemen, in support of this bill, was to be admitted. If such was their wish, if they did intend to put this species of property over, within the reach of the military power of the United States, so be it. It was for them to judge of. This was the great question involved in the present discussion: Shall slave property, like horses and oxen, be placed without the reach of the arm of military government, or not? If the gentlemen take the former ground and agree to pay for the loss of this slave, then the whole mass of slave population is put within the reach of the Government. For himself, he did not now say that he did not agree to take either of these courses.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of contributing to any excitement which the debate might have occasioned: for, if the question was really a difficult and critical one, (which he did not perceive,) it ought only to be approached with a greater degree of calmness and deliberation.

Now, sir, I am not prepared to admit that Congress is about to decide, (whatever may be the fate of the claim before you,) whether slaves be property or not; because, so long as this Confederacy lasts, and the constitution that created it, Congress has no power to settle any such question, and there is an end of the argument. The question, therefore, before the House, is not whether slaves be property or not, because the mere statement of the proposition involves an absurdity in its terms; but whether there be any thing in this peculiar species of property which should deprive its owners of a just claim to indemnity, when injured or destroyed in the public service.

To sustain the negative of this question, the gentleman from Ohio had relied on several precedents, nearly all of which he (Mr. H.) considered as inapplicable. For it would be recollected, in the case he had cited, in which Congress had refused to indemnify the owners either for the loss or for injury to their slaves in the public service, was where they had been taken by their masters into the army as their servants, for which their owners received a full equivalent in pay, clothing, and subsistence, with a perfect understanding of the risk which their slaves were to encounter. But this does not touch the question of coercive impressment, made of a slave, not as a soldier, but as a laborer, precisely as any domestic animal or implements of husbandry might be taken for the public use. Claims of this description could, in his view of the subject, be paid without affirming any power of the Federal Government to enlist or to make coercive levies, by way of conscription, of the slaves of the South. On the contrary, he thought the payment of this claim sustained the converse of this proposition, and proved that the Government had no control over slaves as military persons; but took them for the mere purposes of labor, as property, and, for their use or injury, their owners were to be paid in this light alone.

Mr. KREMER said, that what he had this day heard advanced was so very extraordinary, that it called on him to say something. What is this case? A man has had his slave taken by the Government of the United States, and employed in its service, and there wounded, if not destroyed. Shall the master be paid for it, or not? This was the question, which some gentlemen seemed to think so terrible. The gentlemen say we must not touch it; but they do touch it, and they say the man must not be paid, because a slave is not property. This is the logic of college-learned gentlemen. Now, for my own part, I do not care when or where this question is discussed. I am willing to meet it anywhere. The gentleman from New York (Mr. STRONG) has told us that the officer of Government, and not the Government, must be responsible. Sir, this may do very well in a certain school, but it will never do in a school of justice! I can never consent to such a doctrine as that. I'm for putting the saddle on the right horse. If the servant of the Government acts unjustly and tyrannically, the Government must pay for it? Who ever heard of such an argument? The Government not responsible! Why, even in the most despotic Governments, such a notion was never heard of; but, in a Republican Government, like ours, it's intolerable. If ever there was a just claim before this House, this is one. And if the question is to be argued how far a slave is the property of his owner, I, for one, am willing to declare, before the whole world, that I believe a slave is as much the property of his master as any thing else that he owns.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that he had understood a gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) as having advanced the opinion, that the right to take and employ a slave for the public service, arises out of the imminent necessity of a state of war. There was a very striking case, illustrative of this matter, which took place in 1814. Previous to that time no person had been allowed by law to be enlisted, unless he was over 21 years of age, or the consent of his master, if he was an apprentice, had been obtained in writing. But, at that disastrous hour, while sitting amidst the ruins of this capitol, Congress felt the necessity of raising armies to defend the country, then attacked on its seacoast, on its northern frontier, and in the extreme West. Under the pressure of such a necessity, a law was passed, authorizing minors of 18 years to be enlisted, without the consent of their masters, and the same law was afterwards repeated, to the destruction of the contract by which a servant is bound to his master. Yet, even in that law, the contract was so far acknowledged, that a part of the bounty to which the recruit had a claim was required to be paid to his master. The injustice and the oppressive effect of this act, was pressed upon the House with very great force of argument by a large portion of the members from the Northern States. It was painted in colors as glowing as any which can possibly be used on the present occasion. But what did Congress do? Were they deterred by these arguments? Not at all. They passed the bill on the principle that necessity was above law, and they directed the servant to be enrolled without his master's consent. Some of these recruits fell in battle, or by other casualties of the military service. But was such a thing ever heard of as the master of such an apprentice, coming to be indemnified for the loss of his servant's time, or the expense of medical attendance? Never. Yet gentlemen cannot show any valid distinction between such a case and that in this bill. The difference depends only on the degree of loss or hardship, and not at all on the principle. But, more: a servant with a team was forcibly impressed, and in the impressment the servant was slain. His master had a right to his service. He was taken not by law, but by the exigencies of war, contrary to the common rights of mankind; yet it was never so much as even pretended, that the Government must pay for his loss. The present bill rests on the same principle; and if you allow the claim of D'Auterive, you must go back and include all such cases as those I have mentioned.

After an ineffectual attempt, by Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims, the committee rose and reported, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, January 7.

Removal of Indians.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency and practicability of congregating the Indian tribes, now residing east of the Mississippi River, to the west of that river, and of establishing a Government over them, &c., made a detailed report, accompanied by the following bill, which was twice read, and committed:

"A bill making appropriation to defray the expense of certain Indians who propose to emigrate.

"Be it enacted, &c., That, to enable a deputation of the Chickasaw and other Indians, to be joined by such persons as the President of the United States may appoint for that purpose, to examine the country west of the Mississippi, for the purpose of selecting a portion of it for a permanent home, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid from any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated."

Case of Captured Africans.

The bill from the Senate to authorize the cancelling of a bond therein mentioned, was twice read.

It having been moved that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole,

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR (Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary) expressed his conviction that the reference was wholly unnecessary. The Committee on the Judiciary had had the subject-matter of this bill already before them, and had reported a bill to the House, of which he believed, this was a transcript, totidem verbis. The circumstances of the case he would state:

A vessel, called "the Antelope," had been captured by one of our own revenue officers, and brought into the port of Savannah, with a cargo of 140 African negroes. The vessel had been libelled, and claims had been set upon the part of certain Portuguese and Spaniards, for a portion of the slaves. One hundred of the negroes had been sent to Cape Mesurado, in Africa; but 39 of them had been decreed to the Spanish claimants. The case had been some time before the Federal Courts of Georgia, and had been removed by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It had been pending, in all, about eight years. During the whole of that time, these unfortunate creatures had been detained in the custody of the Marshal, and in this interval, many of them had been married, and become heads of families—had been partially domesticated with us, and were desirous of remaining in this country. The Spanish claimants, however, (who resided in Cuba,) sent an order to have the whole number transported to that island; but a Southern gentleman, (Mr. WILKINSON, of Georgia,) a member of this House, not now in his seat, in a spirit of pure benevolence, and from

JANUARY, 1838.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[H. OF R.]

no motives, whatever, of interest or selfishness, had, from mere kindness, bought out the Spanish claim, and paid out all the expenses in the courts, which were very heavy. By a regulation, however, of the Court in Georgia, he is bound to give a bond, to transport these negroes beyond the limits of the United States, and his prayer is, that the bond may be cancelled. The effect of granting it will be to leave these negroes and their children in the United States, instead of having them transported to Cuba, and he need submit no remarks to this House, either on the difference of treatment they would here experience from what they might expect there, or on the painful severity of breaking those near and tender ties which bind the husband to his wife, and the parent to his child. If the bond referred to were not cancelled, the transportation of the whole must inevitably take place. He presumed there could be but one feeling in the bosom of the House as to such an alternative, especially as the measure would be productive of no possible evil, while it went to mitigate that load, which, under any circumstances, must press but too heavily. He had, indeed, heard a suggestion whispered, that this bill was meant to cover the infamy of evading the law which prohibited the importation of slaves. Did he believe that it had the remotest possible connection, he would be the last to countenance it on any other occasion, which went to increase the number of that unhappy population. But where there was no possible connection with such a design, where the slave vessel had been captured by our own officer, and these unhappy people had been detained in the country in consequence of unforeseen litigation, and where a gentleman, in the pure kindness of his heart, had stepped forward, at an actual pecuniary sacrifice, to save them from being torn from each other, he could conceive of no reason why the House should refuse the request that this bill should go at once to its third reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said a few words on the importance of the question involved in the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR, disclaiming all desire of precipitation, and to allow time for full inquiry, moved to lay the bill on the table.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

The bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive was taken up, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDIOT in the chair, on that bill—the amendment of Mr. LIVINGSTON being still under consideration.

Mr. J. C. CLARK, of New York, said, being a member of the committee who reported the bill under consideration, and having assented to the report, he would claim the indulgence of the committee for a few moments, while he assigned the reasons which induced him to sanction the report. I regret, said Mr. C., that it should have been thought proper by honorable gentlemen, at this time, and on this subject, to enter into a grave discussion of the question whether slaves are property. I regret that a sense of duty should have compelled my honorable friends from the South to start a point which I had imagined had long since been settled; and I still more regret that this debate furnishes an opportunity of getting up, with new dresses and machinery, and for stage effect, a second edition of a serio-comico play, entitled the "Missouri Plot." Is the ghost of the Missouri Question again to be marched, with solemn and terrific aspect, through these halls? Is it again to "shake its gory locks at us," and, pointing with one hand to the North, and with the other to the South, and gazing its blood-shotten eye on slavery, written on the escutcheon of the constitution, to proclaim, with unearthly voice, "out damned spot?" I had imagined that this subject had received its quietus; that it had gone to the "tomb of the Capulets," and that its epitaph had been written "Requiescat in pace." Sir, is there any necessity, at this time, to disturb its repose? I think not. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. Some restless spirit—some future Catiline—appealing to the worst passions of his countrymen, will be found ready to "sound the trumpet, and wake its resurrection."

The honorable gentleman from Louisiana seemed to think, that, to deny the right of compensation in this case, would be to sap the foundations of the constitution, and dissolve the Union. If such is to be the result, the subject should be approached with great caution, and discussed with temperance and moderation. I apprehend the gentleman is indebted more to his fancy than his judgment for his fearful forebodings, and that this question can be settled without doing violence to the constitution, and, at the same time, preserve the just rights of the slaveholder. The gentleman from Alabama thought now was the proper time to settle the question. Sir, the question has long since been settled. If I understood the gentleman from South Carolina, he seemed to think that this House had no right or power to settle the question, and could not, so long as the constitution, and Confederacy under it, should exist. He did not mean, I presume, that the citizens of the South—that high-minded, gallant, and patriotic people—would not submit to a decision of this House. He did not mean to be understood, I presume, that if, for the purpose of making a proper disposition of this amendment, it should be decided that a slave is not property, in the absolute, unqualified sense of the term, that then it would be high time, in the language of a learned Doctor of the South, to inquire of what benefit to us is our Union? He undoubtedly meant that the question had long since been decided by the constitution, by the slaveholding States, and by the opinions of the first men of the South, and, therefore, it was not to be doubted: and in this, sir, I entirely agree.

By the national compact, slaves, for certain purposes, are considered as persons, and, for certain purposes, as property. It is a fixed principle in the constitution, that representation is based on numbers, and not on wealth. In the apportionment of the representation in Congress, amongst the several States, under the constitution, this principle was maintained, by adding to the free white population three-fifths of all other "persons." What persons. So anxious were the venerable framers of the constitution to avoid offence; so studious were they to treat a subject so full of embarrassment, with the utmost delicacy, that they cautiously omitted the word "slave." So, in the 9th section of the first article, they are called "persons." Would to God, sir, that the same tenderness of the feelings of others, and the same anxiety to avoid offence, were more the characteristics of more modern politicians. Then shall we hear no more of Southern nabobs and Southern negro-drivers—names used for the purpose of party excitement, and of arraying the passions and prejudices of one portion of our country against another. That slavery is an evil, there can be no difference of opinion. But the constitution found us in the possession of slaves; it has recognized them as an effective portion of our population, and it is enough for us to know, as far as humanity is concerned, that they are better clothed and fed, and more happy, than they would be in a state of emancipation. Liberty to them, under their present inability to appreciate, and incapacity to relish its enjoyments, would be a curse. No one who consults their happiness, or the good of the Republic, would wish to see them emancipated, and turned adrift on the community. The constitution, then, for certain purposes, regards slaves as "persons," and, sir, for a very important purpose. It gives to them, or to their masters in their right, a portion of our national representation. But it will be said that this was the result of mutual compromise and concession. Yes, sir, it was; but it was a compromise based on equivalents, and one of those equivalents resulting from the principle and spirit of the constitution, is the right of Government, when threatened with destruction, to use slaves for the purpose of national defence, and that, too, without being liable to be called on for indemnification.

Sir, the constitution views slaves in the same light as did the slaveholding States at the time of its adoption. It has given no new character to these anomalous beings. The States had always considered them sub modo as persons. They were considered by the laws of the States as a species of animals, neither belonging to the moral or material world, but holding a middle station between both. The constitution having thus found them, left them to be considered by the States as property of a peculiar character—property so far as their liberty and services were subject to the uncontrolled will of their master—property so far as they were the subjects of sale; but persons so far as the lives and limbs were protected from violation—so far as the right of trial, in some cases by justices, and in others by a jury, was concerned; and so far as they increased the national representation of the States owning them. The laws of Virginia, I think, secured to them these rights—rights which can only belong to persons, as members of the body politic, moral beings, and the subjects of punishment. In more modern times these rights have been enlarged. In Missouri they have the right, in all cases of imputed crime, that a Grand Jury should pass upon the case, to a trial by a Petit Jury, to the benefits of counsel, and are subject in most cases to the same punishment which would be inflicted on a white man for the same offence. The same statute which declares slaves to be personal property, likewise confers on them personal and political rights.

This, sir, is no new doctrine. At the time of the adoption of the constitution, it was well understood. In the 54th number of the Federalist, we have from the pen of Mr. Madison, whose opinions on all subjects, and especially on this, are entitled to great respect, an exposition of the views of the people of the South, so far as he understood them. He says: "The slave is no less evidently regarded by law as a member of society, not as a part of the irrational creation; as a moral person, not a mere article of property. The Federal Constitution, therefore, decides, with great propriety, on the case of our slaves, when it views them in the mixed character of persons and property. This is, in fact, their true character."

Both humanity and religion sanctions this declaration, which declares that slaves are, in some respects, "persons." It is impossible, in this age, to form any idea of the absolute, direct, and unqualified dominion, as applicable to a human being. It is impossible to reconcile this sort of property with the fact, that they are possessed of personal rights. If they are property, in the unrestrained sense of the term, why do they not mingle with the common mass of matter, and be treated like the "brutes that perish?" Has the master the same kind of property in the slave that he has in his ox? No one will answer in the affirmative. This construction of the constitution, and of laws of the slaveholding States, secures the latter in the undisturbed possession of the slave property, except in the extraordinary case of war, when the Government, threatened with annihilation, calls to its aid, for the purpose of self-preservation, all its moral and physical force. Then it is that the Government has a right to call upon the slaveholding States for the equivalent for an increased representation in consequence of the slaves.

The gentleman from Louisiana has said, that no property could be rightfully impressed! This, sir, is a novel doctrine. Every writer, in treating of the rights of sovereignty, from the first to the last, tells you, that, when a nation is at war, struggling for existence, it has the right to avail itself of all its means, whether the subject is willing, or whether he is not. At such a time, it does not stop to inquire whether its population be bond or free, black or white; if they can use the bayonet, or point the musket, it is their duty to rally round the standard of their country, and, if necessary, sacrifice their lives in her preservation. And here there is no discretion. If it is the right of the Government to command, the subject is under a corresponding obligation to obey.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Auvergne.

[H. OF R.]

We have been also told, that no precedent can be set up against the constitution. This is not disputed. But practice and precedent are resorted to, with great propriety, to ascertain the views of enlightened politicians and statesmen; and, in some measure, to learn the prevailing sentiment of the age. Shall we reject the experience of past times, the opinions of the great and good, and continue forever in a state of political infancy? If, sir, there is no precedent to be found, from the earliest period of our history, where a slave has been paid for, under circumstances like the present, it is, to me, strong presumptive proof, that, in the opinion of the patriots of the revolution, and the statesmen of after times, no such compensation ought to be allowed. The gentleman from Ohio has informed us, and, no doubt, truly informed us, that neither the war of our first or second independence furnish any precedents.

Legislation furnishes no instance of remuneration. The act of April 9th, 1816, authorized a compensation to be made to the owner of certain enumerated articles which had been impressed into the service, and had been damaged, captured, or destroyed, but is silent as to slaves. This could not have been an unintentional omission, as it must have been known that many cases like the present existed; and, as I am informed, notwithstanding the term property, in one section of the act, is used in its widest sense, no claim was presented to the commissioners under that act for allowance.

Why was it that Government claimed of Great Britain indemnity for the slaves captured and taken away during the late war? Was it on the ground that they were "property?" If so, Government has made an odious distinction between its citizens. On this principle, it should have claimed indemnity for property of every description, captured or destroyed. But no such claim has been set up. The principle on which our Government claimed pay for the slaves, and on which it was allowed by the British Government, must have been that they were persons, human beings, having some political rights, and, as such, should have been restored to their country on the return of peace.

From these considerations, sir, I am led to the conclusion, that slaves, for certain purposes, are persons; that their masters have in them only a qualified property; that Government, in cases of high necessity, growing out of a state of war, has a right to impress them into its military service, without the liability of being justly called on for indemnification.

It is idle declamation, sir, to talk of the black population of this country, disconnected from the political disabilities under which they labor. The philanthropist may inveigh against slavery. He may urge the consideration that they are of the same flesh and blood with ourselves, descended from a common ancestry, having like passions to gratify, and faculties to improve, accountable to one common Creator, and destined to the same immortality. This would all be fine: but the politician must view them as they are, sunk to the lowest point of mental and political degradation, and wait with patience for the developments of futurity.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, then rose, and said: My motive for throwing myself on the attention of the House—(I was indisposed, and necessarily absent when this question was last agitated)—my motive for throwing myself on the attention of the House, is earnestly to request—I could almost say adjure—but certainly respectfully and earnestly to ask, that no member of this House south of the Ohio, and west of the Mississippi, will debate this question—will deign—will condescend, to debate the point which has arisen—I mean, whether persons can or cannot be property; or will allow that the General Government can, at any time, under any circumstances, in any manner, touch that question. I certainly am obliged to my worthy colleague (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) for some of his remarks; but I should have been full as much so if he had omitted them.

This is a question the United States Government has nothing to do with. It never had, and it never can have; for the moment it lays its unhallowed hands upon the ark of that question, it ceases to be a Government. We have been told by the gentleman from New York, that this question has been settled forty years since. Sir, it was settled two hundred years since. It has been settled from the day on which the first cargo of Africans was landed on these shores, under the colonial Government. What new distinction is this, about persons not being property—as if there were any incompatibility between the two? Sir, there is none: there never has been any. Property is the creation of the law. What the law makes property, that is property; and what it declares to be not property, that is not property. There is no other distinction. The question has been settled during the longest term of prescription, for more than half a century. It has been settled ever since these States first threw off their allegiance to the British Government.

I hope the gentleman from New York will pardon me. I thank him for much that he said, especially for the manner in which he spoke of his Southern brethren. The gentleman is an entire stranger to me. I certainly have every species of good feeling towards him. But I must take exception to one term he employed. He spoke of "our second war of independence." I object to this language, because I never can agree, either, that we were slaves before the first war, or that we were not independent when the second war was declared. But this is aside from the subject. I say that slaves are made property by the law; and you cannot unmake them so, any more than you can alter the British debt, or the tithe, or any thing which you choose to consider as an abuse in any foreign country. When gentlemen tell me that the constitution is to protect us in that species of property, I answer, it is like the protection of the wolf to the lamb. We scorn it. We deny it. It is created property by our law, and our own State Governments are able to carry that law into execution. We do not ask the aid of any Government whatever.

H. OF R.]

Case of Marigny D'Auvergne.

[JANUARY, 1823.]

The gentleman alluded, in one part of his speech, to the Missouri question. Sir, the Missouri question never has been settled. There was a spirit mingling in that question, which, as was once said by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. BARTLETT,) was endeavoring "to buy golden opinions from all sorts of men." A poison was infused into the decision of that question. I never felt it to be any triumph, nor do I now.

Sir, let me ask the House, whether, under the laws of old Rome, a man who was a slave was any the less property, because, forsooth, he was a person? His being a person it was that made him subject to becoming property, because his master had need of his services. I might ask, too, what is the situation of other Governments in relation to this subject; but I will not now pursue that inquiry. We were told something, I know not very well what, about humanity, and benevolence, and religion. Sir, that has nothing to do with the question. We are not to depend on individual views of humanity and religion. It is upon the compact—Ita lex scripta est—that is what we have to depend upon. You may cant to the end of the chapter, about whether your religion is that of the Jew or the Gentile. Your religion cannot interfere in the question. God forbid that I should say that it cannot interfere with those who are the subjects of the question.

Suppose the framers of the constitution, instead of using the terms which they have done, in relation to slavery, (and I think it was with much more delicacy than policy that they introduced such a periphrasis as they have done,) had omitted the subject altogether. Supposing the clause for continuing the slave trade for a limited time, was not there: how would you have got hold of any pretext whatever to bring the subject under your rule or jurisdiction.

Sir, humanity and religion are very good things in their proper places; but we have no right to make our humanity and our religion the rule of other men's actions within the sphere of neither. I will put a case—and I hope I shall not be misunderstood; that I shall be judged by my words, and not by any gloss which may be put upon them here or elsewhere. I will put it for the sake of putting a case, and, that I may not be accused of libelling other States, I will suppose that my own State, the State of Virginia, had made the abuse of a slave not punishable at all, and that slaves were daily and cruelly and inhumanly murdered by the masters, (a thing as much within the range of probability as many statements I have heard,) what would be the remedy? Would it be found in this House? Can you punish murder committed on the other side of the Potomac? Your jurisdiction is confined to your own territory, district, forts, and dock-yards. You may cry your eyes out with humanity, but you could not touch this matter. The thing is in its proper place: it is under the jurisdiction of men of as much learning and talent, and as much humanity and religion, as can anywhere be found, who, knowing the disease, know the remedy, and do not choose to suffer quacks to "step in where angels fear to tread." Again, sir, we have been told that the representation of this description of persons in the Constitution of 1787, was a compromise. No, sir, it was none. There was no compromise about it, further than the whole constitution was a compromise. We wanted a representation for our whole population; but we were weak enough to agree, that one-half of that population should be represented by only three-fifths of that half. Suppose, now, that this had been a regulation for the white population, and not for the black: how would that affect the question? It would not have touched the rights of the whites. A compromise, sir! No; there was no compromise; and why not? Because, in 1787, there existed not a man in this continent, who dared so much as breathe a whisper of a right on the part of the General Government to touch the question at all: nor can they touch it now. This Government has no more to do with it than the Khan of Tartary. We are all Representatives of respectable, and some of us, of ancient and powerful commonwealths; and our laws will, may, and must execute themselves. There may be agitators, and I know there is some real or affected agitation (I mean without the Southern States) on the subject of slavery; and the effect of this agitation may be to make the slaves themselves more miserable, but that will be the sum total of its effect.

One word more, sir, and I have done. Suppose that the reasoning of the gentleman who has just spoken in opposition to that of the learned gentleman from Louisiana—for, in reference to his professional acquirements, no man better deserved the title—were true, then we must lose three-fifths, and the English pay for only two-fifths of the value of the slaves carried away during the last war, because

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Arteries.

[H. OF R.]

three-fifths of each man was person, and two-fifths property! This reminds one of the judgment of Solomon, which we see depicted in the Tapestry, (and in that Book of which I ever desire to speak with respect,) who ordered the child, disputed for by two mothers, to be equally divided between them; but his was a more practicable rule, it was a vertical cut from top to bottom. [Some members smiling at this allusion.] I did not intend, sir, by this remark, to excite any merriment.

Permit me again to ask, before I sit down, that no man will deign ever to discuss this question. This is not "the accepted time." If ever that time does arrive, as I sincerely hope it never will, our business, sir, will not be here, but at home. Our business will be, to make our escape if we can, for this House will then be to us the den of Cacus. Our business, I repeat, will be, not here, but at home. And let me, on the other hand, remind those gentlemen who differ from me on this question, (and differ, no doubt, as conscientiously from me as I do from them,) that it was just ten years from the first stirring of the question of the right of Great Britain to tax the colonies, until the spirit was got up which ended in a separation. It took ten years of goading to bring us to that point. Sir, the relation of the States to the General Government resembles, in some respects, another sort of union, more tender and more sacred in its character; yet even that will not bear continual provocation—even that near and strong relation may be torn asunder, though there are pledges of their loves to bind the subjects of it together. He may be a very acute man—he may be a very learned man—and he may be in a train to become a very able man, but he is not a man of observation and experience, who does not see that a temper has been excited, and is exciting now on this subject, which it is not less the duty than the interest of every member of this House, in every possible mode, to allay. I know, and I speak "the words of truth and soberness" when I say, that I know that the reflecting part of our country will unite with me in this sentiment—even among those who have conjured up all those chimeras on the subject of slavery, which we have so often seen portrayed both by pen and pencil. I cannot agree with the gentleman from New York, that the slaves are an unhappy race. They, no doubt, are causes of unhappiness to their owners, sometimes, and no doubt they are unhappy sometimes themselves: for who is exempt from unhappiness?

But I believe that, as a class, I have no hesitation in saying, that to the best of my knowledge and belief, they are much happier than their proprietors are now, loaded as these are with the effects of a system, which I will not now go into a discussion of, and with the cares, and wants, and difficulties, which this very population brings upon them.

In regard to the claim to be provided for, in the present bill, I had thought that the old maxim was applicable, inter arma leges silent. This slave was taken precisely in the same manner as the horses and the cart. A gentleman has asked if slaves are to be considered as oxen and cattle? Sir, no man of common refinement, or any humanity, ever regarded them in the same light as oxen. Yet, gentlemen should remember that even the ox and horse, though they be but brutes, have, nevertheless, their rights. Sir, I fear I have done, what I have often done before, but very seldom of late, and what I intend rarely to do again, trespassed already too long on the patience of the House.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said he was sorry the honorable gentleman from Louisiana had introduced a question which was so extremely liable to be misunderstood. I cannot, said Mr. S., agree with that gentleman that, on the mere question of the adoption of this amendment, we are compelled to determine what is the precise nature of that property which a master has in his slave. But as the question on the amendment is a question of compensation, we must vote on it. Though representing a State which does not, at this time, contain any slave population, it is not my fault that this question has been presented. It has been brought in, as I think, unadvisedly: I could have wished the honorable gentleman had forbore to press it, lest some misconstruction might lead to a doubt of our maintaining that relation which the laws of some of the States have recognized, and which they sustain between a slave and his master.

I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that the constitution has nothing to do with this matter. That instrument never fixed the nature of the relation of master and slave, nor of any other of our domestic relations, nor of the persons of the different States to each other. When, therefore, gentlemen criticize on the terms "person—population—persons held to service," &c., used in that instrument, they are, in my judgment, somewhat hypercritical. Those words were used, not for the purpose of definition, but out of delicacy, and as laying down a rule to be observed in taking the census of the United States. What is this relation of the slave to his master? And what are the qualities of that relation? I hold, sir, that the right of the master in his slave is a right to his service under all circumstances whatsoever, and also to the absolute unqualified control and custody of his person, so that it cannot be taken from him for purposes of service, nor his actions regulated by any power but his own, save only when the State lays its hand on him for the punishment of crime, and the preservation of the public peace. You may debate the abstract question as long as you will, and may discuss metaphysically what is the exact nature of the right; but, after all, the question is, what do the laws of the State declare in which the master and the slave reside? I have bestowed some little reflection upon the subject, and the only conclusion to which I can bring my mind, is that I have stated. On maintaining this control of the master, rests the security of a very large and important portion of this Union, and whoever interferes with the exercise of it, is guilty of a violation of the rights of all those who inhabit the States where this species of property is held. This Government cannot do this. It is a question not to be debated. No man, I mean no man of any sense and reflection, ever thought of maintaining, that I know of, that it was competent to the General Government to touch the question of right in the slightest degree.

What, then, is the case before us? An officer of the United States, in the use of what he was pleased to consider as his discretion, seized and impressed into the military service of the United States, a slave, belonging to a gentleman of Louisiana. That is, a mere military officer undertook to do what all branches of this Government united, are not able to do. Yet, we have been told by some gentlemen, that he had a right to make this impressment. What, sir—an officer, a mere creature of this Government, whose official existence can be swept away in a moment, has a right to do what this Government, with all its powers, may not so much as attempt? And now, he having done this—having assumed what he called his right to sever the bond between master and slave, and having made himself the judge how far he might carry this right of impressing whom he pleased, what are we asked to do? To adopt his act as our own—to make it an act of this Government, and, in consequence of so adopting it, to indemnify the loser. On what principle, sir, can we possibly be held bound to indemnify, when the officer clearly transcended his duty? I disagree with my colleague, as to the power of impressment in cases of danger. An officer shall never touch my person and property, whenever he chooses to determine that State necessity warrants him to do so. No, sir; whenever he does this, he is a trespasser. And if the State does not give me a remedy against him, there is no longer such a thing as freedom in my country. Liberty is gone—it exists no longer. We have, indeed, indemnified the loser in some few cases, where the public necessity was so great, so high, so undeniable as to overstep all obligations of lower duty. But, then, we have indemnified for the act of our officers, in the character of trespassers—and we took into our own hands to inquire whether any such necessity existed. But, once admit the right of a mere military officer, whose sole power is the parchment in his pocket, and the epaulette upon his shoulder, to seize and impress, whenever he may think proper, and you give to this creature of yours, authority over every slaveholder in the Southern States—he may set them all at defiance—and I am asked to say, I will assume his acts. Sir, I am not prepared to do it. Yet I must do it if this amendment passes; for the principle, and the only principle on which we can grant compensation in this case, is, that we adopt the lawless act of impressment as the act of this Government, and pay for this slave under the pretence of State necessity; and what the officer is pleased to call the salvation of the country. Sir, I cannot even attempt to run out the consequences of establishing such a monstrous principle, and so vitally fatal to a large portion of the Union. If a General may do this, a Colonel may do it; if a Colonel, then a Captain; and if a Captain may, a Sergeant, and so may every subaltern, down to the lowest cotton tassel in the camp. And if an officer from the Southern States may do it, so may an officer from the Northern States. Sir, if these doctrines are sanctioned, it shall be done without my consent. It is a dangerous doctrine. Admit it for a moment, and you strike a blow at the security of the whole slave population of the Southern States. It is the same case in principle as to allow the impressment of an infant, apprentice, or servant, in the Northern States. If there is any reason in it, then every officer of the United States may, at pleasure, (or in circumstances of which he is to be the sole judge,) sever the bond which unites master and servant, which binds together parent and child. He may enter our dwelling, drag our children from the fireside, and, regardless of his father's will, or his mother's cries and tears, force him to the camp—and, when there, put him under martial law. He may do this—and when he has done it, we, forsooth, are to volunteer him an indemnity, to step in his place, and assume these deeds as acts of the Government. Sir, you never provided for such a case—yet you authorized our apprentices to be enlisted, without the consent of their masters, and our children, without the consent of their parents. You allowed this tie to be severed—(though the right of a father over the person of his child is as perfect as that of any master over his servant, and far more tender, though I grant that the ties of master and slave may sometimes be of a tender kind)—but you never thought of granting them compensation. You are asked to make it in a case by no means so strong. You are asked to do that for one section of the Union, which you never thought of doing for the other. Adopt this principle of impressment, and you sanction what may, at some future day, lead to consequences, in one part of this Union, I will not speak of, nay, which I will not permit myself even to think upon. The report of the Committee of Claims avoided meddling with this question.

TUESDAY, January 8.

Battle of New Orleans.

Mr. HAMILTON moved the following resolution:

JANUARY, 1828.]

Historical Paintings.

[H. OF R.]

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of having an historical picture of the Battle of New Orleans painted, and placed in one of the panels of the Rotundo. And that they further inquire into the expediency of engaging Washington Allston to design and finish the work, and, if expedient in both contingencies, to ascertain whether, and on what terms, he can be so engaged.

Mr. HAMILTON said: It was not necessary, nor could it be expected at this time, that he should vindicate the policy which had dictated an embellishment of this national building with a representation of some of the most cherished events which adorn our history. The policy itself springs from a sentiment which may well be called instinctive in the human breast. Its elements are to be found even in the impulse which leads the savage to construct those rude memorials by which he attempts to tell of an age and warriors that have been. But the sentiment becomes irresistibly powerful, and of great moral efficacy, when it summons to its aid the delightful art of painting, which is the result of the highest condition of civilization, and whose lessons are inculcated by a universal language, and is understood by all the children of men, however divided by divers and conflicting tongues.

Whether the victory of the 8th of January was an event which, delineated by the hand of genius, might be applicable to some one of the purposes to which the great moral of this art is subservient, was precisely the question which he wished the intelligent committee to whom the inquiry would be referred, to decide. He trusted he might be permitted to say, that, as we had a representation of the surrender at Yorktown, by which our first war was closed, there would be a peculiar fitness in placing by its side a delineation of that achievement which so brilliantly closed our second contest.

Without professing to be a connoisseur in the art, would those who were, pardon him for saying, that he could scarcely conceive a finer subject for the canvas, than the objects which would animate, and the scenery which would adorn this picture?

The defence of New Orleans forms a beautiful chef d'œuvre in the science of war. It was characterized by circumstances which would enable the painter to place in high relief the heroic steadiness and gallant devotion of our warriors, and to exhibit in gorgeous array, the embattled hosts of our enemy, who rushed on like a torrent, in daring and dauntless valor, regardless of their fate. Nor would the chivalry of our country be content in assigning an obscure or a disparaging spot in such a picture, to the pathetic fate of the British commander, who poured out the willing streams of his life blood in obedience to the mandate of his country. No; "our countrymen war not with the dead." The ashes of a man who thus falls are thrice consecrated by the blessings of the generous, the feeling, and the brave.

Let me add, that the scenery of this picture will be associated with some of our most interesting recollections. It will be placed on that Delta of Egyptian fertility and tropical magnificence, through which the mighty father of our Western waters is pouring the tribute of his thousand streams, in his almost finished journey to the ocean. On that Delta, which belongs to that glorious realm, the first possession of which we owe to him, who now sleeps in peace, "by all his country's wishes blest," and the last, to him "who has filled the measure of her glory."

Mr. H. said he should have felt great delicacy in designating Mr. Allston, if, by universal consent, he was not considered one of the first, if not the very first "living artists our country has produced," by which an important requirement of the committee would be at once fulfilled. Indeed, the profound genius and unrivalled execution of this gentleman was so well admitted, that he had heard, on the best authority, that one of the most enlightened and discriminating critics of Europe had declared, "that, if there was a man living who was capable of lighting up anew the glories of the Augustan age of painting, that man was Washington Allston." It may not be known to all who heard him, that this gentleman, after passing fifteen years of his life abroad, in studying the remains of ancient, and the acquisitions of modern art, is now engaged, under the patronage of a city (Boston) no less distinguished for its refinement and taste, than by its literature and science, in giving the last touches to an historical picture, (the labor of ten years), which is probably destined to form a new era in the arts, and to confer a renown on that country which has neglected to cultivate them.

If you want this man, you must seek him. To the pride of genius he adds a thriftless disregard of money; for he knows, as it has been beautifully said on another subject and occasion, that the real price of the productions of his pencil, "is immortality, and that posterity will pay it."

I hope, sir, I shall be pardoned for a suggestion, somewhat selfish in its origin, but surely not deserving of a severe reprobation. Gen. Jackson and Mr. Allston are both natives of the State of South Carolina, and there would be a happy congruity in the fact, that the conduct and valor of the one should be illustrated by the genius and taste of the other.

Mr. H. said, in conclusion, that he felt entire gratification in confiding his resolution to the judgment and patriotism of his honorable friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) who was well acquainted with the merits of the great artist to whom he had referred, and that of the gentlemen associated with him on the committee, and he would barely repeat that he was content that they should determine, as preliminary to the decision of the House, "whether the period had arrived for completing the decorations of the great Hall of the Capitol," and whether he had designated "a judicious choice of a subject, and a competent artist."

Mr. INGERSOLL said, that he should not have risen, had not the resolution, moved by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, designated the name of the artist to be employed. When it was recollected that Mr. Trumbull, the gentleman who had executed the paintings now in the Rotunda, was a native of the State which he represented on that floor, he trusted his honorable friend would excuse him if he ventured to suggest, that no course ought to be pursued, in this stage of the business, which went to exclude the employment of that venerable and patriotic individual in executing any paintings which might be ordered. If the artist, to which the gentleman had alluded, was a native of the same State with the hero of our second war, the artist he himself had named had been an actor in his own person in the war of the Revolution. He had been a prisoner, and had suffered severely in that contest; and he must be permitted to say that great injustice had been done him, from the manner in which his paintings had at first been displayed. They were placed in a small and obscure room, beneath our feet, and the artist had had the mortification to know that the most unkind and unfeeling strictures had there been passed upon them, in consequence of this or that disadvantageous location. His fame had suffered; his feelings had suffered; and all his friends who knew the circumstances, had suffered with him. It was with pride and pleasure, Mr. I. said, that he had witnessed their removal to a situation more worthy of their excellence, and he (Mr. I.) had witnessed the tears of joy glistening in his venerable eyes, under the consciousness that, at last, justice had been done him. Mr. I. said, that he admitted, very willingly, the high merit of Mr. Allston, but, if Congress should conclude, in this matter, to depart from the class of our Revolutionary worthies, there were other native artists, besides Mr. Allston, who would desire not to be precluded from a chance of employment. He therefore moved the following amendment: to strike out the name of "Washington Allston," and to insert the words "some suitable artist."

Mr. HAMILTON said that he had risen principally to indicate his acquiescence in the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut. He desired, also, to exempt himself from all idea of the slightest disrespect towards the venerable gentleman so feelingly referred to in the remarks just submitted; and certainly, if the resolution he had had the honor to move, proposed the commemoration of any of the events of our Revolutionary war, that gentleman, both from his services, and from his opportunities of observation, would have a special claim to be preferred.

Mr. KREMER said, that he entirely agreed that it was proper such a painting should be executed, and that the illustrious glory which had been achieved in the most brilliant victory of modern times, ought to be handed down to posterity. Such deeds ought to be kept fresh in the recollection of all generations, and he thought that it could not be put in a better place than in the Rotunda of this building. But in order that this painting may be justly judged of, (since all our judgments were founded on comparison, and what could we judge of but what we know? and how could we judge of what was unknown but from what was known?) he would move a small amendment. When this victory was achieved, which rendered our country so glorious in the eyes of all nations, it excited both pride and wonder; and he wished he could stop there. But he must say it created envy too. Now, in order that posterity might have a fair opportunity of judging of that transaction, he would suggest that another painting be placed alongside of the victory of New Orleans, representing the meeting of the Hartford Convention, which was in full session at the same time. He therefore moved to amend the amendment, by adding, "and also the meeting of the Hartford Convention."

Mr. EVERETT, Chairman of the Library Committee, said that he should not have risen to speak on the resolution or amendment, had not the gentleman from South Carolina done him the honor to refer to the report which he had submitted to the House from the Library Committee, during the last session, and which recommended a course to be pursued on this subject. In every thing of commendation which that gentleman had advanced in relation to the artist proposed by him to be employed, Mr. E. said that he heartily concurred; and he had been prepared to pass the resolution, which in itself was the most distinguished compliment that could have been paid to that eminent artist and excellent man. He concurred, too, in all the commendations which had been bestowed upon the great event which was intended to form the subject of the painting; nor was the present the first time that he had attempted on this floor to add his tribute to that which had been so liberally paid by this whole people to the great man who had achieved that victory. But he thought it would be convenient if the terms of the resolution were enlarged, and this idea had in part been suggested by the remarks of the gentleman himself, who had said, that, as the victory of Yorktown, which closed the war of Independence, had been made the subject of one of our national paintings, there was a peculiar fitness that the victory of New Orleans, which gave lustre to the close of our second war, should be made the subject of another. This went to show the expediency of enlarging the terms of the resolution, and he should be glad if the honorable mover would make it general, extending its provisions to filling the empty panels of the Rotunda with appropriate paintings. [The remarks of Mr. EVERETT were imperfectly heard

JANUARY, 1828.]

Historical Paintings.

[H. OF R.]

by the reporter, who apprehends that they have been as imperfectly reported.]

Mr. STORRS said that he had often thought that our naval victories were entitled to some notice, as well as the military exploits of the army, and that Congress could not better occupy some of the vacant panels in the Rotundo, than by filling them with commemorations of some of those chivalrous triumphs of the navy that had conferred so much honor and glory on the country. He hoped that the navy would not be altogether forgotten, and that the House would agree to adopt an amendment that he should offer to the proposition of his friend from Massachusetts. Mr. S. then moved to add the following words, viz: "or such of the victories achieved by the Navy of the United States, as in their opinion should be selected for such national commemoration."

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9.

Historical Paintings.

The resolution yesterday moved by Mr. HAMILTON, together with the several amendments, having been again read, and the question being on the amendment of Mr. STORRS—

Mr. EVERETT was opposed to the amendment because, in his apprehension, it did not go far enough. He had no hostility, whatever, to the original resolution, but thought the inquiry ought to take a more extended form, and, at a proper moment, it was his intention to submit an amendment, intended to effect that object. He did not wish that the House should pass any resolution which might leave it to be inferred that all public merit was divided between military and naval achievements. No, sir, said Mr. E., I think the principle was a very wise and patriotic one, which was pursued in the selection of the subjects already executed. Two of these were of a military kind; two others were, both in their conception, and in the lesson which they taught, of a civil character; and I think that, in filling up the remaining panels, the same principle ought still to govern us. It is, in my judgment, very important, that, in all the details of this great national monument, we keep constantly in view our obligation to teach a valuable lesson to posterity. We may find enough memorable events, in the civil history of this country, to call for all the aid of all the arts. I need not, I trust, repeat the declaration which I made yesterday, that I have no design, whatever, to break down the original resolution. I am perfectly free to say, that, in any series of military exploits which it may be thought necessary or proper to commemorate, the victory of New Orleans ought not to be omitted. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) said of that victory, that it formed the finale of a series of great achievements. Well, sir, on the gentleman's own principles, if this is the termination of a series, is it not at least natural to take, also, some of the actions which composed that series? The gentleman also declared, and I doubt not with great truth, that, in offering this resolution, he meant nothing invidious. But, will it not be considered as invidious, when he himself confesses there has been a series of great actions, to fix upon one, alone, for commemoration? It is, in part, on this account, that I wish to give to the resolution the whole extent which, in my judgment, it ought to embrace.

Mr. BARTLETT expressed his agreement with the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. BURGESS,) that it was an unfortunate time to propose this declaration, in compliment to some of those who have fought for us, while there are others, equally deserving, who remain unprovided for. Before we flatter the vanity of our heroes, would it not be well to provide for their wants? Mr. B. said that he had arisen for the purpose of stating, that he had prepared, and held in his hand, a resolution which would cover the whole ground both of the amendment and the original resolution. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DWIGHT) extends the inquiry, which was at first confined to the victory at New Orleans, to events of the Revolution, not yet the subject of our commemoration, while that of the gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) proposed to include the naval victories of both our wars. There was an important part of the history of our country, which was not touched by either of these amendments. The resolution which he had drafted would be in order by way of amendment, if the gentleman from New York would consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DWIGHT) should withdraw the amendment he had offered.

Mr. DWIGHT said nothing would give him more pleasure than to oblige the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. BARTLETT,) by accepting his amendment as a substitute for his own, could he do so without abandoning the principles upon which he had originally offered his own amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina. He was persuaded that the gentleman himself would be satisfied of the propriety of the refusal, when he heard the grounds upon which it was made. He had, he said, long since understood, from authority which could not be doubted, that, when the artist selected the four subjects embraced by his amendment, at the conclusion of a series of historical paintings, that selection received the sanction of Washington and Jefferson. When he saw the Rotundo decorated on one side, by such scenes as the Siege of Yorktown, the Surrender of Burgoyne, the Declaration of Independence, and the Surrender of General Washington's Commission, it was painful to behold the other side of that splendid room a blank. He lamented it the more when he saw how appropriately it might be covered by the Battle of Bunker's Hill, the Attack on Quebec, and the Battles of Monmouth and Princeton. While up, he would take occasion to reply to some remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON.) He had, in depicting the various modes of legislative hostility, which might be adopted, let fall expressions susceptible of a construction which his own feelings towards that honorable gentleman forbid him to suppose could have been intended. He had intimated that his own original resolution was to be smothered by the weight of the amendments ungenerously thrown upon it. Whatever was intended by the remark, he could not, in justice to himself, suffer it to pass unnoticed. If there was a member upon the floor who did not feel his heart swell with a prouder, and more ardent love of country, when he contemplated the achievements of the general and the army of New Orleans, he was not that man. But the heart which was alive to these emotions could never be closed to such as were calculated to be excited by the Battle of Bunker's Hill, and the other to which his amendment applied. And he could never consent to commemorate by paintings, a scene in the late war, to the exclusion of those of equal splendor in our Revolutionary struggle. If his amendment were adopted, it would embrace them all. The gentleman from South Carolina certainly knew him too well to suppose that his feelings were of such a contracted character as to induce him to refuse to call upon American genius to illustrate American valor. To the genius of Allston, as an historical painter, he would do all homage, and he had the satisfaction of believing that the adoption of his amendment would give full scope to that of both the artists who had been alluded to.

The question was taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. STORRE, viz: "or such of the victories achieved by the Navy of the United States, as in their opinion should be selected for such national commemoration," and decided in the negative—ayes 80, noes 99.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. DWIGHT, viz: "to embrace the battles of Bunker's Hill, Monmouth, Princeton, and the attack on Quebec." Negative—yeas 83, nays 107.

The question being on the resolution as moved by Mr. HAMILTON,

Mr. EVERETT moved to amend the resolution so as to read as follows:

"That the Committee of the House of Representatives on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taking suitable measures, at this time, to procure a series of historical paintings for the empty panels of the Rotundo."

Negatived.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. HAMILTON, as modified by Mr. RANDOLPH, it was decided by yeas 98, nays 108.

So the resolution was rejected.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10.

Coast Survey.

Mr. VERPLANCK submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire and report on the expediency of making such legislative provision as may be necessary for reviving, extending, and carrying into effect the act of February 10th, 1807, providing for surveying the coast of the United States.

Mr. VERPLANCK begged leave to call the attention of the House to a brief statement of the objects of this resolution, and of the facts connected with the acts it referred to. The law of February 10th, 1807, was passed in the last Congress of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, I believe upon the recommendation of Mr. Jefferson himself. It certainly was a favorite measure of his. It authorized and requested the President to cause a survey to be taken of the coast of the United States, designating the islands, shoals, roads, and places of anchorage, within twenty leagues of any point of the coast: also, the respective courses and distances between the principal capes and headlands: in short, every thing necessary for completing a minutely accurate chart of our whole coast, for every naval, military, and commercial purpose. Another section provided for such examinations relative to St. George's bank, and other banks and shoals, and the soundings and currents beyond the limits of twenty leagues, to the Gulf Stream, as might be subservient to the uses of navigation. [The immediate object of this act was unquestionably, to procure a thorough knowledge of our coast for naval purposes and for fortifications, which the prospect of a collision with the great maritime power of the world then pressed upon the attention of Congress.] These, however, were combined with farther views—with the general interest of our own commerce and navigation, as well as with the generous wish to contribute to the useful science and geographical knowledge—of the whole civilized world. The sum of fifty thousand dollars was appropriated to carry the act into effect—and the principles upon which it should be executed were settled by the President. They are stated by Mr. Gallatin, with that luminous precision which marks all the writings of that statesman, in an official letter to a distinguished man of science, who was to be employed in the execution of the act. It is, I presume, to be found in the official files of the Department. I have myself read it in a valuable paper on the survey of the coast, printed in the American Philosophical Transactions. The plan he resolved into three distinct parts: 1st. The ascertainment, by a series of accurate astronomical observations, of the true position of a few prominent and remarkable points on the coast, such as are or would probably be the sites of forts, or light-houses, &c. 2d. A trigonometrical survey, by a chain of triangles, of the line of coast between these points, the position of which had been thus astronomically determined, making therein the position of every prominent object distinguishable at a distance. 8d. A nautical survey of the shoals and soundings, of which the trigonometrical land survey should be the base—to depend as little as might be on astronomical observations made on board ship.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Captured Africans.

[H. OF R.]

Soon after this, Mr. Hasler, well known as a scientific, as well as an experienced and practical mathematician, was sent to Europe for the purchase of instruments. He there procured an admirable collection, selected by himself with great care, the workmanship of the first artists of the age, Troughton and Dolland, in London, and Le Noir, in Paris, well known scientific mechanics, whose labors and improvements have conferred higher benefits on the world than many men of more splendid fame, as well as loftier pretensions in the ranks of science.

With these instruments, the survey was commenced, in 1817, and a portion of the work done with minute accuracy. After a time—I know not why—it is a part of the country I am not acquainted with—the work was suspended, and nautical surveys were substituted. These, too, were finally abandoned, as a system. A vast body of maps and charts were thus collected, at a vast expense—many times the cost which would have attended a perfect execution—I have been told, half a million of dollars, but have no precise authority for this; but, at whatever cost, they were exceedingly dear, for they are comparatively of very little value, and are acknowledged to be so. The private navigation has been left to guide itself by such lights as may be furnished by private enterprise, or by the science of Europe. Whenever any local interest or object such as the building of a fort, or the location of a navy yard, required it, special surveys were, of necessity, ordered either by the Navy Department, or by resolutions of Congress. These were generally executed by the officers of our navy, always with very incompetent means, and often limited in time. In the words of the Secretary of the Navy's last report, "they are unavoidably incomplete. The times within which it was desirable to make them, (says he, speaking of the surveys made last year, of Baltimore, Savannah, Brunswick, and Beaufort,) and the means granted, did not permit them to be made so as to furnish perfect surveys and charts of these harbors."

Indeed, so imperfect are the surveys in the possession of the Navy Department, that I have been assured, on very good authority, that none of them have been found sufficiently accurate to determine the site of fortifications. I ought, however, in justice, to except that of the harbor of Baltimore, made by Lieut. Sherburne.

These partial surveys, by separate expeditions, are also necessarily of enormous expense. Officers, men, vessels, &c., must be detailed anew for each object, with great loss of time, and new expenses of preparation, at each occasion. Without going further into detail, I refer to the navy report of 1825, in support of this assertion. With all this experience before us, it is now evident that we must recur to the principles of the act of 1807. I perceive that that law is printed in our statute book as an obsolete one. I do not see why; but if so, it is on all accounts expedient to revive it. I would go farther: I would embody in a new law, with the necessary appropriations, all the principles laid down by Mr. Gallatin, in 1811. The President should be empowered to appoint a scientific commissioner, with a decent salary. The excellent instruments, purchased ten years ago, are still in possession of the Government, a little worse for neglect, and, I fear, too, a little the worse for having sometimes been in ignorant hands. The other expenses would be very trifling, compared to the magnitude of the object. A tithe of the annual gain or saving it would yield to the commerce of the nation, would pay the whole. To the navy, in case of war, this is an all-important object. It is a disgrace and a scandal to our country, that the British navy is probably, at this moment, in possession of far better details of the chart of our coast than we are.

VOL. IX.—41

I have only to add that this is an application of science to useful purposes, not only strictly within the power of the General Government, but directly incumbent upon it as a guardian of foreign commerce, and the director of peace and war.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. Wilde's Case—(Captured Africans.)

The bill from the Senate for the cancelling of a bond given by Mr. Wilde, of Georgia, to transport certain Africans beyond the limits of the United States, was called up by Mr. P. P. BARBOUR.

Mr. B. moved that it be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TAYLOR objected to this course, as he had not had time to examine the papers in the case, and the bill was unaccompanied by any report.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR (Chairman of the Judiciary Committee) said, that a similar motion to this had been made the other day, when the bill from the Senate on this subject was reported to the House, and, if such were the pleasure of the House, he should cheerfully acquiesce. He would state, however, that the committee, if ordered to report, could furnish no other information than that which was contained in the petition of Mr. Wilde, and the papers accompanying it, which now lay upon the clerk's table; the substance of which he had, on the former occasion, stated to the House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, hoped the motion to recommit the bill would prevail. If I understand the object of the bill, it is to cancel a bond, filed in the office of the Clerk of the Circuit Court of Georgia, pending a litigation concerning a number of Africans, and for their removal beyond the limits of the United States. On a careful examination of the papers, I find no evidence of the amount of that bond, to whom it was given, or the precise terms of the condition. It seems to me there are two bonds, one given by the Spanish claimants of these Africans in Court, and the other by the petitioner. The petitioner asked to have his bond cancelled, and the bill provides for cancelling the one in the clerk's office; and that, too, without ascertaining its date, amount, or the parties. If it were the object to cancel the bond of the petitioner, the bill did not reach it, but provided for cancelling another. But, sir, we are inhibited by the constitution from impairing the obligations of contracts. Can I be expected to give my vote to cancel an obligation, a contract, without knowing the date, the amount, or purport of the obligation, affecting the rights of parties of whom I am wholly ignorant, as well as the extent my act may injure them? Can I be expected to vote to cancel a bond, of which I am so ignorant as not to be able to describe it? The bill contains no description. I have heard none, and can give none. What is its condition? Who are the parties? What its obligations? These questions I think material. Who was the obligee of the bond, and interested in it? Had we any control over it? I fear, sir, this bill exceeds our constitutional limits, and affects the rights of others, having no knowledge of our proceedings or voice in them.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that, when he had requested, a few days since, that the bill from the Senate on this subject might go to the Committee on the Judiciary, it was that they might spread before the House, in the form of a report, the history of the facts connected with that bill. He considered those facts as of such moment as to deserve an official report. The question might be one which involved the liberty of thirty-seven human beings. The House is called upon to cancel a bond for the exportation of 89 African persons brought into the United States contrary to law. The original number had been 189. One hundred of these had been adjudged to be a lawful capture, (of the exact nature of the proceeding which had been had, he possessed no knowledge,) but that number had been sent to our colony in Africa. Of the remaining 89, 37 were declared not to be a lawful capture, and were consequently ordered to be restored to the Spanish claimant. These persons are now in the custody of law. Technically speaking, they have not been imported. It was a subject of discussion, whether their bringing into the country had been lawful or unlawful. So soon as it was determined that they were unlawfully captured and brought in, it became the duty of their owner to give a bond to export them out of the country within a given time. As there was no report to refer to, he did not know how long it was since the judgment of the court had been given, and he consequently could not know whether a sufficient time had elapsed to enable it to be determined whether the persons giving the bond intended to violate its condition or not. A very delicate, and what might prove a very difficult question, arose as to the right which these persons themselves may have to those Africans. As early as the year '98, Congress prohibited the introduction of slaves into the United States, and declared that all slaves imported in violation of that law, should be ipso facto free. Now, if the persons laying claim to these Africans have done acts, which, under the law, are equivalent to importation, it may turn out that all these Africans have a right to their freedom. Mr. T. said that he did not know this, for the House had denied him the opportunity of knowing the facts of this case, from any official report containing them. In an act passed in 1808, said Mr. T., it is expressly provided, that no person in the light of an importer, (and for aught I know the proceedings in this case may have been such as to place these persons in that light,) is capable of holding any right of ownership over a negro slave, and if he shall attempt to sell such slave, he incurs a forfeiture of $1,000 for each offence. Mr. T. repeated that he did not know that the facts of the case would bring the parties within the provision of this law, and it was because he did not know this that he had desired to have all the facts spread out before the House, by the report of one of its own committees.

Mr. DWIGHT said he should not oppose the motion for recommitment; but there were some facts in the case which stood out in bold relief, and were, of themselves, sufficient, in his judgment to recommend this bill to the universal favor of the House. What, asked Mr. D., was the policy of the act which requires a bond for the re-exportation of Africans introduced into this country? It was to prevent collusive captures. It was to prevent the success of what would otherwise have been a very easy mode of evading the law, viz: the bringing of African slaves upon this coast, and their consequent introduction by a pretended capture. In this case, one hundred and thirty-nine African persons had been captured by a South American privateer: one hundred of these had been decreed not to be slaves; but thirty-nine of them had been adjudged to be the bona fide property of the Spanish claimant. The decree of the court, however, omitted to designate which persons belong to the hundred, and which to the thirty-nine. By this omission, a new delay was created, and eight years, in all, had intervened before the question was finally settled. The humanity, however, of the Southern gentlemen, had not left them all this while imprisoned. They had been put out on healthy plantations, where many of them had acquired the relation of husband and wife, parent and child, and had formed attachment to the country. In the meanwhile, the Spanish owner

JANUARY, 1828.]

Captured Africans.

[H. or R.]

appears, and demands that they should be sent to Cuba, where they would be consigned to a bondage tenfold worse than any which exists in the United States. The petitioner in this case (with whom Mr. D. was personally acquainted, and for whom he entertained the highest respect and regard) had been employed as counsel in the case, and, in his course of official duties, had become acquainted with these slaves. They came to him as their only friend, and implored, with tears, that they might not be sent away. To the honor of that gentleman, he stated, that he had interfered in their behalf, and had sacrificed, or at least put in jeopardy, a part of his own private fortune, with the benevolent purpose of relieving them from their distress. He did this from no selfish views. He was not a planter. He owned no plantation. His only motive had been pure humanity; and Mr. D. concluded with pressing his earnest hope that the House would, in some manner, interpose, to relieve him from the unwelcome necessity under which he now labored, of re-exporting those whom he had thus nobly saved.

Mr. MENCER expressed his hope that the House might receive a brief report of the facts in this case. The Colonization Society, said Mr. M., have stated to us that they were unable to comply with the proposal made to them, on the part of Mr. Wilde, and this would not appear surprising when he stated the fact that, when that society, in September last, had advertised that a vessel would shortly sail for Liberia, they had received, within the course of thirty days, nine hundred applications for a passage, and there were, at this time, eighteen hundred persons who had expressed a desire to remove to Africa. It was proper he should state that these applicants consisted entirely of free negroes. Mr. M., however, said that this inability on the part of the society to pay the sum required, ought not to be suffered to interpose an insuperable bar to the benevolent purpose for which they had been offered to the society by Mr. Wilde. He hoped the report of the committee would state the precise sum which had been advanced by that gentleman, in his purchase of those people from their Spanish owners.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, professing some knowledge of this case, said that he did not despair of the vote of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR,) and the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. WRIGHT,) when the facts of the case should not be misconceived. There was one idea, which he considered, of itself, sufficient to ensure their support. Allowing the gentleman from New York to be correct in the supposition, that the conduct of the Spanish claimants should be proved to have been such as gave these Africans a right to their liberty, what remedy would be given by this House, unless the bond should be cancelled? Shall we leave these free persons here, in a land of freedom, or shall we compel the petitioner to re-export them to the irons of the West Indies, and send them into perpetual bondage? Mr. W. declared, that if he could believe these persons rightly entitled to their freedom, he should be prepared to say, not only that they might remain, but that they should not be sent away.

Mr. GILMER said he had risen for the purpose of stating some of the facts which gentlemen had inquired for. He then read from a schedule, which he held in his hand, some items, from which it appears, that the total of law expenses and salvage, paid by the Spanish claimant, had been $11,668. The probable value of the slaves, at a fair estimate of the market price, was $11,700, differing but a few dollars from the expense incurred, but Mr. Wilde, the petitioner before the House, had paid to the Spanish claimant $15,000, to relinquish his claims. This he had done, as was most evident, from no motives of interest, for he bought the slaves at a loss, but because their case pressed deeply upon his own sense of humanity. He hoped that it would be some satisfaction to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MENCER,) to receive this statement, as it satisfied a part of his inquiry.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said, before the question was taken on the motion to recommit, he, perhaps, owed it to himself, and to the House, after what had been said, to explain more fully than he had done, his views of the case, as it appeared to him. He said, as he understood it, in the year 1819, a Venezuelan privateer, clandestinely armed in Baltimore, manned mostly by citizens of the United States, and commanded by a citizen, sailed on a cruise from that port. Off the coast of Africa she captured a vessel from the United States, from which 25 Africans were taken. She also captured several Portuguese and Spanish vessels, from all which Africans were taken, and, among others, the Antelope, owned by persons in the island of Cuba. She proceeded, in company with her prize, the Antelope, until she was wrecked, and her captain, and part of her crew, were made prisoners. The armament, and the residue of the crew, were shifted to the Antelope, which was afterwards captured by a revenue cutter of the United States, hovering on the coast of Florida, and brought into Savannah for adjudication, with 280 Africans. The vessel and cargo were libelled in the Circuit Court of Georgia—claims were filed, by the captain of the cutter, for bounty, or salvage—by the Consuls of Portugal and Spain for, and on account of whatsoever citizens of either country were interested—and by the United States, claiming them as forfeit for a violation of the laws of the Union, and those, also, taken from the American vessel, because of her piratical character. The Court in Georgia decreed those free that were captured from the American vessel, and others not claimed by the Portuguese and Spanish consuls, and decreed the rest to the proper owners of the Spanish and Portuguese vessels on their giving bond to remove them beyond the limit of the United States. These Africans had been thrown into the common mass, many of them had died, and having no satisfactory method of identifying those taken from each vessel, they were designated by lot. It so appeared in the decree, and he believed the whole were so designated. From this decree, so far as it regarded the persons claimed by the Portuguese and Spanish Consuls, an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. On hearing, the Supreme Court reversed the decree of the Circuit Court of Georgia, so far as it regarded the claims by the Portuguese Consul, and affirmed the decree so far as it regarded the claim of the Spanish Consul. The court, however, did not affirm the decree, even to that extent, by the direct action of a majority of its members, but because they were equally divided in opinion on the question.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that this bill provided for one of the alternatives in the report of the Colonization Society, but there was another alternative in that report which he also wished the Committee on the Judiciary to consider. The argument of the gentleman from New York (Mr. TAYLOR) had raised an inquiry of great importance, and which might prove of some difficulty; at all events, it could not be decided without a full knowledge of facts. The observations, too, of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MERRICK) had raised an inquiry which was not only highly important, but one which had excited in him utter astonishment. It suggested the possibility that the liberty of thirty-nine persons had in this case been decided by lot. If that had been the fact, then a solemn inquiry devolved on this House, whether, by the laws of the land, the liberty of any human being could be taken away by the casting of lots. As all these difficulties would press upon the House, if they adopted one alternative, the Judiciary Committee might possibly find it best to devise and report the means of embracing the other alternative, viz: the repaying of the sum advanced for these Africans, and permitting them to be sent, by the society back to Africa. He hoped that the committee (should the bill be recommitted) would pay special attention to that part of the recommendation of the society.

Mr. GILMER said, that he rose to present some additional information on this subject. The facts of this case were not such as some gentlemen who had spoken, seemed to suppose. The District Court of Georgia had declared, in their decree, that the identity of these thirty-nine slaves has been sufficiently ascertained. Mr. G. said, that he knew of no such thing as a lot having taken place in the matter. He then quoted the decision of the Court.

The question on recommitment was about to be put, when,

Mr. MINER moved to amend the instructions to the committee, by adding,

"And that the said committee inquire whether it would comport with the interests of humanity, the principles of justice, and the honor of the Government, to adopt efficient measures to restore the Africans to the country and home from which they have been cruelly and illegally separated."

Mr. M. in offering this amendment, observed, that, if he understood the matter correctly, the Africans whose case was involved in the bill, had been captured on board a slave ship; they were subjects of the slave trade; they, at home, were as free, and, perhaps, as happy, as we are, and had as much right to freedom, Mr. Speaker, as you or I have. By the ruthless hand of slave traders, they had been torn from their home and country, and chance had thrown them upon our shores.

Mr. BARTLETT accepted the amendment of Mr. MINER as a modification of his motion.

Mr. GILMER said he would ask on what authority the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MINER) had assumed the fact that these thirty-nine Africans had been cruelly and illegally taken from their own country. He would ask, further, on what ground it was assumed that this Government has a right over the private property of one of its citizens? And also, how this House was going to alter a solemn decision of the Supreme Court of the United States? That court has decided that these slaves belong to a foreign claimant. By what mode can Government control, or in any way affect that decision? He knew of none. If the court of last resort has fixed the right of property, the Government has no control or jurisdiction in the case. These two difficulties were open and glaring. He could not but think that the amendment had been accepted by the gentleman from New Hampshire, without due consideration. These persons, for aught that appeared, might have been slaves in their own land. There were many slaves in Africa, held in bondage by the laws of that country. The property of the Spanish claimant, if any, was transferable, and might be as well held by a citizen of the United States as a citizen of Spain. There was but one condition attached to the tenure, viz: the re-exportation of the slaves. Gentlemen were greatly mistaken, if they supposed that it was not as valuable an object to the south, as it could be to the north, that African slaves should not be imported into this country.

The people of Georgia had a deep and peculiar interest that no such importation should take place; and he could say with great truth, that there were no persons in the world who held the slave trade in deeper detestation, or would do more to resist it in every possible way. It was the people of Georgia, and they alone, who were to say whether they consented that these Africans should remain within their territory. They, said Mr. G., are the only sufferers, and if Georgia says they may remain, then the right of the Spanish claimant (now purchased by Mr. WILSON) is perfectly un-

JANUARY, 1828.]

Captured Africans.

[H. OF R.]

assailable: and it is equally so, if he performs the condition of this bond, and exports them within the specified period. Out of motives of mere humanity, this gentleman has expended more than $11,000, but he has not divested himself of his right to hold these slaves; he cannot divest himself of it, nor will he yield it to any arbitrary power attempted to be exercised on the part of this Government. It is true, he offered these slaves to the Colonization Society, so that, if they would pay the expense he had incurred, the slaves should be placed at their disposal. This was his own free act, and it was in accordance with the feelings of every one—but, owing to the want of funds, their removal could not, in this manner, be effected, and there the matter ended. Mr. Wilde has never offered these slaves to the United States, on the same terms, or on any terms; and, if he had, the United States Government has no authority to expend $11,000 belonging to the people of the United States for any such object.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I now say, sir, without intending the least disrespect, that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MINKER,) and which has been adopted by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. BARTLETT,) affirms as a fact, what the petition, and the decree of the Court of Georgia, do positively deny. And it is certainly unbecoming of this House to say to one of its committees, as a fact, that which all the evidence before the House proves not to be a fact, that these people had been taken illegally. The resolution in its present form affirms that these slaves have been “inhumanly and illegally” taken from Africa. They may have been taken “inhumanly,” but of this we have no proof—but as to their having been taken illegally we have the most positive evidence to the contrary, because they were claimed (and the claim was established by the tribunal in the last resort) by the Spanish and Portuguese owners, the Government of both of whose countries legalize the traffic. They could not, therefore, have been taken contrary to law. They were taken according to the laws, usages, and customs of Africa, and of the nations to which the claimants belong. They were as lawfully taken, probably, as any slaves who were brought into South Carolina and Georgia since the adoption of the constitution, under that clause of the constitution which permitted the traffic in slaves for a limited time. The taking and bringing of these was legal, according to the laws of America, and by the customs of Africa. We are, therefore, asked to affirm that the slaves mentioned in this petition were taken “illegally,” when all the proof is to the contrary.

Sir, I am not going to enter into the question of the slave trade and slavery in the abstract. That man has a hard heart, or at least a narrow understanding—yes, and a narrow heart too, who would justify slavery in the abstract. But that man, although he may have a heart as capacious as the Atlantic Ocean itself, has a narrow and confined intellect, who undertakes to make himself and his country the judge and the standard for other men and other countries. Sir, this very principle of interference with the conduct of other nations was one of the great objections to the revolutionists of France, and it was one of the greatest objections taken to the conduct of the high contracting parties at Pilnitz. We have no right to prescribe laws for other countries. God forbid, Mr. R. said, that he should ever defend slavery, or ever should, in any case, raise his voice against the cause of liberty. Though, said he, I might remind the House that slavery existed a long time ago. The mother of the Ishmaelites was a bond-woman; the Greeks and Romans about whom we hear so much were slave owners. Sir Thomas More, one of the wisest, and one of the most benevolent of men, could not complete his Eutopian Commonwealth without the aid of slavery. That it has existed, does exist; that it is an evil, no one will deny. But we have no right, on that account, to make laws for other nations, and in this case, the decision of the Supreme Court, to whom the case was submitted, is positive evidence that these persons were not illegally taken, and consequently were not illegally brought into the United States. I am now bottoming myself upon law—upon sheer law.

Sir, said Mr. R., there has a spirit gone abroad—both in England and here—it is now raging in England, perhaps, as much as ever fanaticism raged there in the time of the Covenant of the Round Heads—it is raging here, and I wish I could say that it does not exist even in Virginia. It is the spirit of neglecting our own affairs for the purpose of regulating the affairs of our neighbors. Sir, this spirit takes the plodder—yes, the plodder from the field—to become a plodder in the pulpit. It has taken the shoemaker from his last—and, what is worse than all, it takes the mother from the fireside and from her children, into a sort of religious dissipation, in which the Church is made as much a Theatre as the Grand Opera at Paris, or as Drury Lane or Covent Garden in London. This spirit renders home too dull a place, and renders it (if I dare to use a French word in this House, or a Latin one, without the certainty of being misrepresented) the very seat of ennui.

Sometimes our humanity is up for the Greeks—it has not yet, so far as I know, been asked for the Trojans—it may, very possibly, be some day up for the Trojans—and we are called to rejoice, in a victory of the three first powers of Europe over a handful of semi-barbarians, in the harbor of the ancient Pylos. Sir, instead of any triumph, in my opinion, that victory was a stigma—a stain—upon the naval glory of all those nations concerned in it—I mean of those who had any glory to lose. With immense odds in their favor, they attacked, and killed, and murdered, hand to hand, as brave a set of men as the sun ever shone upon. And what are we to assist the Greeks for? To build up a nest of pirates in the Ægean? They were so of old—yes, sir, of old—long before the time of Ajax and Agamemnon—pirates they are—pirates they ever have been—and pirates they ever will be. Why, sir, our force will not be able, even in that small, placid—that halcyon sea, I might call it—to protect our own commerce from their row-boats and their corsairs.

In saying this, Mr. R. said, he knew that he was running against the prejudices of the country, and that philanthropy which was so much in vogue. But, said he, what was I sent here for but to oppose those prejudices whenever it is practicable?

[Here the Chair interposed, and reminded Mr. R. that the discussion ought to be confined to the amendment of Mr. BARTLETT, which was to strike out the last words of Mr. MINER's amendment to his resolution.]

Mr. R. resumed. If I am out of order, I submit to the decision of the Chair—what I said was only intended as illustration, in reference to the part of the amendment, which goes to assume that the slaves were illegally taken, when we have the evidence of the decision of the court in the last resort to the contrary. Sir, said he, I will put a case, which will further illustrate this controversy. Suppose that the British Government, instead of being anxious, as they are, to vomit forth the Lazaroni of Ireland—that wretched population who are reduced to the minimum and the peccimum too, of human existence—to the potato, the whole potato and nothing but the potato—was desirous of detaining them in Ireland—would it be “inhuman” in the captain of an American vessel—it certainly would be “illegal,” according to the laws of England—but would it be “inhuman” to bring a number of that wretched peasantry, ground down to the last turn of the screw of despotism, so that one turn more must rescue them entirely from it—the human family could not multiply under a feather more of weight—to bring a number of these miserable beings to this country! Sir, I will not say how much humanity and religion I have—I will say, in the words of a very great man, on another occasion, “none to speak of;” but it would be humanity to bring them all here. Yet, as regards the interest of my country—of the State of Virginia—I would hang any man who brings one of them into it. Yes sir, I would make it death;—for it would be inflicting a serious evil.

Sir, if this amendment be adopted, it goes to touch not only the legal right now under consideration, but the legal right to every slave in the country previously imported: for, if these thirty-nine slaves were inhumanly and illegally taken, then, according to the reasoning of the gentleman, all the rest which were brought into this country from Africa, whilst the constitution admitted their introduction, were inhumanly and illegally taken.

I will not trespass farther on the patience and indulgence of the House, but, as a southern man, I will not suffer this matter to go any further, without making a solemn protest against any such preference as this, on the part of any branch of this Government, going to touch this question, or affect that right in any manner whatsoever. I protest against it as one of the humblest and lowest of the Virginia Delegation—and, sir, I never will sit silent here as long as any thing is brought before the House, which touches it in the slightest or the remotest degree.

Mr. MINER begged gentlemen to remember that he had no hand in bringing this subject before the House. The case of these persons was brought here by others. In speaking of the slave trade as illegal, I did not intend to speak in the precise terms of the lawyer, nor to embarrass the question with legal technicalities. The honorable gentleman must pardon me, but, because Spain and Portugal may legalize this traffic, I cannot regard it as legal, nor consent to speak of it as legal. This point is not to be settled for us by Spain or Portugal. We should regard and speak of it as statesmen, and the question of its legality should be determined by the higher laws of God and humanity. Those are the laws to which I referred.

Mr. MINER withdrew his amendment.

And the question being put on Mr. BARTLETT's original resolution, viz., to have the bill recommitteed, with instructions to report to the House the facts of the case, it was adopted without a division.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

The remainder of the day was occupied in the consideration of the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive.

Mr. DRAYTON, of South Carolina, said he concurred with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. OLARK,) who last addressed the committee, in the wish he expressed, that the necessity should never occur of discussing the question now before the committee. But the necessity has occurred, said Mr. D., and the gentleman from New York has contributed at least as much towards it as any one who has engaged in the debate. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) requested that no member from certain parts of the Union would condescend to discuss the main question which had been raised. With the most unfeigned personal respect for that gentleman, I shall rather imitate his precept than his example: for after the course which he had recommended, in a manner the most solemn and impressive, he afterwards entered into an argument which, perhaps, exhausted the subject. I undertake to say that, if it should ever here be seriously discussed, whether the master has a right of property in his slave, that no members would remain in this Hall, who represent the people of the States in which slaves are possessed. Rights which are secured by the constitution must endure as long as that constitution exists.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Autorie.

[H. OF R.]

Is it not an article of the constitution that private property shall not be taken for public use, without compensation? Is it not another, that the citizens of each State are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States? Are these articles respected, if his property is ravished from the southern owner, and applied to the public use, without remuneration? Is he alone to be deprived of that which is enjoyed by every other citizen? Are these infractions of legal, and moral, and constitutional rights to be even justified by resorting to abstract subtleties and sophistical refinements? Let me entreat the committee to look at the real question which is before it. It is simply whether an individual, whose property has been impressed into the public service, is to be paid for the damages he has sustained by that act. Would the committee, apprehending clearly this question, ponder for a moment as to the answer to be given? If it pauses, upon the ground that slaves are not property—if it pauses to investigate and decide what Congress has no power to sit in judgment upon—the pause would resemble that which precedes the whirlwind and the tempest: it would be followed by the rocking of the fabric of our constitution to its base, and its prostration in the dust. Sir, when I listened to the sentiments which were expressed by some who have addressed the committee, particularly by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLARK;) when I heard them utter opinions pregnant with such baleful consequences, I shuddered. When I heard doctrines advanced, the recognition of which would dissolve the bonds of our confederacy, I trembled for my country. It has been openly avowed, that the United States, in virtue of the compromise in the constitution, by which slaves were represented, are entitled, in every military emergency, to take these slaves into the public service, without the consent or remuneration of their owners. Do the inhabitants of the South hold their property at the will of the United States? Are their slaves at the mercy of the Government? Can their proprietors, when it shall please this Government, be reduced to destitution and beggary? When such principles are promulgated, will our citizens calculate upon the value of the Union? If I know my countrymen, they would sooner perish; but they would perish with arms in their hands, dyed in the blood of those who would attempt to rivet upon them so degrading a vassalage. Did they submit to such degradation, they would deserve it: they would be fitter for slavery than freedom. And yet, sir, whilst professing doctrines leading to the direst issues, to the subversion of the confederacy, to bloodshed, and civil war, the gentleman (Mr. CLARK) talked, in impassioned terms, of justice, and benevolence, and religion. Sacred majesty of justice! are these thy dictates? Pure fountain of benevolence! do these thy precepts flow from thy source? Is this, O God of Mercy! is this the religion thou enjoimest?

Though somewhat drawn from the even tenor of the discussion, by giving utterance to feelings which could not be suppressed, I will, nevertheless, now endeavor to argue the question before us calmly, or rather those parts of it which admit of argument. As several gentlemen have spoken, to whom I wish to reply, in order to save the time of the committee I will compress the substance of what they have said in a few propositions, and trust that I shall demonstrate that they rest upon foundations which are utterly untenable.

Upon the topic of slavery, as connected with its existence in the Southern States, I hoped never to have uttered a syllable in this House; but, as it has been forced upon me, and as, in its discussion, much feeling is necessarily mingled, in order that sentiments may not be ascribed to me which I do not entertain, I will make some few remarks upon the subject. What I have hitherto said, has been founded upon right, upon strict and inalienable right—a right which belongs to my constituents and to myself, which it is both my duty and my inclination to defend and preserve to the utmost of my ability. Slavery, in the abstract, I condemn and abhor. I know no terms too strong to express my reprobation of those who would introduce it into a nation. I know no language of crimination too unqualified to be applied to those who are engaged in the African slave trade. An African slave ship is a spectacle from which all men would recoil with horror, unless the vilest lust of lucre had steeled their hearts against every feeling of humanity. But when we live in States in which slavery existed before we did, where it has grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength, it has become so inseparable from, and interwoven with, our condition, as to be irremediable—or, if remediable, can only be so by the slow process of time. Our consolation is that we did not originate it; when a colony, we struggled against it; we found it at our births; it was a part of our inheritance—from which we can no more deliver ourselves, than we can from the miasma of our swamps, or the rays of our burning sun. However ameliorated by compassion—however corrected by religion—still slavery is a bitter draught, and the chalice which contains the nauseous potion is, perhaps, more frequently pressed by the lips of the master than of the slave. All we can do, is, for our safety, to retain the slaves in a due state of subordination, and, for their sakes, and for the sake of humanity, to treat them with all the consideration and mildness which their condition permits. But, whatever we do, must be the work of ourselves. To understand how slaves ought to be treated, we must be among them—must be acquainted with their minds, temperaments, and habits. One not living among them, would be as unfit to establish rules for their government, as could be an ignorant empiric to prescribe a remedy for a disease which he knew only by name. We not only are alone capable of devising the best practicable mode to be observed towards our slaves, but we will suffer none others to meddle with them. Slavery is a municipal institution, as unconnected with any control of the United States, as our corporations, our colleges, or our public charities. We would as soon permit others to invade the sanctuary of our dwellings as to touch it. We would as soon permit Congress to dictate to us in our domestic concerns,—in our social intercourse—to prescribe to us a system of religion, or a code of morals. We should receive any extrinsic interposition as an injury, and resent it as an insult. Much as we value this Union, we would rather see it dissolved than yield to such a violation of our rights. Much as we love our country, we would rather see our cities in flames, our plains drenched in blood—rather endure all the calamities of civil war, than parley for an instant upon the right of any power than our own to interfere with the regulation of our slaves.

[Here the debate closed for to-day.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive, the question being on the amendment moved by Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. BUNNEN, of New York, said: It is impossible for any individual, coming from my part of the country, to hear dispassionately and coolly, the language which has been used by the gentlemen of the South. We have, all of us, certain habits of thought, certain feelings and associations, inseparable from our nature, which education renders indelible, and which should be mutually respected. We ought to remember that, so fallible is human reason, and so much under the dominion of the circumstances which surround it, and impart to it their own character, that the same exact quantum of reason, as it exists north or south of the Potomac, exercised upon certain subjects, may perform precisely converse operations; and it therefore becomes us, when discussing any topic which thus alters the character of our rational nature, to practise a lesson of mutual toleration, of mutual forbearance. When our Southern brethren, therefore, giving utterance to the unbiassed dictates of their own judgment, on this irritating question, forbid us to touch or approach it; when, in their language of strong and indignant feeling, they warn us against the hazard of incurring the last and worst of political evils—they forget this peculiarity of our relative position. They do more, Mr. Chairman; for, arriving at the conclusion that this House has no power to decide whether a slave be property by virtue of their own natural reason, and inhibiting us from even an approach to that question, they claim the uncontrolled exercise of reason, and the expression of opinion, which they refuse to us.

There are two great divisions of property, in respect to their natures, that are separated from each other by a line as clear, and marked, as light and darkness. They are—that property which has no rational will and that which has. Both have been the subjects of ownership from the earliest ages, and the right of exclusive ownership over both, is of an origin coeval with the history of the world. The nature, however, of this exclusive right, is different, vastly different, in each; and the difference arises from the nature of the subject. No man who has the slightest glimmering of reason can confound them. No legislative body ever has confounded them. The confusion, whenever it arises, has its root in passion, prejudice, or ignorance. Our natural feeling in this, as in many other matters, overmatches all the sophistries of reason. For what man can view the death of his ox and his slave, with equal indifference? If such a man there be that man is not to be found north or south of the Potomac. We exercise over the one subject (however uncontrollable our political right and power may be) an accountable, a responsible, a moral agency; if not responsible here, at least hereafter. Now, sir, let me ask, if the framers of our constitution intended to blend these two subjects together in this their provision? Let me ask, if both had been intended, would not each have been as distinctly pointed out by words, as they are different in their natures? Let me ask again, what is this right of property which the master has over his slave? What but a right to his services, the right to his bodily and intellectual labor, either for life or for years, accompanied by the duties of protection and sustenance? If for either life or years, what difference can the gentleman from Louisiana, the first civilian of his country, among the first jurists of any, point out between the servitude of the slave, and that of a minor by the civil law, or an apprentice by our common law system? For the purposes of this argument, the legal duties of protection are the same in each, and the legal right to the services is the same. I know well, that there is an important difference in their respective conditions; but this is not within the scope of the present discussion.

I, for one at least, am free to acknowledge, what I religiously believe, that, guaranteed as the claimants and possessors of these rights are, by prescriptive right and by constitutional compact, they can expect nothing—they can hope nothing—they must lose every thing, if we attempt, by direction or indirection, to make or meddle with this subject of their exclusive jurisdiction. This is a topic upon which we of the one side, may speculate coolly; because one common consequence of evil to North and South is remote; the other, peculiar to the South, is present, pressing, and fearful. It is an evil of which the constitution has made them the only judges, as by its nature

JANUARY, 1838.]

Case of Marigny D'Antierce.

[H. OF R.]

they ought to be—the only persons empowered and competent to alter, to soften, or to eradicate. They well know that any experimental tampering on our part, must be made at their sole risk, cost, and suffering. Is it strange, then, that, with the pledged faith of the nation, and the prescriptive right of ages for the guarantees of their title, they should be jealous of our interference? This, however, is a partial consideration. There is the other common danger to us both, arising out of it, and its necessary consequence, to which I have distinctly alluded. The dissolution of this Union is an event which no American citizen can contemplate without the most intense feelings for the national interest and national glory. I need only allude to it. Other causes may hereafter endanger or destroy this family of free republics, but this is the present danger, imminent and fearful. Mr. B. then insisted warmly, and at length, upon the injurious effect produced on public sentiment, and the patriotic sympathies of the whole nation, by those ill-judged and ill-timed appeals to certain feelings, and those menaces of direful consequences; in their proper time and place susceptible of producing powerful impressions and probably salutary effects; but if used on any other occasion, only wearing out and frittering their own power and weight. He then proceeded. Let me, then, entreat the gentlemen from the South to forbear pressing the discussion of this question upon every idle occasion. Let not the brain-sick theories of speculative men, in this House, or out of it, provoke them to it. Let them not start up, on every inconsiderate resolution which may appear to involve it, to protest against its being considered, thought of, approached, or touched. Let them rest upon their title to the subject as property. It is founded upon the same prescriptive right, upon the same pledge of national faith, with our own. Do the gentlemen if the South suppose that we can sanction an attack upon their rights, which must, in its principle, endanger our own? If we respect not the rights of property, as secure to them, do we not know that the time will come when others will cease to regard or respect our parchments and muniments? But they have a stronger hold upon us than even this. We cannot forget the blood that was prodigally shed by the gallantry of the South in securing that independence which the united wisdom of all has established upon its present basis. We remember who it was from the South that led us to conquest and to glory. Let them trust something to our generous feelings—something to the tie that binds us together. Let them wait until the evil is real, and not distant, contingent, imaginary. When some bold bad man, for mean and selfish purposes, shall attempt to make this contest the ladder of his ambition, whether upon unsound notions of political expediency, or the pretences of impracticable benevolence, they will then find that the North will be true (I speak the language of experience) to them, true to itself, true to the Union. The gallant spirits from South Carolina may then pour forth, in the strong language of passionate eloquence, those truths, the force of which the coolest men will acknowledge, and the dullest will feel. Let the gentleman from Virginia then raise his clear, distinct, and thrilling voice, let him put forth his great energies upon a subject worthy of them—he will find a respondent feeling in the North. He will then discover, when the danger is real, that the sympathy is common. Men of all classes and all descriptions will answer to his call. The danger of this Union will then become a natural object of religious dread and reverence to both North and South. Embracing, as it does, recollections and events, which have both instructed, astonished, and appalled the European world, we will stamp with infamy the man, or combination of men, who attempts to hazard it by an attack upon this, one of its vital principles.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana goes to indemnify the master of a slave impressed into the public service, by the order of General Jackson, and wounded by the enemy while thus in the public service, for the deterioration in his value caused by the wound thus received.

This amendment is resisted by the gentlemen who have argued in opposition to its adoption, upon various grounds. It is resisted by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. WHITTLESBY,) upon the practice of the Government, as illustrated by various precedents recognizing the principle that slaves are not put on the footing of property, and paid for when lost to the owner, in the public service. By the gentleman from New York, a member of the Committee of Claims, on the ground that it is the right of the Government, when threatened with destruction, to use slaves for the purpose of national defence, and that, too, without being liable to be called on for indemnification. By another gentleman from New York (Mr. STORAS) upon the ground, that the right of the master in his slave is a right to his services under all circumstances whatsoever, and also to the absolute, unqualified control and custody of his person; so that it cannot be taken from him for purposes of service, nor his actions regulated by any power but his own, save when the State lays its hand upon him for the punishment of crime, and the preservation of public peace. By all these gentlemen upon the analogy between master and servant, and master and apprentice. The claim is farther resisted upon the ground of political inexpediency.

The gentleman from Ohio has, for a long time, been a distinguished and laborious member of the Committee of Claims. He knows full well the great weight which the decisions of preceding committees, and the opinions of enlightened statesmen, have on the judgment of those called to act upon analogous questions. He has, therefore, with great industry, culled from the Journals of this House, reports of various committees on questions of the like character with the one under discussion—establishing, as he argues, the correctness of the position which he has assumed in opposition to the amendment; and from which he argues that the practice of the Government has been to withhold indemnity for slaves injured when called into the public service, as D'Auterive's slave was. With great deference to the judgment of that gentleman, the reports referred to recognize no such principle. The principle recognized in these cases presented to the committee, is, that, when a slave is voluntarily carried into the military service of the country, by his master, being an officer, and substituted by the assent of the officer commanding, for the servant which the Government was bound to provide the master with, that then the Government is not bound to indemnify the master for injury sustained by the servant while thus employed. The cases referred to, are cases of substitution by agreement. The first case is the report of Montgomery, who was a lieutenant, who carried with him his servant as a waiter, who was killed. The committee in that report, say, if the Government should be compelled to pay for the negro, they would stand as the warrantor of the value, instead of making a reasonable allowance for him as a waiter—placing the resistance to his application for relief upon the spirit of the implied agreement, which was not one of warranty but of compensation.

In accordance with this principle, recognized in this first application to the Government for relief for slaves injured in the public service, the claims of Lawrence, Evans, and Shaw, were rejected, inasmuch as all of those claims were for indemnity for the loss of their slaves, who were substituted in the place of the waiters which the Government, by its army regulations, had itself promised to these officers, to be taken from the ranks. The application now made for compensation comes not within the rule of substitution, for it is a case of impressment, where the Government, bound with the obligation of the general defence, omitted to provide the means essential to protect the country against the invasion of the enemy, impresses or takes, without the consent of the citizen, his slave, and employs him for the general welfare.

The next report referred to by the chairman, is the case of Purkill, who was impressed by the order of General Jackson, and, when the men were called to man the lines on the 8th of January, was sent to throw up entrenchments, in the doing of which he contracted a consumption, of which he died. The committee that reported on this case, were of opinion that, as it was a case of consequential injury, the Government was not bound to indemnify the owner; and when the committee report adverse to this claim, because the injury was consequential, it does appear to me, Mr. Chairman, that, if the injury had been direct and immediate, in consequence of a wound received in battle, they would have reported in favor of Purkill's claim. Indeed, it does appear, from the distinction taken by the committee, that they admit the liability of the Government for indemnity for immediate and direct injury, but not for remote or consequential injury. If, in their opinion, the Government was exempt from the obligation of indemnity for injuries done to slaves while impressed in the public service, I can see no reason for the distinction assumed by the committee between direct and consequential injury, upon which this report reposes. Thus, sir, it does appear that this is the first case in which this House has been called on to decide if there be any claim on the justice of this nation to indemnify a master for an immediate and direct injury, resulting from a wound received from the enemy by his slave, while impressed into the public service. The whole power of precedent is thus removed. There is no practice of this House; no principle recognized by the treaty-making power; no act of the General Government, which rejects this claim.

Let us then see how it stands on principle. The gentleman from New York says, that the constitution, for certain purposes, regards slaves as persons, and for a very important purpose. It gives to their masters, in their right, a portion of our national representation, and the equivalent yielded for this increase on this floor, is the right of this nation to call those slaves to the general defence, in times of great national emergency, and that, too, without incurring any responsibility on the part of the Government, to indemnify their masters, for their loss in battle. It is a subject of congratulation, sir, that no other gentleman, in debate, has relied upon this constitutional doctrine, in resistance to the proposed amendment. Whenever this House shall recognize in the National Government, the right claimed for it by the gentleman from New York, it will carry alarm and dismay through the southern sections of this Republic. If this nation is vested with this implied power of taking this species of private property, upon any great political exigency, for the common defence, without making just compensation to the owner, the citizen has no constitutional security for the acquisitions of his labor; and, if this distinction is recognized by this House, between slaves and other kinds of property, it will engender in the minds of our people, jealousies and distrust. They will be led to believe, that that species of private property which is most common in the South, will be placed within the grasp of the national arm, without just compensation to the owners; while the property and the wealth of the non-slaveholding States is shielded against its power by the restrictions imposed by the constitution in protection of private property. A recognition of such a distinction will be highly invidious, and cause much just dissatis-

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Maryign D'Artesie.

[H. OF R.]

faction. But this branch of the prerogative claimed for the Federal Government by the gentleman from New York, alarming as it may be, is nothing, when contrasted with the terrific power, which he also says was yielded up by the Southern States, at the adoption of the constitution, as the equivalent for an increased representation on this floor. This power, he says, thus yielded to the General Government, was the power to embody our slaves, to discipline, to arm them—in fine, the power to place the lives of the master in the hands of the slave! It cannot be that the South ever consented to yield such a prerogative to the National Government. The magnitude of the grant is of too appalling and terrific a character for this House, for the gentleman from New York, upon deliberation, to believe, that the compromising temper of the constitution, in relation to representation, eventuated in arming the National Government with such an unrestricted control over this species of property, which, according to the gentleman's views, not only may be taken without equivalent, but which, when taken, may be so used as to produce the most horrible results!

I forbear pressing any further this aspect of his position. My object is not to produce excitement.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, had not the least idea that such a spirit could have been excited as had been manifested in the House; and, so far from having deserved the reproach of unnecessarily stirring an important and delicate question, the amendment he had proposed could not, as he thought, hurt any honest prejudice, or give the slightest shock to the most sensitive mind; on the contrary, in itself, it involved nothing but a question of plain obvious justice. He had, however, with deep regret, perceived, that it had been made the occasion of introducing the most dangerous and destructive doctrine; and, having no desire to prolong or to increase the excitement growing out of this debate, it was his intention, before he resumed his seat, to withdraw the amendment he had offered. Justice to himself, however, required that he should state his reasons for so doing.

It had been said that the excitement had been unnecessarily raised by those who had introduced and supported the amendment, and that there was nothing in the report of the Committee on Claims which in any wise called for it. It was on this point alone that Mr. L. said he wished to be heard. Gentlemen have said, "You have, without reason, raised a commotion, which the subject did not call for; you have grown warm, and have insisted that this is a most serious question, but, if it is a serious question on your side, it is no less so on ours." This was what he wished to examine. He held that, while the principle involved in the amendment was a most serious one, indeed, to the slaveholding States, it was absolutely nothing to those States where slaves were not to be found; and so certain was he, that it would be so considered, that he would have been willing to submit it to William Wilberforce, or to the Apostle of Abolition, Caleb Lowndes himself. Gentlemen from the Northern States might, with some reason, have had their feelings of humanity roused, had it been proposed either to increase the number of persons in slavery, or in any manner to aggravate the hardships of their condition. So far as this, he fully entered into their feelings, he agreed, and he felt with them. But what is the case here? A man has had his slave injured, while taken by force to labor in the public service. The facts are settled, and the amount of damages ascertained. The only question is, shall we pay the demand? Now, sir, asked Mr. L., how are the feelings of humanity involved in such a question? Will the miseries of slavery be any lighter if we do not pay it, than if we do? Will the number of persons in slavery be increased by our paying, or diminished by our refusing? What good feeling will be gratified by our refusal? None that I can conceive of. Sir, is this a fair view of the case, or is it not? Be the prejudices of gentlemen ever so inveterate, even prejudice itself cannot be injured, by doing an act of manifest justice. And gentlemen must pardon me for saying, because I state what is the fact, that I have not heard so much as the shadow of a reason for refusing the payment.

Our slaves have never been employed as soldiers—never have been impressed as such—our foes are to be repelled non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis. To defend our country is too honorable an employment to be trusted to, or divided with slaves. We claim that function for ourselves. The same gentleman asks, Shall an officer of the United States, because he has epaulettes on his shoulders, and a sword by his side, be permitted to take the slave from his master, and shall we indemnify him for the illegal act? Sir, this is not a bill of indemnification, and the act, though an invasion of private property, is one of those cases in which such invasion is allowed by the constitution, under the obligation of giving compensation—which obligation it is the intent of the amendment to fulfil. It is not an illegal act, done with a good intent, against the consequences of which Congress have generally thought it right to indemnify their officers; but is in case of property taken for their use, and lost in their service, by their act. It was not because the officer had epaulettes on his shoulders that he took this property, but because he had a head thereon that had formed the unbending resolution to use all the means in his power to defend his country; because he had a heart in his bosom that could feel and provide for the wounded soldier, whom this negro, and the cart which he drove, were employed to convey from the field where their blood was shed for their country.

This is the case which my amendment was intended to provide for; one that could excite with propriety no warmth, and could hurt no prejudice; but it had been encountered with arguments that were indeed dangerous, and could not fail to produce the greatest excitement. Seeing, therefore, a disposition to protract the debate, and delay, by the discussion of this item in the claim, the larger amount to which it was acknowledged the petitioner was entitled, he thought he would be serving his interest in withdrawing the amendment, with the intent of renewing it when the cooler reflections of members should show the justice of this claim, or of others depending on the same principle. In doing this, (said Mr. L.,) I yield to the request of friends, for whose opinions I have the highest respect; but I yield nothing to the dangerous doctrines to which I have alluded, and which, I trust, a consideration of their consequences, and their injustice, will induce those who now support them to abandon.

Mr. GURLEY expressed his regret that his colleague had withdrawn the amendment. It was now too late to prevent excitement; and as he apprehended that a majority of the House was prepared to pass the amendment, and as other cases resting on the same principle would, in all probability, arise, he felt himself bound by duty, and he did it with reluctance, to renew the motion for amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that he rose with the intention of making another motion. As (said he) the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. LIVINGSTON) has done us the favor to take away this bone of contention—for it is but a bone—from the House, I trust we shall have no more trouble from that quarter. But I feel myself called upon to state, with regard to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BUNNER,) who has spoken to-day, but whom I do not now see in his place, and whom I sincerely thank for his remarks, that it was not the amount in dispute, but the principle involved, which brought about that contest with the British Government, which ended in our Independence. For that gentlemen I have every kindly feeling. I knew him (and this puts me in mind of a disagreeable subject—and that is, how old I am) when he was hardly more than an infant: but if that gentleman had been as long or even half as long as I have been, a member of this House, he would have seen the necessity of acting on the old maxim, "principiis obsta, venienti occurrere morbo"

I remember the first time this question was stirred. I was in the lobby, and was an attentive auditor—it was under the first Congress—and my venerable friend from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) would support me in the recollection—he was a member of that Congress—no—he was not at that time—for North Carolina herself was not then a member of the Union—it was in the first Congress—and I believe I remember almost every time it has been brought forward since—for this has not been attempted once—or twice—but a thousand times—not by storm—but by sap. Sir, we ought to remember the sentiment—non vi, sed sapie cadenda, and not permit it ever to pass, no matter in how demure and apparently trivial an aspect it may be presented.

I do not intend to abuse the indulgence so kindly accorded to me by the committee, both now and on a former occasion—but I must remind the gentleman, (Mr. BUNNER,) that when, in the words of Hotspur—or rather of his uncle Worcester—"this heat was struck up"—some gentlemen were doing here—what has been tried elsewhere—to establish the principle that there is a law of God, which supersedes the laws of the functionaries of the land—that the legality or illegality of a measure is to be judged not by our social compact, but by some other code—of which there are as many different interpretations as there are sects. With a view to allay the excitement which has been produced, I now move to lay the amendment on the table.

The Chairman reminded Mr. R. that no such motion could be received in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GURLEY said, that he regretted exceedingly that his colleague should have been induced to have withdrawn his amendment. It was now too late to prevent the excitement that he appeared to deprecate. That he believed the amendment was in accordance with the opinions of a majority of the committee; and as other cases rested on the same principle, would in all probability arise; and as it proposed merely an act of strict justice to the petitioner, he felt bound by a sense of duty (although he did it under existing circumstances with reluctance) to renew the motion that had just been withdrawn. In doing this, he could assure the House and his honorable colleague, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) that the excitement, if, indeed, any existed, should no longer continue by his agency.

I will now proceed to show, said Mr. G., that the amendment I offered ought to be adopted. It appears from the testimony, that during the invasion of Louisiana in 1814, a cart, horse, and slave, the property of the petitioner, were impressed into the public service by order of the commanding general. The Committee of Claims, in the bill under consideration, propose to pay for the cart and horse. The amendment proposes to pay for the injury sustained by the slave from wounds received while in service, and upon medical attendance consequent for those wounds.

On the 23d of December, when the enemy appeared on the banks of the Mississippi, within six miles of New Orleans, to the number of three thousand men, the flower of the British Army, and the boasted invincibles of Lord Wellington, you had not a breastwork, nor a fortification of any description—not a solitary cannon planted to sound an alarm, or check their progress to that great and all-important em-

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Arseries.

[H. OF R.]

porium of the west. The whole of the disposable force of General Jackson, at this time, did not exceed fifteen hundred men, and more than half of that number were militia men who had had never seen a field of battle. What was to be done? Delay was ruin, and an attack almost certain defeat. Under these trying circumstances, the commanding general did not hesitate. He instantly resolved to meet the enemy; and this small, but gallant band, collected at the beat of the drum, were led by him to the field of battle. The contest was long and bloody. The combatants were at last separated by the darkness of the night; and the remnant of this little corps were planted on that memorable line which was destined to be illumined by the glory of the 8th of January. This sudden and desperate attack spread consternation and alarm into the ranks of the enemy. He resolved to wait for reinforcements from his fleet. General Jackson knew well the importance of this delay, and he lost no time in strengthening his position, and fortifying himself in the best manner time and circumstances would permit. Breastworks were to be thrown up, fortifications erected, and the whole means of the country were requisite for these operations, on which depended the salvation of the city. It was under these circumstances of high and pressing necessity the property in this case was taken. I now submit the question to the committee, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the impressment was not justifiable. If there be one individual in the nation who doubts it, I envy him not his candor or patriotism.

An attempt has been made to liken the case of slaves to that of apprentices and minors; but there is no analogy whatever between them. The military power of this nation is confided by the constitution to the Congress of the United States. They have the authority to enlist, to arm, and to organize the militia. Apprentices and minors are citizens; they form a part of society, and are enlisted by the delegated authority of the whole. They, like others, must consent to part with a portion of their natural rights; and, like other freemen, are bound to protect themselves and their country; but this is not the case with slaves. Slaves are no part of the militia; and if the Government have the power alleged, one thing is certain, they have never yet exerted it. When the gentleman from New York (Mr. CLARK) will show me an act of Congress for the enlistment of slaves, I will show him an act which he will admit to be a dissolution of this Union. But there is no such act. Apprentices are taken according to law; slaves are not, and cannot be.

Gentlemen deceive themselves, therefore, in supposing that this slave was taken as a part of the military force of the country. He was no more taken as such than was the other property; and there is no power in this Government that could authorize the employment of slaves as soldiers.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I have stated briefly my views on this subject, and the motives that induced me to offer the amendment; and it is, in my opinion, due as an act of justice to the claimant—it is due to the character of the Government—to the transactions with which it is connected—and more especially it is due to the reputation of that gallant and distinguished individual, who, in the most gloomy period of the war, and under the most pressing and desponding circumstances, had the moral courage in defence of his country, to exercise the power which produced the individual injury proposed to be compensated by the amendment. By rejecting the amendment we virtually declare this meritorious act a wanton exercise of usurped authority.

Mr. INGHAM said: My object in rising at this time, has been, if possible, to narrow the ground of discussion. For I apprehend, with all submission, that the true point in this case has not yet been touched at all. If I understand the claim intended to be provided for by this amendment, it is for the loss of time and expense of medical attendance of a slave, who was impressed shortly before the battle of New Orleans. The demand was opposed by the Committee of Claims, on the ground that slaves do not constitute a species of property, which is to be paid for at the public expense, when pressed into the service of the United States; and farther, that slaves are not liable to impressment, and, therefore, ought not to be paid for when impressed. The fallacy of the argument embodied in the report has led to all the embarrassment as well as to all the excitement, which has taken place on this occasion. I think it has been shown that the war-making power is an attribute of sovereignty, (if there be any sovereignty in Government at all,) in order that all may be preserved for whose sake the Government was instituted. And if this attribute of sovereignty is in the Government, shall a city, threatened with capture, pillage, conflagration, and the violation of women, not be defended till those charged with the defence come down and chaffer with perhaps a disaffected partisan, whether his cart, and horses, and slave, may not be used in the construction of a breastwork for the defence of that city? Yes, sir. Whether the public demand affects his cart, or his horses, or his slave, or his son, or his brother, or himself, all must be surrendered, and the country must be defended. But we are told that, though his horse and his cart may be impressed, and if injured, must be paid for, that slaves are not that species of property for which compensation is ever to be made. But, sir, do we read any thing about species in that article of the constitution which declares that private property shall not be taken for the public use, without just compensation? If I understand the word property, it is a generic term. The constitution does not say that a certain species of private property shall be paid for, if taken, but it says, "that private property must be paid for, if taken for the public use." It was also said, that apprentices, minors, and persons held to service constitute a kind of property that ought to be paid for. Now, my principal object is to satisfy this committee, that these two descriptions of property may be brought under the same rule, and justice done without any difficulty.

The right of property to a slave, and to an apprentice, if not identically the same, are as nearly alike as two things can possibly be, and they should be paid for under the same circumstances, and in the same way. There is no incongruity whatever between them. I maintain, that the right of impressment is a perfect, and not a qualified right; that it is a necessary attribute of sovereignty, and applies equally to a slave, an apprentice, a brother, or a son. But when this right is exerted, what is to be the rule of compensation? This is the gist of the question. The constitution says that when private property is taken for the public use, just compensation shall be made. Now what is just compensation? It is a payment for the services of the person, or for the use of the things impressed. If a horse is taken, you must pay for the use of the horse; if a slave is taken, you must pay for the services of the slave; there is no distinction in principle.

The friends of the amendment are contending for a principle—a principle which deeply concerns them, and hence the excitement which has been produced. To test that principle, let me put a case. An officer is charged with the defence of a city threatened by the enemy. To effect that object he is bound to exert all the powers of the Government, so far as they are entrusted to his hands. In the neighborhood of that city, there are two different persons, both owning slaves: he applies to both for the use of their slaves, to be employed in the public defence. One of the slaveholders willingly consents: he says to the officer, take my people in welcome; it is true, I expect hereafter to be compensated, but I will not chaffer now. They are wanted, and let them go. The other slaveholder, traitorous in heart, or having, perhaps, a mistaken notion of his rights, refuses his slaves, and they are taken by force. What is to be the rule of your compensation to these two persons? The rights of the general extended alike over both. Will you adopt a different rule of compensation in one case, from what you adopt in another? Is not one entitled to the same rate of pay with the other? Will you acknowledge, that you were, in the one case, a trespasser, and will you therefore pay the last slaveholder, and not the first? Surely not. The rule of compensation must be the same in both cases: for the constitution requires, in both, that you make just compensation? And what is just compensation? Need I discuss it farther? Whether the general contracts for the slaves or takes them with the consent of the owner, without special contract, the rule of compensation must evidently be to pay the same price as would be paid for the same services in a transaction between man and man. Can there be any other rule? In private contracts, the employer is bound to compensate according to the kind of service performed, and the length of time during which he employs it. It is precisely so with impressment. The Government impressing is bound to compensate the owner for all descriptions of property whatsoever, and according to the time during which it was employed in the public service; this, I think, is too clear to be disputed.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, January 14.

Case of the Captured Africans.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, "to authorize the cancelling of a bond therein mentioned," with instructions to report the facts upon which the bill was reported, made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Amendment of Rules—Stenographers.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that like the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) he came here with the hope that nothing would be introduced to disturb the harmony or interrupt the business of the session. I had come to the understanding with myself, (said Mr. R.), that I would introduce no measure which might in any degree retard or impede the execution of that business. But I am constrained, by peculiar circumstances, to throw myself upon the attention of the House on the subject of its rules and orders. Without some alteration in them, we shall not get through the session with that convenience and despatch which the public interest requires. We have adopted the rules and orders of the preceding Congress—but we have power to alter them. I had intended to call the attention of the House to the subject before the difficulty which arose this morning, and I shall now move a reference of the rules and orders of this House to a Select Committee.

[The Chair here pronounced such a motion to be out of order at present.]

I rose (said Mr. R.) only to give notice of the motion which I intended to make. We have voluntarily placed ourselves in a situation which enables a few members of the House to forestall any subject, whether they are for or against it.

[The Speaker here said that Mr. R. might get at the object he desired by moving to postpone the orders of the day, &c., with a view to take up this subject.]

Well, sir, said Mr. R., then I make you that motion.

[The orders of the day and business on the

JANUARY, 1828.]

Amendment of Rules.—Stenographers.

[H. OF R.]

Speaker's table were then postponed upon Mr. R.'s motion.]

When first I was acquainted with this Assembly, said Mr. RANDOLPH, the rules and orders hung up, in fair, large round text, on a single placard; but now they are grown to a volume. I was at that time acquainted as perfectly with the rules and orders as with the Alphabet, and I should as soon have made a mistake in the one as in the other. But I have grown gray in the business of this House; I have been a member of this House until I have grown out of all knowledge of the rules of our proceedings; and why? Because they are complicated in the extreme, and highly unparliamentary. Now, sir, as on taking that chair you have restored one good old rule, the practice of which prevailed under the administration of the Muhlenburges, the Trumbulls, the Daytones, the Sedgwicks, the Macons, and the Varnums—under every Speaker, I believe, but one—that of calling us over by our Christian names, as well as our surnames, which enables us all to know each other, so I hope to see restored some other good old rules. I shall at present confine myself to two items in the account. The first is, the practice which has just occurred—it is unheard of—that a motion shall be snipped off in this way; and it never was practised until the change in the rules. The other rule to which I will call the attention of the House, is one on the consideration of which the character and dignity of the Congress of the United States, at home, as well as abroad, materially depend. I will read the rule as it now stands.

“Stenographers, wishing to take down the debates, may be admitted by the Speaker, who shall assign such places to them, on the floor or elsewhere, to effect their object, as shall not interfere with the convenience of the House.”

This may be a presumption so strong as to the will of the House, that no Speaker of this body, having a due reverence for public opinion, will refuse an application made under it for admission—I might say, can refuse. But then, by adopting this rule, we make whatever these stenographers may choose to publish, our own: we stamp it with at least a semi-official authority. I happen to know—I was informed of it but yesterday—I was informed of it by a distinguished foreigner, attending the debates of this House, that the gallery is a better place for hearing than any other part of the House—and that he had retired to it for that purpose. I know that the debates in the House of Commons are taken, and faithfully taken—for though they are compressed, it is a miniature likeness—by persons whose seats are in the gallery.

The public mind, at present—it would be folly, and worse than folly to deny it—is in a state of great excitement. A reaction of public sentiment is fondly predicated in some quarters, and as fondly looked for a new advent—and this House is made—I do not say by the members of it—that would be disorderly,—and more, it would be indecorous—but it is made the theatre of electioneering. And I ask you, sir, what more powerful lever would you demand—what firmer fulcrum would you have for such a purpose, than to give to the people of this country the debates of this House in such a manner as to throw a shade on one side, and, at the same time, to cast a light on the other?

I should not have stirred in this, did I not feel myself personally aggrieved. I have no purpose, whatever, of entering into a contest with the press—I have not lived to my time of life, without knowing how vain a thing that is—and with what fearful odds it is undertaken. I only use my privilege to rescue myself, as far as I can, from misrepresentation—nor is this at all on my own account. I could bear it—as I have bore a thousand misrepresentations from the same quarter: it is only because it injures the cause—the good cause, with which my humble name has been very humbly associated. I say, sir, and I bottom myself on what we have all seen—that it does not comport with the dignity of this House, or the interest of this people, to lend even a semi-official sanction to that which is notoriously false.

For what purpose are stenographers admitted to the places assigned them? It was not surely that we might figure in the newspapers, or rather be disfigured in them, but it was for the information of the sovereignty of this country, the good people our constituents. Now, when a member feels himself misrepresented, and asks for a correction of the error—after much slow, reluctant, (but not amorous) delay, he is told, that if he will send his representations, they shall be admitted into a certain book, which these persons happen to be publishing. Sir, do we admit stenographers on this floor, that they may first sell us in detail, and then sell us wholesale? Or, do we admit them for the information of the people of the United States? I ask, for which of these two purposes that I have mentioned, are they admitted? Sir, I have seen that book—and I have seen myself caricatured in it. I have seen these prints on the other side of the Atlantic—and have there seen words put into my mouth, which I never could have uttered, unless when I was asleep. I have seen them on the tables of the most respectable club houses in England—I have seen them at Galignani's in Paris.

In the debate of Friday last, I did say that I would punish with death any man who should violate the law forbidding the introduction of Africans into the State of Virginia. In the report of what I said, as “the learned gentleman from Louisiana” was transmuted into “my learned gentleman from Louisiana,”—(there never has been any hostility between us—but there has been no particular friendship—and as I said in another place, I will not permit friendships to be made for me by any one—I choose to make them myself—I was, and I take pride in saying it, a humble coadjutor with that honorable gentleman—the youngest in the corps—in putting down an administration thirty years ago, and I should be happy to aid in doing the same now—and I should be proud of what I am sure I should receive, his aid and comfort in the process—so these blackamoors have been whitewashed—and they are all converted into Irishmen! A more mischievous, or a more wicked misrepresentation was never sent abroad than that. We all know there is an immense population of Irish and descendants of Irish among us—and why do we know it? Sir, we have felt it; they have fought our battles in the field—they have filled the ranks of our army; they have distinguished themselves in our Revolution, at Brandywine, and elsewhere; and these men are to be insulted, and their feelings lacerated, that this House may be made an electioneering theatre, and the cause on one side may be put down, and that on the other side may be propped up.

I regretted to see the proposition introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina, the other day, against which I was compelled to vote; and I regret now to see a proposition introduced, which must lead to effects of which I will not now speak. I came here thoroughly convinced, that this was not the hour for reform; that the disease must run its course—and that, on the 4th day of March, 1829, the doctor or the patient must die—the safety of the one implies the dissolution of the other. I feel constrained, however, to endeavor to have the rules and orders altered, in the one point I mentioned, and in some others.

I will call the attention of the House to another rule, which I wish to see altered. [Here Mr. R. read the following:]

“The Speaker shall examine and correct the Journal before it is read. He shall have a general direction of the Hall. He shall have the right to name any member to perform the duties of the chair, but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.”

The adoption of this rule was contemporaneous with the change in the manner of calling our names.

This is a dispensation which the Muhlenburgs, the Daytons, the Sedgwicks, the Macons, the Varnums, never claimed or enjoyed, nor was it ever enjoyed by Chairmen in Committee of the Whole. I remember that I saw John Cotton Smith sit in the chair for seventeen or twenty hours—I don't recollect which—and I have been glad to see that you, sir, are content not only to receive the salary, and enjoy the patronage and honor of your high office—for high it is—but deign also to perform its duties. This rule also, I wish to see altered.

I thank the House for their politeness and attention, and I conclude with moving that the standing rules and orders of this House be referred to a Select Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Old Seditious Law.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he had some time since given notice that he would on this day call up the resolution he had had the honor to submit on the subject of the Alien and Seditious laws; but in consequence of having learned that the appropriation bills introduced by his friend from South Carolina (Mr. McDuffie) would be taken up on Wednesday next, not wishing to impede the course of those important bills, he would, for the present, postpone his resolution, but would embrace the earliest opportunity of calling it up after those bills should be disposed of.

Cumberland Road.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that it would be recollected by many gentlemen upon this floor, that, at the last session of Congress, when the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road, which provided for the erection of toll-gates within the jurisdiction of the States through which it passes, was before the House, the session was so far advanced, that time did not remain to discuss and settle the important principles which it contained. Some days after that bill had been reported, I presented an amendment to it, which I gave notice I intended to offer, when it should come before the House for discussion. This amendment provided for the retrocession of the road to the States through which it passes, upon condition that they should keep it in repair, and exact no more toll upon it than might be necessary for that purpose.

As the Cumberland road then required immediate repairs, there was a general understanding throughout the House, that a simple appropriation should pass for that purpose; and that the decision of the question which would have arisen upon the bill, as reported, and upon the amendment which I had proposed, should be postponed until the present session. The same bill for the erection of toll-gates under the authority of Congress, which had been reported by the Committee of Roads and Canals, at the last session, has been again reported, at this session, by the committee. For the purpose of bringing the whole subject fairly before the House, and of preventing any unnecessary delay, I, therefore, again present the amendment which I intended to offer, at the last session, and move that it may be printed; and I give notice that I shall offer it, when the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road shall come before the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted to the House a paper containing an amendment to the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road; which was ordered to be printed.

TUESDAY, January 15.

The Captured Africans.

Mr. HALL submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary

JANUARY, 1828.]

Mobile Court Martial.

[H. OF R.]

be instructed to inquire into the expediency of settling, by law, under what rules and regulations private property (if to be taken at all) shall be taken for public use.

Mr. H., in explanation of the object of his resolution, said, I have risen to present a resolution to the House which has been suggested to me by a debate, some time, nearly a week or ten days, carried on in this House, upon one of the simplest, most plain and circumscribed questions which I have ever known to engage the attention of any deliberative body, for any length of time. I am still more astonished that the debate should have been so protracted, after hearing, from all sides (if my memory serves me rightly) the admission, that the article in contestation was property. After this admission, I conceive, the door was closed against debate, beyond the mere question, whether that which was sanctioned by the constitution and law, should be done in this case? I am not certain that legislation on this subject is necessary or practicable. I should, however, suppose that it was competent for Congress, by some declaratory act, explicitly to recognize the principle, that what the State laws decide to be property, shall be so recognized by this House in its legislation in relation to property. It is a question which peculiarly belongs to the States. But, as things now stand, we are placed in this most anomalous situation: Acts expressly recognized by the constitution, or within its contemplation, may be performed by certain persons, and yet such acts are contrary to law, and the actors, or performers, subject to punishment for them.

Mr. TAYLOR hoped that the gentleman from North Carolina would not press the consideration of the resolution this morning. During the late war, a resolution of nearly the same tenor had been introduced into the House. It had been decided at that time with great unanimity, that impressment was a violation of all right, and could only be excused by the extremest necessity. It was, therefore, not a fit subject for regulation by law. It did not become Congress by a law to provide for the violation of all law, nor to provide for the exercise of rights, if rights they were, when all law is silent.

Mr. HALL, in reply, said, I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether I perfectly understand that clause in the 5th amendment to the constitution, which declares that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation. It appears to me to mean, that, under certain circumstances, private property may be taken for public use. But, if taken, must be paid for. These are circumstances which must necessarily sometimes occur. They did occur in our last war, in every war we ever had, and in all probability, they will occur in any future war in which we may be engaged. If this interpretation of the constitution is correct, then, as I said before, the country is in a strange and anomalous situation. The self-same act is allowed by the constitution, and is nevertheless punishable by law. The resolution proposes a mere inquiry, and is introduced solely with that intention. My past conduct, (having been so long in this House,) I think, furnishes a sufficient pledge, that I have no disposition unnecessarily to consume its time. I hope the resolution will be permitted to go to the committee.

Vol. IX.—42

The resolution was then agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16.

Militia Courts Martial.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution, moved by Mr. SLOAN, of Ohio, on the 11th instant:

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he had risen to propose an amendment to the gentleman's resolution as now modified. It is to strike out all that part of the resolution which calls upon the Secretary of War for copies of any orders made by the President, under the discretion given by the act of 1814, by which the length of service of the Tennessee militia was extended, and also copies of the correspondence between Governor Blount and the Department of War, upon the length of time which the militia of Tennessee were bound to serve.

The mover of this resolution avowed his object to be a desire to obtain all the information in the Department of War, connected with the court martial and the six militiamen. His resolution, if modified as proposed by me, will give him all the documents which belong to that subject. He desires a copy of "any order or regulation made by the President, under the act of 1814," by which the term of service of the Tennessee militia was extended to six months. I am satisfied, and so must be the gentleman, that no such order ever was made, either as relates to the militia of Tennessee or any other State, save to the requisitions which may have been made from time to time upon the Executive of the respective States, by the letters of the Secretary of War, calling upon them to detail their quota of men. Why then call for a copy of a paper which we believe, and which the public have been assured, does not and never did exist? If such an order were on file, would we have the call for it? I will not answer the question. If it is not there, I am to be told the Secretary is called upon "to state the facts." We ask for a thing which we know we cannot get; and if we could get it we would not ask it.

The object avowed, or seemed to be avowed by the gentleman from Ohio, is to ascertain the main fact, how long these men, I mean the six militiamen, were bound to serve. To obtain this object, can it be necessary to call upon the Secretary to inform us that President Madison and the Secretary of War failed to discharge their duty in omitting to enter upon the records of the Office of War, that the militia called into service from the State of Tennessee, should serve six months, three months, or any other term of time? I repeat, the important fact in this investigation is to know whether the detachment of militia, of which the six shot for mutiny and desertion were a part, were called into service for six months. An answer to this question full and complete, must be given in responding to the resolution as proposed to be modified. If the gentleman's object was a reformation of the militia law of the last war, which has performed its functions; if he designed to arraign the then President of the United States, and his Secretary of War, for a dereliction of duty, perhaps the information sought might be proper as a preliminary step. No such purpose is intended or expected. I do not understand this resolution to be a declaration of war against the distinguished citizen who then filled the Presidential chair.

Unless gentlemen will close their eyes, it is impossible not to see its tendency. It is in vain to disguise it. Why has this business slept so long? Why has it not excited the patriotic sensibilities of the statesmen who have filled this hall for the last fifteen years?

Is there a member on this floor who does not believe the effect of this resolution is most anxiously looked to, as appalling to the hopes of the gentleman whose fame has been assailed by every art which intrigue and falsehood could invent? I will not say that such is the desire of the gentleman from Ohio, or those here who act with him.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. W., to strip this subject of all extraneous matter. I wish to present it naked to the public eye. The man whose character has been assailed on account of the execution of six militiamen, seeks no concealment. His conduct on this, as on all other occasions when engaged in the service of his country, will stand the test of human scrutiny and of time.

Mr. BELL said, it would, perhaps, not be in order to enter into any general discussion of the merits of the resolution, nor of the objects intended to be attained by it, further than might be necessary to express his views, briefly, of the propriety of adopting the amendment moved by the gentleman from Kentucky, so far as it proposed to strike out those words, which, if adopted as part of the resolution, would give the Secretary of War any latitude of remark, upon what may not be found upon record in his Department. I certainly would not think of intruding myself for one moment upon the indulgence of the House, said Mr. B., seeing so many abler men around me ready to take up the subject, if I did not perceive that the purpose of the resolution may be to arraign, before the tribunal of the public, the character of a distinguished citizen who resides in my own immediate neighborhood. Under this impression, I feel myself called upon, by a sense of duty, to notice an attack made on him, which I conceive to be unmerited and unjust, for the same reason that I would feel it my duty to defend the reputation of every other private citizen of the district I have the honor to represent, and who could not be heard in his own defence on this floor. I acknowledge, however, that I may possibly do injustice to the intentions of the mover of the resolution, in supposing that the conduct of the distinguished individual I have alluded to, is alone to be the subject of investigation. Judging from what appears upon the face of the resolution, and the imperfect avowal of the mover, as to what may be his motive, it is left doubtful whether one or all of several gentlemen of distinction, are intended to be the object of attack. It may be intended to disturb the repose of a late President of the United States: for, if it shall turn out to be true, that Mr. Madison did permit a Secretary of War to invest the Governor of a State, during the late war, with important discretionary powers, without his authority, and suffered a large detachment of militia to be called into service for the purpose of manning several important posts, situated at a great distance from the States from whence they were drawn, without giving any instruction for retaining them in service for six months, when it is evident that the shorter term of three months must have been chiefly consumed in distributing them among the posts to which they were ordered, then was he guilty of a most gross and criminal omission of duty. If a late Secretary of War proceeded to exercise such extensive powers without the sanction of the President, or failed to renew his instructions to the Governor of Tennessee, according to the requisitions of the law, and the exigencies of the war, then was he guilty of a usurpation of authority, or a neglect of an important duty. I confess I am not ready to admit that a late Governor of Tennessee could be charged with any gross impropriety of conduct, in proceeding to act under discretionary powers, conferred without any other limit as to the time in which they were to be considered operative, than the termination of the war, even if the fact be that his instructions were not renewed in the Spring of 1814. But how a charge of improper conduct, or responsibility for the blunders and omissions of others, if any such there were, can be fixed upon the mere instrument and organ appointed for the execution of the orders and decrees of his superiors in office; how such a charge can be fixed upon the distinguished individual to whom I have more than once alluded, for retaining in service the detachment of militia referred to in the resolution, during a term of six months, and treating them accordingly, when it is known that he ordered out that detachment, acting then as Major General of militia, and that, in doing so, he obeyed, as he was bound to do, an order from the Governor of the State of Tennessee, expressly stating, upon the face of it, that the detachment was to serve six months, and that the Secretary of War had authorized

JANUARY, 1828.]

Mobile Court Martial.

[H. OF R.]

that latitude of the call, is to me most incomprehensible. But if it be against him that this resolution is intended to operate, then I would remind gentlemen that they begin their attacks at the wrong end, and that there is but little magnanimity in striking at the tail, instead of the head, of the offending series of public agents.

Mr. CULPEPER said, that he did not know the motives of other gentlemen, and he thought that the House had nothing to do with the motives of any of its members. Their conduct alone was the proper subject of animadversion. What I want, said Mr. O., in this case, is the truth, and nothing but the truth, and I intend to move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table, that gentlemen on both sides may consult together and agree upon the proper form of this call, without further dispute on this floor. I want, I repeat it, nothing but the truth. I have no wish to get rid of the subject, but a very strong wish to get clear of this very disagreeable debate.

Mr. POLK said: The ostensible object of the resolution seemed to be, to obtain information from the Department of War in relation to the detachment of militia, of which the "six militiamen," executed at Mobile, under sentence of a court martial, for the crime of mutiny and desertion, in 1814, were a part; and yet the gentleman from Ohio proposes, by the resolution, to call for the whole correspondence between the Secretary of War and the Governor of Tennessee, not only in relation to this particular detachment of militia, but from the commencement of the war, in 1812, until its termination. The gentleman was not content to have the correspondence in relation to this particular detachment, which was already embraced in another part of his resolution, but desired all the correspondence which ever took place between the Secretary of War and the Governor of Tennessee, during the whole war, in relation to other detachments called into the public service from Tennessee, at different periods. He could not perceive the purpose to be effected by calling for a lengthy correspondence, which had no connection with the main object of the inquiry, unless it was to obscure and cover up the material facts of the case, by a mass of documents which had no relation to it. Why had not the gentleman likewise called for all the correspondence with the Governors of other States, whose militia were in the public service during the war? It would have just as much to do with the "six militiamen," as that part of the correspondence with the Governor of Tennessee which does not relate to the service of the "six militiamen," or the detachment to which they belonged. He wished the information called for, when received, to stand naked before the public, and to be stripped of all extraneous matter.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that no possible modification could, in anywise, affect the course he had chalked out to himself, and for reasons which he would now briefly state. I will promise, said Mr. R., if I throw no light upon the subject, that, at least, I will not (to borrow a word used by the honorable gentleman from Maine) "obfuscate" it.

I concur most heartily with the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. CULPEPER,) in his view of this matter. Before he made his motion, I had expressed a similar opinion to the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON.) I am sorry he withdrew it. I think the House ought not to act in this matter at all. And why? Because, sir, disguise it as much as we will—as much as we can—it is a matter (as was said in another body, on a very different occasion) as notorious as the sun at noon-day, that the state of public feeling throughout this country, (and what are we but the pulse, the artery, which shows the action, the sanity, or the unsoundness of the heart?) is such, that, if this game is once commenced, there will be no end to it. Sir, I have nothing to do with gentlemen's motives. I am bound, not only by the Rules and Orders of this House, and by a sense of decorum, which ought to be a still stronger restraint on every gentleman, but I am bound by evidence before my senses—to believe, that the motives of the gentleman from Ohio cannot be such as have been imputed to him. And why? It is notorious, that you affect a balance as much, by taking out of one scale, as by putting into the other; and after what I have seen in the public prints, under his name, he can never surely mean, by taking out of the scale A, to give preponderance to the scale B. I wonder, sir, that it did not appear to the very acute and astute perception of the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. SPRAGUE,) that there was another occasion for this information, besides the bill from the Senate on the subject of the militia laws. This House, in the last resort, may, by the constitution, be called upon to decide that question on which the public mind is in a state of so great and so justifiable inflammation. Now, as we may be called upon the next session, to decide that question, and good managers, all people of forecast, like to be beforehand with their business, it is no doubt highly proper that we should proceed now to get all the information we may need in the performance of that duty. But, sir, it is time to dismiss this style of treating the subject—it demands a graver tone. A bill from the Senate, affecting the militia laws of the United States—well, sir—a bull shall I call it, or an anathema got up by some of those, under whose order certain militiamen were shot at Norfolk, is thrown in contemporaneously—not with the bill from the Senate—no, sir—that is a different affair, but with this motion; an anathema, sir, has been issued from the laboratory of the modern Vatican, and comes to us via Richmond—yes, sir, via Richmond—and a nuncio has been despatched—(I believe I must drop the metaphor, or it will drop me)—well, sir, an agent, then, has been despatched, and has touched at this port, on his way to Richmond, for instructions—yes, sir, in mercantile phrase, cleared out for Cowes and a market—to Cowes, and wait for instructions from London. Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina deserves our thanks for having torn the mask off this thing yesterday. It is the curse of this age—the opprobrium of this country, in its legislation, that, in grave concerns, requiring the deliberation of statesmen, and the decision of common sense, a system is pursued of artificial reasoning, and of special pleading, drawn from the forensic school, (where it may be very right and proper,) and, while we are debating about the danger of having our heads chopped off by the myrmidons of a usurper, we are ourselves chopping logie. [By the way, sir, I was extremely sorry that the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) who spoke to us, the other day, about Cicero, did not favor the House, at the same time, with a dissertation on the subject of the Roman coaches, out of one of which, he told us, with great good breeding, that Cicero stretched his neck, that it might be struck off.* Sir, I should greatly like to see a model of one of those coaches—I would send it to Longacre, by way of specimen—yes, sir, not as a model, but as a curiosity.] Great public mischief is produced by bringing into this House the system of word-catching, and watching, and quibbling, and quirking, from the Court below—it will hardly do even there. Sir, this practice is as notorious as another, confessed to prevail in the House of Commons, on a subject of the most vital interest to the liberties of Englishmen—it is as “notorious as the sun at noon-day.” We, sir, are country gentlemen, plain planters, or farmers, sometimes styled clodhoppers—we have not a fair chance under such a system; and, what is worse, our constituents have not. Sir, it is time we had done with this practice, of looking one way and rowing another. I entirely concur with the view presented to us in the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. CULPEPER)—I hope I may say, without offence, the Reverend gentleman from North Carolina. Sir, I applaud him for preaching peace—not peace, sir, with the enemy, in time of war—“Blessed are the peacemakers!”—but I am not one of those who preach the love of enemies in time of war. Let me ask of this House, if they can imagine a case in which, by bringing forward a motion in this House, every part and any part of the public conduct, (for we shall hardly invade the sanctuary of domestic life,) but the public conduct of either or any one of the parties now most prominent before the nation, may not be attacked? Sir, cannot we, too, bring motion after motion, to bear on one of them? We can: and I will tell the gentleman from Maine how—he does not need to be told—but I speak for the information of those out of this House—a resolution can be introduced, bringing a charge against the Minister—another motion can be brought against the conduct of some of our diplomatic agents—and then we shall discuss it here pro and con—such-a-one versus such-a-one—and then we must have another “blow-out”—and then again the same thing may be done on the appropriation of money. Sir, it is endless; and, therefore, I think we ought to remember the old doctrine—a doctrine I have long preached in this House, and which I ever shall preach, obsta principiis. Occasion enough can be given for every man to show, on the floor of this House, how much he is or is not a partisan. And where will it end? With the exception of, perhaps, the necessary appropriation bills, scarce any thing else will be done this session. For, do gentlemen believe, if this thing is done on one side, it will not be done on the other? Do old and practised statesmen suppose that, if they trump, their adversaries will not trump too? Why, sir, I thought that Hoyle had taught them better. Yes, sir, that Hoyle had taught them better. Sir, we shall have our tables flooded with such resolutions. No, sir, let us do what all men cannot at all times do, and some at no time—let us do right, sir, fearless of the consequences. I know very well, what a bugbear—what a ghost will be conjured up, if the motion to lay on the table shall prevail. Yes, sir, it will be said, we are about to “put out the light, and then”—and then, sir, to smother the constitution; to cut the throat—not of Cicero, sir, no, sir—but of poor half-suffocated Desdemona—of the constitution. Sir, this is a responsibility I am willing to meet; if I was not, I would not show my face here. When inquired of, I should say to my constituents, “A motion was made in this House, calling for information about the six militiamen—the public papers and the Richmond manifesto are full of the subject. It has been worn threadbare. We were called upon to second the Anti-Jackson meeting at Richmond. It must have led to recrimination. We should have had the same game played over and over again, iterum iterumque. It would only have led to ill blood and calling names, and, therefore, I endeavored to put an end to it at its commencement.” Sir, if the militia laws want mending, they will not get it, take my word for it, this session. Our militia laws, sir, are like some reprobates—always about to reform, or to be reformed. We do not want this information to act on the bill from the Senate, and as for the other object, most of us, I believe, are pretty well prepared to act on what we have.

I promised, when I rose, that, if I shed no light upon the subject, I would at least endeavor not to make it more obscure. I cannot promise e fumo dare lucem, but I will not lend my aid to raise a smoke to obscure the judgment and to inflame the mind's eye of this House. Without wishing in the least to fore-

* By a loquax lingua, Mr. Storrs had said “coach” instead of litter.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Mobile Court Martial.

[H. OF R.]

stall debate, or put it out of the power of any gentleman to reply to me, I shall, before I take my seat, renew the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. CULPEPER.) I shall move that the resolution and the amendment be laid, to lie upon the table. But I shall withdraw the motion if any friend, or if any adversary—for I trust I have no enemy here—shall request it. It is a case in which I would yield more readily to the request of an adversary than of a friend.

Mr. RANDOLPH so moved accordingly: when Mr. WEEMS said, I request the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. RANDOLPH retaining his seat,

Mr. WEEMS said, I call upon the gentleman to comply with the promise he has just given.

Mr. RANDOLPH still keeping his seat,

Mr. WEEMS said, I call upon the gentleman to fulfil his promise.

Mr. RANDOLPH now rose, and said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to comply with it. I promised that if any friend, or, much more, any adversary, should make the request, I would withdraw my motion. I have never, thank God, refused to keep my word, nor shall I now break my promise. But, as that honorable gentleman stands to me in the relation, neither of a friend nor of an adversary, I shall not withdraw my motion.

The question being on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion,

Mr. SLOANE requested that it be taken by yeas and nays. It was so ordered by the House, and were—yeas 42, nays 150.

Mr. WEEMS said he felt very much gratified to find, by the vote just taken, that so large a majority of the House thought with him, that a subject of such importance ought not to be smothered or nipped in the bud (if he might be allowed to use the expression) at the instant suggestion of any member, and more especially so, when the vote seemed almost to justify what he was about to offer as advice to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who had thought proper to quote the same authority as it regards peacemakers: "Blessed are the peacemakers," &c., was his remark. "Let that man who esteemeth that he knoweth all things, remember that he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know." I have no idea, sir, said Mr. W., of any one individual member of this House undertaking to suppose, when he has made a speech, that every one is to be hushed by his shutting the door upon them, because, forsooth, he may suppose that they cannot or dare not introduce a word in reply to him. I had hoped, sir, after the member from Virginia had voluntarily promised to withdraw his motion to lay the resolution on the table, if any gentleman suggested a desire to be heard on the subject, upon rising and requesting him to suspend, or withdraw his motion, to have found him willing, at once, to comply; finding this not to be his disposition, I expressed a hope that the gentleman would comply with his word; and whether that gentleman considers me as standing in the relation of friend or enemy, or neither, towards him, sir, was neither asked nor cared about. [Here the gentleman from Virginia asked permission of the gentleman from Maryland to apologize.] Mr. WEEMS said he asked no apology, but would give the gentleman from Virginia an opportunity to explain; when

Mr. RANDOLPH said, nothing was further from his intentions than to say any thing uncourteous. The gentleman from Maryland, said Mr. R., had called on him in so imperative a tone, that that happened which often happens in similar cases. We often refuse, what we should otherwise grant with willingness, when we conceive ourselves to be rather more enforced than we like to be. But, the candor of that gentleman will induce him to acknowledge that I stated neither more nor less than what is the actual fact, when I said, that he stands to me in neither of the relations—either of adversary or friend. I can assure him, however, that I shall never again offend the gentleman by noticing him in that, or in any other way.

Mr. WEEMS said he was not disposed to trifle with the time of the House, or to attempt, in the slightest degree, to discuss the merits or demerits of the subject to which the proposition before the House, barely calling for information, pointed. But he rose to offer, first, his thanks to the gentleman from Ohio, for introducing the resolution, in any shape that would eventually obtain all the information immediately relating to the subject. He cared not about the form, or phraseology, provided it resulted in laying before the nation the truth, and nothing but the truth. He agreed, to the fullest extent, with the gentleman from Maine, "that it was not our privilege to judge men's motives;" and he hoped he might be allowed to offer another quotation, as it seemed fashionable to do so, from the volume of truth, without incurring the appellation (sarcastically, or otherwise) of reverend gentleman from Maryland: "Who art thou, oh man, that judgest another man's servant? before his own master, he standeth or falleth." Sir, said Mr. W., this subject has now been introduced, and I, for one, am unwilling to return home to the high-minded freemen whom I have the honor to represent, and say to them, I voted against this inquiry, because I feared to trust my strong prejudices and partialities. That might answer for the gentleman from Virginia, but it would not answer for me. Mr. W. protested against being governed by any such influence. The sovereign people of Maryland felt anxious for information, and would not be content without it, and, for himself, he could with truth declare that he wished it, and would receive it anyhow, rather than not have it, although he would prefer having it without any thing like that massive weight that accompanied some of our documents: for instance, the Georgia affair—the immense bulk of which deterred almost every man from attempting to wade through it. No, sir, said Mr. W., that man whose character and conduct are to be affected by it, will, like pure gold, seven times refined, be found the more pure the oftener his conduct or patriotism shall be scrutinized. I shall not trouble the House further, at this time, said Mr. W., from a hope, sir, that the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Kentucky will be able so to modify the proposition as not only to agree themselves, but to produce an accordance throughout the House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said he had but a few words to say, and would trouble the House but a short time. If I understand the question, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. W., that part of the resolution proposed to be stricken out by the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) embraces a call for copies of the correspondence of the Government of the Union, with the Governor of Tennessee, relative to the time the drafted militia of that State should be continued in the service of the United States—for copies of any orders of the President, directing such drafted militia to be retained under the law of the United States, for a period beyond three months; and if no such order existed, directing the Secretary of War to certify that fact to the House. Such is the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, to refuse the call so far as I have specified. But, sir, how is the motion supported by the argument of the mover, and by the argument of the gentleman over the way? They all tell you, we want all the facts—all the documents; but we would shut the door upon the opinions of the Secretary, or his arguments. I, too, want the facts and documents, and no opinions or arguments; and will not any gentleman perceive, who will take the trouble to read over that part of the resolution proposed to be struck out, that these arguments are directed against matter which has no existence in fact? Sir, is it argument or opinion, to furnish us with copies of the correspondence with the Governor of Tennessee? Is it argument or opinion to furnish a copy of the Executive order to continue the militia in service longer than three months? Or will it be said to be argument or opinion, if no Executive order exist, to certify that single fact to the House? Surely no gentleman will pretend it is either; yet we have heard much of a desire to give all the facts and documents, and to withhold only opinions. Let us have all the documents, and all the facts. How will the case stand before the country, if the motion prevail and gentlemen deny the information sought? We may be told, if the information obtained bears hard on any individual, that, if the whole correspondence between the War Department and the Governor of Tennessee had been published, the country would have found ample evidence to justify either the Governor, or any militia officer acting under him, for retaining the militia in question for six, instead of three months; and if we have not an express certificate from the proper officer, that no order of the President exists, it may be said it has been withdrawn. I therefore want the whole information, correspondence, and documents. I wish an opportunity of judging for myself what they contain—to have the light shed upon my own mind, that I may form an opinion myself. I do not believe, sir, for I could not impugn any man's motives, there can be a single gentleman on this floor, who would withhold the information sought for, if he understood the subject.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, had heard it declared, on all sides of the House, that gentlemen want information; that they seek the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. I wish this as strongly as any one; and because I want this, I don't want any speeches from the department. The gentlemen who profess to want the correspondence most, give to me the strongest evidence, by their speeches, that they are perfectly conversant with it. I shall not dive into their motives: that belongs to another power—a power from which this Administration once claimed its right to rule. I had, like others, hoped that we should have met to transact the public business; and that we should have agreed to leave this question to the people; but it is in vain to conceal the fact, that this House is intended to be made an arena on which to excite the passions of the people. We see an individual branded with reproach, for having consented to the execution of several militiamen—we who are nursed by the pap of the Treasury—it is no expression of mine—pap—it comes from the Treasury, of course it must be good—we are told that these are the proper scenes to engage the minds of men, and not the vulgar scenes of bloody war. At the same time we do see a General of the United States trying soldiers at Norfolk, and shooting them too, for desertion. I know it to be a fact: for I was an eye witness. A gentleman near me says, that these were not militiamen. I believe two of them were. I derive my information from a source entitled to at least as much credit, as if it was drawn from hired and pensioned letter-writers in one of the Departments. But, sir, if they were not militiamen, they were men; and is not the life of man dear! And are we now to be told that no regard is to be shown to the life of a common soldier? My information goes still further. An order was issued by a United States commander, to go in pursuit of a deserter, and if he could not be taken, to shoot him, and he was shot. Why was not the same noise made then, that there is now, and why was not information of that fact laid before the House, by the same gentleman or his friends, who have stirred this inquiry? It is true I belong to the committee on the militia, but I have not been called upon to attend it, until this morning.

Mr. WICKLIFFE now signified his agreement to the proposal of the gentleman from Tennes-

JANUARY, 1823.]

Mobile Court Martial.

[H. OF R.]

see, (Mr. BELL,) to modify his amendment in such a manner, as to retain the call for the whole correspondence.

Mr. SLOANE also expressed his willingness to modify his resolution, by striking out the following words: "and if no such order exists on the files of the War Department, to state that fact to this House."

Mr. BURGESS expressed his regret that a simple resolution calling for information should have taken the turn this had. He understood that copies of documents could not be obtained from the public officers without a legal order, and he thought the regulation a good one. Under that regulation, it was impossible that the record called for by the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SLOANE) should ever go to the public unless by the direction of this House, or of the Senate.

The question, said Mr. B., for us to settle, is, whether this information shall be laid before the House, and the public be enabled to know the truth as it is? What the ulterior intentions of the mover may be, is nothing to me; I shall vote for myself according to my own views of propriety—so, I presume, other gentlemen will vote; and, even if the rules of the House did not restrain me from a violation of decorum, I hope I should have civility enough not to impute, without evidence, to any gentleman in this House, motives hostile to the public peace and to the safety of individual reputation. It cannot be denied that much curiosity, to give it no other name, exists in the public mind, in reference to these papers. I have seen the evidence of it in those records, which, from our childhood, we are accustomed to consult—I mean the chronicles of the day.—

It is commonly said that certain militiamen have been executed, and it is said by some, that that their execution had no legal sanction. The question whether that execution was legal or not, is one on which great anxiety prevails. The person under whose orders it is said to have taken place is a person of great consequence in this nation. He fills, at this time, a great space in the public eye, and occupies much of the public feeling, and I ask if it be courtesy in this House to interpose before the facts of the present case, any obstacle which may disappoint the public curiosity, (if it is to receive no better name,) quickened as that curiosity now is, and anxious as the most unmanageable appetite. What courtesy will it be to lay your hand on a part of the documents inquired for, and to say, they shall not go to your constituents? Why will you withhold from them what either the friends of that distinguished individual, or, if you will, his foes, may desire to lay before this House? For myself, I should be satisfied if the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SLOANE) should select one portion of the documents, and the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) should select another portion. I should be satisfied with their discretion, and would call for the whole. I would not, at least, transmute this hall into an arena for gladiators. I think better of my country—of this House—of those opposed to me and those who are with me, than to apprehend that the sword of the gladiator, or the pistol of the assassin, is in any danger of being used, whether here or elsewhere, in consequence of our decision on a resolution like this. If there is any thing in this matter to produce exasperation, it must be the withholding, it cannot be the granting, of this call. The gentlemen who spoke with so much ardor of their illustrious friend, spoke only as a man should speak, when he supposes the character of his friend is in danger. But their zeal might well have been spared. The character of that illustrious man is not impugned. Nobody here has injured, or wishes to injure him. Why then should his anxious friends endeavor to forestall public opinion, or keep back from the public ear, the voice of truth? Why will they refuse to satisfy public anxiety? Why do they strive, with so much earnestness, to strike out from the resolution a call for the orders of the President, copies of which are said to be in the War Department? Why do they dread so much, if such copies are not there, that the Secretary shall say they are not there? What would gentlemen have? The public will believe the signature of the Secretary of War; for, prostrated as he has been, at least in the wishes of his enemies, still the American public will believe him, without an oath, while they remember that he belongs to the State of Virginia, although he be the Secretary of War, and a member of the Administration. May he not be permitted to say, if the fact be so, that he cannot furnish copies of any such orders, because they are not in his office? We want no commentaries, no glosses, no labored explanations. We want the record alone, and, if it is not there, we want him to certify that it is not there. Sir, what will, what must, the public think, if you prevent him from giving this certificate? I do suppose there are abundance of our citizens who know what the usual form of a certificate is, and if you put forth to the world a certificate in some unusual form, they will have too much acuteness not to perceive that you deny them the knowledge which they desire to have. I might beg gentlemen for their own sakes, not to excite such irresistible suspicions in the public mind.

Mr. SLOANE signified his acceptance of the addition proposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, and the resolution, as thus modified, was finally adopted, in the following form:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with a copy of the proceedings of a Court Martial, which commenced its sittings at or near Mobile, on the fifth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, for the trial of certain Tennessee Militiamen, together with a copy of all the orders for the organization of said Court, as well as those subsequently issued in relation to its decisions.

"And, also, to furnish copies of all papers, letters, and documents, relating to said Court Martial: copies of all orders, general or special, made or issued by the President of the United States, or by the Secretary of War, concerning or relating to the length of service of the detachment of the Tennessee Militia, detailed under the order of the Governor of said State, issued on the twentieth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and afterwards placed under the immediate command of Lieutenant Colonel Philip Pipkin; also, copies of such order, and of the muster and pay rolls of said Militiamen, which may be on file in the Department of War.
:

"And to furnish copies of any orders of the President or Secretary of War, by which in the exercise of the discretion vested in the President by the 8th section of the act of 18th of April, 1814, the term of service of the Tennessee Militia may have been extended beyond three months; also, copies of two letters from the Secretary of War to Governor Blount, dated the 11th and 31st January, 1814.

"And, also, to furnish copies of any correspondence in the War Department between the President or Secretary of War and the Governor of Tennessee, during the late war, on the subject of the time which the drafted militia of said State should be required to serve in the armies of the United States."

FRIDAY, JANUARY 18.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive: and the question recurring on Mr. WHITTLESEY'S motion, pending when the bill was last before the House, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims; Mr. W. withdrew the motion.

Mr. GURLEY moved to amend the bill, by adding the following:

"And that the further sum of $284 be paid to the said D'Auterive, for the injury done to his slave while in the service of the United States; and for medical attendance on said slave."

Mr. KERR said: Mr. Speaker, from the serious aspect in which this subject is now presented to the whole nation—notwithstanding the opinions first entertained, that it was of minor importance—I feel myself under a sort of moral necessity of assigning reasons for the vote I shall give. I am, sir, decidedly in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana. Although I was not very solicitous to obtrude myself, the other day, upon the attention of the Committee of the Whole, when I moved its rising, and when, after giving way for the explanation of a gentleman from New York, I was intercepted from the Chair by the precipitancy of gentlemen who rose to speak, yet I confess that I did feel a desire to declare my opinion upon the question in debate, inasmuch as my constituents as well as those of others, who had delivered their sentiments at large, had a direct interest in it.

Our local situation—dwelling as we do on the waters of the Chesapeake, late the scene of a most vexatious predatory warfare, and always exposed, in time of war, to the loss of that very species of property which, in the case before the House, is attempted to be refined away—gives us an interest in the question not far short of that of Southern men. I am not, sir, a Southern man—strictly so called—but I feel, and my constituents feel drawn towards the people of the South, by chords of sympathy in many respects; and, in that particular interest, which has now become the subject of controversy, even on this floor, we have a common stake. Although our concern in the subject is not, perhaps, so important, yet the interest we feel in it is scarcely less vivid than that of the Southern planter. Sir, since the last speech of the gentleman from New York, in which he has portrayed the consequence flowing from the premises which he had, himself, most kindly assumed for the advocates of this measure—as leading to the destruction of all civil liberty in this country—I cannot content myself without an humble effort to refute the fallacies by which it is attempted to blind this House against the true import of the question before them.

Gentlemen now say, (some of them at least,) that they do not deny the general proposition that slaves are property; yet they do contend that, pro hac vice, they are not property, and they are not to be considered as such, when taken, or lost, or injured in the public service. Here then is the issue: We aver that slaves are property so declared by law, and so held in the view of the constitution. It is the report of this committee with the bill which will make up the record of our judgment here; and if you had permitted this amendment to be dropped, because of the insignificant amount of the claim of Marigny D'Auterive, or now reject it, you establish a precedent, to be quoted on all future occasions, against the most important claims, and against redress for the most serious individual losses: and I have no doubt it would be set up by some as a solemn decision on record, that slaves are not property.

Many observations have been made by gentlemen in this House, to do away an impression that they would in any manner impugn the right of property in slaves; and it has been said that such a question will never be stirred until "some bold, bad man," shall raise it for the purpose of his own ambition. I feel happy in believing that this bold, bad man has not yet found his way into this House; but I have made some note of the opinions and dispositions of men in different quarters upon this subject. Not alone in the East, nor in the north, but in the Middle States—aye, in the South, even without the instigation of that ambition which has been assumed as the only motive to it—bold, bad men, have had the folly, or the wickedness—call them fools, or knaves, if you please, (as they have been so denounced by a gentleman from Virginia,) to avow and maintain that slaves are not property, and that all such pretended rights ought to be abolished. I trust that men of this description will be long kept from this place; but there is no question, they have been seeking, by stealthy steps, to make their way into the State Legislatures, for the express purpose of stirring, by slow degrees, the question of slavery, and in due season, the solemn one of universal emancipation. You may call such people fanatics, hypocrites, or knaves, or by whatsoever other epithets of reprobation you please, but all the while the fatal consequences of their principles and their movements, may spread and be felt in every part of the country. If such a character should ever show his face in this House, I trust there will be always here, men of firmness and talent, to make him toe the twig, and avow himself clearly so that he may be held up to the scorn and detestation of every good man in the nation.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Auvergne.

[H. OF R.]

Gentlemen here say that they do not deny the right of property in slaves; but the report of the committee does give color to, and in effect declares the doctrine to a great extent, and in so much destroys the rights of owners. They aver in effect, that, as to the purpose in view, slaves are not property, or are not to be so considered. [Mr. K. here read the report of the committee of the present session, and proceeded.] I will not trouble the House with reading the report of January, 1826, referred to by the present committee, and adopted by them, as it must be familiar now to every member; but I will assert that the foundation of the report is an actual denial of the right of property in slaves. They say that slaves have not been put on the footing of property, and paid for, when lost to the owner in the public service, and they report that this petitioner ought not to have relief. No matter how you disguise it, common language will be understood by the people, and they will consider a rejection of this amendment as a decision against the right of property to this extent; for the committee do aver, that, as to any claim to compensation for injury done to a slave taken for public purposes, such slave is not considered as property, and therefore not to be paid for. Now, sir, this is the very reason why I now would decide at once that they are property, and so to be considered, and settle the question forever. I stand upon the ground that slaves are property to all intents and purposes, and should be paid for as such, like every other species of property. I will not take upon myself to lay censure on an honorable committee of this House; but I must say that all the excitement which has been exhibited on this occasion, is owing to the mistaken views of their report.

If slaves are property, as admitted, why shall they not be considered as such? I will put the absurdity to this House: What is that which is property, and not to be considered such? Such refinements are not for us, sir. If gentlemen knew how this kind of thing is felt by those more immediately concerned, they might excuse my earnestness. If slaves be property, why should they not be so considered? These are convertible propositions; and they are property of a kind the most valuable and most exposed. Has any direct reasoning been offered, on general principles, or from the constitution, to prove that though slaves are property, they are not to be considered such? Not a scintilla of reason has been presented to support the position. The only thing like argument which has been attempted, is the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. WHITLSEY,) that it has not been the usage of the Government to pay in such cases; but all the instances he has cited, have been shown to be inapplicable to the present. If they were applicable, I would, on that account, call upon the House now to come to a correct decision in this case, and settle the true principle. It has been urged that because the Constitution of the United States, with certain views, considered slaves as persons, they are but a qualified property, and therefore not to be paid for. You may seize the property for the public use—deprive the owner of the services of his slave, and carry him into danger even of the loss of his life, and if he be injured or destroyed, you will not pay! I will tell the gentlemen in a word why slaves are property: They are such in respect of the right of the owner to sell them; not like the relation between master and apprentice, or father and son, where there is a contract or a right to the temporary service—but it is the absolute power of disposing of the slave altogether, that makes him property. Again, sir, the owner of the slave pays a tax on him, as has been before enforced in this debate; and that is the peculiar badge of private property in relation to Government. The slave was property, sir, before this Government was formed—was such under the laws of the States, and was so declared by them, as he had been held by the inhabitants of the provinces before. This General Government found slaves the property of the citizens of the States, and its power cannot impugn the right. It shall not define property but must take it as it was, and construe the constitution, which enjoins compensation for it, when taken for public use, with reference to what is property in the States. If this Government takes slaves for the public use, in any emergency, it can only touch them as the property of the owner; not as citizens, for they are not such; and they cannot be enlisted as soldiers, or enrolled in the militia. They cannot be enlisted, because they are slaves, and cannot contract; and they cannot be enrolled in the militia because the fundamental militia act of 1792, excludes all but free white males. An attempt has been made to do away this right of property, by comparing slaves with apprentices; but they are citizens, and participate in the rights and burthens of the Government, and are not property. The force of this suggestion, however, has been triumphantly put down by the gentleman from Louisiana, by the brief answer, that if there were any analogy, it might prove that the master of an apprentice was also entitled to remuneration for his loss, but not that the owners of slaves are not so entitled.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said he would advance his reasons in favor of the amendment, making compensation for the loss of the slave, occurring from his working at the entrenchments at New Orleans. In the course of the argument, some gentlemen had urged the propriety of paying for the time the slave was in the service, but did not feel disposed to go any further. He was willing to pay the loss the master had sustained. And it was a matter of no consequence to him, so far as related to his vote, whether the man was impressed, or was voluntarily sent by his master. To pay the owner for the hire of this slave, was not, in his opinion, "full compensation." He said he would sustain the propriety of his argument from the fact, that, although a soldier receives his monthly pay, yet if he should die in the service, a pension is allowed to his wife. This is a matter of reparation. It is intended to be in the nature of an equivalent for the loss of one's services, upon which the wife looked for support. He said, if we applied this principle to the owner of the slave, who has lost his services, there can be but little difficulty in coming to a correct conclusion upon this subject. And that, in his opinion, would be by voting for the amendment before the House.

Mr. EVERETT said: In the first place, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. WOOD,) which the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. LIVINGSTON) professed himself unable fully to answer, I would observe, that it appears, from the original papers of the case, that the slave impressed sustained an injury from the fire of the enemy; that he was wounded in the left eye, and in the left arm, deprived of his eye, and permanently weakened in his limb; so that the injury suffered was the direct and not the consequential effect of the impressment. In answer to the other demand of the same gentleman, viz: for a measure of damages, I would farther observe, said Mr. E., that a tribunal, which I take to be the usual one in such cases, two or three neighbors had testified that they conceived the owner of the slave to have suffered an injury, to the amount of the compensation now claimed. This testimony may be seen among the original papers of the case; which, though too long to be conveniently read, may be consulted by any gentleman, at the clerk's table.

The real merits of the question, said Mr. E., may, in my opinion, be reduced to narrower limits than might be supposed, from the wide range of the discussion. The claim arises under that provision of the constitution—the amendment of the constitution—by which it is guaranteed that "private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation." Now, sir, by rejecting this amendment, we virtually introduce into this provision of the constitution, the qualification "excepting slaves." We make it read, "nor shall private property, excepting slaves, be taken for the public use, without just compensation." I am prepared to say, without scruple, that if, at the time of discussing and adopting this amendment to the constitution, it had been proposed to insert such a qualification of it, it would have been fatal, not merely to the amendment, but to the constitution itself. I am willing to leave it to the candor and common sense of every gentleman in the House, whether a proposition going, in effect, to say, that "private property in slaves, might be taken for the public use, without just compensation," would have been entertained for a moment, when the amendments to the constitution were adopted.

There is, I own, continued Mr. E., one view of the matter, which struck me with some force, as an objection to the allowance of this claim. Admitting the principle that property impressed into the public service is to be paid for, the measure of compensation is to be sought, in what would have been the terms of a contract, had the property been taken under contract with the owner and not impressed. Now it may be said, that no person hiring a slave, would insure his life, which we virtually do if we pay this claim. This objection, however, seems to me only plausible. Suppose the mayor of New Orleans, instead of impressing a slave, had come to his owner, and proposed to hire him, would not the owner, in making his terms, have said, "this is no common case of service; you want the man, not to work in your garden or plantations, but on the lines, where he is to be exposed to the fire of the enemy, from morning to night. I cannot yield him at the usual rate of wages; I must be paid according to the peculiarly dangerous nature of the service." Such would be the language of the owner; and the least he would demand would be indemnity against the damage actually sustained; on the common principle of contracts he ought to have more; he ought to be indemnified against the risk of the total loss of the slave. I therefore know of no better measure of the compensation, to which D'Auterive is now entitled, than that which is found in these documents—the judgment of the Physician—the opinion of the neighbors, that a loss to the amount claimed has been sustained: for it was sustained by the direct effect of exposure to danger, known to exist when the man was subjected to it, and against which his owner would have stipulated in a contract.

I cannot admit, said Mr. E., that the nature of the right of impressment, or, if you please, the quality of the act of impressment necessarily comes into discussion here. We are not now called to legalize (if I may use that word) the act, by which this property was impressed. We did that at the last session of Congress. We paid D'Auterive for his other property, taken at the same time. On the passage of the bill, making appropriation for him, I do not find that a division took place. The yeas and

JANUARY, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Anterive.

[H. OF R.]

nays do not appear to have been asked. I cannot find the name of either of my friends from New York (Messrs. WOOD and STORRS) on record against the allowance made to Marigny D'Anterive last Winter. It is therefore not now a question, whether we shall adopt the act, by which this man's property was impressed into the public service; but whether, having paid him for a part of it, and with a report from the Committee of Claims in favor of another part, we shall refuse to pay this remaining portion. If we do refuse, it must be on strong grounds, applicable to this particular part of the property. The preliminary question has been settled.

Mr. E. said he should not enter into the consideration of the precedents. Among all which had been cited, there appeared to be but one of an impressed slave, and that one was not a case fully in point; because the injury sustained, although probably the effect of the exposure, was not certainly so. Granting, however, that it were fully in point, it would still make but a single precedent hitherto produced, against such an allowance as is now asked: an insufficient ground certainly for refusing to pay for a part of the property, while you pay for the rest.

The argument against this claim drawn from the analogy with the case of minors and apprentices, who might die in the military service of the country, said Mr. E., I heard with some pain. There seems to me no resemblance, scarce a shadow of likeness, in the cases. What, sir, shall we adopt an analogy, which would make the free citizen of the country, because he lacks a year or two of the term of legal majority, the property of his master! The most that can be said is, that his master or father has a qualified property in his services; and this is balanced by obligations essentially reducing the value of that property in a pecuniary view. Besides this, the analogy supposes what cannot happen. The minor and apprentice cannot be impressed into the service of the country. If they enter it at all it must be after an act has been passed by the supreme legislative authority of the country, emancipating the son from the patria potestas, making the apprentice sui juris, and thenceforward competent to form with the country the contract of military service. When he has thus entered by contract into the military service of the country, he is there for himself, for his own rights as a citizen. No doubt such a law is an invasion of the interest of the parent or master, in the minor's services. The law, which has been referred to, recognized this, in assigning them a part of the bounty money; but it is a kind of interest, which if extended to a claim for an indemnity in money, for the loss of the life of a free citizen, would be in opposition to the spirit of all our institutions.

The case of the slave impressed is totally different. The analogy fails in the most important points. He does not enter into the military service of the country by contract. He cannot contract. His master has not contracted for his slave. On the contrary, at a moment, when, by the laws and constitution of the country, he is the property of his owner, the Government comes by force, takes him away, and destroys him in the public service. To make the case parallel, we must suppose an act of the Government emancipating the slaves, and enabling them to enlist in the army. Would any Government think of passing a law simply emancipating the slaves of its citizens, without making any compensation to their owners? Such an act would indicate a tyranny, as absolute as any that ever oppressed a people. It had lately been objected, with justice, by Lord Howell, to the views of those benevolent persons in England, who were contemplating the abolition of slavery, that they looked too much to the condition of the slave, and too little to the rights of the master; and that the ideas of emancipation and compensation ought to go hand and hand.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, said he considered that the right of the master in the slave was founded solely in the municipal law of the place, and he was bound to respect the right, as assured by the laws of the State where this relation is recognized, and disclaimed all right to interfere with it on the part of the General Government. The subject was exclusively within the competence of the States where slavery exists, and this Government has no authority or power over it. Still, there was a distinction between the right of the master in his slave, and that of the owner of other subjects of property. The right of the master rests solely in the municipal law of the place, and is limited to the jurisdiction of the State. If the slave, therefore, pass out of that jurisdiction, and into a Government which does not recognize this kind of property, the right of the master falls, there being no law to sustain it. Not so with other property. This is founded in a principle of universal law, and the right of the owner is recognized and protected in every civilized country. It was on account of this distinction that the holders of slaves thought an express provision necessary in the Federal constitution, in order that they might reclaim them when found in States where the municipal law does not authorize this kind of property. If this property had rested on the same foundation as other property, no such provision would have been necessary. The owner might have taken it under the universal law, as he might other property, or might have found redress in the courts in the like manner. It belongs to the municipal law to settle relations between individuals—to regulate the rights between private men. The right of the Government over the person, and to the property of the citizen, pertains to the public law, or, as it is sometimes called, the law of empire.

Mr. HAILE said he rose principally for the purpose of urging, at this late hour, a decision of the question, as he was satisfied, in his own mind, that the opinion of every gentleman was made up; and that there are other and great interests to be consulted, that are now delayed by this protracted discussion. He would ask if any good result is expected to grow out of the discussion of matters, foreign to the question, and that have no reference to it? He remembered that when the memorable Missouri question was agitated, and discussed, with all the excitement that grew out of it, that the hopes of the slaves for freedom were strongly excited—excited in some States even to rebellion, of which melancholy examples were the consequences. He would not say that some of the language used and uttered in this debate might spread the same contagious influence abroad, even to that region of country in whose peace and welfare he should always feel a lively interest. To avert a calamity like this, was his principal inducement for trespassing on the time of the House. Sir, the hopes of the slaves for freedom may be inspired by gentlemen, without knowing that they only add another link to the chain that fetters this population; they only add to that quantum of misery that the people of the South have attempted to mitigate by kindness.

No gentleman has, he believed, pretended to deny the validity, and the sacred and unqualified right of the slave owner. This was admitted on all sides. But, in order to resist the claim, gentlemen say, and so do the committee, that this "species of property" is not a fit subject for indemnity; and that the Government have never regarded slaves as property. I will not condescend to argue on such a proposition; I will not condescend to argue the fact, whether slaves are property to the master, or ever were regarded by the Government as such.

The only true question seemed to him to be, whether the officer, under the exigencies of a state of war, may not impress the private property of the citizen? I place slaves on the same footing as other property. You can make no distinction, and all the arguments in the world could not weaken this position—a right consecrated by the constitution—protected and defined by the municipal laws of the several States. On this question no reasonable man can hesitate for one moment. The right of impressment has been admitted by this House for many years, in the payment of various claims of individuals for property impressed. Will we stop to inquire into the motives that operated on the mind of a military commander, invested and clothed with all that power that springs from a state of danger and alarm, that power that originates from necessity, that knows no law—will we stop to ask, at such a moment of danger as that, whether the impressment of property for the public service, to contribute to the general good, was justifiable or not? What! when that city, which is the key of all our western States—I might say of this empire—was at stake, threatened with the most terrible evils from an invading foe, was it an hour to cavil about law? Necessity dictated laws for that occasion, and the result convinced the world, that the means employed were honorable.

Sir, said Mr. H., I will not go home and tell my constituents that I deemed their rights of property so precarious as to justify me in their defence. I would as soon discuss a question, whether the wool which grows on the sheep of our northern brethren (about which we have lately heard so much, and shall soon hear more) belongs to the farmer who rears it. This right of property is sacred in every State. It cannot be touched by this House—it cannot be reached in its legislative capacity. It is beyond the jurisdiction, not only of Congress, but of the Federal Government. It is a subject exclusively of municipal regulation—and if the State of Louisiana declares that slaves are property, this House must recognize them as such. If a Federal officer has seized upon the property for public use, the owner can demand compensation, under that clause of the constitution which says, "private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation."

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19.

Death of Geo. Holcombe, Esq.

AS soon as the Journal of yesterday was read,

Mr. SWAN, of New Jersey, rose, and addressed the House, to the following effect:

Mr. Speaker: It has become my painful duty to announce to the House the melancholy intelligence of the death of GEORGE HOLCOMBE, late a Representative from New Jersey.

To the members of this House, and especially those who have had the satisfaction of a personal acquaintance with the deceased, no eulogium can be necessary from me.

Exhausted by the pressure of a protracted but unyielding disease, he sunk into the embrace of death, on the morning of the 14th instant.

To his family, sir, the loss is irreparable—the affectionate husband and the kind parent is no more.

Mr. S. then moved the following:

Resolved, That the members of the House of Representatives, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. GEORGE HOLCOMBE, late a member thereof, will go into mourning one month, by the usual mode of wearing a crape round the left arm.

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be directed to notify the Executive of New Jersey of the vacancy in the representation of that State, by the death of GEORGE HOLCOMBE.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; And the House, thereupon, adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23.

Retrenchment.

Mr. CHILTON moved the following resolutions:

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to discharge the National debt, without unavoidable delay; to accomplish which desirable object, a resort to a general system of retrenchment is necessary. This, it is conceived, can only be effected by

First. A judicious reduction of the numbers of officers receiving salaries or pay from the General Government, and of the salaries of such as are necessarily retained in public service: avoiding, in each instance, the adoption of any measure which would be incompatible with our national dignity.

Second. By avoiding each and every appropriation or expenditure of public money which is not imperiously demanded by the justice of the claim, or the necessities of the Government, with a view to its efficient operation in a spirit of republican simplicity and economy.

2. Resolved, That the matters and things contained in the foregoing resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report to this House what offices, in their opinion, may be most advantageously discontinued, what salaries will reasonably bear reduction, and such other means of retrenchment as to them may seem necessary.

Mr. McDUFFIE (Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means) said that he should be glad to hear some specifications of the objects to which the mover of the resolutions wished to direct the committee's attention. He should be sorry if the Committee of Ways and Means should be obliged to revise the whole system of Government of the United States, the Civil Department, the Army and the Navy. The abstract propositions in the resolution were certainly just. It was very desirable that the unnecessary expense of Government should be reduced; that the public debt should be paid; and that economy in the public expenditures should be promoted. But really, as the resolution now stood, he would feel at a loss where to begin, or where to end. If the honorable gentleman wished to diminish the number of military officers, he ought to have directed an inquiry by the Committee on Military Affairs. If he was desirous of reducing the number of officers in the Navy, or rather, of preventing their unnecessary increase, the resolution ought to have been sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs; but it did not appertain to the Committee of Ways and Means to say, whether the several branches of the public establishments were, or were not, too large.

Mr. CHILTON, in reply to Mr. McDUFFIE's inquiry, and in support and explanation of his proposition, rose, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The resolutions which I have just had the honor to submit, contemplate, in the first place, the establishment of one grand national truth—a truth, indeed, of axiomatic character, to wit: that a national debt is a national curse, and should, hence, be liquidated, and discharged with all convenient despatch. This doctrine is, indeed, not only unlike, but the reverse of that which has been again and again contended for by some members of this community; and which, to some extent, it would seem, has received our sanction, by our conduct; but experience, the most trusty of all monitors, has at last exploded the heresy, and the American people begin to look with fond concern to that shrine, upon which they will be able to proclaim themselves politically, civilly, religiously, and morally free.

The remainder of my proposition divides itself into three parts. The two first are mere specifications under the general maxim, first attempted to be established, and designed to designate the means by which its object can be accomplished. The third relates merely to the committee of this House to which the whole subject-matter should be referred. To each of these considerations I shall attend; but, Mr. Speaker, I am constrained, by a remark which fell from my honorable friend from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) to invert, to some extent, the order in which I should have considered them, and first to speak of the committee to which the reference should be made.

Sir, I am conscious that, as a young man, and a new member of this honorable body, to its lenity alone I shall be indebted for the devotion of a few moments of its time to a view of this subject, which, when submitted by me, must stand or fall upon its intrinsic merits or demerits. A suggestion has been made, that, in submitting a resolution of this character, I should specifically name the officers whose services I would dispense with, the salaries I would reduce, and the expenses I would curtail. All this would I do: and more if in my power. But, sir, if I were able to do this—the necessity which exists for a reference at all, would be altogether superseded. I could then move on with a bill, directly embracing my views—but, in the present case, I am situated as is the physician, who knows his patient to be diseased—yet knows not where the disease is located, nor the remedy which will heal it.

Mr. Speaker: In relation to that part of my resolution which supposes the existence of a greater number of officers, who are receiving pay or salaries from the Government, than are necessary to attend to its concerns, I am guided and influenced by the long list which is annually presented to this House. I am further influenced in the formation of my opinion, by information received from various sources, entitled to my confidence and to the confidence of the nation, that there are many sinecures in office; men, sir, who, to give the plain English of the matter, are feasting and fattening upon the Treasury: rendering, in the mean time, no services, nor, indeed, having any to render to the country. If gentlemen seek for specifications under this general remark, (as it may be considered,) I would observe, that I am informed our Navy list is crowded; that, at West Point, perhaps, from thirty to fifty cadets have been educated at the expense of the Government, who are wholly destitute of employment; that a fifth auditor was appointed for a time which has of course passed away, and under circumstances which exist no more, nor longer require his intervention or aid; and, indeed, that, in most of the public offices, more clerks are employed than are necessary to transact the business of them respectively—some receiving pay from public appropriations; others from the "Contingent" Fund. If, upon these subjects, I am correctly informed, I cannot hesitate to say, that reform or ruin will constitute with us the closing scene.

It, in the next place, becomes my duty to allude, at least, to salaries which, in my opinion, would reasonably bear reduction. Here, sir, though, I hope, with honest motives, I am situated differently from some of my friends upon this floor. They insist that they know not where to seek a beginning point, nor in what region to look for a salary upon which to commence the work or operation of reduction. I, on the one hand, know not what part of the body politic is most infected, and demands the most speedy remedy. If, however, sir, I am compelled to particularize, I present the long list of salaries as fit subjects for amputation. Amongst the rest, I must not neglect to bestow a more specific, though a passing notice, upon the pay received by members of Congress, who are sitting here at their ease, receiving eight dollars per day for their services, and eight dollars for each twenty miles travelled, in reaching and returning from the seat of the General Government. This, sir, is the last modification of the ever-memorable "Compensation Law." Previous to the passage of that act, members of Congress received, for their services, only six dollars per day. We had then councils as wise and dignified as at present; and I doubt not that we should again see our Legislative Halls filled with honorable and intelligent men, if the compensation were reduced. A reason, and a strong one too—for this reduction, is found in the fact that our country is oppressed, and that the fruits of domestic industry, instead of price, command a mere pittance; not half so much as when aspirants for seats in Congress filled the ranks, as mere volunteers, without the formalities of a draft.

The only remaining branches of this subject which I am bound to notice, relate to the importance of avoiding unnecessary expenditures of public money, for our own accommodation, and to the necessity which exists for the exercise of caution and prudence, in making appropriations to meet the claims of others. If it be demanded of me to know, what departure from the rules of republican simplicity and economy I have witnessed here, and which I conceive to fall subject to the first of my two last divisions, by way of answer I can only request you, Mr. Speaker, to cast your eyes around this spacious Hall, each morning, upon entering it—see upwards of 200 tables piled with printed documents—private or local matters—interesting, perhaps, only to one solitary individual in the whole Union—a string of affidavits, certificates, letters, or depositions, accompanied by a report as long as the Moral Law; yet all must be printed! This matter, which gentlemen may consider unimportant, is, to my mind, a crying evil. Members from the East, and North, and South, may, from the circumstance of their having been rocked in cradles of luxury and ease, think it a small matter to expend small sums of public money. But, sir, the Western people, particularly that portion of them whom I represent, have, upon the subject, but one voice; it is, so far as I understand it, that which I have spoken. They have liberally contributed to the support of your Government in peace—they have nobly defended it in war—and are, therefore, entitled to their weight upon this floor. I say, in their name, that we are gliding imperceptibly down the smooth and deceptive current of extravagance and prodigality, and steering, without a change of course, directly to the port of National Bankruptcy and ruin. This argument, sir, gentlemen may attempt to answer, by insisting that my picture is too gloomy—that we are prosperous—that universal peace prevails—that our nation is powerful—and that, therefore, we may indulge, to some extent, in extravagance. Permit me, sir, to suggest, that industry and frugality, not indolence and prodigality, are the legitimate parents of national prosperity; and that financial ability preserves peace—and that the worst of all independent conditions, in either peace or war, is that in which a nation is placed, "having nothing to depend upon."

WEDNESDAY, January 23.

Retrenchment.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. CHILTON, yesterday.

Mr. BARNY desired not to be considered as wanting in courtesy to the honorable member from Kentucky, when rising in opposition to the reference of the resolutions to the Committee of Ways and Means, inasmuch as the chairman of that committee had expressed his unwillingness that they should be thus referred, and their merits could be tested by the discussion which would be thus elicited.

The printing for this House is the first item in the list of extravagances. I grant you, sir, that it does involve a large expenditure; but how is it to be corrected? How regulated? Shall a purveyor of public printing be employed, especially charged with the duty of designating what shall and what shall not be consigned to the press? The task would be as invidious as it would become irksome and arduous, and could not fail to result in disappointment and dissatisfaction. Sir, I hesitate not to say that every printed document submitted to this House, voluminous as they are, are interesting to, and read by, some of its members, and many of their constituents. They are indispensable to a general and correct knowledge of each particular case.

JANUARY, 1838.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

It is contended that the salaries should be reduced. Whenever Congress is satisfied that more is allowed than is sufficient for a mere subsistence, then such a proposition may find favor. If the Government desire the services of faithful and intelligent men, they can only obtain them by allowing such compensation as will enable them to live free from the apprehension that the wants of to-morrow may be unprovided for. While griping penury stares them in the face, and a helpless family are destitute of the ordinary comforts of life, the energies of neither mind nor body can be devoted to the public weal. A cursory glance at the operations of the Sinking Fund, will satisfy the gentleman that the public debt is amply provided for. Probably, before he retires from public life, and certainly before the expiration of another Presidential term, it will not exist even in name.

Thirty or forty officers are supposed to be at this time unemployed at the Military Academy at West Point. The bill from the Military Committee, now on our tables, authorizing the appointment of additional professors, does not sanction this idea. Having recently enjoyed an opportunity of becoming intimately acquainted with this valuable institution in all its details, I can safely affirm that there are neither supernumeraries nor idlers connected with it. Presenting a most interesting spectacle of strict order, and high state of discipline; every duty, whether of the soldier or the student, is performed at its appointed time, without the least confusion, and every hour, from reveille to tattoo, has its appropriate employments. No American can view such a scene without strong emotions of pride and gratification—he beholds the germ of future greatness to his country; for those whose capacity and diligence enable them to attain the proud eminence to which they all aspire—present themselves to the world the adopted children of their country, qualified to be useful in any situation in life, either civil or military. The impartial and equal administration of justice is one of the brightest attributes in its republican character; for, while the son of a sergeant has received its highest honors, the descendants of Governors, members of Congress, and other prominent men, are sent home with a diploma of incapacity.

And now, sir, last, not least, I come to our noble selves. Our compensation, surely not greater than our deserts, must be reduced. I can approach this subject with a clear conscience, and hold up at the bar of this House a pure and spotless right hand, when declaring, that, during many years a public servant, not one dollar of the people's money has enriched my private coffers. The average pay of a member of Congress is about $1,100 a year, out of which must be defrayed all expenses here and elsewhere. In the Western and Southern States, the people require to know personally the candidate who asks their confidence; hence it becomes his duty to make a tour through his District; and, for at least three months previous to an election, he is employed in riding his circuit, cultivating their good will; it is to me a source of pleasure and recreation: so industriously have I pursued it, that there are but few persons to whom I am unknown; and I verily believe that a good old horse, who has accompanied me in two campaigns, would, if a saddle-bag was fixed on his back, and the whip occasionally applied, present himself in regular succession, at every farmer's door in Baltimore County. In a large double district, the cost of about 100,000 tickets forms a considerable item of expense; from which it is indispensable that seven or eight thousand votes should find their way into the ballot boxes to secure a seat here: a large allowance must be made for wear and tear, for many are literally torn up. The benign spirit of universal religious toleration prevails throughout this happy land, and numerous temples of worship to the Great Supreme, rearing their modest heads, even in the wilderness, proclaim the increase of piety and religion. To these, contributions are liberally made; for charity, like mercy, covereth a multitude of sins, and the Lord loves a cheerful giver. Thus, the people's money is returned to the people; and as pecuniary emolument never entered into my consideration when seeking the honor of a seat in this House, I have not desired to enrich myself by compensation. And there are many members, living more remote than myself, whose happiness is intimately connected with their domestic circle, who are induced to assent to a separation from their families, and expend here thousands more than they receive. Once convinced that the exigencies of the nation do require that our per diem be reduced, and I pledge myself to go farther than is proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky—I will vote for a bill which shall deprive us of all compensation, from this day to the expiration of my term; but will never give my assent to a resolution pronouncing sentence of condemnation, until proof shall be adduced that prodigality and extravagance have existed in our Republic.

Mr. KREMER said, that it had been with pride and pleasure that he heard this resolution when it was first offered. He had rejoiced that at length a member had risen in his place, and, from a sense of duty, had presented such a resolution. He had himself, for three years past, urged it upon those who were better qualified than himself for the task, to bring forward such a proposition. It was with no small surprise, he said, that he heard this proposition now assailed. What was the question? The whole amount of it might be contained in the compass of a nut-shell. The Committee of Ways and Means are, by this resolution, called to inquire whether a retrenchment may not be made in the expenditures of this Government, without detriment to the public good. If they inquire and report to the House that no retrenchment can be made, be it so. But the impression has gone abroad, that we old-fashioned Republicans are getting corrupt, and are extravagant. I want to know whether any evil can result from ordering such an inquiry as this? Who are we? We are but men; and the most exalted of our species are stamped with imperfection and frailty. It is well known that unlawful longings too frequently mark the character of men in power. Does any one doubt that the public expenses may be too great, when they look at the march of private extravagance? When they consider the evils that are exhibited in these ten miles square? I feel regret that such an example should be set at the seat of Government. If it were confined to the ten miles square, he should not so much regret it, but the force of example, in this Representative Republic, was most pernicious. Members of this House witness continually the extravagance which is engendered here—they insensibly imbibe it, and carry it home to their own neighborhoods. A Republican Government may be safe, so long as its main stream is kept in purity. But when the main stream is corrupted, all the tributary streams partake of its pollution, till at length it spreads like an incubus over the whole land. We are told that the salaries of our public officers are not too high. I wish to see them reduced, and I want that the officers themselves should be obliged to attend to their duty within their offices. I don't want to furnish them with cash to travel through the land and make dinner speeches. I would give them what is fair and reasonable, but would encourage no extravagance. I, for one, trust that the resolution will at least go to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that we shall have the report of that committee as to what officers can have their salaries curtailed; and then, I trust that there will be virtue and firmness enough in the House to reduce the salaries of all to what it ought to be.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he could not concur in opinion with the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. BAENEY,) that no necessity for reform existed at the present time. On the contrary, I believe it is necessary that all the public expenditures should be subjected to a most rigid examination. That abuses do exist, which ought to be remedied, I do not entertain a particle of doubt. Whilst this is my deliberate conviction, I entirely concur with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that this is not the proper period for reform. Our duty at present, is, to transact the necessary public business of the country, and to go home as soon as we can. I will say, however, to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CHILTON,) that whoever shall undertake the work of reform, cannot accomplish his purpose by such a resolution as that now before the House. He must go to work systematically. He must patiently and laboriously ferret out one abuse after the other, himself, instead of imposing that labor upon others. Such a task cannot be performed by referring a general—an unlimited and undefined resolution, to the Committee of Ways and Means at this period, when, I trust, half the session has elapsed. I should not have risen, upon the present occasion, to say one word, did I not believe that the duty which I owe to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury imperiously demands of me to make an explanation of the duties which that officer performs. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CHILTON) never could have investigated the subject, when he informed the House, that office had been created for purposes which no longer exist. This office was created in March, 1817. Its duties originally consisted in auditing and settling all the accounts connected with the Department of State. These duties embraced all the accounts relating to our intercourse with foreign nations. Since this office was created, those duties must have been doubled. The independence of South America has since given birth to a new swarm of Foreign Ministers, Diplomatic Agents, and Consuls along the shores both of the southern Atlantic and Pacific Ocean. Their accounts must all be audited by this officer.

The same observation is applicable to the accounts of the Post Office Department. This officer is the auditor of all the accounts of all the postmasters, and all the mail contractors, in the United States. The new energy infused into this Department, by the excellent officer now at its head,* has greatly extended the duties of the Fifth Auditor. This, however, is far from being the aggregate of his services. He has been made a kind of residuary legatee, of all the duties which other officers of the Government could not conveniently perform. When the office of Commissioner of the Revenue was abolished, in 1819, the Fifth Auditor was designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to perform the duties of that office. Although, since that time, there have been no internal taxes to collect, yet those gentlemen who know how difficult it is to wind up an old concern, will readily believe that the duties imposed upon this officer have been nearly as arduous as they would have been, had internal taxation continued. This branch of his business has entailed upon him an extensive correspondence with all the collectors in the United States, who have not finally closed their accounts—and the number of such, even at this day, is not small. But the most extraordinary of all the duties which has been imposed upon this officer, is that which the President of the United States devolved upon him in 1821. Although never bred to the laws, yet he was appointed to discharge duties which strictly and properly belong to the office of Attorney

* Stephen Pleasonton, Esq

JANUARY, 1828.]

Georgia and Florida Boundary Line.

[H. OF R.]

General of the United States. Ever since that time, he has directed and superintended all the lawsuits throughout the Union, in which the Government have been concerned; and, at the present moment, the United States have upwards of three thousand lawsuits depending.

To show the extent and the arduous nature of this duty, I would remark, that the then Secretary of the Treasury, who was never suspected of a want of proper economy—an officer, upon the purity and wisdom of whose official conduct the people of this country have passed, and who is now revered in his retirement by every patriot, recommended that a person should be appointed for the sole purpose of attending to these suits, with a salary of $2,500 per annum.

If, therefore, there be any one officer in this Government, whom the gentleman from Kentucky ought not to have designated as useless, that officer is the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury. I am just now reminded by gentlemen around me, that this officer, in addition to other burdens imposed upon him, has the charge of all the light-houses in the United States.

I have a word to say to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BARNEY) before I take my seat. I am prepared at this time, and at all times, to act upon the subject of reducing our own pay. In relation to this question, I formed a deliberate opinion six years ago, which my experience ever since has served to strengthen and confirm, that the per diem allowance of members of Congress ought to be reduced. As a compensation for our loss of time, it is at present wholly inadequate. There is no gentleman fit to be in Congress, who pursues any active business at home, who does not sustain a clear loss by his attendance here. If we consider our pay, with reference to our necessary individual expenses, it is too much. It is more than sufficient to cover our expenses. I believe that the best interests of the country require that it should be reduced to a sum no more than sufficient to enable us to live comfortably whilst we are here. For my own part, I do not, like the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. BARNEY,) give away to my constituents my per diem allowance. I receive it, and use it for my own benefit. It seems that gentleman uses the surplus of his pay, in displaying his liberality to his constituents; by making donations to churches and charitable institutions at the public expense. In this manner he may use it most effectually for his own advantage; but still I am inclined to believe, his constituents, as well as mine, would be quite as well satisfied, if the surplus were allowed to remain in the Treasury, for the benefit of the nation. If the Government of this country should ever want to employ almoners to distribute their bounty, the last men whom the people should desire to employ in this office, would be members of Congress. It might be dangerous to trust them with the performance of such a duty.

Mr. McDUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, said, that with regard to the propriety of retrenchment, as a member of that committee, he felt wholly incompetent to express any definite opinion, but he would suggest to the mover of the resolution that, if he desired to effect any really beneficial object in relation to this matter, the proper course would be to introduce a series of resolutions applying systematically to the various retrenchments he wished to effect, and have them referred to the appropriate committees. The Committee of Ways and Means were already enumbered with business, and it would be out of the question for them to do any thing like justice to such an inquiry, which, indeed, he did not consider as appropriate to that committee. Should the resolution pass in its present form, it would send the Committee of Ways and Means on a voyage of discovery, without chart or compass. It was out of the question to expect that that committee are to go severally to the different Departments, and there make minute investigations as to the duties and salaries of all the officers of the Government.

Georgia and Florida Boundary Line.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

WASHINGTON, 22d JAN., 1828.

By the report of the Secretary of War, and the documents from that Department, exhibited to Congress at the commencement of their present session, they were advised of the measures taken for carrying into execution the act of 4th May, 1826, to authorize the President of the United States to run and mark a line dividing the Territory of Florida from the State of Georgia; and of their unsuccessful result. I now transmit to Congress copies of communications received from the Governor of Georgia, relating to that subject.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, moved to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said that the question submitted to Congress in the Message of the President just referred to, was one of great importance to the United States, and of still greater to the Territory of Florida. It involved a question of boundary which they supposed had been settled long since, and never expected to see revived again. Since it was introduced here, however, it must be disposed of, and under the rules of the House it was difficult to say what committee had, appropriately, the cognizance of it. The Committee on the Judiciary, in the learning, ability, and integrity of which he had the utmost confidence, were charged with the consideration of all questions involving judicial proceedings. It was obvious, said Mr. W., that there was no question of that nature involved in this matter. The questions to be investigated had arisen under three treaties, that of 1783—of 1795, between Spain and the United States, and that of the 22d of February, 1819; and although there was now no question immediately in reference to our foreign relations, it nevertheless referred itself to the negotiations and relations of this Government, at the respective periods of the ratifications of these treaties; and the rights of each party growing out of them, naturally involved such inquiries as were generally made by the Committee of Foreign Affairs. That committee have less business before them, and are entirely competent to present an enlightened and satisfactory view of the subject. He should not, however, move a reference to either of the Standing Committees, for two reasons: First, because it did not legitimately, by the rules of the House, belong to either, and, secondly, because they were so much occupied by subjects previously referred to them, that it would be impossible to obtain a report as early as it was desirable. He preferred that it should go to a Select Committee, and he thought that the magnitude of the object justified such a disposition of it. The claim of Georgia, now set up in the communications of the Executive of that State, and transmitted by the President, embraces a tract of country south of Ellicot's line including fifteen hundred thousand acres, claimed by the United States, as a part of the territory acquired by the treaty of 1819 with Spain; about eight hundred square miles of which has been surveyed and sold by the United States, and the money deposited in the public Treasury. The amount of property, the subject of jurisdiction, the uncertainty of titles, and the suspension of the sales, all unite to render it desirable that the question should be speedily settled. The bill which passed at the last session was referred to the Committee of Public Lands. Mr. W. expressed his satisfaction that, in moving for a Select Committee, he was not animated by any desire to obtain any garbled or one-sided view of it. It was known he could not, and, if he could, would not, sit upon it. If it was the pleasure of the House to send it to the Judiciary Committee, he did not doubt but that the rights of Florida and the United States would be ably, faithfully, and impartially investigated, and to whatever committee referred, he should be satisfied.

Mr. WILDE said he should always trouble the House with great reluctance, and his reluctance was increased, in consequence of being obliged to differ from the gentleman from Florida, in relation to the propriety of the proposed reference. Such subjects, he believed, had usually been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A question of similar character took that course during the last session. He was sure the gentleman from Florida desired only what he himself and the people of the State of Georgia also desired, that this question should be fully, patiently, and impartially examined, and justly decided. Their feelings were all in favor of the prosperity of Florida; their interests led them to wish her early admission into the Union at the earliest period. In any event, the titles acquired by individuals from either Government, within the disputed territory, would, he presumed, be respected, and jurisdiction alone, though a relinquishment of it was forbidden by State pride, of which he had as much as any one else, would not be insisted on, if not shown to be the right of Georgia. She took more pride, he trusted, in her justice, than in her jurisdiction.

With regard to the proposed reference to the Committee of Foreign Relations, he would observe, that, in all questions of this description, it is not only important that justice should be done, but that those who are interested should believe it has been done. In that view of the subject, he felt bound to oppose a reference to that committee. A report from that quarter, upon another matter, did not satisfy the people of Georgia, nor increase their disposition to submit any question connected with their interest to that committee.

He did not propose now to inquire how far their distrust was well or ill founded—it was enough for his purpose that it existed. As to a reference to a Select Committee, he considered objectionable such a motion, when the conflict was between the State and the Union, it was suspicious. It was like a motion for a special jury, in a case where the crown was concerned. He had the most entire confidence that no advantage in the selection of a committee was sought by the gentleman from Florida. He was sure none would, in any event, be obtained, as none was desired, on either side. The subject came, he considered, within the proper duties of the Judiciary Committee. Their zeal, ability, industry, and impartiality, commanded entire confidence, and neither required nor admitted of eulogium from him. Why, then, should this inquiry be withdrawn from them?

Mr. WHITE was not unwilling the matter should go to the Judiciary Committee, but three days since that committee had, at their own request, been discharged from the consideration of a question involving the boundary between Michigan and Illinois. Mr. W. had considered the question as virtually settled last year, when it had gone to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR (Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary) made some statements in reference to the business before that committee being already sufficiently onerous.

Mr. GILMER advocated at some length the reference of the Message to that committee. There was no necessity for any hurry in the case, and it might turn out that the ultimate question would go at all events to that committee. He deprecated any but the usual course in this affair—denied that the subject had any relation to our correspondence with foreign nations, and insisted on the propriety of avoiding

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

every thing that might excite suspicion of any partiality in the course which should be taken on this memorial. It was very well known, he said, that much excitement had grown out of the relations between the United States and the State of Georgia for several years past. This very circumstance made it the more important that any business in which the State of Georgia was interested, should take the usual course in this House. He was opposed to any reference but to a Standing Committee, and to any partial operation which might be produced upon the decision of the subject by its reference to a Select Committee.

Mr. HAYNES remarked that, although the question embraced by this controversy did arise, as stated, out of the treaty between the United States and Spain, yet, the United States now occupy, as to Georgia, the position, in reference to this question, which Spain formerly did: and there was, therefore, no sort of propriety in giving the subject, as now presented, a direction to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

The question was taken on referring the Message to the Committee on the Judiciary, and decided in the affirmative.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24.

Retrenchment.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. CHILTON on the 21st January.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, when the gentleman from S. Carolina withdrew his motion yesterday, to lay this resolution on the table, I rose for the purpose of renewing it. But, understanding that he had not withdrawn it, I did not because I could not renew it. The gentleman from South Carolina, with that courtesy and comity which we all ought to show to one another, did, subsequently, withdraw his motion, in order to give an opportunity to the gentleman who moved it, and who has now just taken his seat, to make explanations. That opportunity having been ample, I should be content to let the matter pass, but that I feel myself pledged (to use an expression which, though parliamentary, is not strictly grammatical) to the cause of retrenchment. I shall say a few, a very few words, in order to explain the course I am about to take, and which, otherwise, might appear to militate against that cause. Sir, I do believe, that retrenchment is required, both by the circumstances of the country, and by the voice of the public. I concur heartily with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on my left, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) in all he advanced, (in as far as that went.) I am clearly of opinion that this is a case in which reformation, like charity, (I mean modern charity,) begins at home—at least it ought to begin at home. I have long been of opinion, that no economical Government could ever inhabit such a House as this; I do believe we never shall have an economical Government in such an establishment as the present. This, however, may be a peculiar opinion of mine. Yes, sir, reformation must begin at home. I do not mean in our own cases as members—I am not going to start the per diem question—God forbid! We had enough of that when we sat in the brick building, over the way, (where I should be very glad we sat now.) I believe, sir, that whatever abuses may exist elsewhere, we can go with them, pari passu, at home, and show an equal case of abuse. But, sir, this is not “the accepted time”—and in saying this, I do not speak in the words of some of the orators over the water, who never will find an “accepted time” for parliamentary or economical reform. Every effort that is made now, will only recoil on those who make it—will injure the cause, not further it. One of the greatest men and best patriots that ever lived, I mean John De Witt, when asked how he managed to get through so much business, replied, that he managed it “by doing one thing at a time.” Now, sir, I believe that we have “one thing needful” to do, and I am for doing it. I will not indicate further than I have done, what that “one thing” is. I say, let us bring to bear upon that object the whole of our strength, all our rays, light and heat, into one focus. Sir, we know that even Mr. Jefferson, in his highest and most palmy state, could not succeed in certain reforms he wished to introduce. And why, sir? Because there was a countervailing under-current, too strong even for him to stem.

Mr. Speaker, I wish not to add another to the number of resolutions which are to be taken up regularly every morning—debated for an hour throughout the session, and, at the end of it, left unfinished, with the unfinished speech of some gentleman by the side of them; and this resolution will infallibly take that course, unless you revise your rules and orders, or unless the House will join me in a motion I am going to make. Sir, I will not enter upon one of the subjects referred to in the resolution, farther than to say one word in respect to the school at West Point. Sir, that school is a contrivance to educate the sons of the rich at the expense of the poor. But I will not, by farther entering into the subject, bring all that force to operate against me, which I know to be enlisted in defence of that Institution. I am for doing one thing at a time—but it is nevertheless true, that every poor man in this country who buys a pound of sugar, a peck of salt, or as much iron as will point his ploughshare, can proudly say to any one of the cadets from West Point, “you were educated at my expense.” Yes, sir, he can say this, and how would the young man feel under such circumstances? Certainly as I would not feel for any consideration that can be named.

I had rather that a son of mine should be obliged to make his mark, for want of knowing how to write, than that, while his father was capable of bearing all the necessary charges, he should be educated at the public expense. Sir, I make no reflections: for the only man I ever knew, who was educated under such circumstances, is as estimable, as worthy, and as true a man as any that lives. I never knew but one. Sir, it is just as easy, that two bodies should occupy the same space, as that all these irons should be in the fire at the same time, and none of them should burn. As long as we have this dead weight against us, reformation is impossible. I defy the committees to accomplish any thing—you may turn them all into the Departments and they will do nothing; and when I say this, do I mean to cast any personal reflections? Certainly not—not at all, sir—I have already said that Mr. Jefferson, even in his highest and most palmy state, was baffled in the attempt. Sir, there are certain interests here which were too strong for him—they are stronger than the President, and stronger than the people.

Mr. CULPEPER said he should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from New York, because it does not go to the full extent, if any reform be necessary; but he should vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, with the hope that he would not stop at, or be content with the reference of the committee, but pursue it to some practical result. And I will pledge myself (said Mr. C.) to go with the gentleman the full length. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that we should begin with a reduction of our own compensation, I do not agree with him. He says that the per diem allowance to members is too low to compensate for our loss of time, though more than sufficient for our support while here. Sir, (said Mr. C.,) I have not patriotism enough to devote my time to the public for a bare support. My family are to be provided for, and I shall vote for the compensation I deem just, and use my wages to support myself, to pay my debts, to support my family, &c., just as I would the avails of my labor on my farm, or anywhere else: and I deem eight dollars about a proper compensation, and I shall never vote for less, for fear that that compensation may end the 8d March, &c. But the gentleman expresses a hope that we have passed the middle of the session. Passed the middle of the session? And what have we done? We have passed one bill to appropriate money to pay our own salaries; and if we are to progress in the same way, judging of our progress in future from the past, we shall pass one more bill; and what bill is that to be? Not the tariff, I presume: for though many gentlemen are anxious for the passage of that bill, yet the resolution authorizing the committee to send for persons, &c., has, I expect, put the passage of that bill out of dispute, if we are to rise the 8d of March. Yes, sir, the bill on that subject, if not defunct, is rocked to sleep for the present, if we are to have a short session. Before I sit down, I will suggest to the gentleman, if he desires reform, to amend his resolution, and refer the subject of it to a Select Committee, and not to the Committee of Ways and Means, when the committee has informed us, and no doubt honestly, that they cannot have time to make the inquiry. Send it, sir, to a Select Committee—let the subject be fully investigated, and I will go all lengths with the gentleman in his progress towards reform and retrenchment, if any shall be proved to be necessary.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, as this thing is to be gone into, so far from having reached the middle of the session, I fear we have only begun it. I had hoped that, instead of being half way, we were two-thirds through it. I do not know what more the public good imperiously requires, that is now attainable, than that we should pass the other appropriation bills, and then adjourn. I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR,) but I shall not, therefore, vote in favor of the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CHILTON.) I cannot agree in sending the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means; and one reason is, that the chairman of that committee has very truly told us, that he would be sent without chart or compass, upon a voyage of discovery, to find out a terra incognita; but, if adopted, I will join in sending it to a Select Committee, knowing from what has passed, how that committee will be appointed—I should not say knowing, but rather, being able to anticipate, from the usage of the House in all such cases. If this subject is to be brought up, I hope it will be thoroughly probed; and the only way thoroughly to probe it, will be, to have the discussion, first, here, on the general principle of reform. Let gentlemen here—in this House—determine whether they will retrench, and then point out what offices can be spared, and what salaries can be reduced. Sir, any movement at this time, affecting great interests and classes of men, was what I deprecated when my very worthy and most respectable colleague (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) brought in his resolution on the subject of the Government Stock in the Bank of the United States; and which, although the House refused to put upon the table, finally obtained but nine votes in its favor. I do not hesitate to say, here in my place, that the expenses of this Government are too high, that they ought to be reduced, and that, as soon as such a thing is practicable, I am ready to join heart and hand in its accomplishment. Sir, I will specify one or two particulars. The present salary of the President of the United States, and I hope no gentleman will understand me as wishing to have it increased, has remained where it now is ever since it was appointed, hard upon forty years ago. What other salary under this Government is in the same situation? Is there one other? When by the improvidence, imprudent conduct, of the men who were at the head of the Treasury, and of the Councils of this House, under their auspices, the whole country was deluged with

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

paper money—when the people of the United States were brought to this pass that their trustees exchanged their notes, bottomed upon every foot of land and upon every shilling's worth of productive labor of the country, against the notes of certain corporations; yes, exchanged their own notes, bearing interest, for the notes of those corporations, bearing no interest—when they agreed to allow a bonus on the nominal amount of these bank notes, equal to nearly twenty, certainly exceeding ten per cent.—when tobacco was worth forty dollars per hundred, for choice crops—when cotton was worth thirty dollars; and for a single slave, a common field hand, were paid, to my certain knowledge, twelve hundred dollars—when land was at a price which beggars all belief, (if that price had not been paid in worthless trash, for the land was, in fact, cheaper than it is now)—then, sir, the salaries of all the officers of this Government were raised. I will point to one, (absit invidia), that of the Attorney-General. It commenced, I believe, with $1,200, because it was considered that the very office itself was a great remuneration. Since then it has been raised, I know not how often. So all the salaries have been increased. Sir, have any been diminished? I believe not one—not one to my knowledge. It is easy to talk about “a certain style of living,” and about the dignity which becomes the officers of this Government. Sir, we may swell like the poor frog in the fable, till we burst, but we cannot equal the style or splendor of those on the other side of the water. And we never shall be able to equal them, until our people shall be reduced to the same state of misery with their people. Dignity consists in adapting the style of our living to the means we have to live on. It never did consist in expense and pageantry, especially in a Government having even the semblance of Republicanism. Dignity, like happiness, resides in the mind—it is in the man, and you cannot give it by any station. Sir, there was as much true dignity in Fabricius—there is now as much true dignity in Fabricius, as there ever was in Louis XIV.—the grande monarque, who was never seen, even by his valet de chambre, without the paraphernalia of his enormous wig—comptis Curium capillis; yes, sir, there was as much dignity in the American Curius Dentatus, I mean Roger Sherman, as in any of the Ambassadors which his most Christian Majesty thought fit to send to us, then his very great, dear allies.

Sir, whenever money is plenty, and every thing is at the highest price, that price forms a very good reason why salaries must be raised. And when all things have fallen, and the price is depreciated, for aught I know, 90 per cent., why then, sir, the times are so hard that salaries cannot be reduced, but, on the contrary, should be raised. So, in reference to the emolument of Government, that happens which happens in certain other institutions where the Directors, the Cashiers, and the Presidents, take good care of themselves, but are quite regardless of the Stockholders. Sir, in this Government, the people are the Stockholders, and all I look at, in any public man, is, whether he is for the Stockholders, or for the Directors. This is my test, my touchstone. Yes, sir, when all things are dear, salaries must be raised because they are dear; when all things are cheap, still salaries must be raised, because the cheapness of every thing shows the scarcity of money, and that the times are hard. So, sir, to use one of my homely phrases, and that language is understood by the people, and is the only language I will ever use when speaking to them—the game amounts to this: Cross, the people lose; and Pile, their rulers win. Sir, I wish to know, if the offices of this Government were filled with less able men, when Jefferson was in the Department of State, Hamilton at the head of the Treasury, Knox, aye, sir, Knox, in the Department of War, and Bradford was Attorney-General, than they are now? Were our officers, with about one-half the present salary, less dignified then, than they are now, with double the amount? I wish to know if that (I was going to say) unrivalled Chief Justice of the United States, has any more dignity now, when his salary is $5,000, than he had when it was $4,000? Or whether his associates are more dignified now they get $4,000, than they were when the salary was but $3,500? They are the same men, they perform the same services, and with the same ability and integrity. Sir, I did not intend to trespass on the House so long as I have done, but out of the fulness of my heart I have spoken. Sir, I believe that the country I live in is quite as well off as any of those adjacent to it, and this may, perhaps, be owing to the fact of its being too far removed from any Bank, from this Pandora's box, for us to receive our full portion of its blessings, which, like those of the evil spirits, are curses. But, sir, there is hardly a man in the sphere of my knowledge, who makes one per cent. upon the value of his plantation and stock. For one such, I can show you twenty persons whose account of profit and loss, if they keep any, will exhibit a balance on the wrong side of the Ledger. Sir, the country is in an unexampled state. I can remember nothing like it, though I remember well when Lord Cornwallis passed triumphantly through the South, carrying all before him, before the battle of Guildford. I remember well the peace of '83, and even then, when we had nothing like this state of things, although the paper money of that day did its office, we had a forty shilling year for tobacco, and fifteen and twenty shillings years for many years thereafter; and yet even then the times were not like these. Sir, there is not a planter within the sphere of my knowledge, or not a farmer if you please, with no other resource but his farm, who has one shilling at the end of the year, even though he may not have spent, in the course of it, one shilling on himself. The expenses swallow up all the profits, and, in most cases, far exceed them. And why is this? Sir, we have been legislated into this thing—would to God, we could be legislated out of it again—facilis descensus Avernus. Aye, sir, but the return revocare gradum superasque evadere ad auras hic labor, hoc opus est. Sir, we have been impoverished till we have scarce enough of spirit left to act like men. Yet we hear that the expenses of this Government are only such as comport with the dignity—yes, sir, the dignity of a poor man with a sheriff at his back—such as comport with the dignity of this great Metropolis. The dignity, sir, of vainly endeavoring to rival the Representatives of Autocrats and Kings, instead of exercising Industry and Economy. But when I say economy, I do not mean merely the economy of lopping off. I know very well, sir, that economy is one thing, and parsimony is quite another. But I would couple industry with frugality, and associate it with all the domestic virtues. But no, sir, our sons must be educated at the public expense, and when the people are in distress we must look from their own or our improvidence for some canal, or some road, or some woollen manufactory, to any thing for relief—but industry and self-denial—and to ascribe the disease to any thing but the true cause, unwise legislation and prodigality. And when I say this, sir, I don't mean to exempt the States from the charge. No, sir, not at all. I do not mean to exempt Virginia, and I will never vote for a man to represent me in her Legislature, who will not there vote for short sessions and low taxes. And if it becomes necessary, as it never yet has been, I will turn out, sir, and electioneer against him upon these very grounds.

That is a good Government which takes from the people nothing that it can spare. I mean nothing that the Government can do without. I would always give the requisite supplies. Yes, sir, I would not stop the supplies unless the Government refused to redress grievances; but, if it did, I would follow the example of those very ancestors who are now quoted on the other side. Yes, sir, I would then stop the supplies. I would not hesitate to vote against any item in an appropriation bill; yes, sir, and against the appropriation bill itself, if I could get at my object in no other way. Sir, we are the keepers of the people's money, and what other function can be so important? If you let me have the keeping of your money, I shall be very glad to be discharged from the custody of your person and the protection of your wife and children. Such a state of things would benefit me much more than if you were an Ethiopian. Sir, look at the condition of other people. Look at the state of the Irish, that brave, honest, gallant, warm-hearted people, (too warm-hearted, I grant you, sometimes, when their hearts sail too fast for their heads.) They are the most oppressed of the human race. I make no exception, sir; no, none at all.

But do I take part with their oppressors? Far from it. Look at the people of England. I ask the House to turn their eyes to the sea-girt isle. And, sir, I hesitate not to acknowledge that I feel towards that country as a Greek of Syracuse would feel towards Peloponnesus. The French, indeed, are not so badly off, yet many of them are extremely wretched, if that can be called an extreme which, like Milton's fire, has an extreme still more fierce beyond it. You see there the same empiricism, the same Charlatanerie that we see here. There is, at this moment, within three miles of St. Stephen's Chapel, more misery and more vice than exists on the whole of North America, the West Indies included. And what is the cure, sir! The philanthropists, instead of ferreting out that which is immediately under their noses, or rather which they are glad to stop their noses to avoid, occupy themselves in taking care of the slaves of Mr. Watson Taylor, Mr. Beckford, Mr. Hibbert, and other West India gentlemen, whose condition, in comparison with the canaille of St. Giles's, St. Paul's, Westminster, and other quarters of London, is a condition of independence, virtue, and happiness. The misery before their eyes they cannot see—their philanthropy acts only at a distance. (I will not say only, for there are some very good men, no doubt, who do relieve the sufferings at home.) Their philanthropy acts only through their ears, and not through their eyes—they reverse the Horatian maxim, that what a man sees affects him more than what he hears. Sir, there are lazzaroni—I used the word because they are so—there are lazzaroni all over Europe, and I am far from sure that we shall not have some of them here—they were lazzaroni only who took up arms in defence of Naples—sturdy beggars, if you please—sturdy dogs—but as far above the condition of the oppressed peasantry of Ireland in food and raiment as a slave here is above the condition of a slave in the West Indies.

Sir, I am very sensible that I have wandered somewhat from the point in debate—seduced, probably, by that very kind attention which the House has accorded to me. If there is any gentleman who thinks I have said too much—that I have said what I ought not to say, or, not as I ought to have said it—let such gentleman remember that it has not been owing to me that this subject is here. For myself, I should be satisfied if we could pass the other appropriation bill, and then go home. I hope we shall pass upon such salaries as are to be abolished or retrenched here, in this House, and not suffer the subject to go to a committee at all, until we shall have settled the principle. I am in favor neither of the amendment, nor of the resolution. I shall vote against both. If we are of opinion that any officer of the Government receives too much salary, why must we send one of our committees on a voyage of discovery, or rather of undiscovery—for they can and will discover nothing.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, I shall add no more at present. I have many and heavy things to say—high matter, sir—when the proper time shall come; but I reserve it until then.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said: If I understand the object of the mover of the resolution, it is to abolish useless offices, to reduce extravagant salaries, and to apply the savings to the payment of the debt. That object is distinctly kept in view by my amendment, without encountering the objectionable features of the original resolution. Whatever shall be saved by retrenchment under the existing laws, must be applied to pay our debts. At the close of the last war, the party which had declared it, and had carried the country successfully through its perils, considered its work but half done, until provision was made to relieve the country from the burden it had left on our shoulders. Our debt at that time exceeded 120 millions of dollars. For the punctual payment of the interest, and the gradual reimbursement of the principal, a sinking fund was established, which, in its regular operation, has paid the interest, and already reduced the principal of that debt to 55 millions of dollars. Not only have the pledged ten millions been thus applied, but also all the surpluses which remained in the Treasury, over and above the sum limited by law.

There was, indeed, a period, said Mr. T., during the last Administration, when the condition of the Treasury was such, that it could not regularly pay to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund the annual ten millions. The appropriations remained a charge upon the Treasury, and although loans, to the amount of several millions, were authorized, and negotiated, the Treasury still remained debtor to the Commissioners. It was in this condition of the country, when, on the one hand, we were increasing our debt by loans from banks and individuals, and, on the other, not paying our debt to the Sinking Fund, that the reformers, the much-abused radicals, of whom, said Mr. T., I was one, succeeded in reducing the army rank and file, from 10,000 to 6,000 men, and disbanding useless officers. This operation saved about a million a year, which has already amounted to seven or eight millions, without the least injury to the public service. Since then, the condition of the Treasury has been more flourishing. Within the last three years, it has paid the balances it owed to the Sinking Fund. The principal of the public debt has been extinguished to an amount exceeding twenty-one millions of dollars, and nearly twelve millions paid for interest. The speedy extinguishment of the remaining debt can only be arrested by some unlooked-for national calamity. It has been steadily and most successfully pursued by the present and preceding Administrations. It is the settled policy of this Government, in which all men of all parties unite. Why, then, is it now brought forward, as if it were some new discovery? Surely, it cannot be necessary, for the purpose of confirming our courage, to abolish useless offices or reduce extravagant salaries. I have been no advocate, said Mr. T., for raising salaries. Most of the laws increasing them, both in the Legislative and Executive branches of this Government, have been passed in opposition to my vote. When the Secretaries at the head of Executive Departments had smaller salaries, they lived less expensively. They were not required—it was not expected of them—that they should keep open house, and entertain all members of Congress and strangers, who might visit the seat of Government. Most of them could not do it without ruin to their private fortunes. When you raised their salaries to six thousand dollars, you did them no service. You imposed upon them the necessity of living in more splendor, but in less comfort. Put the salaries back to the old standard, and they will have more time for private study and public duties; and I doubt not you will have their thanks.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that if the House should determine to adopt any resolution on the subject of reform, at the present time, it ought to contain a distinct proposition, that it was expedient to discharge the national debt as soon as possible. For this reason, he could not vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR.) When that gentleman moved an amendment, which, if it should prevail, would strike out all that part of the original resolution which related to the extinguishment of the public debt, he expected to hear some reasons urged for such an omission. In this he had been disappointed.

Sir, said Mr. B., I know it has become very fashionable in the present day to say, that we are discharging the public debt too rapidly. Many deplore that it is melting away so fast: and although it has not been openly avowed that a public debt is a public blessing, yet such is the necessary tendency of the remarks which we often hear. Upon this subject, I beg the House to recur to the past history of the country. What was the amount of our debt before the late war? It had been so much reduced that a very wise and a very great statesman felt himself at a loss to know how our surplus revenue could be expended, after the debt should be entirely extinguished. To accomplish this purpose amendments to the constitution were recommended. But war came, and in less than three years, the public debt increased from forty-five to one hundred and twenty millions of dollars. It was a maxim of the Father of his country, that, in peace, it was our duty to prepare for war. How can we better prepare, than by paying our debts? According to the system which has been pursued by this Government from its origin, we have, comparatively speaking, no resource left, in time of war, but a resort to loans. They and they alone must support our credit in the day of trial; and yet this resource had nearly been exhausted before the close of the late war. What has once been, experience teaches us may be again. A war, by injuring our foreign trade, would cut off many of the sources of our revenue, and we should be compelled again immediately to resort to loans. I wish, then, if possible, to be clear of debt, when another war shall commence. Our debt, reduced as it has been, is still much larger than it was at the declaration of the late war. A future war would, in a very few years, raise it higher than it ever has been. I am, therefore, in favor of husbanding all our resources, and applying the whole surplus, not absolutely necessary for other objects, to the extinguishment of the national debt. If, therefore, we shall pass the resolution, I trust that this object will stand in the front rank.

I know that the process of extinguishing the debt has been rapidly advancing for several years, and I do not complain that the present Administration have not fairly applied the sinking fund to this purpose. Although I do not pretend to be their friend, yet I am willing to admit, they have gone on to carry into effect the law creating that fund, which was so wisely enacted by our predecessors. This rapid extinguishment of the public debt has been productive of much good to the country. Among other benefits, it has essentially promoted domestic manufactures, by forcing capital into that channel of business, which would never have been thus employed, could it have remained in the public stock. I shall vote for no amendment which shall not embrace, in distinct terms, the position that the public debt ought to be extinguished as speedily as possible.

If the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. CULPEPER) had reasoned upon the fact which he stated, and had drawn the fair deduction from it, he would, I think, feel the force of the remarks which I intend to make. He says that but one bill has passed into a law during the present session, and that one is a bill providing for the pay of the members of Congress. I would ask that gentleman, why is this the case? Why has not more business been done? If he had asked himself these questions, he would probably have discovered the true origin of my remarks. I wish to speak with all due deference to the members of this House, when I say it is my desire, by reducing our wages, to make it our interest, as well as our duty, to do the business of the country as it arises, and go home as soon as possible. I do not wish to be in a hurry—I do not wish to act without due deliberation; and yet, I firmly believe that the public business might be better transacted than it is at present, in little more than half the period of our long sessions. I do not profess to be “an aged gentleman;” but yet, upon this subject, I can speak in the language of experience, and am glad that there are many gentlemen around me who can correct me if I should fall into error. I would ask, what has been the course of legislation which we have heretofore pursued? What have we done during the first half of every long session? I answer, comparatively nothing. The fact stated by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. CULPEPER,) in regard to the business which has been transacted during the present session, is substantially true of those that are past. But I do not complain of the waste of time alone. The necessary consequence of this manner of proceeding is to force the whole business of the session in a solid mass upon the House near its close. Then we have so much to do that we can do nothing well. There is neither time nor opportunity for investigation; and measures are adopted, the nature and character of which cannot be understood by the House. Immediately before the close of the session, we are employed in passing bills until 12, 1, 2, and 3 o'clock in the morning. I have been upon this floor at a late period of the night, when important amendments were arriving every few minutes from the Senate, which were adopted, when, I believe, there were not more than thirty or forty members present. I do know that it was then in the power of any individual, by merely calling for a division, to defeat any of these measures. This would have furnished official information to the Speaker that a quorum was not present, and then no business could have proceeded.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, said, I shall vote for the resolution. It was with pain I saw the apparent laugh and amusement which the resolution, and the remarks which accompanied it, afforded to some of the gentlemen of this House. Their feelings towards a new member must be very different from mine. I view such a member as coming fresh from the people, and, therefore, not long enough here to be contaminated by bad principles, or evil example. He is fresh from the oven of public opinion; and, as such, bearing the impress of the people. The gentleman from Kentucky speaks, I do not doubt, the sentiments of seven-eighths of the honest and intelligent people whom we represent. What he speaks is not his own language; it is the language of the people. And while I listened to him, I felt an emotion of shame that I should, in any degree, during the little time I have been here, have weakened my feeling of reverence for what I believe to be the will of my constituents. The constitution itself, by appointing a periodical term for our service here, reminds us of the principle that the representatives in this hall ought, from period to period, to come fresh from the people, reflecting their sentiments, and speaking their language. And, sir, he who disregards this principle, will most certainly fall a victim to his own folly; and, in saying this, I do not speak the dreams of imagination, but the language of fact. It has been said, in this discussion, that we have the cheapest Government on earth. Have we, sir? I can call the attention of gentlemen to one which has outlived all the republics of the world—of Athens, of Sparta, and all the other republics of Greece. There is not one among them all which is equal in this respect to the little republic of San Marino,

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

which has endured now for fourteen hundred years. So long, sir, as a republic continues simple, its Government cheap, and its people virtuous, it will perpetuate their happiness; but as soon as the Government becomes splendid, and its officers grow into rulers, it will surely be of short continuance. Now, sir, what is the present situation of this cheap Government? Why, sir, would it be believed that the number of persons actually engaged in it amounts to double the number of our military force? Yet such is the fact at this moment. The number of officers in the various departments of this Government, civil and military, amount to no less than nine thousand. Can they all be really useful? No, sir, it is impossible. I have been informed, said Mr. M., and believe, that, in the Ordnance Department, the disbursement of about three hundred thousand dollars costs the Government nearly seventy thousand. Sir, in this there must be something wrong. There must be something rotten in Denmark.

Sir, it has been said that the gentleman from Kentucky ought to have pointed out the particular mischief which he wished to remedy. But this is not in the power of any individual, unless he can devote the whole of his time to the inquiry. And I therefore hope this resolution will not be sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, but will be confided to a Select Committee, who may be employed exclusively in this investigation. And I have entire confidence in the discretion of the Chair, that such members only will be put upon it, as are not already burdened. I hope they will go into the numerous departments, and search every thing to the bottom. I repeat, there are now 9,338 persons employed in these various departments. Sir, is this like a Republic? It is like any thing else in the world. Within the small period I have enjoyed a seat on this floor, I have witnessed a very strong desire to multiply officers, but no movement of reform. It has been said by a gentleman more aged in experience than I, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that this is not the accepted time. Sir, I cannot agree with that gentleman. It is always the time to do good. Now is the accepted time. A continual drip will at length wear a hole in a stone, and so will continual perseverance, in attempting retrenchment, eventually succeed; and I have been delighted to see, in so many members of this House, a disposition to carry forth this measure to the good of the country. Look, sir, at the vast expenditure of this Government, and compare that expenditure with the simple form of the Government itself. This, sir, is the true principle of comparison, and not to compare our expenses with the expenses of England, of Russia, of Austria, or of France. Such a comparison is manifestly unjust. Our own Government stands alone, and the parallel will not apply. When we look at the simplicity of its machinery, we shall find the Government of Great Britain a very unfaithful monitor. It will be worse if we go to that of Russia, and it will not be better if we look at any Kingly Government whatever. How many new offices have been created since the days of our prosperity? And when I speak of the days of prosperity in this Republic, I refer to the first days of Mr. Jefferson's Administration. Those were the days of its glory. The Republic has been deteriorating ever since, and will soon slide, unless carefully restrained, into the ocean of profligacy. The gentleman told us that the Military Academy at West Point did not confine its benefits to the sons of the well born, and the rich. But, sir, I ask what orphan son of a widowed mother is ever recommended to that institution? No, sir; we recommend a boy whose father is abundantly able to educate him, and we do it because that father is also able to aid us in our election to this House. The gentleman says the school is conducted with the greatest Republican simplicity. Sir, I am at a loss to know what idea the gentleman attaches to those terms. If ever there was a monarchical institution on the face of the earth, the military school of France not excepted, this certainly is one. Sir, it is one of the very creatures of royalty. But we have been told that we must not stop here; that we must have a naval institution also, in which young men from the first circles may receive their education also, at the public expense; and I venture to say, when they have got it, they will be more useless, if possible, than before. But it is with these that our navy is to be filled. Then, to crown all, we are to have a national university, intended, no doubt, to prepare young men for filling seats on this floor: then, sir, all things will be going on beautifully, and the poor people will be run down under our feet. God save me and my posterity from any such Republican institutions. Sir, we are misled by names. A spade is not called a spade. We call these Republican institutions. But I say, let the States educate their own sons. Let us have that cradle which brought forth a Washington and a Jackson, to bless their country. When, sir, did gentility do any thing for the public good? When did pomp and show prolong the date of a Republic? Remember how Thebes mouldered into ruins when her people sought to outvie the Persians. Remember what became of Sparta when she forgot the simple laws of Lycurgus. So will this Government crumble into ruin, before twenty years, unless we stop the wheels of its downward course in profligacy and extravagance. We come from our homes, many of us at least, poor and penniless—we look at the magnificence of this Hall—we learn to attend upon levees, and to bow to those who are in fact our servants, and we soon disdain to own that we were poor. We are dressed at the public expense, and soon cut a fine figure, but this course will soon destroy us unless we stop midway in our mad career.

Mr. DANIEL, of Kentucky, said: the adoption of this measure would, in his opinion, produce much good. It would set on foot an inquiry whether the public expenditures are not exorbitant, and ought not to be reduced. In any general attempt to reduce the public expenditures, it was highly expedient that Congress should set the example. Let us (said he) begin by reducing our own compensation, and then other public officers will have no reasonable ground of complaint if we should reduce their salaries, which measure might otherwise be made a matter of reproach to us. It is my opinion, that, with proper prudence and economy, a man may be paid for his services, and live very well on six dollars per day; and when gentlemen seem to think that two dollars saving per day is not worthy of the deliberate consideration of such a dignified body as Congress, they ought to consider that the saving of two dollars per day on the pay of each member would amount to hundreds of dollars per day: and for the number of days in each session, would amount to an immense saving. Such would be the effect of reducing the pay of members from eight dollars per day, to six, or five, or four dollars per day; and members might live comfortably for less than the latter sum, the expenses of living in this city being nothing like what he anticipated and expected when he left home.

In our own State, where the members of the Legislature receive two dollars per day for their services, they live well during the annual session, and return home, at the end of it, with 50 or 60 dollars in their pocket, &c. Another reason which induced Mr. D. to favor a reduction of the public expenditures was, that it was proposed to increase the duties on woollen goods, &c., to such an extent as to operate as a prohibition on their importation, the consequence of which would be, that the people must be taxed, by a direct tax, for the support of this Government: and gentlemen, who were in favor of what was called the tariff principle, ought to consider, if they meant to press that measure, that it was indispensable that the expenses of the Government should be retrenched. To this, he presumed, a portion of the public officers could have no great objections; and especially the Secretary of the Treasury, who was so desirous that the import duties on certain articles should be augmented.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 25.

Retrenchment.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions heretofore submitted by Mr. CHILTON. The following amendment, moved by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, being under consideration:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into, and report to this House, what officers, in their opinion, may be most advantageously discontinued; what salaries will reasonably bear reduction; and such other means of retrenchment as to them may be necessary.

Mr. FLOYD, of Va., said that he was opposed to the amendment, because, in his judgment, it was not likely to result in any thing beneficial either here or elsewhere. It amounts in substance to this, that a committee shall be directed to tell this House that which they already perfectly know—that there is prodigality and waste in the expenditures of this Government; and because that very thing on which the whole nation has so long felt the greatest anxiety, is, by this amendment, to be stricken out of the resolution. I mean, said Mr. F., the expediency of discharging, as speedily as possible, the national debt. The time has now arrived when this House is bound to do something decisive in its character. Heretofore, the operation of this Government has been, in a great degree, beyond our limits, and confined to objects of a constitutional character; but now a new era has opened upon us, and we are about to feel all those calamitous consequences which its measures and policy are destined to bring upon the people. It is very true that the doctrine advanced under the elder Adams, that a national debt is a national blessing, has not now been distinctly avowed; but the same doctrine is substantially advanced in a different shape. We have been told that a national debt for which stock is issued by the Government, is beneficial and desirable, because it enables capitalists to invest their money in the United States securities, and then, if death overtakes them, a permanent provision is made for their wives and families. The interest on their investment, though not, perhaps, so great as that arising from other stocks, is sure, and can be received with certainty, being free from all those risks and changes which arise from the misconduct of Bank Directors, and other contingencies to which it would be liable, if invested either in commerce, or in the stock of turnpike roads, steamboats, canals, &c., which seem to be the mania of the day.

Mr. STEWART rose to say a few words in reply to his colleague, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) and the gentlemen from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. FLOYD,) who had spoken against the resolution. The object of this resolution is to institute an inquiry, to ascertain whether abuses exist in the public expenditures; whether there are any unnecessary offices and salaries: and whether retrenchment may not be beneficially resorted to. For his own part he was decidedly in favor of the resolution. Let the doors of inquiry be thrown wide open; let every one enter and see for himself. He would vote for it, whether referred to a Standing or a Select Committee; or whether the amendment now proposed was adopted or not; he would vote for the amendment, because the preamble proposed to be stricken out, seemed to him to contain an assumption of the very facts which it was the end and object of the proposed inquiry to ascertain. Mr. S. was decidedly in favor of every

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

inquiry into supposed abuses; and, if found to exist, he would go with him who dares go farthest in applying the corrective. The gentleman who introduced this proposition, who comes immediately from the people, and from a highly excited political contest, tells us, what is undoubtedly true, that the public mind is excited on this subject; that the people believe the Government has become wasteful and prodigal, that abuses exist, of the most alarming character: and so strong was the popular sentiment on this subject, that he was obliged to give a pledge to his constituents, before he left them, to bring this subject immediately before the House—it was then, in his judgment, alike due to public opinion, and to the character of the Government, that this inquiry should be promptly instituted. If the alleged abuses exist, let them be exposed and remedied. If not, let these clamors be silenced by the report of a committee of this House—let the public ear be disabused and the public mind put at rest.

If abuses exist; if there are too many offices; if salaries are too high or too numerous; if the public money is wastefully and prodigally expended—where is the fault? At whose door lies the sin of these offences? The fault is in this House, sir. We hold the purse strings of the nation, and we are responsible, and we will be held responsible, if we apply not the remedy promptly and efficiently. Public offices were not only created, but the salaries fixed, and their payment annually provided for, by law. Every appropriation of money for every object of expenditure, down to the lowest clerkship in the Departments, had to pass under the notice and receive the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means, and afterwards of this House. He therefore hoped the inquiry would go on—its postponement would be a disregard of public duty on the part of those who believed in the existence of the evils and abuses complained of. His colleague had said, that he considered it too late in the session; that half the session had now gone by. If half the session were gone—what have we done? It had been said, and said truly, that but one bill had yet become a law, and that was to provide for the payment of our own wages! What would become of the tariff if half the session was gone, and no bill yet reported to the House? But, for one, if abuses existed, as had been alleged, he would stay here (however reluctant) till midsummer, if necessary, to expose and correct them, and fulfil the other duties which we owe to the country and our constituents. But, gentlemen say we must go to work “systematically;” let each individual go to work and ferret out abuses and expose them. Expose them where? In the public prints? For what purpose, and with what view? This could lead to no practical result. No, let the resolution be adopted, let the subject be referred to a committee of this House; if abuses exist, let them report a bill for their correction;

if not, let the fact be stated, and let the tongue of misrepresentation be silenced; let the injurious reports now abroad upon the wind, and wafted to the remotest parts of our country, be exposed to merited reprobation. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) says, we will, by adopting the resolution, send the Committee of Ways and Means not on a voyage of discovery, but of “undiscovery;” this constituted no objection to the measure. The gentleman had alleged the existence of many and great abuses. If so, does the gentleman doubt the ability or disposition of the able Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to ferret out and expose them? He presumed not. This duty is imposed on the Committee of Ways and Means, by the rules of the House; it was a duty for which they were particularly qualified, by their familiarity with the whole range of public expenditures constantly presented to their view. He would be glad to see an annual report from that committee, presenting, in one clear and comprehensive view to the country, an exhibit of all the expenditures of the several Departments of Government, civil, military, commercial—with the considerations which recommend their continuance or discontinuance: thus public attention would be attracted to abuses if they existed, and, if not, misrepresentation and unfounded complaints would be silenced.

Mr. BLAKE said: Mr. Speaker, the question is not whether the national debt should be extinguished, but whether the present Administration is an extravagant and prodigal one or not. Before I left my constituents, to discharge the duty they had been pleased to assign me in this House, I had heard repeatedly and frequently that the patronage of the Administration had become alarmingly extensive—that the officers in various Departments under them received higher salaries than their services entitled them to, and that the disbursements of the public money were prodigal, and menacing to the liberty of the country. These complaints were not made generally without assigning a responsibility, but they were all charged upon the Administration; they helped to swell the catalogue of misrepresentation and complaint against the present incumbents in the high offices of the Government. Those distinguished individuals were represented as setting an example of extravagance, of nourishing and extending the evil to the community around them at the public expense; and their conduct generally, it was emphatically said, was incompatible with the true character of a Republic, sustaining and recommending the notion that this Government should be splendid and profuse like the old Governments of the other hemisphere. That the gentleman from Kentucky has introduced his resolution, and presented the subject seriously before the House, is therefore matter for rejoicing. I shall support an inquiry into these charges most willingly. Let the resolution be adopted, let the investigation be proceeded in, and pushed thoroughly—let the gentleman and those who may be assigned to aid him, have every assistance from this House, so that the inquiry may be conducted to the greatest advantage. If it be the fact, that this is such a wicked and unprincipled Administration as it is represented, let that fact be made appear and reported to us, and let every member of it tremble for the consequences that will await him from a betrayed and indignant people. But if it be mere fiction, originating in the heated minds of political zealots, let that fact also appear, and let a generous acknowledgment be made. And, sir, I trust that there is in this House a sense of generosity, a spirit of chivalry, which under all circumstances, will support its honor, and induce it to redress the calumniated and the injured. Sir, I cannot vote for all the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, but for that one which is retained in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, which contemplates an inquiry whether any retrenchment be necessary or not. The other resolutions which precede it, state it as a fact that abuses do exist, and I am unwilling to sanction such an admission by my vote, until I have some evidence that they do exist. So far as he contemplates an inquiry, I will go with the gentleman from Kentucky, but I cannot admit any loose and unsupported charges; nor am I as yet prepared to say that retrenchment is necessary—that the salaries of officers are exorbitant, and that abuses exist in the disbursement of the public money. Sir, we were told yesterday about the West Point Academy, and that the manner in which it was supported was a reflection on the present Administration. It is true that the Administration has sustained and nourished that Institution. And why so? Did the Institution originate with the present Administration? No, sir. It was recommended by the illustrious Washington, so frequently and deservedly called the Father of his Country, was established by Congress in the second year of the administration of Mr. Jefferson, and, from first to last, has been protected and cherished by every Administration. If it be an improper establishment, and one calculated to undermine the political institutions of the country, let not the blame be attributed to the present Administration, but to those who have gone before it. We are told by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. MITCHELL,) that it is a place for the education of the sons of rich men, and that the sons of poor men do not participate in its benefits. Since the remark was made by the gentleman, I have inquired particularly into the facts, and I have learnt enough to satisfy me that the gentleman has been misinformed—that he is mistaken—that the appointments are distributed without regard to the pecuniary circumstances of the parent of the applicant—that the sons of the poor as well as the rich have received them—that it is enough to know that the youthful candidate is one of promise, and that the district in which he resides has not received its full complement; and these facts being established, the Secretary appoints without regard to the exploded qualification of family rank.

Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to say that a general retrenchment is absolutely necessary—that there are more officers employed here than are required by the public interest. If such was the case, I am inclined to believe that the distinguished individuals at the head of the Government, would have recommended the measure. My opinion of those gentlemen is very different from that which the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) appears to entertain of them. I believe them to be as intelligent, as honest, as patriotic, as any set of men at the head of any Government in the world, and that we have cause to rejoice that they are our countrymen, and have been placed at the helm. If justice should not be done them now, posterity will do them justice; but I hope, and trust, and believe, that the present age will do them justice, notwithstanding the many predictions and appearances to the contrary; and, sir, as it relates to my humble fortunes, I cheerfully and fearlessly peril them in the same barque, and am willing to sink or swim with the cause of the present Administration.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said he owed it to the subject to express his satisfaction that this matter had been introduced into the House; and, said Mr. W., I may be permitted, I hope, to congratulate the country on the auspicious prospects which now appear to attend the proposed inquiry. So long ago, sir, as the 18th of May, 1826, I presented to the House a proposition having in view the same object with that avowed by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CHITRON.) A reference to the Journal of that day will show a proposition introduced by me, to amend the rules of the House, so as to raise a standing committee on retrenchment, whose express duty it should be to examine into the mode and manner in which business was transacted in the various public offices, to ascertain any abuses that existed, and suggest the proper remedies, and propose measures calculated to promote economy in the transaction of public affairs. The proposition met with little favor then, and I was unable to get it off from the table. I am glad to see many gentlemen, from whom I then received neither aid nor countenance, anxious to promote the measure now. I then preferred a general Standing Committee, because, in looking over the duties assigned to the various committees of the House, I was afraid that this, as I then thought, and still think, important subject, would be neglected by committees charged with so many other duties. At the last session of Congress, sir, thinking that, if I directed my efforts to one single subject, I might be more successful, I offered a resolution directing an inquiry into the expenditure of the contingent fund of this House. In looking over the items of expenditure connected with it, I thought many of them extravagant

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

and unnecessary, conducing more to the convenience of members than to the advancement of the public interest. I thought retrenchment ought to be made, and that it was proper the work should begin here, in this House. This project failed, as did the other. I am really gratified that the subject is now here under different auspices, and that the present proposition meets much more favor than either of mine did.

I have, sir, still another cause to congratulate myself that this subject is introduced in the House at this time, and under the present auspices. The present President of the United States has recommended it to your consideration in his two last messages. This shows the subject is not a new one, brought forward for the first time by the gentleman from Kentucky. The President, in his Message to Congress, in December, 1826, says: "It is well for us, however, to be admonished of the necessity of abiding by the maxims of the most vigilant economy, and of resorting to all honorable and useful expedients, for pursuing, with steady and inflexible perseverance, the total discharge of the debt." In the Message of December, 1827, he says: "The deep solicitude felt by all classes throughout the Union, for the total discharge of the public debt, will apologize for the earnestness with which I deem it my duty to urge this topic upon the consideration of Congress; of recommending to them again the strictest economy in the application of the public funds."

Sir, if we really wish to retrench the public expenditures, and reform existing abuses, we have reason to felicitate ourselves on the prospect of doing something; and I have reason to be satisfied that a measure which, when brought forward by me, wholly failed to find favor, and which, when earnestly and repeatedly recommended to our consideration by our present excellent and vigilant Chief Magistrate, under the injunctions of the constitution, could not attract the attention of the House, or draw out one friend of economy and reform in its favor, has now drawn to its support the aid of many gentlemen, from different sides of the House. I hope something will now be done. I have supposed that, in some of the many public offices to which the business of the nation is assigned, there is extravagances and abuses that need remedy; but I owe it to candor to say, I am unable to say precisely where the extravagance or the abuses can be found. I want the subject inquired into by a competent committee, and fully probed to the bottom. Give us information and light, and if reform be needed, let us reform. I entertain the opinion that this duty would be better performed by the able, experienced, and diligent Committee of Ways and Means, than by any Select Committee which may be raised, composed, probably, of new members. Gentlemen must be more fortunate than I have been, if, in visiting the offices on business, they can find their way through the different official ramifications of the offices; and they will, I fear, make slow progress in searching for abuses where they are ignorant of the routine of business. If gentlemen will advert to the duties devolved by the rules of the House on the Committee of Ways and Means, they will find that, among other things, that committee is required "to inquire into the state of the public debt, of the revenue, and of the expenditures, and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon; and to examine into the state of the several public Departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with those laws; and also, to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the Departments, and the accountability of their officers." This committee, then, is the proper committee; its members are familiar with the whole subject, many of them are old members; they have long contemplated the whole routine of public business in the offices, and can act speedily and efficiently. They know where to strike; from them I should expect something; but I should not feel the same confidence in a Select Committee. I hope, therefore, the reference will be to that committee; but if that is refused, I will vote for a Select Committee.

Sir, it has become fashionable, in various parts of the House, for gentlemen to rise and to proclaim their desire to do the public business and go home; and I will avail myself of this occasion, lest I should not be favored with another, to say, that it is also my desire to do the public business and return home. I am willing to engage in doing the public business, and work at it, and when done, to go home. But I am not willing to go home before we have made some effort to do the public business, even if we fail in accomplishing it. What have we done? The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) has told us the session is half over. We have passed a law appropriating money to pay ourselves, but what else have we done? Let gentlemen examine into the business done, and they will find we have passed no other act. Let us not go home and leave the public business, but do it, and then talk of going home. If I understand the gentleman right, (and I always listen to him with pleasure,) he avowed himself favorable to retrenchment and reform, but thought it not the accepted time to engage in that work. Why is it not the accepted time? If I seek an answer in the remarks of the gentleman, I find nothing but the observations alluded to, that the session was half through, and we ought to do the public business and go home. Is the gentleman content that we infer from this that retrenchment and reform is not the public business? Surely he would not admit that. We have done nothing—there must be some public business done before we go home. What are we to do? This, sir, is public business—let us engage in it. Let us retrench—ferret out abuses, if any exist—and reform. The gentleman has declared that he is no friend to the Administration. I declare I am a friend to the Administration; and I am for engaging in this measure—which has been repeatedly pressed upon us by the President—and correcting any abuses that shall be found to exist. I will go with the gentleman in this work. Begin the inquiry; and if we are unable to accomplish our object before the close of the session, I will go farther, and empower the committee to send for persons and papers, and allow them to sit here during the whole recess of Congress, if necessary, that we may have the information at the commencement of the next session of Congress, in time to act on it then. Let us go to work, and stick to it from morning to night, and try to do some of the business before us.

The Chief Magistrate was a candidate for reelection; the people should be informed if these charges are true. An issue is made up and submitted to the decision of the people, and before they are called on to pronounce the guilt or innocence of this officer, they should be furnished with the evidence—all the evidence on the subject. The gentleman from Virginia, entirely over the way, (Mr. FLOYD,) supposes the friends of the Administration are opposed to retrenchment, and to the reduction of the public debt. Sir, I know of no such opposition of the friends of the Administration. No one has avowed any such feelings. The supposition is groundless, altogether gratuitous. The friends of the Administration are friendly to retrenchment: but if they were not, if any friends were opposed, I have shown in the extracts I have read, that the Cabinet and President are in favor of both.

Sir, we have been told of great extravagances and of many abuses—but no one has been specified. I regret that this is not the case. Tell us where the abuses are to be found—what officers' salary should be reduced. Is it that of the Postmaster General? Will any gentleman say his salary is too great a compensation for the various and arduous duties devolved upon him? If he does, let him satisfy me of the fact, and I will unite to reduce his pay. But how can the Administration be chargeable with waste and extravagance? They can expend no money except on the appropriations of Congress; and what laws have we passed, since the commencement of the present Administration, to increase expenditures or salaries, except that of the Postmaster General? I recollect none. If then, there is waste and prodigality, and extravagance, it originates and continues here. Point out the extravagant object, and withhold the appropriation. We are to blame—we hold the purse strings of the nation, and I am not disposed to surrender them, and we can close and open the purse at pleasure. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) speaks of visionary and extravagant projects. Does he rank among the visionary and extravagant projects that introduced by himself, to establish a new Government at the mouth of the Columbia, or Oregon River? I formerly went with him in favor of that bill, but he says so much of visionary schemes, that I begin to doubt if that be not one.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to amend the amendment proposed by Mr. TAYLOR yesterday, by striking out all after the word "that," with which it commences, and inserting as follows:

"The Committee on Public Expenditures be directed to examine into the manner in which the moneys appropriated to defray the expenses of foreign intercourse have been expended, and that the Committees on the several Executive Departments be directed to inquire into the manner in which the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of those Departments have been expended; and that the said several committees do make special report to this House, as far as they can ascertain the facts touching the matters before stated."

In support of this amendment, Mr. McDUFFIE said, it was with no affectation he declared his sincere regret at the introduction of this matter, and at the course the discussion of it had taken. I was fully convinced, from the beginning, said Mr. McD., that no subject could be stirred in this House, bearing either directly or indirectly on the two great parties militant now in the field of political warfare, that would not interfere most injuriously with the appropriate legislative business of Congress. It was this conviction that caused me to do every thing in my power to arrest this debate at its commencement, and to regret that the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) to lay the resolution on the table—a regret in which, I have no doubt, the House must, by this time, participate—did not prevail. But we have now fully got into the discussion. All attempts to avoid it have been defeated by the concurrence of both sides of the House; and so far as it can be considered a party question, a portion of both parties appear to have rushed into it. So far as my conduct is concerned—whether as it relates to my duties as a Representative of the people, or as a member of a party—I would have it distinctly understood that I shall, in this matter, act upon my own grounds and upon my own opinions.

In the first place, then, I think it proper to say, that I do not regard it as becoming the dignity of this House, or as consistent with the public interest, which it is our special duty to promote, to entertain jurisdiction of any question which is either intended or calculated to have a political bearing upon either of the two parties that now divide the country. Unfortunately for the public interest, we have too much reason to apprehend the undue and improper infusion of party politics into the discussion of those legislative measures which it is our duty to consider. Under this impression, I entered upon the business of this Congress with a fixed purpose of avoiding any reference to this Administration, farther than was indispensably necessary to the proper discharge of my duty

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

in relation to those public measures which belong to the legislation of Congress. But, sir, I presume I shall obtain credit when I say that, if it shall ever become my duty to make any movement here tending to implicate this Administration, I shall openly and distinctly avow my purpose. Believing it, however, to be incompatible with the interest of the country to carry on this discussion, either for the purpose of inculcating or exculpating the Administration, I sincerely hope it will be speedily terminated: for, as to any other object, it must evidently end in nothing. No practical result can possibly grow out of it the present session. With regard to the number of officers existing under this Government, and the salaries they now enjoy, I would remark, in the first place, that the present Administration cannot be fairly made responsible, but to a very small extent, for the one or the other. The offices were created, with a few exceptions, and their salaries fixed by law, before this Administration came into power. A proposition to limit the number of these officers, or to curtail their salaries, ought not, therefore, to be debated as a question affecting the present incumbents of the Executive Government. That certainly is not the point of their responsibility. On the subject of the proposed retrenchments, I differ entirely from the mover of the original resolution. The true mode of effecting reforms really and extensively beneficial to the country, is not by lopping off public officers with an indiscriminating hand, and curtailing salaries without a due regard to the importance of the duties for which they are paid. This is at best but a very small business. No saving worth the discussion could be effected by it. If any thing salutary is to be done, it must be a general and systematic reform of the system which regulates and controls the disbursement of the public money. An effective system of responsibility might save millions in the public expenditures; I make this general remark without any reference to the actual operations of the Government, so far as they are connected with the present Administration. But I will state for the information of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CHILTON,) and for the purpose of illustrating the view I am presenting, that there are two of the Executive Departments, as well organized, both with reference to the efficient performance of the duties belonging to them, and to the strict observance of economy in the disbursement of the public money, as any Departments ever were organized in any Government on earth. I refer, sir, to the Department of War and that of the General Post Office. Yes, sir, it is susceptible of the clearest demonstration, the system of strict accountability introduced into the War Department by the late Secretary of War, effected an annual saving of at least one million of dollars in the expenses of the Military Establishment, independent of the reduction of the Army. The improvements introduced into the Post Office Department, have added, in a manner not less striking, to its usefulness and economy. Since that Department was committed to the management of the excellent, and able, and faithful officer who now presides over it, an increase of half a million of dollars has been added to its annual revenue, while the facilities for the transmission of intelligence by the mail, throughout every portion of the Union, have been increased two or three-fold. And how, sir, were these signal improvements effected? By diminishing the number of the officers connected with those Departments? So far from this being the case, the number of officers was as much increased as was necessary for a proper distribution of duties and division of responsibility. To each officer was assigned his appropriate duty, and the officer whose duty it was to control and check the disbursing officers, had no agency in making the disbursement. To the complete success of this system in the Post Office Department, a considerable increase of clerks has been indispensable. And I was informed the other day by the Postmaster General, that one single clerk had been the means of saving fifty thousand dollars, I think, in the postage of newspapers alone. What are we to infer from these facts on the subject we are discussing? I will tell you, sir. As it is apparent that no beneficial reforms have ever yet been introduced that did not proceed from the chief officers of the Executive Departments, so may we justly infer, that no important improvements ever will, or ever can be made, without at least the aid and co-operation of those officers. If we have not at the head of those Departments, able, efficient, and practical men—men, sir, who have a talent for business—I will not say for action, lest I should be misconstrued, as on another occasion, to mean military action—unless, in a word, we have men eminently qualified, not only to talk about public business, but to do it successfully, it will be in vain for this House to attempt any thing like a beneficial reform in relation to the expenditure of the public money. It must be obvious, I think, from these views of the subject, that it will never answer any good purpose, to go blindfold into the business of reform, cutting off indiscriminately this officer and that, without a thorough and comprehensive knowledge of the whole system, and the relation which the officers in question bear to that system. So far, therefore, as the resolution of the honorable member from Kentucky proposes a reduction of officers, or a decrease of their salaries, and that seems to be its principal aim, I repeat my opinion, that the inquiry must end in nothing. We should only send a committee of this House a tilting against shadows. With what consistency, sir, could any committee of this House recommend a reduction of the number of Executive officers, when, at the very last session, Congress authorized, by law, an increase of the number employed in almost every one of the Executive Departments? I cannot, therefore, consent to indulge the peculiar views of any member on either side of the House so far as to consume the time of this House, which ought to be devoted to the ordinary business of the session, in what must evidently prove to be an unprofitable inquiry, and worse than an unprofitable discussion. I have no idea, sir, of converting this hall into an arena for conducting a political canvass. A few words, sir, with regard to the amendment I have offered.

It appears from the very large vote recently given against laying the resolution on the table, including both parties, that the House deem an inquiry necessary and proper. The friends of the Administration seem to regard such an inquiry necessary to exonerate the Administration from the imputations supposed to be cast upon them. Now, I am clearly of the opinion, that, if we go into an inquiry at all, it should not be mere children's play. If we are to prosecute an inquiry into the alleged or the possible abuses of the Government, let us direct that inquiry, specifically, to those parts of the system where such abuses are most likely to occur. Though I will never sanction the injustice of making this Administration responsible for the extent of the peace establishment, civil and military; yet the application of the various contingent funds placed at their disposal, is a very different matter. I perceive the gentlemen on the other side of the House are very prompt to meet this as an attack on the present Administration, and to insist upon an inquiry, with a view to their defence and exculpation. I would suggest to those gentlemen, that, if their object is to whitewash the Administration, they can accomplish it only by giving the inquiry a direction such as I have proposed. All the other points of inquiry that have been suggested, are perfectly immaterial, so far as this Administration is concerned. But if there has been any thing extravagant or improper in the application of the contingent fund, they ought to be held responsible for it. I have no knowledge as to the manner in which this fund has been employed, particularly as relates to diplomatic agents and messengers sent abroad. I have, however, seen it repeatedly stated in the public prints—and I can make the matter no more notorious by stating it here, or I would not state it—that a distinguished editor of a newspaper in Virginia, received from the contingent fund about 1,700 dollars, for going to Buenos Ayres on public business, when, in fact, he went to Europe on his own. Abuses of this kind, if they exist, ought surely to be exposed and corrected. If they do not exist, it is due to the officers implicated, that the truth should be presented in an authentic form to the public. I think the contingent fund a very proper subject of investigation, without any reference to alleged abuses. There should be an annual scrutiny by the committees of this House into the application of all the contingent funds, and the scrutiny cannot be too minute. Sir, I was anxious to get rid of this subject altogether; but, as it has been forced upon us from all sides of the House, I cannot consent to it only in the specific and practical form indicated in the amendment I have submitted.

Mr. RANDOLPH addressed the Chair. That has arrived, (said he,) which must have been foreseen by every member yesterday, whether he voted for or against the motion to lay this resolution on the table. This House is converted into an electioneering arena. I should not, permit me to say, before I go any farther, have inquired of the gentleman from Ohio "over the way"—I will not say out of the way—at which of the two gentlemen from Virginia who had spoken on this subject he levelled his remarks, if he had not responded to the inquiry of my colleague that he did not intend them for him: and, as at my call he declares that he did not intend them for me, I leave it to that other gentleman from Virginia, whoever he may be, who has spoken on this debate, to take them to himself.

[Here Mr. WRIGHT asked permission to explain—but Mr. RANDOLPH refused to yield the floor for that purpose.]

But, (continued Mr. R.,) if the gentleman meant my colleague, (Mr. FLOYD,) to my colleague I relegate the gentleman, being well satisfied that he could not be in better hands. Yes, sir, with this thing I have done forever. I will not be provoked, nor will I suffer myself to be induced to enter into personalities with any man upon this floor; but I do know that the newspapers have it in their power, and, whether designedly or not, they do exercise that power, of giving to my remarks a pungency and an application, which, as made by me, they were divested of—I refer now to a late and notorious occasion.

And now, sir, let me call the attention of the House to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, and the peculiar state of things in which we are. I will vote for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, but, if it is adopted, I shall vote against the resolution, as amended. I was sent here to discharge the duties of a Representative to the best of my ability, for the good of those whom I represent; and that duty I shall discharge, undeterred by calls of yeas and nays, and by the bugbears and hobgoblins which may be conjured up of any supposed responsibility—undismayed by any fear of imputations of suppressing inquiry, or of conniving at public abuses—insensible to any imputations of throwing out against Government charges which I am not prepared to establish. I shall vote against the resolution, fearless of consequences, and the motives upon which I vote I will avow to my constituents, and in the face of the world. I have never yet refused to do so, under much more trying circumstances than the present—for, in proportion as the atmosphere presents nothing but clouds and darkness to the view of the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. BLAKE,) so to me the aspect of it exhibits indications of returning sunshine. No, sir, I shall not be deterred. I shall do whatever I think right—and when I say so, I do not say that others will not—far from it—I will not vote for any proposition, whether from friend or from foe, which I think calculated to injure the great cause of the people of these United States. No, sir, no gloss that can be given to my words, no coloring whatever that may be put upon my conduct, shall induce me to say aye when I am inclined to say no, or no when my feelings prompt me to say aye. I may stand alone. I have been in small minorities under the first of the present dynasty, and I have been in a minority under the second, and it is very possible I may be in a minority now—but that will make no difference to me.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, it is a received maxim of the common law, drawn from the only fountain of wisdom, experience, (and the experience of ages,) that no man shall be trusted to try his own cause, or be a witness in his own case. It is on the application of that wise and salutary maxim to our present situation, that I say no to this inquiry. I say no. The gentleman from Indiana has told us that, for his part, he is willing to sink or to swim with the Administration. He has nailed his colors to the mast. Sir, I admire his gallantry, but he must pardon me if I have no wish to sink along with him, or, what is worse, to sink the cause in which I am embarked against him, by agreeing to any measure, prudent or imprudent, concerted or unconcerted, matured or precipitate, which any new or any old member may throw into this House. I say to that gentleman, and to others, that, as soon as they give us the helm, we are responsible, and not before, for the safety of the ship. But I will not consent to inflate her sails—I will not consent to impel her canvas—I will not consent to work like a galley slave at pulling the oar, while she has a helmsman who may at any time he pleases run her on a shoal, and make me responsible for the result. No, sir, I will be content to wait. I will wait, sir, until a factious majority of the people of the United States, who have returned a factious majority to the other House, and as I hope to this also, shall have elected a factious President. Sir, you had scarcely taken your seat in that chair, before one of the master spirits of the times sneeringly said to us, I wish you joy, you are now the majority in both Houses, and you are responsible for the measures of Government. I cry you mercy, Master Stephen, I cry you mercy—we are not, and do not mean to be thus responsible; and for that very reason, because we do not, I shall vote against this measure, and against any other out of the ordinary routine of business, that may be brought up. Sir, with the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) I am for masks off. And now what do you mean to do? Do you mean, as the gentleman from South Carolina said, to send to a man, who is both witness and judge in his own case—and in using this language, it may be said that I am making implications against illustrious and great men, to whom the people of the United States, and a just posterity, and even the present age, will not fail to do justice. Sir, I do no such thing—I make no other implication than that which every free and wise people make against our common nature—I do say, it would be requiring more of parties implicated, than can justly be demanded from human nature, and therefore at least as much as can fairly be demanded of them, to ask them to decide in this case. You are requiring men, whose political existence hangs by a single hair, and who have already the risus Sardonius of political death upon their countenance—for it was with a Sardonic sneer that we were told that we had become responsible for the measures of the Government; you are required to call upon them to do any thing which may have an effect to hasten that event. Sir, I will do no such thing. I will not call upon them. And why not? Because I may, by possibility, by that call, put it in their power to protract a little longer their political lives. I say by possibility; and that is a possibility which I am determined to avoid. No, sir, if this House is to be converted into a political arena, and I shall be accused as one of the gladiators, whether the man with the trident or him with the net, I do not say, I am clear that we should so speak that every man, woman, and child, in the United States, shall be able to understand our drift. I then shall call upon the present men in power for nothing that can, directly or indirectly, enable them in the smallest degree to affect the great question which is now at issue between them and the people of the United States, in which, as interested parties, I will take none of their evidence that I can avoid.

I believe I have, by this time, pretty well explained my object. Sir, what should we have said, thirty years ago, of one of that party, to which I had the honor to belong, as the youngest and most humble member, if he had brought forward a proposition, unconsulting and unconsulted, which might give the adverse party some color to their sinking cause, and put it in their power to live one more term? But, sir, I have another objection to the resolution. The public mind is in a state of excitement, such as must ever exist on the eve of a great political battle. And, sir, I should as soon look for perfect calmness and composure on the eve of a battle of another sort, or rather after the fight has begun, as that such an investigation should now be conducted with that patience and deliberation which it demands. Sir, the adverse party would gladly catch at such a resolution. In the time to which I have referred, the ruling party, for they held their majority in both Houses to the last, did catch at some such straws: they were drowning men—drowned they are. I had intended to have said something as to the challenges so boldly made, to point out the offices that ought to be abolished, and the expenditures which ought to be retrenched. But I feel my strength unequal to my purpose. But I must say, that in the affair of the Panama (since called the Tacubaya) mission, not only new offices were created, but new doctrines were started in reference to the Executive prerogative, which were wholly unknown to the constitution and to the practice of the predecessors of the present Chief Magistrate; and I will tell my worthy colleague, (Mr. FLOYD,) if he will permit me, that there has been an improvement on his plan of sending Ministers abroad, and bringing them back when they have finished their business: for they are now sent abroad on sleeveless errands, that they may come back, re infecta, to pocket their emoluments. Is not this the fact? Sir, we have had (to say nothing of Tacubaya) two missions to England under this Administration; one of them was a complete abortion; and as to the other, what has it done for the public good? what object has it accomplished? We were told by the very accurate gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) whom I always hear with pleasure, that these missions were justified on the ground that the acquisition of South America had created a swarm—I believe that was the word—of Diplomatic appointments. So much the worse for us, sir. Are we, whenever a nation, great or small, changes its relations to another nation, and becomes independent of that other nation, instantly to send off Ambassadors to it? Are we to make use of the incident as a pretext for increasing that patronage which all profess to wish to diminish? But we are told that the President has recommended to us economy and retrenchment. Yes, sir, he did recommend them, in one of those lofty generalities with which all sermons, political or religious, abound, which might be printed in blank, like law process, and filled as occasion might require. But I, sir, am for looking at the practices, and not the precepts of the parson, political or religious. I suppose, sir, our good friends the Greeks—yes, sir, suppose that the Greek—who is Græculus auriens, the same animal now that he was in the time of Juvenal, except that he is less enlightened and refined—should succeed in throwing off the Turkish yoke—"the faith-keeping Turk"—I suppose we must have an Ambassador sent to every islet and nest of pirates in the Ægean, sir—we must send one to Hydra—one to the Continent—and one, I presume, to each of the Cyclades. So that, if my friend from Virginia, who is a medical man, will permit me the phrase, the disease, instead of being contagious, will be sporadic—as, indeed, it now is—and highly malignant.

Sir, I have never seen but one Administration, which, seriously, and in good faith, was disposed to give up its patronage, and was willing to go farther than Congress, or even the people themselves, so far as Congress represents their feelings, desired—and that was the first administration of Thomas Jefferson. He, sir, was the only man I ever knew or heard of, who really, truly, and honestly, not only said, "nolo episcopari," but actually refused the mitre. It was a part of my duty, and one of the most pleasant parts of public duty that I ever performed, under his recommendation—not because he recommended it, thank God!—to move, in this House, to relieve the public at once from the whole burden of that system of internal taxation, the practical effect of which was, whatever might have been its object, to produce patronage rather than revenue. He, too, had really at heart, and showed it by his conduct, the reduction of the national debt, and that in the only mode by which it ever can be reduced, by lessening the expenses of the Government till they are below its receipts. Sir, there is no witchcraft in that—no, sir—no witchcraft at all—no more in paying a public than a private debt. You may have sinking funds, as many as you please, and never so vast a financial apparatus; but, if you spend more than you have, you will be in debt to the end of the world. Sir, so far from fearing any injurious effect from the too rapid payment of the national debt, I would pay the three per cents now—Yes, sir, I would pay them at par, if necessary—for it could only prove that money is worth but three per cent. Sir, I was the humble instrument of introducing the first efficient sinking fund, by setting apart a given sum of $7,800,000, which ever operated to reduce the national debt. When that debt was increased by the acquisition of Louisiana—aye, sir, the acquisition of Louisiana!—and who was for and who was against it then?—who pronounced the acquisition unconstitutional, and declared, in the other House, that we had no right to tax the people of that country?—the sinking fund was then raised to eight millions. Since that time, owing to the debt created by the expenses of the war, it has been raised to ten millions. The gentleman from New York (Mr. TAYLOR) himself admitted—and I thank him for it—(he was obliged to admit it, and therefore, perhaps, my debt of gratitude is the less)—that the sinking fund has not been faithfully applied to its object. Sir, I said, in some hasty remarks, when the gentleman interrupted my colleague, (Mr. FLOYD,) that applying surplus balances to make up what had been pillaged from the sinking fund, was robbing Peter to pay Paul. No, sir, it is no such thing—it is robbing Peter to pay Peter—it is robbing the sinking fund to pay the sinking fund: for, as it has been over and over again said, the sinking fund has not only a right to its own modicum of $10,000,000, but it is residuary legatee besides; it takes all the surplus, whatever that may be, as its own, and you never can give it any thing in return for that of which you rob it, except out of that surplus which was already its own. Can't give it any more. Your giving surplus balances to eke out the sinking fund, is nothing more than like the false guardian, who, when he comes to settle his accounts, pays off his debts to his

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

ward with the money out of which he has cheated him.

We are asked by the gentlemen, why do you not specify? Particularize! particularize! Show us the particulars! You give us a sum total without any items, as Mr. Sterling says in the play. Will the gentleman have one? Sir, I will give you one of them. The House will give me that credit which I demand. It is only my due. I did state that, if we begin this system of reform, it ought to begin, like modern charity, at home. Sir, I never pretended that the House was not answerable for abuses as well as any other branch of the Government. Now for one item of them. Sir, at the first session I was on this floor—it was the last Congress of the first Mr. Adams—whether this will be the last of the second I cannot say—I find this item in the list of appropriations: For the expenses of fire-wood, stationery, printing, and all other contingent expenses of Congress, twenty-one thousand six hundred and sixty-four dollars and forty cents. This sum, sir, covered the expenses of both Houses, and included, besides, the extraordinary expense, and furnishing each member with a complete copy of the Journals of the old Congress. This House then consisted of one hundred and two members, one only of whom I see now left, (Mr. LIVINGSTON.) Now, we have 218 members. Then, according to the rule which has been introduced into this House—sir, by the simple rule of three, if 102 gives so much, what ought 218 to give? This item, be it remembered, included the expenses of the other body, but I shall confine myself now to the expenses of this body alone. For the present year, the total estimate for the contingent expenses of this House now differs but a trifle from ninety thousand dollars, of which, I am justified in saying, fifty thousand is for printing alone; and I have no hesitation in saying, sir, if the British Parliament paid for their printing by the same rule that we do, it is not five hundred thousand dollars—which we are told exceeds the whole annual expenses of Congress—but that is not my statement, remember—that will defray their printer's bill. No, sir, and it is not for me to say what will defray it. I happen to have had an opportunity of seeing a good deal of the printing of the British Parliament. It is not made up, like ours, of title pages and blanks, and broadsides of every thing and any thing—motions, petitions, bills, reports, resolutions, amendments, and every matter which can be brought into the House of Commons. No, sir, they go on and print closely; and where one line ends, another begins, (I make no allowance for the high rates of living and wages in that country;) but I will let the House into the fact, that when the rate of printing for this body was settled, a printer—a worthy and honest man, as I believe—was a member of Congress. I speak from the information of one of the first men in the country. The rate was fixed during the depreciation of paper money, which I described yesterday, when every thing brought ten prices, and it has remained not unsettled. No, sir; for it has been regularly settled and paid ever since. It has remained, from that time to this, at the same rate—though one dollar now will buy as much of land, slaves, every article from which we draw subsistence, as four dollars would buy then. To illustrate this, I will state a fact. A gentleman whom I knew, owning a fertile, but, as he thought, an unhealthy tract of land, on the Roanoke, sold it, and purchased a small tract, on which he built a house that cost him five thousand dollars, and that sum will build what is considered a first-rate house in my part of the country. The land itself was not good, nor was it bad. It was what is called fair land. The state of his affairs, like that of many of his neighbors, soon obliged him to sell, and he sold the land, without any allowance for the improvements, for three dollars an acre. An acquaintance of mine was tempted, by the lowness of price, to purchase the farm; thus verifying the maxim of Poor Richard—that he who buys what he does not want, always buys it dear: and so it turned out in this case. If he wished to sell it now, he could not get his money back. This single fact was worth all the declamation in the world. In the same quarter of the country, land (some of it good woodland) has sold for one dollar per acre!

Sir, I have not done with this subject of the public printing, and the price paid for it. I do not mean to worry the House. It is well known to the members of this House (and I hope what I now say will be taken down verbatim, if possible)—that the public printers of this House are also the editors of the most extensive—I mean in point of superficial content—the most extensive journal in the United States, and one which, from having been hitherto considered as possessing a sort of at least demi-official character—something like the Moniteur, in Paris, but not exactly—and from observing, or rather professing to observe, a strict neutrality, had obtained a most extensive circulation at home, and by far the most extensive abroad, of any paper in this country. Now, sir, we also know, that this journal is our main stay and reliance for the reports of our debates, and the proceedings of this House. Sir, I make no inference, further than to say—I do not say that the political existence of these people hangs upon the event of the next election—the thread of their existence, like that of the gentleman from Indiana, is connected with that election—they sink with the Administration, having abandoned their professed neutrality, if it sinks; and, if it does not, they will certainly swim. I make no more imputations on them than that they have $50,000 per annum staked on the event—on a single card.

If the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina shall prevail, if I understand the matter of it, this item of expenditure ought to be included, as one over which we have complete control. I beg pardon, I should have suggested this before, but I knew that there was a committee of the House whose duty it was to audit its accounts, and to see that no improper items are admitted. I have pointed out one abuse, and I have done it where it was proper to point it out, at home. Sir, I have known of the existence of these evils for a long time. They were no secret to me, nor did I make a secret of them to any body; but I do know, that a man might calculate on as much success in going a tilting—not at shadows, as the gentleman from South Carolina says—not like the knight of La Mancha at sheep and windmills—but rather at a flock of mad cattle, pent up in a narrow lane, as to attempt to ferret out the abuses, without having the cordial co-operation of those who are at the head of the Departments; and that co-operation it would be worse than folly to pretend to look for. On that subject, sir, I declare the pleasure that it gives me to bear my testimony, such as it is, along with the gentleman from South Carolina, to the public services, the intelligence, the integrity, and the indefatigability of the officer who is at the head of the Post Office Department. I voted against increasing his salary. It is the only one of the Departments which I have lately had any thing to do with, and whenever I had occasion to go there, I have always found him in his office, and at his business. Sir, there was a time when I often had to visit the Departments, (which does not, however, affect the present Administration,) and then I seldom had the honor to find any of their high mightinesses at home—I mean, in their offices. Sir, we cannot expect the cordial co-operation of the heads of Departments in such an inquiry as is now proposed. They are pleading before the bar of public opinion for their lives, with a zeal proportioned to the strong evidence before the jury of their guilt.

I shall vote, however, for the amendment moved by the gentleman from South Carolina, and, if it prevails, I shall vote against the resolution as so amended. And let me, before I sit down, give one warning to all concerned. This country, as we all know, is divided into two adversary parties; and we must shut our eyes to the fact, if we do not know that this House is nearly, or quite, equally divided between them. Fus est ab hoste doceri. I see one of these parties, perfectly willing, no doubt, with the very great man to whom I have before alluded, to throw upon us the responsibility for whatever is done here, sitting perfectly still, steadfast, silent, and demure, bringing forward no proposition whatever. I see the other party throwing out proposition after proposition. The opposite party never commits itself until after a night's reflection. And what is the consequence? Though, I believe, a minority, they so manage matters, as on every question to constitute an effective majority of this House, and then throw on us the responsibility of their own measures. Sir, this is a new sort of political justice.

Again, I see most plainly, with the gentleman from South Carolina, that this inquiry will end in smoke—and I am not one who will light the fire, or help to raise a smoke by which a retreating adversary may cover and protect his retreat. I will afford them no facilities towards victory. I stand here pledged as their adversary, quoad hoc, and I will add another pledge to oppose any and every party who would impose on this country any man, as its Chief Magistrate, besides him who receives the greatest number of its votes. Sir, if we must amend the constitution, I shall not vote for a hereditary Chief Magistrate—I do not belong to that privileged class—the President of a minority is hardly less odious than a king—but I warn the House against any attempt at reform while the President is not with us. In the Seventh Congress, in spite of all Mr. Jefferson did, his measures were thwarted; and when was an Administration stronger? Then, with a House of Representatives so equally balanced as this, (and I take the vote for the election of Speaker as the indication of its state,) with the scale vibrating, nearly in equilibrio, it is almost impossible to be certain of a majority, let our measures be ever so well concerted. How could we get along, even if the Executive was on our side, acting against a solid phalanx who hold together—so perfectly united that we cannot cut off a single straggler, while we ourselves act more like raw undisciplined militia! Sir, I speak from experience. In the Seventh Congress, sir, we never could have got along, with the aid of the most popular President that ever lived, (except one,) without consulting before we acted. We were obliged to hold—I will not use a barbarous word which has become common throughout the country, and which I first heard in this body—but we were obliged to act in concert. And, sir, if we do not act in concert now, it is not we who will be responsible for the consequences. And how ought we to act in concert? Sir, by leaving this Government just in the course where we found it. We ought to observe that practice which is the hardest of all—especially for young physicians—we ought to throw in no medicine at all—to abstain—to observe a wise and masterly inactivity.* I am afraid, sir, said Mr. R., on resuming his seat, that I have not, on this occasion, added to my precept my example.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

SATURDAY, January 26.

Retrenchment.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions heretofore moved by Mr. CHILTON,

* The expression of Lord Chatham, often repeated by Mr. Randolph, and generally as a quotation from that supreme master in the use of the English language.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

together with the modifications proposed by Messrs. TAYLOR and McDUFFIE.

And the question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. McDUFFIE to the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR—

Mr. CARSON said: In that part of the rules of the House prescribing the duties of the several committees, the attention of the Committee on Public Expenditures is particularly directed to this subject, and it is made their duty to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether such moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws.

We find this duty in the 65th rule of this House, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Expenditures to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers."

Now, I did believe that the duties of that committee being of this nature, precluded the necessity of the resolution which was offered, and I further thought that this was a very improper time for its introduction—that it could be attended with no beneficial result to the community, and that its only effect would be to waste the time of this body, and produce electioneering speeches on this floor. I was mistaken, as has since been shown by the progress of the present debate. It appears that even gentlemen who have expressed a disposition to transact the public business and return home, have nevertheless been actuated by an anxiety of a political kind, to turn this matter to the benefit of one or the other of the great parties which now divide this country.

He had explained himself on this subject, to a gentleman from Ohio, in the folding room attached to this House a few days ago, where he was justified in saying, that he saw thousands of the celebrated Virginia Address, written by Chapman Johnson, folding to be sent to the North and to the West, and even to the South; and the hope, I understand, is entertained, that the old State of North Carolina, among others, is to be revolutionized by the effect of this address of Chapman Johnson. But, sir, I can tell those gentlemen, who expect this to be the result in North Carolina, that they will find themselves completely defeated in all their efforts to produce such a result. Sir, North Carolina has repeatedly been tried, and in every instance she has been true to herself, and done her duty. I mentioned to that gentleman that all such attempts were perfectly useless, and the reply I received was, "Though the chances are now for you, yet a reaction will speedily be brought about," and this subject is seized upon as one means to aid in producing that result. Sir, I do not care for this. No event in future is more certain, according to my judgment, than the election of General Jackson; but, let that be as it may, I wish to see no discussions on this floor, except such as are calculated to advance the good of the community, and that we may do the public business and go home, instead of remaining here, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has said, to feed upon the public Treasury.

Speaking of the establishment at West Point, permit me to make one remark. Among the items in the estimates for that institution, I find the following: "For compensation to 20 supernumerary Second Lieutenants, $15,100." Here are twenty young men who have been educated at the public expense, and who are now supported at their own homes, at an annual expense of $15,000. Sir, is this economy? I know that that institution was got up under a different Administration; but this application of the public money has been made by the present Administration, and it is one of those expenditures which ought to be considered in the present inquiry.

Mr. BARNEY said: While we confine ourselves, Mr. Speaker, to the legitimate duties devolved on us, we continue to be the representatives of 40,000 freemen; but that moment we condescend to become electioneering partisans, we resolve ourselves into units, one in the great mass of our countrymen, possessed of equal rights, and equally competent with ourselves to judge and decide on the important question, who shall become our next Chief Magistrate. I have resolved to steer clear of all party strife, but seek not to conceal my sentiments. I believe the present to be an honest Administration, ably administered. In Mr. Adams I behold a plain unpretending republican, who has enjoyed, in an eminent degree, the confidence of all his illustrious predecessors; incessantly devoting the energies of his vigorous intellect to the advancement of the best interests of his country; while the distinguished services of Gen. Jackson have encircled his brow with a wreath of never-fading glory, and embalmed him in the affections of a large portion of his countrymen. It remains with the only sovereigns, the people, to decide between their respective claims. It is not for me, nor for us, to interfere. We, too, are public servants, and have other important duties assigned to us. My maxim ever has been, and shall be—may the Administration of my country be always right, and while right may it be supported.

The gentleman from Tennessee has stated that there are twenty supernumeraries, graduates at West Point, now at their homes, unemployed. It is true, sir. Those young men, in four years devoted to study, are permitted but once to visit their families. After obtaining their degrees they generally receive a furlough of two or three months, which enables them to renew that intercourse, and rekindle that glow of affection to their parents and friends, which too long a separation might entirely alienate. Will any father say that this is extravagant indulgence? It is, however, probable, that at this present moment, there are not vacancies in the army to offer them immediate employment, but in a very short time they become merged in the Register, and cease to be supernumeraries. Having seen and known at West Point the destitute orphan son of a widowed mother, who was there educated, and is now one of the most distinguished Professors, I mention the fact, to convince my friend from Tennessee that its benefits are not monopolized by the children of the affluent and influential.

The gentleman from Virginia expressed great repugnance at the idea of a son of his receiving an education at West Point. He would rather he should make his mark, and not be able to read or write. Sir, were this a charity school, so would every man who had the means to educate his children out of his own purse. Do not those young men repay the debt of gratitude due to the nation? A well-organized army, well-constructed fortifications, are necessary to its defence. The elements of military science imparted to them become the property of their country, and are called into active requisition, in the construction of its fortresses and resistance to its enemies; and even should they return to the paths of civil life, in imparting their science to the militia, our nation's best bulwark, they thus contribute more essentially to its advantage than while in the tented field. I have never ranked, Mr. Speaker, among the radicals. I hope I shall not be deemed a prodigal, when desiring to be found among those liberal politicians disposed to cherish the existing institutions of our country, and by ample appropriations, commensurate with her resources, advance internal improvements, cherish your Army, your Navy, increase your national defences of every description; and thus accelerate the speed of the Republic in her march to the high destinies which await her, and which can only be arrested by a system of injudicious and wasteful parsimony.

Mr. DANIEL said: All resolutions of this description, whenever they are introduced, produce much good. They awaken all concerned to diligence and inquiry; abuses are searched out, and the cause of economy promoted. Yet, it has appeared strange to me, that gentlemen on this floor, while urging every argument they can think of against the resolution, tell us, at the same time, that they are strongly in favor of it. They declare that they are very much in favor of searching out abuses, though there are no abuses in the Government to search out, and though they are certain it will end in nothing, yet that they support it, and will vote for it. This course of argument appears to me strange. That abuses do exist, I have not the least doubt; if they do not, why do gentlemen oppose inquiry? Can any injury result from it? If the Administration be indeed as pure as some gentlemen seem to imagine, it ought to be their boast and pride that the search should be made, let it result as it will. They call upon us to point out the abuses. Many have already been pointed out. But, is this the time to call out for a detail of the abuses, when we are just appointing a committee to inquire if any abuses exist? They make a question, and answer it themselves. They tell us all is well. Every thing is as it should be. Well, sir, if so, let the inquiry go on. Let us see if the Administration is as pure as they would have us believe. I acknowledge that I am incompetent to point out the various abuses that may exist in a Government so complicated as ours. It is only from newspaper rumor that I derive my knowledge of it. And, if I am to believe what I see there, then I can have no doubt that there ought to be an inquiry. I could name some offices which have been created under this Administration. The Panama mission has cost us somewhere about $80,000 or $100,000. Has it resulted in any great benefit? A Minister was sent to England, who was perfectly superannuated, and wholly unable to perform any duty, and it was through this that we lost the West India trade, and this, in my opinion, was a great loss. There was another great abuse of power. This man was known, at the time, to be incompetent, and his mission cost us $80,000 or $40,000. We have had another Minister sent out since, who has returned without much benefit. There have been other abuses. Men have been paid for taking out despatches to our Ministers, who went out in the very ship with the Ministers themselves. I should certainly have thought, that the Ministers might have so far condescended, as to take charge of these documents themselves. Another instance of abuse is to be found in the outfits of our foreign Ministers. $9,000 per annum as salary, I should think, was an ample provision, without $9,000 outfit, especially when we furnish a vessel, and bear all the expenses of their transportation to the spot. This, in my opinion, is an item which calls for retrenchment, and, under the resolution, it can be reached. But, we not only give our Ministers outfits when they go out, but we must give them homefits when they come home. Was not this the case with young Mr. King? He had an outfit of $4,500, and yet his homefit was paid him within sixty days. Is there any example of this under other Administrations? Sir, it is enormous. It may appear a little sum, but it is very much if rightly considered. The expenditure of the public money in the Government at home, has been made the subject of equal abuses. In the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, the disbursement of $300,000 is attended with an expense of $50,000 or $60,000. Is there any one who cannot see that this is an abuse?

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, said: I am now glad to see a prospect of excitement being allayed by means of the resolution introduced by my friend from Kentucky. I preferred the original form of the resolution, however, since I think that the Committee of Ways and Means is the proper organ through whom this inquiry should be made. It will be recollected that, at the last session, the Secretary of the Treasury earnestly recommended the exchange of the sixteen millions of the present six per cent. stock of the United States for other stock, of a later date of payment, at five per cent., by which operation, had it been adopted, there would have been effected a clear annual saving of 160,000 dollars, and I consider it well worthy of consideration by the Committee of Ways and Means, whether such an exchange cannot still be effected. I preferred the first resolution, because it referred the inquiry to a committee which may justly be entitled the first in this House, and of which I am free to say, that, in its wisdom, application, and integrity, I entirely confide. I think the subject ought to be referred to that committee, and to no other. It is one of the peculiar subjects over which that committee is called to preside, by the Rules and Orders of this House; and although I should be loth to burthen the committee with unnecessary labor, yet I consider it of vital importance to call forth, in this inquiry, the first talents of the country. It is an investigation, which, from its own nature, cannot properly be executed unless by an individual intimately acquainted with all the operations of the Departments of this Government. The Committee of Ways and Means, in the regular discharge of their duty, have been compelled to acquaint themselves with the routine of business in the Departments. They have the knowledge and are familiar with it, and they could prosecute the inquiry with one-third of the labor that would be required by any other committee of the House; and when they should present a report, it would have far more of the confidence of this House, than if proceeding from any other quarter.

Sir, I have regretted to witness the character of this debate. Surely, this is a question which does not characterize party in this House. Surely, we have not yet arrived at that degree of mutual ill-will, and that disregard of all public justice, which, when abuses are to be investigated, arrays the members of this House in compact and opposite ranks, for and against any Administration, or for and against any Presidential candidate. Such a state of things were beneath the dignity of this House. Surely it becomes us all to do strict justice to him who administers the concerns of the country, be that individual whom he may. If, on the one hand, it is important to the welfare of this people that their Representatives shall drag forth into public view that man who violates their trust, and expose him to the infamy which he deserves, it is equally important, on the other, that they should measure out to him who has discharged that trust with laborious fidelity, a just reward.

I did not voluntarily misunderstand the gentleman, (Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee,) but the course of his remarks induced the belief that such had been his intention. The gentleman, however, must allow him to make a single remark on the manner in which cadets were introduced into the Military Academy. He seemed to suppose that the existence of that institution furnished, in itself, an evident proof of the correctness of his remarks, that, ever since the days of Mr. Jefferson, the state of the country and of the Government had been growing worse. He spoke of the days of Mr. Jefferson as emphatically the days of our prosperity, but the gentleman surely knew that the Military Academy was organized during those very days. When the gentleman said that its benefits were confined exclusively to the sons of the rich and of the "well-born," I do not know that I perfectly understood him. I had always supposed that all were well-born, who came of honest parentage. We have in this country no privileged orders. But the gentleman says, that none are admitted into that school, but the sons of the "well-born and of the wealthy." In this opinion, the gentleman is certainly mistaken. Unless I am greatly misinformed, (and I have my information through a very direct and creditable channel,) nine-tenths of those who have been admitted, and are now there, are not the sons of wealthy parents. I admit, however, that they are "well-born;" for, not only are they the sons of honest parents, but a large proportion of them are the sons of officers and soldiers who fell in the revolution and in the last war. If these are not fit subjects to receive the benefits of that institution, I am at a loss to conceive who ought to be so considered. Their parents were indeed poor, but they were honest and patriotic, and they shed their best blood for that liberty, and all those political blessings which the gentleman from Tennessee now enjoys, and which I hope he may long continue to enjoy. In the charge he made, he was certainly mistaken, and, if he will take the trouble to inquire, he will be satisfied of the fact.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, said: I rise merely to support the allegation which I made, which, to my mind, is as irrefragable, as the rock of Gibraltar is immovable. I said that the benefits of the Academy at West Point are given to some of the well-born, and as the gentleman professes not fully to understand the meaning of that expression, I will treat him with a dissertation upon it. None can abhor the word more than I do: for this is a Government where merit ought to rise, from whatever station it may proceed. But the Government has converged; the poor and humble are looked upon as "canaille," to use an expression of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) but the man possessed of thousands of dirty acres, (no matter how he may have got them,) is regarded as a person of consequence and consideration! It is the sons of these, and such as these, who are called the well-born. But there is a species of people among us whom the Government has fostered, even on this floor, who esteem wealth more than they do all the knowledge, talent, and virtue, of a sage. I acknowledge that property is a great blessing when bestowed by the munificence of Heaven upon men of talents and integrity, who consider themselves as stewards for the benefit of society; but there are others, in whose hands property is one of the greatest of curses. I hope that the gentleman, by this time, has a full view of what I meant by the term well-born. Sir, I know of no such thing as personal distinction, under this Government. I see, indeed, an attempt at it, but that attempt is odious to me, and to all who think as I do.

Now, sir, who are in this West Point Academy? One gentleman tells us that there is to be found the son of a widowed mother. Sir, I should be glad the gentleman would name him. I certainly never heard of such a one before. [The honorable member here named some of the youths who were at the Academy, whose names and parentage the reporter was not able to catch with sufficient distinctness to embody them in this report, commenting upon them as he went along.] Sir, I feel no enmity whatever towards those who conduct that institution. God bless them—they are in what they believe to be the course of their duty, and it is not with them that I find any fault. It is the institution which I hate, and I hate it for the reasons I have stated. From a district adjoining that of my colleague, there is a young man of wealth and splendor—but, sir, this proud soul of mine shall be bent as low as that point of degradation to which the Government seems likely to bring us all, before a son of mine shall be brought there. Notwithstanding I have the same privilege with other members, I should deem myself unworthy of the confidence of the hundred thousand souls who have sent me here as their Representative, if I could use that privilege in favor of any son of mine. Sir, my colleague did me no more than justice, when he said that I usually speak with caution in this House. Sir, I never speak unadvisedly; neither is it my desire or intention to hurt any one. I am, it is true, the son of a corrupt and fallen race, but my conscience does not reproach me with ever designing to speak what is wrong. In what I said of this Academy, I spoke from data, as I hope the gentleman also did when he told us about the son of a widow who had been received there. I know him not, and I protest before Heaven and this House, that it is my sincere belief that no son of a forlorn and destitute widow has ever been received there. But when I speak of a forlorn and destitute widow, I do not mean a woman who has merely lost her companion in life; by that description I understand a woman depressed by poverty, who has a family to maintain, and who is compelled, by necessity, to drudge from the morning to the night, (like the unwearied ant,) for her offspring. She is a forlorn widow, and I never yet heard of the son of such a one being recommended and admitted to the West Point Academy.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Pennsylvania, said: The supposed prodigality and extravagance of the Government for some time past, had afforded a rich theme for declamation throughout every part of the United States. Newspaper essayists had been clamorous on the subject. And where, he would ask, have we been told, we should find evidence of this prodigal expenditure of the public revenue? In the subordinate offices of the Treasury Department? No, sir. Where, then, are we told we should find it? In the East Room. There, it has been boldly asserted, would be found the glittering and costly representatives of thousands upon thousands of the public money. There, sir, we have been informed, we should find the most incontestable evidences of the extravagance and prodigality of the present Administration! And what is the fact? After being led by curiosity, or by the glaring light of this ignis fatuus, to its pretended location, what do we find? Nothing, except a few chairs, apparently of domestic manufacture, and of little value. He would beg leave to ask, what had gone with all this costly furniture, if it ever was there! As that constituted a very important part of the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means, which devolved upon them by a Rule of the House, he had no doubt they would inform us. For the purpose, then, of ascertaining whether such an unpropitious state of things did exist, in relation to the management of our financial concerns, he was willing that the inquiry should be made, and that the fact of their existence or non-existence should be disclosed. If a disease so alarming, and so malignant in its character, existed in the body politic, let a prompt and efficient remedy be applied, lest, by delay, the disease should become incurable. If reform was necessary, let us go to work promptly. If retrenchment in all or any of the Departments was required, let the fact be speedily ascertained, and the remedy applied. If, on the contrary, it should be found, on inquiry, that no reasonable ground of complaint existed, that all the subordinate offices were indispensably necessary for the despatch of the public business—that the salaries of the officers and clerks were not extravagant—let the public know it.

All his deliberations on the subject had led to the conclusion, that, as all those offices, about some of which so much had been said, had been established by legislative acts—that, as the salaries of the officers and clerks were fixed by law, and graduated, no doubt, by a due regard, as well to the public interest, as to the nature and importance of the services to

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

be rendered—it would be uncharitable in him to charge the Government with extravagance, unless he had better information, and stronger evidence of the fact, than could be derived from newspaper essays. He should not, he thought, be passing a very handsome compliment on the very able and highly distinguished predecessor of the present honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, should he be induced to make a charge so illiberal.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: As the House appears determined to pass some resolution upon the subject now before them, I shall take the liberty of making a suggestion in relation to the Military Academy at West Point. It is chiefly intended for the committee who may have charge of the resolution.

I cannot agree with some of the gentlemen who have addressed the House, that the Military Academy should be abolished. On the contrary, this Government, possessing the power of making war, and being under a solemn obligation to provide for the common defence, owe it to themselves and to the people of this country, to furnish them with the means of military instruction. War, especially in modern times, has become an art, nay a science, so extensive and so complex in its nature, that its theory can only be acquired after years of application. A Military Academy is the best plan which has ever yet been devised of communicating military instruction. It is true, that a few men of brilliant genius, have appeared in the world, who, without a military education, by mere intuition, have excelled in the art of war. These splendid exceptions ought not to detract from the general rule that a military education is necessary to make a skilful and efficient officer.

Gentlemen have complained, and I believe with justice, that there now are several supernumerary cadets. I would suggest the source of this evil to be, that the Military Academy is too large for the Army—or, if any gentleman will have it so, the Army is too small for the Military Academy. A just proportion does not exist between them. The supply of officers which the Academy furnishes is too great for the demand of an army not amounting to 6,000 men. This state of things gives birth to another evil. No man who now enlists as a private soldier in the Army, no matter what may be his capacity, or what may be his conduct, can ever expect to be promoted above the rank of a petty officer. He can never indulge the hope, which the policy and the practice of the wisest nations have sanctioned, that he may one day become a general officer. Every avenue to promotion is closed against him by the graduates at West Point, who always have the preference and are more than sufficient to furnish the army with officers.

Whether the Government, in addition to furnishing the means of a military education, ought to feed, and clothe, and pay the cadets, whilst they are receiving it, is a question well worthy of the attention of the committee to whom this subject may be referred. One thing is certain, that, whatever other sins may be fairly chargeable against the present Administration, they cannot be justly chargeable with the establishment of the Military Academy.

Admonition and Exhortation to Order.

The Speaker (ANDREW STEVENSON, Esq.) rose and addressed the House. He felt, he said, very deep regret at the personal and unpleasant character which the debate had assumed, and which, if continued, was calculated to have a baneful effect upon the character and deliberations of the House. The Speaker certainly could have no wish to restrict improperly, the freedom of debate. He had never attempted it; he never should; but at the same time he felt it a duty that he owed the House, the nation, and himself, to interpose the authority of the Chair in maintaining the order and dignity of the House, and in repressing personalities and recriminations, which could produce no other effect than deep excitement and personal altercations. In the eagerness of controversy, and the commotion of debate, it was often very difficult for the Chair to interpose successfully its authority in preserving order, and limiting debate; in cases of great or unusual excitement, it could never be done without the most prompt and vigorous co-operation of the House. In making these remarks, the Chair intended no allusion to any particular member of the House. He had risen to impress upon the House the necessity of enforcing order, and sustaining the Chair, and to entreat gentlemen, who might be disposed to mingle in the debate, to refrain from personal and recriminating remarks towards each other, and to confine themselves to the subject under consideration.*

MONDAY, January 28.

Retrenchment.

When the House adjourned on Saturday, a motion had been made by Mr. DORSEY to lay the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, together with the amendment thereto, on the table. On the opening of the debate this morning, Mr. DORSEY withdrew his motion, and the question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. BLAKE—

Mr. BUCKNER, of Kentucky, said: I have said that, when offered, I was prepared at once, and willing to aid the proposed inquiry. Yet, candor compels me to declare, that such a vote would not have been founded on any belief, or even suspicion, that there were such abuses as those pointed out. They may be: if so, they are not within my knowledge. As a friend of the Administration, there was no option allowed me, as to my vote. We occupy an entirely different attitude from gentlemen of the opposition. If they will exhibit accusations, and get up debates, however useless, by which that time is consumed which should be devoted to important business, it is not our fault. Situated as we are, it could not reasonably be expected that we would refuse to meet them. What was the resolution in substance, as originally offered? That the national debt should be speedily paid off; that, to effectuate this, a general retrenchment of public expenditures should be resorted to; that the number of officers employed in the public service should be lessened, and the salaries of those retained, diminished. In support of this, it was said by the mover, that there were sinecure offices, that we had departed from the republican simplicity of our ancestors; that the public money had been uselessly squandered, &c. Now, sir, whilst I admit that the public debt ought to be discharged at as early a period as possible, without detriment to other great national interests; and whilst willing to vote for an investigation of the alleged prodigality, I neither sanction it as correct, nor concur in the gentleman's argument. After all that was said by him, in general terms, about profusion, national bankruptcy, &c., what were his specifications? That the services of the Fifth Auditor might be dispensed with, the occasion for which that office was created having long since passed away. That our tables were every morning piled with useless documents, and reports as long as the moral law. Whilst he seemed to imagine that, to the gentlemen of the South and the North "rocked in the cradle of ease and luxury," this would be considered as a matter of little moment, in the West there was but one voice concerning it. Whatever, sir, there may be of prodigality of public money in this matter, it savors more of any thing else than luxury. But, if the gentleman so estimates it, let me assure him, that, throughout the session, he will have it in his power to indulge his appetite in all the luxury of a most delectable variety. Reports, and the testimony upon which they are founded, must be printed and laid before us, to enable us to determine correctly such claims as are presented to Congress. They are cases in which redress can be obtained, and justice done nowhere else. Many of them are for very large amounts of money or property. In such cases, are we to act blindfolded, and attempt to dispense justice at hap-hazard? Surely not. If, in any particular case, any gentleman believes that it would be useless or improper to print them, when the motion is made to have them printed is the time to oppose it.

* Every thing is omitted in this abridgment which led to this interposition of the Speaker.

Yet, sir, I am not not at all disposed to censure the gentleman who introduced the resolutions. He did so, no doubt, under honest convictions of their propriety—he had seen these charges of extravagance, of corruption in the disbursements of public money, repeated so frequently, in a thousand different shapes in the newspapers, by editors in various parts of the United States, from some of high standing, down to the curs of the very lowest degree, until he began to believe there must be some truth in it. However zealous a man may be in his pursuit of truth, even falsehoods may be repeated in his hearing so frequently and confidently, that at last they are received as truths. May I not now be allowed to indulge the hope, that my colleague has become satisfied, that he entertained most erroneous conceptions of these matters? Else, why has he so entirely abandoned his original resolution? Sinecure offices, high salaries of officers, the unnecessary number of them; the high per diem allowance to members seem to have been forgotten, and we are now invited to inquire as to the manner in which the money appropriated for foreign intercourse, and for the contingent expenses of the Executive Departments, has been applied since 1824—yes, sir, since 1824. There lies the secret. All errors, if any, committed before that period, are not worth investigation. They would shed no valuable light on the subject. The occurrence has passed by, and is no longer of any moment. It would be of no service in suggesting the propriety of any change in the law on the subject. Very well, let the inquiry be so limited. I am willing to go back as far as they please; to commence, and to stop, where they please. Should there be any thing wrong in the management of the affairs of this nation, by this Administration, let it be made appear. If it be an error of the head, a magnanimous and generous public will scorn to punish; if it proceed from corruption, it will show that they ought no longer to be trusted. When proof of this is produced, none will be more ready than myself to pronounce a verdict of guilty. But idle suspicion, and worse than idle rumor, shall never influence my judgment.

We were told by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that he would oppose any and every party who would impose on this country any man as its Chief Magistrate, besides him who receives the greatest number of its votes. Is our constitution then a dead letter? Can a man conscientiously discharge a duty devolving on him in the election of a President, violating neither the letter or spirit of that sacred instrument, and yet be subjected to censure? That must be the gentleman's opinion: for no man elected by Congress, can have received a majority of the votes of the people; otherwise, the election would not have devolved on Congress. I was truly surprised to hear such sentiments avowed; and the more especially as coming from such a quarter. When, on the last election of President, that matter was before Congress, I understood, and still understand, that every member from Virginia voted for Mr. Crawford, except two, of which two the gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) was not one. It is to be presumed that he did not vote for one man, and wish another to be elected. He was in earnest as to the vote which he gave, and was, no doubt, anxious for Mr. Crawford's election. And yet, according to his present declarations, he would then have imposed on

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

this country a man, as its Chief Magistrate, who had not received a majority of the votes of the people; yes, and he would now upon the same principles, had he been elected, been found opposed to his administration, for that reason only, if not for other reasons.

Mr. WASHINGTON said: When the resolution was offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CHILTON,) I had resolved to vote against it—not that I was opposed to retrenchment or the reform of any abuses which might, by possibility, exist in the administration of the General Government, but because I did not believe that any valuable results to this nation could grow out of such inquiry, and because I did not then, nor do I now imagine, that any abuses exist, which require the intervention of this House, or which this inquiry is calculated in any manner to reform. I considered it merely as the redemption of a pledge, which the gentleman from Kentucky informed us he had given to his constituents. But in the latitude which has been allowed in this debate, sentiments have been expressed by gentlemen distinguished for their talents, high in the estimation of the public, and high in the confidence of their party. What are the declarations they have made, sir? That this is not the time for reform; that the clouds which now obscure the political horizon must be chased away, by the rising of another and a brighter sun—an evident allusion to the election of another President—that you have nothing to hope for or expect from the present Administration, in aid of your patriotic exertions to effect reform. Sir, the imputation has gone forth to the world, under the sanction of high authority, that abuses, if not corruption, do exist, and that any attempt at their exposure would prove unavailing, as you could expect no co-operation from the rulers of this nation, who are thus pronounced too corrupt, too much wedded to their own sinister views, to make any sacrifice for the good of the nation. So far, sir, we have heard nothing but allegations, without the semblance of proof: for all the evidence which has been attempted to be produced, has been ably met, and triumphantly refuted, without the aid of any inquisition.

Sir, I believe this Administration to be as pure, as patriotic, as devoted to the interest of the nation, as far removed from the suspicion of corruption, as any which ever has, aye, sir, and as ever will preside over the destinies of this Republic; and that, like gold, the oftener assayed, the brighter it will shine. Sir, the Administration fear no inquiry or scrutiny, however rigid, either in relation to the disbursements of public money, or the discharge of the duties appertaining to their offices; neither do their friends entertain a fear on their account. On the contrary, we invite and challenge the fullest and freest investigation: and, in accordance with this belief, I would, with great deference, suggest to my friends—political friends I mean—for I have the pleasure of claiming many personal friends on this floor, with whom I am not politically associated—that every amendment should be withdrawn which has been offered by them, and that we afford to the gentleman from Kentucky every facility he can desire, by adopting his original resolution, or the modification offered by him, as he may prefer. This is not an inquiry of our seeking, and let us not put it in the power of gentlemen to say that we frittered down, or in any way embarrassed, the inquiry they had proposed. Let the whole responsibility rest where it should. For my own part, I will vote against every proposition, either in the way of amendment or substitute, which does not originate with the gentleman from Kentucky, or his political friends.

One word, sir, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, in relation to the institution at West Point, and I am done. Having recently had the pleasure of attending an examination at the Military Academy, I will take the liberty of stating the impression made on my mind by that visit. Without having enjoyed the advantages of foreign travel, and of making a comparison of this with similar institutions of other nations, I will venture to assert, that, in regard to discipline, and indeed the whole economy of its arrangements and conduct, it is not excelled by any institution in the world. Sir, it is a noble monument of the liberal and enlightened policy of this nation. It richly deserves instead of reprobation, the fostering care and protection of the Government. Young men, from every State of this widely extended empire, are brought together at West Point. They there form friendships which remain through life; local jealousies and prejudices, which unhappily exist among us, are conquered; and the associations growing out of this friendly intercourse have a most imposing influence, in a political respect, by drawing more closely the chain which binds together this great Confederacy. It is true, sir, the selection of cadets is not confined to any particular class of society; nor can I perceive any just reason why it should be: for this institution was created for the benefit of the whole community. Yet the gentleman asserts that none but the well-born are allowed to participate in its advantages, to the exclusion of the sons of Revolutionary fathers and widowed mothers; but one fact, sir, is worth a thousand such assertions: For I myself, within the last year, have had the pleasure of procuring for the deserving son of a poor widow in my district, a warrant of admission to that school; and I could instance to the gentleman from Tennessee, many appointments of a similar character—one particularly, in this district, of the son of an old Revolutionary officer and poor widow, to whom the present Secretary of War promptly gave a warrant. But, sir, no censure can attach to this Administration in relation to that establishment, it being almost co-eval with our Government. I therefore will not consume the time of the House by any farther reference to the remarks of the gentleman.

Mr. INGHAM said: The resolution before the House simply proposes a retrenchment of public expenditures, without reference to the period when such a measure became proper or necessary, and no one will deny that some retrenchment might be effected; but it by no means follows that the Administration would be assailed by such a measure. Another part of the inquiry proposes a specific inquiry as to the expenditure of certain sums of money placed at the disposal of the President and Heads of Departments. We all know, that, when the law prescribes the special application of public money, there cannot be much danger of a misapplication; but where large sums are disbursed at discretion, it is, to say the least of it, a fit subject for the scrutiny of this House, and may fairly be done, and has been done over and over again, without any imputation against the Administrations who have made such disbursements; if all has been done right, they can have no just objection to the scrutiny; if any thing has been done wrong, we have a right to know: for, in either case, the information may be useful to direct future legislation. Let us look, for a moment, into the amount of the sums that are placed at the discretionary disposal of the President and Heads of Departments. The proposed inquiry goes back, I believe, three years. The sums appropriated for the contingencies of foreign intercourse, for that time, are as follows: 1825, $40,000; 1826, $40,000; 1827, $30,000—$110,000: this is the fund out of which the President may by law, cause to be paid what amount he pleases, and if, in his opinion, the public interest requires it to be concealed, he certifies that fact to the accounting officers, and they settle the account without specification, or any other voucher than the certificate I have mentioned. It is proper that we should know what sums have been thus settled at the Treasury. I would not invade any regulation which may have been found expedient, especially in times of war and difficulty, but the resolution does not call for the specification, it only asks for the amount so expended. The remainder of this fund and the appropriations for the contingencies of foreign missions, and the contingent expenses of the several Departments, are required, by the resolutions, to be specified, and to this there can be reasonable objection. The amount appropriated for the "contingencies of missions abroad," for the last three years, is $70,000, and for the contingent expenses of the Departments $211,845, making a total sum of $391,845, including the foreign intercourse fund, which is disbursed very much at discretion. Now, sir, if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana should be adopted, it will exclude us from any knowledge of these large disbursements. But let us consider what his amendment proposes to do in place of the inquiry contemplated by the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky. The first proposition of the amendment is to inquire whether any abuses have been committed by the President or Heads of Departments, and what can that end in? Shall we send a committee to the President, to ask him what abuses he has committed? He will tell them in the first place that he does not confer with committees, and in the next, that he is not conscious of abusing his trust, and is not bound to answer that question. Will you send a committee to the Heads of Departments, to put the same question to them? Will they give you any such information after you have thus characterized the object of your inquiry? But perhaps it may be said your committee might go to the Clerks. Do we not know, that, at the last session, a certain transaction leaked out, which excited some attention both here and abroad, and afterwards became the subject of a motion in this House—I mean the payment of $4,500 to John A. King, for a homefit, as it has been aptly called. I never knew nor inquired how it got out; but soon after it was noticed here, we heard it as a fact of common conversation in this city, and for myself, I cannot doubt it, that the Head of one Department summoned his trembling clerks before him, and menaced with immediate dismissal whoever could be proved to have made the disclosure. In such a state of things what could be expected from an inquiry after abuses? It has been well said by the gentleman from South Carolina and others, that it must end in nothing. The next object embraced in the amendment is an inquiry as to the reduction of salaries, and as to what offices can be dispensed with, and if any salaries are found too high, under what Administration they were established? And, according to the form of the issue made up by the gentleman from Indiana, the decision of these points is to try the character of the Administration! What, sir, test this Administration by the ascertainment of a fact, which, no matter what it may be, cannot affect the Administration in the slightest degree? It was certainly an ingenious contrivance of the gentleman to put the trial on such grounds. If the salaries should not be deemed too high, nor any offices to be dispensed with, the Administration would be acquitted and entitled to our support; but if some reduction and diminution should be thought proper, then the next point presented by the gentleman is, when were these offices and salaries established? And if it should be found that they were established before this Administration came into power, which we may all know, by looking into the statute book, then the Administration would be acquitted. I, for one, will not consent to any such a trial, and will here admit that the Administration are not responsible for the amount of the salaries—these were established by law—nor for the number of officers, whose offices are created by law: nor for the time when they were established. If the gentleman, by his ingenuity could get

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

such a trial as he has proposed, he would get his Administration out of their difficulties most easily indeed. I am not disposed to be drawn into the discussion of that question, nor to any trial of the Administration before this House. We might indeed be compelled to put public officers upon their trial, in some events, but we have no right to try them ourselves, but most especially, I would not take the great political trial now going on before the people out of their hands. It would be most unwise, as well as irregular, for this House to entertain jurisdiction of any question upon an appeal from the people. I came here to assist in transacting the legislative business of the country. This House is not competent to decide that great political question by any act which can grow out of these resolutions. Why, then, bring this discussion here? Let it remain, I beseech gentlemen, before an intelligent people, where some, perhaps, of the most intelligent bodies of men ever convened for such occasions, are discussing the subject with eminent ability.

TUESDAY, January 29.

Retrenchment.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. CHILTON'S resolutions, with the amendments proposed thereto.

Mr. PEARCE said: In the zeal of gentlemen to retrench, the Military School at West Point has occupied their attention, and violent hands have been laid upon it. I did hope, that this institution, which is more creditable to this Government than any other in it, and which, I had supposed, was the favorite child of the nation, would have been spared. I, also, Mr. Speaker, have attended one of the annual examinations of that school, and can, with other gentlemen who have spoken, bear witness to its merits, if its merits are not generally known. Until the commencement of this debate, I had supposed they were. We are told, sir, by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. MITCHELL,) that it is the nursery of Aristocracy, created for the education of the rich man's son, and a place where the widow's son or the orphan boy cannot enter; or if he does enter, cannot long remain; established for the education of the sons of members of Congress, and those who are high in office. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee, that he is mistaken—that he has been misinformed—that, although I shall not question what he has said, in relation to the sons of those coming from his own State, his remarks will not apply to those who have been educated at that school, citizens of the State which I represent. Let the gentleman examine the catalogue of graduates, and he will find that there are men who have had the benefits of this school, and shared in its honors, who were not sons of members of Congress or those in power. Let the gentleman examine the Army Register, and he will also find that are graduates of this school, who were the sons of widows, or orphan boys, the sons of those who had nothing but poverty to leave to their children for an inheritance, and are indebted to this institution alone for the education which they received. To avoid, if possible, the recital of names, who is the gentleman, who has now the principal superintendence of your fortifications, and who discharges his duties with so much credit to himself and justice to the nation? Who is the aid of your Commander-in-Chief? Who is now the assistant to the Chief Engineer? And I might extend the inquiry to a very great length, of men who are ornaments to their country, and men who, but for this school, would never have received the education and advantages which they derived from it. I once entertained the opinion—an opinion formed without much reflection, that the doors of this institution ought to be opened to the poor only, and the sons of the wealthy should be debarred, and stated my views to the Vice President of the United States, in the first conversation I ever had with that distinguished man, and learnt from him that others had expressed the same opinions; but, said he, to make this a school for the indigent would render it less valuable to them, as they would not be excited by the same spirit of emulation; that genius was to be found in all grades of society, all classes and ranks of men; and it was the object of the Government of the United States to enlist into its service the best talents, whether found among the rich or the poor. Further reflection has satisfied me that the views of the late Secretary of War were correct. Genius is not confined to any grade of life; it is found among children of the asylum, and is not a stranger to the princely palace. At this institution, a soldier's son—yes, sir, the son of a Sergeant in the Army of the United States, receives the first honors, while the sons of two gentlemen, who have been Speakers of this House, are unable to pass through the ordeal of an examination. If, sir, favoritism exists in other institutions, it has no abiding place in this: for here they all rise or fall by their merits or demerits, and there are none who are the sons of the poor, and none who are the sons of the rich: for no such distinctions are kept up by the officers of that institution. The students themselves soon find of how little use they are. Sir, if I had a son old enough to be admitted into that Academy; if I had any influence with those in power—I know I have none—if my friends had any, it should be exerted and called into operation, if necessary, to procure for that son an admittance; this I would do without property. If, on the other hand, I had the wealth of my friend from New York, (Mr. VAN RENSSLAERE,) (and I may be permitted to call him so, whose philanthropic spirit makes him the friend of mankind,) the most wealthy man in this House, if not in this nation, I would not, like that gentleman, send my son to a private school, where the same sciences are taught; but, if influence were necessary, I would resort to it, to procure for him a place at this school. What greater benefit could you confer upon the son of the rich, as well as poor, than by teaching both that, in this country, the road to preferment is open to both, and the highest honors are within the reach of all—that poverty is no embarrassment, and wealth furnishes no facilities? What better practical lessons, what more useful, or which are better tests of the excellence of our form of Government, and the blessings which our free institutions confer, than those which are taught at this institution? What better plan to fire the ambition of the poor, and excite the emulation of the rich, than the system in force at this school, where the Senator's son and the widow's son are placed upon an equality, and both are told that, in this country, that, at that school, the "mind is the measure of the man?" So long as that useful and distinguished officer, now the Superintendent of this institution—an officer whose talents and acquirements are such as to qualify him to discharge the duties of any post or office in this Government, or recognized by our laws, and who has peculiar qualifications for the office, the duties of which he now discharges in a manner as creditable to himself as satisfactory to the nation—shall preside over this institution, so long will the great advantages which the nation has derived from it be dispensed, and so long will the nation continue to realize them. In justice, Mr. Speaker, to the head of the War Department, and that responsibility may rest where it belongs, I hope to be indulged with a few words as to the mode in which appointments are made. There is allotted to each State as many Cadets as there are Representatives and Senators; and, in those States which elect by districts, one to each Congressional district. In making the selection, it is reasonable to suppose that recommendations of members have, with the Secretary of War, great weight. Then, sir, suppose that those abuses, referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. MITCHELL,) have existed—let it not be understood that I make any admissions—who is, or ought to be, responsible for these abuses? And on whom should the censure fall? Not upon the President or his Secretary, but upon the members. In justice to the useful, as well as distinguished officer now at the head of the War Department, I will further state, what I know to be true, when every thing else is equal, it has been his uniform practice to give the preference, in the selection to be made, to the son of him who is poor. Having met some of the objections to this institution, and, in fact, all that I have distinctly heard, and shown that it is not such an institution as it has been represented to be; that neither this Government nor Administration ought to be censured for its fostering care towards it; that the present Administration has pursued the same course towards it that others have done; that the expenditures are the same—for I did understand the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. CARSON,) to withdraw the objection he made on account of the fifteen thousand dollars paid the supernumerary lieutenants, or to admit that, under former Administrations, similar appropriations were made, and the same amount paid—it becomes necessary to inquire what was the object of the Government of the United States in the establishment of this institution? What are the benefits which are derived from it? And whether the objects contemplated, have been, or will be, attained? It has been stated, and truly stated, by those who have preceded me in this debate, that this institution was projected by Washington, and founded by Jefferson. I would add, that it began to flourish under the auspices of John C. Calhoun, to whom it seems to have been as dear as the apple of the eye, who was devoted to it, and, on all occasions, evinced his devotion. The moment we declare by any act or vote of ours, that this institution is a useless one; that it is liable to those imputations which have been cast upon it, that moment, sir, your Vice President, if not shorn of all his beams, is deprived of half his glory. Look into the correspondence between Washington and the Continental Congress, and you will find him continually urging upon that body, pressing upon them, the necessity which existed for the employment of skilful engineers. They were not to be found in the country, for there were no military schools; recourse was had, and necessarily, to foreign countries, as has since been had, for that military skill which was not to be found at home; and military science was then, as it has since been, imported, but not then, nor since, so as to answer all the requisitions of the Government; and, knowing the necessity for such schools, its establishment was among the first recommendations of the first President of these United States.*

* Washington is constantly adduced as the father and founder of the present Military Academy. No adduction could be more fallacious. He never counselled such an institution, nor any thing like it. The Academy of his day was a place of instruction in the two higher branches of the military art—artillery and engineering—and nothing more: the cadet of his day was a young soldier, attached to a company, and serving with it in the field and in the camp, "with the pay, clothing, and ration of a sergeant;" (Act of 1794:) and in the intervals of active service, if he had shown an inclination for the profession after a trial of its duties, and a capacity for its higher branches, then he was sent, "in the discretion of the President," to West Point, to take instruction under engineer and artillery officers in those two higher branches; and nothing else. All the drills both of officer and private—all the trainings in the infantry, the cavalry, and the rifle—all the camp duty—were then left to be taught in the field and the camp—a better school for such teaching than any academy, and under officers who were to lead them into action—better teachers than any school-room professors. And all without any additional expense to the United States, the teachers being officers under pay not otherwise employed and the cadets being part of the military force, temporarily

JANUARY, 1838.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Let us, Mr. Speaker, for a moment, turn to the contingent fund, or money annually appropriated to meet the contingent expenses of this Government: for this is the fund which is liable, if I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to such gross abuses, and from which, as one would suppose from the tenor of his arguments, a good share of the patronage of the Administration is derived. How stands the case? By the constitution, "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law: and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time." No moneys can be drawn without appropriations. And who makes the appropriations? Not the President and his Secretaries, but Congress. A reference to the Treasury estimate for the current year will perhaps best explain the nature of the contingent expenses, and the fund provided for defraying of them. The whole amount asked for, is $8,990,880 44—and of this sum, the following sums to defray the contingent expenses of the Department of State:

For Books,	$2,000
Binding Books,	500
Stationery and Parchment,	1,500
Mediterranean Passports,	1,500
Blank Personal Passports, Circulars, &c.	1,000
Fuel and Candles,	900
Newspapers for the Office and Agents abroad,	500
Translations of foreign Languages,	350
Forage for Messengers's Horses,	200
Expenses in distributing Congressional Documents,	800
Wages of a laborer,	300
Miscellanies,	1,000
Extra Copying of Papers,	1,000
Printing in Newspapers, and in Pamphlet Form, the Laws of the first Session of 20th Congress,	13,500
Distribution of the Acts of Congress throughout the States and Territories,	3,000
	<hr/>
	$27,550

Now, of the whole of this sum, amounting to twenty-seven thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, not one cent of it is at the command of the President, nor can one cent of it be paid or expended in a way to escape our examination, and not to be open to our inspection. Let the committee ascertain, if the standing committee on expenditures in the Department of State has not already done to their satisfaction, whether this sum, the usual appropriation, has not been applied to the usual and ordinary purposes, and settlements made in the common and ordi-detached for instruction, but receiving nothing in addition to a sergeant's pay, ration, and clothing. The present military academy began to take its form in the year 1812, under the act of that year, after Washington had been a dozen years dead; and has been built up by constructions and regulations under that act, essentially changing it from what it was intended to be.

nary form—whether vouchers have not been taken for all the money paid, and whether secrecy veils any part of this expenditure. An examination of the acts of Congress will show, that this is the usual amount appropriated for that Department, and the other Departments and officers have, to defray similar expenses, annual appropriations. I have referred to the State Department, because it was the first mentioned in the Treasury estimate. In addition to these appropriations for the Departments and offices, a sum of money has heretofore been asked for, and appropriated—sometimes fifty thousand dollars, but seldom less than half that sum, to defray the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse; but this extravagant Administration require for the year 1828, no appropriation whatever to defray this expense.

Mr. BELL said: When the original resolutions were introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, I saw in their ill-digested form (and when I say this, I do not mean to say that I could have given them a better shape) the substance of a proposition for a general retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government. To a well-timed proposition of that nature, I beg leave to say, I would never be opposed. Inquiries into supposed excesses in the regular and ordinary appropriations for the support of Government, or into the abuses supposed to attend their disbursement by its officers, will always be productive of some good in Government, constituted on whatever principles it may, although no immediate legislative enactment of a remedial nature may be the result of them. The very discussions which attend propositions for such inquiries, serve to keep alive a spirit of jealousy and watchfulness in the people in regard to that, which, properly managed, constitutes their strength, and which, under evil auspices, may be converted into the material of their weakness. For, in the estimate of a nation's strength, this paradox intrudes itself—that which forms the chief sinew of its power, may, at the same time, become the source of its greatest debility. National wealth (if I may be permitted a common-place argument) can nowhere be as safely and properly exhibited as in the hands of the people who created it; and there it should remain, except such portion of it as may be absolutely necessary for the protection and free enjoyment of the balance. When, therefore, a nation shall have arrived at that point in its organization, when it deliberates upon the expediency of abolishing certain institutions as useless or improper, and of curtailing certain expenditures as extravagant, we may take it for granted that the annual modicum of the people's wealth, which is absolutely necessary to be drawn from their pockets, is already large enough, and that no new institutions will be created, and no additional exactions enforced. But I go farther. I would have supported a well-timed proposition of this nature, for a better reason. I have entertained the opinion, as I do now, that the expenditures in some branches of the public service would bear retrenchment without injury to the interests of the country, and to the very great relief of the people. I have thought that the career of this Government, during a late Administration, was marked with a wasteful appropriation of the public revenue, and that the present Administration has entitled itself to still higher distinction in the same prodigal course. I believe, too, that the present Administration contemplated, at one time, still greater eminence in this way, than they have since thought it prudent to attain. I am of opinion, that, for a part of this extravagance, the Executive officers of the Government are alone responsible, and that Congress may well come in for the balance of the responsibility. How this responsibility should be divided between those two departments of the Government, I will not undertake to determine; nor will I at this time, be drawn into a specification of instances of the extravagance in the Executive officers of the Government; neither will I be forced, upon this occasion, into an argument of the specifications that others have thought proper to make in the course of this debate. In speaking of the extravagance of the Government, I beg leave to state, that my opinion, if it may be regarded as of any consequence, has been formed upon facts which I have never heard disputed; and what I may now, or at any other time, say of the conduct of the present Administration, will be found to be based upon ascertained facts, about which I expect to speak freely, without the imputation of joining in a hue and cry merely for party purposes. I despise a senseless clamor as much as any man, but I am not prepared to admit that this is one.

I was opposed to the resolution, seeing that it must wear a party livery, because, with my approbation, (and I trust gentlemen will give me credit for sincerity, when I make the declaration,) no inflammable matter of that kind would be thrown into this House, to retard and obstruct the ordinary business of Congress, or to interrupt the decorum of debate during the present session. I desired, as, indeed, I thought every other member of this House did, from the frequent professions I heard upon all sides, that we should despatch the more important business confided to our care, and return to our homes. I deprecated the consequences of bringing the Presidential canvass into this House, and making this floor an electioneering Campus. We have already had a specimen, in the two last days' debate, of the consequence of introducing such matter into this House. We have already had a match exhibition of reciprocal attack and reply. We have already reached the very verge of order and decorum. Perhaps, sir, we have advanced one step beyond their boundaries.* To what end will a further indulgence of this course lead in the discussion of this or any other measure of a like inflammable character? As the passions of the opposite parties kindle by collision—as they will—we may expect to hear from one side of the House, a glowing description of the dangers of military despotism, while, from the other, we will present the picture of a great nation sinking by corruption. When, from the other side, shall be held up to public view, the evils to be apprehended from the elevation of a Military Chieftain; on this side, you shall hear of the ills that will ensue from establishing a succession, by adhering to the line of safe precedents. When we shall have carried this war of crimination and recrimination to the highest pitch to which party feeling can ascend, all we shall be able to accomplish will be, perhaps, to degrade the character of the Congress of the United States, consume ourselves in the heat of controversy, and vomit forth, through the channel of the newspapers, upon the people of this Union, the poison of our own gall, to embitter and stir them up to a like useless rage.

If I do not mistake the allusion, or overrate the apprehensions of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. BUCKNER,) I will say to him, that I know he will not forsake his country at the approach either of a domestic or foreign foe. On the contrary, if I am not greatly mistaken in him, he would not shrink from the presence of a tyrant, even in his stronghold; and when "the accepted time" alluded to, shall have arrived, I predict that that gentleman returning to his post here, with the manly purpose of guarding his country's rights, will then become convinced how greatly he had misconceived the true character of the individual so often alluded to. I am persuaded he will find that great man, though, perhaps, not perfect—as no man is—yet so nobly redeeming any slight faults he may have, by his generous devotion to the interest of his country, by his tact in civil government as well as in military command, that even the most unrelenting of his opponents will feel some regret that they ever felt it their duty to encourage apprehensions which turned out to be so destitute of any foundation.

The Tariff has found its way into this discussion. Upon a subject of so much difficulty and importance, I would at no time feel myself competent to manage the argument, either for or against it. I am, therefore, at this time wholly indisposed to enter into any examination of the questions connected with it; but I do trust in God, that no gentleman on this floor—I must be permitted to express a further hope—that no friend of his country, will be found here, or anywhere else, who will seek, for any purpose, to connect a subject of such intrinsic interest, with a contest, involving, in my opinion, separate and distinct principles and objects.

Mr. Speaker, although opposed to the resolution originally for reasons I have attempted to make intelligible to the House, yet I fear we have advanced too far now to recede. Expectations are created, that something will be done, without farther delay, in the work of retrench-

* Of course, and according to its plan, all these personalities and indecorums have been omitted in this abridgment.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

ment. At all events, an inquiry, a rigid inquiry, must be prosecuted—and I hope for the best results. I am free to declare, for myself, although I would lop off, without compunction or regret, every institution and office, which may be opposed in its tendency to the liberty of the people, or which may create unnecessary burdens upon their honest gains, yet would I forbear to touch either one or the other, which may, upon inquiry, appear to be essential either to the liberty or to the prosperity of the country. And since it has become necessary that this inquiry must be gone into, I rejoice that so large a majority are of opinion that this is the auspicious period, and that so much of the talent of the House has become pledged to assist in it. I look upon the vote taken upon the motion to lay this resolution upon the table, as a pledge, not only of the perseverance with which the work of retrenchment will be prosecuted, but of the success which will attend it. And I trust that we shall all, exercising a spirit of mutual forbearance upon those points, upon which the interests and feelings of parties may be connected, zealously co-operate in effecting something for the good of our common country. For my own part, I can only promise that I will aid in the enterprise, by working as a common laborer in the trenches, if it be necessary.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30.

Retrenchment.

The House then proceeded to consider the resolution of Mr. CHILTON on the subject of retrenchment, and the question being on the amendment of Mr. BLAKE, (virtually a substitute for the other)—

Mr. DOBNEY said: In a Government like ours, predicated on law, confidence must be reposed somewhere. Our constitution reposes it in the Executive Department. From its analogy to monarchy, it is always an object of distrust and jealousy. It is presumed to affect the splendor of royalty, to stretch its prerogative; to extend its patronage, to sustain its power; to lavish the resources of the nation, to reward its partisans. This jealousy, invigorated by our devotion to our republican simplicity, to a restricted executive prerogative, to the purity of our institutions, and hatred for a profuse expenditure of that money drawn from our labor, has been constantly invoked in every struggle for political power that has distracted the American people.

The first administration of the illustrious Washington had not passed, before it was charged on his Administration that its policy was devoted to an assimilation of the practice of our Government to the most corrupting parts of the British Government; that the war debts of the Revolution were funded, and the public debt created, to bring strength to the usurpations plotted by the Federal Government on State rights; that the army, raised to check the savage incursions on the frontier settlements, was adopted in conformity with the policy of creating a standing army; that, having a funded debt, and army, the piratical depredations of the Algerine corsairs were greedily seized on, as an apology for creating a navy; that the excise on whiskey was introduced to add to the support of the Government a swarm of officers; and that thus a public debt, an army, a navy, the excise, the four prominent features and engines of the patronage, corruption, and expense, of the British Government, were grafted on the American policy. The monarchical tendencies of these national measures, were not the only accusations made against this illustrious man. He was charged with affecting the splendor and folly of royal audiences; and the levees which were held at his house, to gratify the anxious and laudable curiosity of his countrymen, to see the great benefactor of the American people, were traced to a disposition, on his part, to imitate royal levees. He, too, was charged with an encroachment on the treaty-making power, and assuming that it came within his constitutional competency to give instructions to his Ministers abroad; to negotiate treaties with foreign powers, without first submitting his instructions for the approbation of the Senate: he, too, was charged with drawing the public money for his own private purposes; and it was published, that the day on which he should retire "ought to be considered as a national jubilee; for from that day, would the name of Washington cease to legalize corruption." And such, sir, was the acrimony of party spirit in his day, that there are now distinguished political characters, high in the confidence of this people, who have recorded upon the journals of this House, that their confidence in him was diminished.

Notwithstanding the great popularity which Mr. Jefferson acquired by the repeal of the war tax of the preceding Administration, and the prostrate condition of his political rivals, there soon sprung up men who had contributed to elevate him to power, who denounced his Administration. He was charged with an undignified, unpatriotic attachment to France; with a hatred against England, that could only be satiated by her prostration at the feet of the French Eagles; with shaping his whole course of foreign policy with an eye to the gratification of these feelings of attachment and hatred. (We all recollect the celebrated saying imputed to a Minister of his cabinet when it sought to purchase from Spain the Floridas, "France wants money.") With a wasteful prodigality of the public money; for, sir, a gentleman,* then of distinguished influence, the bitterest political enemy of the first Adams, as he now is of the second, the most zealous of those who toiled for the elevation of Mr. Jefferson, remarked, on the floor of this House: "Against the Administration of Mr. Adams, I, in common with many others, did and do yet entertain a sentiment of hostility, and have repeatedly cried out against it for extravagance, and for profusion, and for waste, and wanton waste, of the public resources. I find, however, upon consideration, whether from the nature of man, or from the nature of things, or from whatever cause, that that Administration, grossly extravagant as I then, and still believe it to have been, if tried by the criterion of the succeeding one, was a pattern of retrenchment and economy."

* Mr. Randolph.

These historical facts are brought into view to the end that the public may appreciate the motives which give currency to these clamors against those who administer the Government, and to show that, at all times, and by all parties, the same charges which are now made against the Government, have been made and are instruments used for party triumph:—corruption, prodigality, and a fondness of splendor, are the practised weapons of the Opposition; they may influence sentiment for a time, but a spirit of free inquiry and correct information will banish these delusions, demonstrating the innocence of the accused, and the daring and selfish motives which produce the imputations. Recollect that these Presidents were the founders of the Republic, that they had an active agency in the establishment of your constitution, that they lived and toiled for the Republic at home in the gaze of the American people; and above all, that they came into power by the majority of the votes of the American people; but even thus sustained, and thus elected, they escaped not the fell spirit of detraction. The present Chief Magistrate came not into power sustained by such powerful appeals to the confidence and affections of the American people. His life had been spent principally in the service of his country abroad, in watching its interests and its rights in foreign courts. When at home he presided over a Department, of none or very limited patronage, and which addresses itself only to the patriotism and intelligence of the people. He had three competitors, of distinguished reputation, and alike endeared to the country. A gentleman of splendid talents,* the bold and undisguised advocate of those constitutional doctrines which enlarge the sphere of Federal action, retired from the struggle in consequence of the unexpected movements of a State, upon whose powerful support his calculations on success were predicated. No election was made in the primary colleges—and this House, exercising its constitutional contingent power, called the present incumbent to the Presidency. In forming his cabinet, he called to the office of the Secretary of the State, that distinguished citizen who now presides over that Department, and it is understood that he offered to another competitor, the office of Secretary of the Treasury.

From this moment, a spirit of opposition, detraction, and misrepresentation appeared. It was charged that the election was effected by "bargain, management, and intrigue;" and the nation has been convulsed by a more angry state of political hatred than it ever experienced before. History informs us, that, of all the parties or factions which divide a nation, those are the most angry, which are founded on personal considerations. The parties heretofore existing in this country had their origin in a difference of opinion among the people, as to our foreign and domestic policy. In sustaining or resisting that policy, the rival politicians addressed themselves to the reason and understanding of the nation. An unprecedented unanimity existed among us all, as to the great and fundamental policy which the prosperity of this country required to be pursued by its rulers. The present parties of this country are therefore formed upon the preference of one individual to another. In all our attempts, therefore, to proselyte, a review of their character and of their talents is taken. In this review much is said—much will be said—of an irritating and offensive character. These are the causes of our disunion.

The structure of our institutions is attacked, and the Military Academy is sought to be rendered an object of public jealousy, and the seeds of disunion, between the rich and the poor, between the plebeians and the patricians, is scattered, with more than Tribunitian industry. The West Point Academy, founded by Jefferson, is now described by his friends as an institution in its very principles aristocratic. The gentleman from Tennessee says that none but the children of the wealthy are educated there. It is not so; in its principles, it contains no exclusion graduated on rank. That there may be children of the wealthy educated there is true: and shall it not be so? Who contributes to it? Do not the wealthy? And shall they be excluded who do not contribute to it? But the children of the wealthy are not sent there from considerations of economy, but to prepare their children, by a previous course of study, to enter into the armies of their country: and it must be so, or the children of the wealthy will be excluded from the Army Register. This theory is confirmed by one single illustration. An honorable member of this House, who has expended thousands in giving to the poor the blessings of intellectual light, has now at that school a youth, who prefers to serve his country in her army. The gentleman has enumerated many instances, from his own State, in which the Representatives in Congress have had children educated there. If this be an abuse of the power and influence of the members, they are responsible to their constituents. The War Department must act upon recommendations. The constitutional implication that the members of Congress are deserving of confidence, must influence that Department, and the sin of the abuse of the discretionary choice must rest on their head. I can only say, that so far as my experience goes, the selections in the State from

* Mr. Calhoun.

JANUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

whence I come, has, in every instance fallen upon those without parents and without property—except the son of a gallant General, whose blood moistened the field of Eutaw, and whose anxious wish is, that one of his descendants might, if a war should ever again return, display the same patriotism and the same daring as his father. A principle of distributive justice regulates the selection now, and I, with others, can say, that the claims of the friendless and the poor are listened to with a sympathizing heart, and a disposition to foster and protect those whose genius, it is presumed, fit them for military command. The general utility of this institution, till the power of a selection was exercised by a political rival, was admitted by all. If its abuses have weakened the public confidence in it, this Administration has not to answer for it; it commenced in other days, when the late Secretary of War was a candidate for the Presidency. But why deal in this general accusation? Bring forth a direct proposition to pull it down.

THURSDAY, January 31.

Retrenchment.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON on the subject of retrenchment, and the amendment of Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. LETCHER said: I have witnessed this debate with more pain and regret than any that has ever occurred in this House since I have had the honor of a seat. One more unprofitable, more intolerant, and less likely to effect any good for the country, has never occurred here or elsewhere. Sir, as the Representatives of a free and enlightened community, disposed to maintain the dignity and utility of debate, upon correct principles, we should pause, seriously pause, before we determine to prosecute this further. Where, when, and how is it to be ended? What profit will be derived from it? What valuable object attained? Is our time justly, correctly, and fairly employed, in reference to the important interests of the country, to be thus exclusively occupied in this digressive, angry debate? if a debate it can, or ought to be called. I had always, sir, until brought to a different conclusion by the present discussion, been led to believe, that a debate was only necessary where a difference of opinion, in some shape or other, existed, and that its main object was to enlighten, to convince, or to persuade. Such, however, sir, does not seem to be the character or design of this. Its object, or rather, perhaps, its tendency, is not to illustrate any particular proposition, or to convince us upon any matter of disputed policy. It is, if not for the nobler, at any rate for the obvious and gratifying purpose, of abusing and censuring some of the most distinguished men of the country. There ought to be no discussion upon the resolutions as offered, because there is no disagreement of opinion among us as to the direction which they ought to take, and must take. Yet, sir, without any disagreement whatever, as far as I know, or believe, in reference to the subject-matter before us, we present ourselves before the nation in an attitude truly lamentably singular, to speak in no stronger terms. What is it? Why, sir, a subject is offered for the consideration of the House, in the usual mode of resolutions, inquiring into the manner in which the pecuniary concerns of the country are conducted by those to whom we have confided these high trusts; also, of inquiring into the propriety of lessening the number of our officers in service, of curtailing their salaries, and of reducing the pay of the members of this and the other House. To these resolutions every one almost, without exception, seems to yield a ready assent. Indeed, sir, we appear to struggle severely with each other for the honor of most admiring them. We all profess to be willing, yes, anxious, to go into the inquiry, exceedingly anxious, yet, from some cause or other, we can't get into it. To profess to be willing to make an inquiry, is one thing—to make it, is another. Talking, and doing, are very different matters. If we are really and sincerely disposed to do any thing for the benefit of the country, upon this or any other subject, we must speak less, and do more. We should engage in the business of the country with the determination of doing it speedily, and going home. How, sir, does it happen, that we can't get the question, and bring the debate to a close? The answer to this question will not, and cannot be denied. It arises from too much zeal, and too much sensibility, upon the Presidential question. Ah! That's the whole secret. The people understand all our movements; they are cool, deliberate, and intelligent, and will very quickly comprehend the design of an electioneering speech delivered in this House, whether it comes from the one side or the other. For my own part—I speak, however, with great deference to the opinion of others—I do not think it either complimentary to the members of this House, or to the people of this nation, to make the Representative Hall the arena of electioneering strife, and turmoil, and bustle. It should be exclusively appropriated to the legitimate purposes of legislation, and no other. The people will attend to the election of President themselves, if permitted to do so. They are the proper tribunal to make the decision between the two contending parties which now divide the country and this House. In their decision I have unlimited confidence. They will reflect coolly, and decide wisely, and that decision will be made, if not according to the wishes and feelings of all in this House, at any rate according to their own sober judgment, uninfluenced, I hope, by any and every attempt to excite them on the one side or the other. The truth is, sir, and I speak my undisguised opinion when I say so, the importance and consequence which some gentlemen seem to attach to what they may say in this Hall, tending to bear upon the Presidential canvass, is very greatly overrated. It is a mistake, which results, like most other mistakes, from thinking too highly of their own speaking powers, and too little of the judgment and discrimination of those who send us here. Sir, we may declaim, and rave, and rant, and read newspaper squibs, and reassert stale and long since refuted charges, and even descend to personal invectives against each other, or to personal violence, until we become exhausted, and exhaust the Treasury too, without being able to infuse into the public that degree of zeal which political calculating partisans feel, or in any material manner induce any portion of them to surrender their judgment to politicians struggling for power. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, to discover around me, the most formidable preparations for a continuation of the debate. One gentleman is covering his table with books, another is taking notes, whilst about a dozen others are ready to avail themselves of the first opportunity of getting the floor. I did not rise with a view of saying any thing which would be the means of prolonging the discussion, but principally to express my earnest desire that the question may be brought to a conclusion. With the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) I desire to get the House rid of the question, by referring the resolutions to a committee. It is very easy to dispose of the matter should we choose to do it. But one says, with great force and energy, I did not commence this discussion: another says, I did not. One party says, you began it: the other says, No, it was you. Who did begin it? Sir, nobody began it, yet it is here. Instead of disputing who commenced the discussion—for that fact, it seems, never can be ascertained—let us struggle who shall be the first to get clear of it; and at once proceed to the transaction of business. Why, sir, the scene is really ludicrous. It is more like children's play, if I may be allowed to say so, than the part of grave legislation. The original resolution offered by my colleague, (Mr. CHILTON,) was not of an unusual or extraordinary character. I was very glad when he introduced it. I little anticipated the irritation it has produced, or the length of time it has consumed. The inquiry proposed is a necessary one, and may prove useful to the country.

In a Government constituted as ours is, too much vigilance cannot exist upon the part of those in whom the people have placed confidence, in watching the public expenditures. I am not for making false clamors, or exciting the public without any just apprehensions, merely for my own purposes; but, upon principle, I am now, and always have been, in favor of observing a system of rigid economy and strict accountability in every Department of the Government. Frequent inquiries and examinations ought to take place. Honest, able, and faithful officers, such as I believe compose the Administration, have nothing to fear from the strictest scrutiny into all their official acts. On the contrary it has a good effect. It satisfies the country, and it is particularly proper at this period in reference to what has been said out of this House for some time past. The inquiry, sir, is demanded by the people: they expect it, and are anxiously waiting to see how it will progress. Give it to us. Let the examination be thorough and complete. If one dollar has been applied improperly by the disbursing officers, ascertain the fact, and make it known. If nothing be wrong; if censures have gone abroad without any just cause; it would be but an act of sheer justice to those who have been implicated, as well as to the country, to say so, after this inquiry is completed. It requires no great intellectual effort to create suspicions, and to give them currency, whether they be directed against public or private character. So far as any thing has been said, in this debate, having for its object a design of casting any imputation upon the Administration, in its management of the moneyed concerns of the country, its friends now, and at all times, challenge the freest and fullest investigation; but, at the same time, protest against the right of their opponents of trying them under the doctrine of Revolutionary France "of laboring under a suspicion of being suspected," and taking upon themselves the exclusive right of accusing and deciding. If any fact whatever exists, upon which to predicate a charge, even by implication, the accusing party have it completely in their power to expose it to the nation in glowing colors—the nation is fully competent to decide upon its merits.

But, sir, I am not about to pursue that course which I have taken the liberty so freely to condemn in others, by discussing the relative merits and demerits, fitness and unfitness, of the two distinguished candidates now before the people for the first office within their gift. No, sir. If my vanity even prompted me to suppose I was qualified for such a task, I would not, at this time, upon this occasion, in this House, allow myself, even under feelings of excitement, to engage in it. The topic, if persisted in, I fear, sir, will, in some degree, impair that dignity which has heretofore characterized the proceedings of this body. I have not taken the floor with a design of answering charges on the one side, or making them on the other. It was, sir, for a very different purpose, as I have already intimated. During this discussion, Mr. Speaker, which has taken a most extensive range, from what was said by my friend from Ohio, (Mr. VANCE,) an impression was made upon the minds of some gentlemen, that his design was to impeach the purity and integrity of the presiding officer of the House, in his appointment of committees. Sir, I was very glad to hear that honorable gentleman frankly and voluntarily disclaim every idea of the sort. It would, sir, in my estimation, not only have been unkind, but unjust, to that officer, to have expressed or entertained a different sentiment. Though not elevated to that honorable station with my consent, I will take this occasion to say, without supposing my opinion is a matter of the slightest consequence to any one, as far as my feeble judgment extends, he presides over the deliberations of the House with ability and dignity. As to his appointment of committees, he has a right to select and organize them as he chooses—he and they being responsible to the country for doing harm, or for not doing good.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

As to myself, I do not think, after two parties have been struggling for power, and one of them succeeds, it can reasonably be expected, that, in the distribution of the honorable stations in this House, the victorious party shall select their adversaries. This ought not to be required. If they look for the qualifications which fit individuals for those stations, and find such qualifications in men of their own party, it is natural, and right, that they should put those who possess them at the head of the leading committees. I should never object to such a course. If the party which has now the majority here, has placed its friends in stations where they can be useful to the country, while they do honor to themselves, I hope we who are of the minority, will never complain of it. If they have the honor, they have the responsibility too; and, I say, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky who has just taken his seat, and who has made some complaints against Mr. Adams about patronage, that I would go farther than merely protecting friends. Patronage ought to be distributed in the first place, with a constant view to the public good. That object being kept in sight, the Administration has a right to look first to its friends—I mean its prudent, enlightened, and capable friends, and those who have done the most to place it in power, by giving support to fair and just principles. It ought to look next to friends, who, though not quite so zealous and efficient in its behalf, are equally faithful in their attachment to its principles and their country. In the next place it ought to look to intelligent neutrals; still, as I said before, keeping its eye upon the public good, and upon suitable qualifications; and then, if there is any thing left, let them give it to open, but able and magnanimous adversaries. This I take to be a rule, right in itself, and one which has always more or less governed every Administration, but particularly Mr. Jefferson's. It is true, in aiming at this rule, an Administration may make great mistakes. They may sometimes select for important stations, men who bring no force to their cause, but then, this arises only from defect of judgment or information. They intend to strengthen their own party while they serve the country, and if they fail to do so, it is from the causes I mentioned. Sir, look to all Governments which ever existed. You never find one which gives all its favors to an enemy that would have prevented its success, and would, at any moment, prostrate it. The gentleman says, this Administration has been very imprudent, and has committed great blunders in the distribution of its patronage. That may be, but I tell that gentleman, that, if his favorite candidate ever gets into power, he will most infallibly protect his friends, and to a greater extent than the present Administration has ever done. Sir, I believe this Administration has been a little culpable in this matter, although they have incurred the censure of the gentleman for a different course. I think they have not stuck to their friends quite as much as they ought to have done. No gentleman will suspect me of saying this with any personal reference. I never was an applicant for any office, and I never expect to be, and for a very good reason, sir. I never can succeed, if I should apply; there are too many ahead of me, of both parties, who excel me in zeal and ability, and anxiety to obtain office.

FRIDAY, February 1.

The resolutions of Mr. CHILTON with the amendment of Mr. BLAKE, (as proposed to be modified by Mr. DORSEY,) being again under consideration—

Mr. EVERETT said, he begged leave to return his sincere thanks to the House for according to him the indulgence of an adjournment. At this stage of the discussion, (said Mr. E.,) nothing but physical inability to proceed should have induced me to ask this indulgence. I will now endeavor to requite it, by the only means in my power; that is, by introducing no matter into the debate, which shall have a tendency to protract it. I took the liberty, yesterday, to observe, that, when a motion was made by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) to lay the resolution on the table, I voted in the affirmative upon that question. I did so, thinking I foresaw the character of the debate which was likely to arise, if the resolution remained before the House. To a resolution for inquiry, of this nature, I could have no objection, except that of some little crudity in form, which has been objected to this resolution on every side of the House. With that exception, and could it have passed without debate, I should cheerfully have voted for it.

The House was not pleased to make that disposition of the resolution. The debate has been pursued; and the ground, in my judgment, has entirely shifted beneath our feet. It is not now an inquiry into the practicability of retrenchment, with a view to the more rapid payment of the public debt. I do not say that no allusion to this matter is left in the resolution; it may remain there in form; but the substance is changed. The topic now put forward, is the expenditure of the contingent funds, particularly that for foreign intercourse; and taking the debate as an indication of the character of the resolution, it is one of general crimination of the measures of the Administration.

I again beg leave to observe, that I am friendly to inquiry, in any and every form—I care not with what severity and strictness it be instituted. I know that all human establishments (especially so vast and complicated an establishment as that of a Government) are liable to abuse. I am willing to admit, on these general principles, that there may be abuses in the Government as at present administered, although they are as likely to be abuses of restriction, as of extravagance; especially as the one generally leads to the other. Ill-timed and misplaced reduction often leads, in the end, to more lavish expenditure; and a judicious expenditure, (a memorable instance has been lately stated to this House in relation to the Post Office,) as often proves to be true economy. But, retrenchment is a popular theme, and the pruning knife has sometimes been so fully applied to our establishments, that their vital sap has flowed out of the wounds. Still, however, sir, I would never oppose an inquiry into the abuses that may exist; and whether they be those of redundancy or deficiency, I am equally ready to apply the remedy.

Permit me to make one other general remark. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BELL) in his liberal and eloquent address to the House, made a remark, which he justly offered as sound in itself, however paradoxical in its terms, that there were states of things, in which that which is naturally the health and strength of a people becomes a source of decline and decay. The gentleman applied this wise remark to a profuse expenditure of public money. There is another application of it, which seems to me to be equally just and pertinent. This branch of the Government—the Legislative branch—is, has been, and ever must be, the great centre of power in the Republic. It is the heart of the political system, out of which all life and power, as they have been imbibed from the people, must flow back, through the various channels of administration, to them. There are, however, other branches of the Government, which cannot be dispensed with for the public good, and these must be upheld, in their proper spheres and functions. Now, sir, if the tremendous power of this House be brought to bear unduly and disproportionately on other branches of the system; and especially if it be put into an extra-legislative action, (by which I mean an action wholly disconnected from its functions, either as a branch of the Legislature, or the grand inquest of the nation,) then, also, what is naturally our strength and safety, becomes a source of weakness, decay, and ruin.

I have already observed, that the prominent point of the inquiry, as now before the House, has become the foreign service of the country, and the expenditure of the funds appropriated for defraying its expense. The resolution puts forward that as the leading topic, and, in its very terms, (and this objection, I must confess, applies also to the amendment as modified,) gives a character to the mode in which that part of the service has ever been administered unwarranted by the constitution, the law, and the usage under it. We are to inquire into the amount of the sums paid out of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse, and settled at the Treasury without specification; and also into the amount paid out of the same fund, and settled at the Treasury in the usual mode, according to law. So it seems that there are two kinds of settlements—one usual, and according to law; the other by specification, and impliedly neither usual nor legal.

This, sir, is an important topic. The foreign service of the country is an exceedingly responsible branch of the public service. Unless we adopt the Chinese policy, we cannot but stand, in relations with foreign nations, highly important to the welfare and prosperity of the country. In peace, we stand in the relation of an extended and profitable commercial intercourse, depending upon its prosperity, to a good degree, on the character we sustain abroad. When peaceful relations give way to war, its duration depends not a little on the character with which we embark in it. The estimate which other nations form of our character, is affected by the manner in which we are represented abroad. The subject of our foreign intercourse is not, therefore, to be too lightly dealt with. It is one for which the constitution and laws of the country have made peculiar provision—a provision, as I conceive, overlooked, or misstated by the terms of the resolution.

By the Constitution of the United States, it is provided, that the President “shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls.” Over the exercise of this power, no control is given by the constitution, to Congress; nor have they undertaken to exercise any other, than that of limiting the compensation to be allowed to such officers for their services and the expenses incurred by them in the discharge of their duties. How, then, was this provision of the constitution reduced to practice, in the original organization of the Government? In his speech at the opening of the second session of the first Congress, President Washington brought the subject before the two Houses, in the following terms:

“The interest of the United States requires that our intercourse with other nations should be facilitated by such provisions as will enable me to fulfil my duty in that respect, in the manner in which circumstances may render most conducive to the public good: and to this end, that the compensations to be made to the persons who may be employed, should, according to the nature of their appointments, be defined by law; and a competent fund designated, for defraying the expenses incident to the conduct of our Foreign Affairs.”

With the subject thus presented to them, what did Congress do? Did they pass a law creating such and such missions? No sir. Did they appropriate sums of money for such and such salaries and expenditures? No. The law passed is brief, and, bearing strongly on this

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retraçment.

[H. OF R.]

and other matters of interest, I beg leave to cite it. It bears date first of July, 1790:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States shall be, and he is, authorized to draw from the Treasury of the United States, a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, annually, to be paid out of the moneys arising from the duties on imports and tonnage, for the support of such persons as he shall commission to serve the United States in foreign parts, and for the expenses incident to the business in which they may be employed. Provided, That, exclusive of an outfit, which shall, in no case, exceed the amount of one year's full salary to the Minister Plenipotentiary or Chargé des Affaires, to whom the same may be allowed, the President shall not allow to any Minister Plenipotentiary a greater sum than at the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum, as a compensation for all his personal services, and other expenses; nor a greater sum for the same, than four thousand five hundred dollars per annum to a Chargé des Affaires; nor a greater sum for the same, than one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars per annum to the Secretary of any Minister Plenipotentiary. And provided, also, That the President shall account, specifically, for all such expenditures of the said money, as, in his judgment, may be made public, and also for the amount of such expenditures as he may think it advisable not to specify, and cause a regular statement and account thereof to be laid before Congress, annually, and also lodged in the proper office of the Treasury Department.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the space of two years, and from thence, until the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer."

There is one phrase in the law to which I invite the particular attention of the House, ("as he shall commission")—a phrase throwing light on questions not long since much agitated here and elsewhere. There were those who took great alarm at the use of the expression to "commission," when employed by the President of the United States, to indicate one of the Executive functions in the appointment of a foreign Minister. They probably did not advert to the fact, that the President made use of no other language than that of the earliest legislation under the constitution, and meant no more than the law meant by the same expression.

The next law on the subject was passed 9th February, 1793. It continued the act of July, 1790, for another year, and thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and amended it to the following effect:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases where any sum or sums of money have issued, or shall hereafter issue, from the Treasury, for the purpose of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, in pursuance of any law, the President shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause the same to be duly settled, annually, with the accounting officers of the Treasury, in the manner following, that is to say: by causing the same to be accounted for, specifically, in all instances wherein the expenditure thereof may, in his judgment, be made public, and by making a certificate or certificates, or causing the Secretary of State to make a certificate or certificates, of the amount of such expenditures as he may think it advisable not to specify; and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum or sums therein expressed to have been expended."

This is the first full enactment of the mode of settlement by certificate, or without specification, although the elements of the provision exist in the law of 1790.

By the law of March 20, 1794, the large sum of one million of dollars was appropriated, in addition to the annual forty thousand dollars, to defray any expenses which might be incurred, in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; to be applied, under the direction of the President, who, if necessary, was authorized to borrow the money; and an account of the expenditure, as soon as might be, was to be laid before Congress. This large appropriation was designed to meet the expense of a treaty with Algiers.

Several similar acts were passed, at subsequent sessions of Congress, till, on the 10th of May, 1800, a law passed, giving to the legislation on this subject a somewhat modified form. The law is entitled "An act to ascertain the compensation of public Ministers." It contains no appropriation. It re-enacts the former limitation upon the compensation of Ministers Plenipotentiary, Chargé des Affaires, and the Secretaries of Ministers: the second section directs, that, where any sum of money shall be drawn from the Treasury, under any law making appropriation for the contingent expenses of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, the President shall cause the accounts to be settled by certificate, as prescribed by the act of 9th February, 1798; omitting the substitution of the Secretary of State for the President. This year, for the first time, the appropriations for the expenses of intercourse with foreign nations, were transferred to the act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1800. Besides several large specific items, fifty-two thousand dollars were appropriated, in addition to the annual forty thousand.

In May, 1810, an act was passed, fixing the compensation of public Ministers, and of Consuls to the Barbary States. By this law, the compensation of a Minister, and Chargé des Affaires, was fixed as before; that of a Secretary of Legation, at two thousand dollars, &c.; and it was provided that it should be lawful for the President to allow to a Minister Plenipotentiary, or Chargé des Affaires, on going from the United States, to any foreign country, an outfit, which shall, in no case, exceed one year's full salary of such Minister or Chargé des Affaires; but no Consul shall be allowed an outfit, in any case whatever, any usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding. The third section of this law was the same, verbatim, with the second of the law of 1800.

Up to this time, the appropriation acts had contained one item, viz: for the expenses of foreign intercourse. From 1810 to 1814, there were two items of appropriation, one for the expenses of foreign intercourse, and one for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. The first of these sums was applied to pay the salaries of the Ministers, Chargé des Affaires, and Secretaries; the second was placed entirely at the discretion of the President, to discharge contingent expenses arising from the foreign intercourse, as he should think just and equitable.

In the general appropriation act of 1814, the item which, till then, had been expressed in general terms, for the expenses of foreign intercourse, was made more specific—"for the salaries, allowances, and contingent expenses, of Ministers to foreign nations, and of Secretaries of Legation;" after which was added the other item, for the contingent expenses of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.

In April, 1818, the general appropriation bill contained one item for the salaries of Ministers at the several foreign courts, specified by name, and their several Secretaries of Legation; an item for two outfits of Ministers, to London and St. Petersburg; an item for the contingent expenses of all the missions; an item to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation of the preceding year; and the usual item for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. Similar specifications have been made in all the annual general appropriation bills, since that time.

From this view of the legislation of the subject, it appears that, originally, the whole fund for foreign intercourse, and, since 1814, the sums appropriated for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, have been placed entirely at the direction of the President. And, further, that a settlement, by certificate, without specification, is coeval with the Government, and in conformity both with usage and law.

I have been induced to make these statements, not merely for the sake of a better understanding of the point, in the resolution, on which it bears, but also in order to prepare the way for a satisfactory answer to some of the charges made against the President of the United States, relative to the accounts of his compensation and allowances, as a foreign Minister. This is a subject on which I enter with much reluctance; it is not, perhaps, of the class which I should select to discuss on this floor. It does not belong, strictly, to this debate; but it has been introduced, on the present occasion, with strong emphasis; and to the effect, no doubt, of giving sanction to what is said more at large on the same topic elsewhere. This is an important point: for the allegations have extended not merely to a charge of extravagance, but of illegality, and even fraud.

High salaries are, I know, a popular subject of comment, and, as those of the foreign Ministers are, with a single exception, the highest paid under the Government, it is natural that they should be obnoxious to complaint. But, sir, it is an undoubted truth, that, high as they may be thought, great as their aggregate may seem, for the service of a long series of years, they are yet too small; and, but for the extra allowance by which they are eked out, would be wholly inadequate to their object. It is not long since that a most respectable member of Congress, opposed to the Administration, expressed to me his concurrence in this opinion, and his willingness to join in raising them. I speak of the salaries of the three most expensive missions—to London, Paris, and St. Petersburg. It is a sufficient confirmation of the truth of this remark, that the compensation of foreign Ministers is smaller, by one-fifth, than it was in the Revolutionary war. It was then fixed at two thousand five hundred pounds sterling, with an allowance of expenses. We are told, by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Floyd,) that he approved the Republican simplicity in which a Franklin and a Livingston lived, at the court of France. Dr. Franklin's simplicity was kept up, for about eight years and a half, at an aggregate expense of one hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars, (money being then twice as valuable as now,) and Chancellor Livingston, as I am informed, during his short residence at Paris, in addition to his allowance from the Government, sunk an estate of one hundred thousand dollars. I repeat it, sir, that, but for the extra allowances, it would be impossible for our Ministers, at the courts I have named, to remain and support themselves; and the weight of necessary expenditure over the utmost allowance, has, to many of them, proved the cause of utter ruin. It is not necessary that I should specify the names of the living or of the dead.

Another remark, Mr. Speaker: The allowances to the President, be they great or small, were the acts of other Administrations—of the Administrations of Messrs. Madison and Monroe. Mr. Adams had nothing to do in establishing the offices, fixing the compensation, or seeking the employment. For a third of a century passed in the public service, he never, neither himself, nor his friends for him, with his knowledge, nor without his knowledge, that I am aware of, solicited any office. The compensations and allowances to the foreign Ministers were fixed by General Washington, under the limitations of acts of Congress, and were paid to Mr. Adams, as they had been paid to his predecessors.

Farther, sir, Mr. Adams had nothing to do with auditing his own accounts, or controlling the settlement of them; although this has been alleged, out of doors, and intimated, as I think, in this debate. The standing instructions to our foreign Ministers, require them, once a quarter, to make up and transmit an account to the Treasury. This was done by Mr. Adams;

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

and in all his accounts there was but one item which the accounting officers of the Treasury declined settling themselves. That one item was referred to the President, by Mr. Adams, while Secretary of State; and, on legal advice, ordered by the President to be settled. To this I shall presently recur. With this exception, Mr. Adams had no more to do with the settlement of his accounts than you had, Mr. Speaker. He could have no more to do with it, if the officers of the Treasury were faithful to their trust.

I will add, sir, that, taking into consideration the number of years passed by Mr. Adams in the foreign service; the nature of his appointments; the variety and importance of the missions with which he has been entrusted, in whole or in part, no foreign Minister has received less than he; while many have received more. For the four years and eight months, commencing in 1812, when the first question of his accounts arises, and ending at his return, he received, in all, about $75,000. For a like term, Mr. Monroe received $82,000; for one year and eleven months, Mr. Pinckney received $41,000.

To place this matter in a clearer light, permit me, sir, to enter into some detail. In July, 1809, Mr. Adams received his appointment as Minister to Russia, with the usual salary and outfit, and repaired with his family, to St. Petersburg: a residence, I believe, as expensive as any in the world. No exception, as I understand, is taken to any thing in his accounts, till the commencement of the mission for the negotiation of peace under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia. This mediation was offered in the fall of 1812, through the agency of Mr. Adams; and I believe it is not too much to say, that it was mainly owing to the favorable impression of the American character conceived by the Emperor Alexander, during the mission of Mr. Adams, that the offer was made. This offer was accepted by the American Government, and, in April, 1813, a commission was sent to Mr. Adams, jointly with Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard, to negotiate the treaty with Great Britain, under the proffered mediation. The Secretary of State, under Mr. Madison, on informing him of his appointment, in conjunction with the other gentlemen, said, "as you will all be exposed to considerable expense, an outfit has been allowed to each." It may here be observed, that, in employing, as one of the three negotiators, the resident Minister at St. Petersburg, a saving of $9,000 accrued to the Government. The outfit alluded to was allowed and paid, at the time, to Mr. Adams.

Messrs. Bayard and Gallatin arrived at St. Petersburg in July, 1813. The Emperor was absent on the eventful campaign against the French; but the conferences of the Commissioners were opened with Count Romanzoff, Chancellor of the Empire. The expenses which the outfit was intended to cover, incident to the arrival of a new mission, actually accrued to a considerable extent, and were incurred the more freely by Mr. Adams, for the very reason that he had been allowed and paid an outfit for that purpose. England, however, it is well known, refused to accept the mediation of the Emperor, and the mission under it closed, by the departure of Messrs. Bayard and Gallatin, in January, 1814. Mr. Adams was then left as the resident Minister at St. Petersburg.

In refusing to negotiate under the mediation of Russia, Great Britain offered to treat directly with the United States, at Gottenburg or London, and this offer was accepted. Mr. Adams was appointed in joint commission with Messrs. Bayard, Clay, and Russell, to whom was afterwards added Mr. Gallatin, to negotiate for peace at Gottenburg. Mr. A. received this commission at St. Petersburg, in April, 1814, with the instructions to repair to Gottenburg. His commission as Minister to St. Petersburg still remained in force, and he was directed to leave Mr. L. Harris, as charged with the affairs of the Legation during his absence. Of his family, he had with him at that time, at St. Petersburg, his wife, in very ill health, and a son under seven years of age. In travelling from St. Petersburg to Gottenburg, it was necessary to go by water passage, upon the Gulfs of Finland and Bothnia, or by crossing five passages, from ten to fifty miles in extent, over the islands of the latter of those Gulfs—which passages, at that season of the year, by the breaking up of the ice, were rendered impracticable, and were, at their first opening, extremely dangerous.

There was little expectation, in any quarter, that the negotiation would be successful; and there was every reason, on the part of Mr. Adams, to believe, that, after a short absence, he would be obliged to return to St. Petersburg. He therefore left his family and establishment there, which continued at nearly the same expense as before. Taking passage by water at Revel, in the first vessel which sailed, after the breaking up of the ice, and after repeated delay, and detention, and great risk, from the same cause, Mr. Adams arrived at Stockholm on the 25th of May. He there learned that an arrangement had been made by Messrs. Bayard and Gallatin (who were in London) with the British Government, by which the seat of negotiation had been transferred from Gottenburg to Ghent, in Flanders. An American sloop of war was then at Gottenburg, having, as a cartel, conveyed Messrs. Clay and Russell to that place. It was ordered to the Texel, there to await the further direction of the American Ministers. Mr. Adams accordingly proceeded to Gottenburg, embarked with Mr. Russell on board the vessel, landed from her at the Texel, and thence proceeded by land to Ghent, where he arrived on the 24th of June. Six months from that day, on the 24th December, 1814, the Treaty of Peace was signed.

For this mission to Gottenburg and Ghent, Mr. A. never (as has been alleged) received either salary or outfit. And yet it was a mission different in its locality and the expense incident to it, from that under the mediation. The outfit for the latter was not intended to cover, and could not cover, the extra expenses for the former. Accordingly, Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard, each of whom had received an outfit and the expense of their conveyance to St. Petersburg, on the mission of mediation, were yet allowed all their travelling expenses from St. Petersburg to Ghent. On the same principle, and on the established precedents in the cases of Mr. Thomas Pinckney, in 1795, and Mr. Monroe, in 1805, who were allowed all the extra expenses of their mission to Spain, while they retained their commissions and salaries as resident Plenipotentiaries in London, Mr. A. retaining his commission at St. Petersburg, was allowed, in addition to his salary as Minister there, the necessary expenses incident to the mission extraordinary to Gottenburg and Ghent. The reasonableness of the allowance to them was never doubted. In Mr. Monroe's case, it received the direct sanction of Congress, not two years ago. It could not be more questionable in the case of Mr. Adams. Those gentlemen had to provide for their families in their absence; Mr. Adams was compelled to leave his at St. Petersburg, with a necessary continuance of almost all the expenses of his establishment. The extra expenses incurred were, therefore, fairly chargeable upon the extra service. The period during which this service continued, including the negotiation of a commercial convention with Great Britain, was fifteen months, from April, 26, when Mr. A. left St. Petersburg, to 3d July. But the charges made by him, and allowed to him, were confined to the period from his departure from St. Petersburg to the time when his family joined him at Paris, about eleven months.

Mr. Adams had been informed by the Secretary of State, at the time he was appointed on the commission, under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia, that, in the event of the conclusion of peace, it was the intention of President Madison to nominate him as Minister to London. He accordingly repaired to Paris, and directed his family to join him there, with a view to receiving the order of the President either for his transfer, or his recall to America. They arrived at Paris, March 20, 1815. On the 7th of May, he received a letter from the Secretary of State, informing him of his appointment as Minister to London. This was in the midst of the period in France which has been called the Hundred Days; between the arrival of Napoleon from Elba and the battle of Waterloo. The ordinary communications between France and England were interrupted; and the passage of Mr. A. and his family to the latter country was attended with difficulty and delay. He arrived in London on the 15th of May, 1815, and the next day received his commission and credential letters to England, and letter of recall from Russia.

According to the rule adopted, as early as the Administration of General Washington, Mr. A. would have been authorized to consider his mission as Minister Plenipotentiary to the Russian Government as terminating on the day on which he received his letter of recall. He might, also, on the same rule, have charged his extra expenses to the account of the joint commission for negotiating the commercial convention with Great Britain. He, however, considered his mission to St. Petersburg as terminating when the expenses incident to it terminated, viz: the arrival of his family at Paris, and regarded the special mission for negotiating a commercial convention as merged in that of Minister Plenipotentiary to England, for which he received a full outfit. Accordingly, from the 20th of March, 1815, he made no charge, and received no allowances, for the expenses of a special mission. His colleagues received, for their part, in the service of negotiating the commercial convention of July 3, 1815, each a half outfit. Mr. A. has received no corresponding allowance.

In this way, the time for which Mr. Adams was allowed the necessary expenses of the special mission to Gottenburg and Ghent, is reduced to between ten and eleven months—about the same space of time which was occupied by the special mission to Spain of Mr. T. Pinckney, in 1795, and Mr. Monroe, in 1804-'5. The allowance to those gentlemen for their expenses was, to Mr. Pinckney about nine thousand dollars, and to Mr. Monroe upwards of eleven thousand dollars. The whole amount of expenses allowed to Mr. Adams, was $6,385—less than was ever claimed or allowed in any parallel case, since the foundation of the Government.

Sir, there were other topics on which I meant to have touched, but I have exhausted the little strength which I brought into the House. In the part I have taken in the discussion, I have acted on the defensive. I own that I have been a little surprised, that it has even been made a question, whether the Administration was assailed or not. Why, sir, there has not been a day, nor an hour, since it was formed, that it has not been assailed. I do not now complain of this—I do but state the fact; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us now, what we were told two years ago, by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the very existence of the Administration was a political felony; that they have burst unlawfully into the offices of State, and that he would no more make terms with them, that is no more "judge them by their acts," than with the robber, who, having broken into his premises, should promise to behave himself well. One gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. MITCHELL) says they are already too much worn out to be attacked; and the gentleman from Tennessee,

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

(Mr. BELL,) that they are run down; and yet we are accused of kindling at fancied charges, and bristling up in the defence, when nobody has attacked us.

Sir, such an assault, in my limited acquaintance with the history of the country, I have nowhere found. A Chief Magistrate, of more than ordinary simplicity of life, and purity of character, is denounced at one moment as the imitator of oriental pomp; and at the next, as the profligate corruptor of the youth of the nation. As able, faithful, and patriotic a Cabinet as any ever formed since the first Administration of Washington, and abler than almost every other which has followed, is denounced as weak, inefficient, and corrupt. An Administration, which, in three years, has applied thirty-three millions to the payment of the public debt, and expended ten or twelve more in objects of public utility, is proclaimed to be profuse and extravagant. An Administration which came into power avowedly on the principle of seeking out the best talents of the nation, for offices of trust and honor, and which, if it has erred, has erred in neglecting its friends, is charged with proscribing and persecuting its opponents. And, after all this has been repeated, year after year, till, in its effect, gentlemen flatter themselves, and tell us that we are wasted, worn out, and run down; and after each and every one of these topics, and numerous others, have been touched, in this very debate, we are then told to keep very cool—nobody has attacked us.

But I am willing, for one, sir, to take these declarations of gentlemen as the indication of the course which they approve, and are willing to pursue. It is time, for the honor of the country, that the war of extermination should cease. In laying waste the characters of those who, under the constitution of the country, are clothed with the administration of its affairs, we are wasting that which is a part of the most valuable treasure of the nation. Above all, it appears to me, that it is time the vehemence with which, within these walls, the war has been waged against the Administration, should cease. In addition to its necessary and unavoidable evils, the waste of time—the sacrifice of dignity—the kindling of the worst passions; it is accompanied with the still greater evil, that it lends a kind of sanction to that ferocity of the press, which has already reached the point at which many of the most valuable citizens of the community shrink back into retirement, before the storm of obloquy that awaits every one who appears before the public. Before I sit down, sir, I must ask leave to say, that if every member had spoken in the tone of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) I should probably not have troubled the House. To almost every remark that fell from him, I yielded a hearty assent. I feel, not less strongly than he, though I may be unable to express it with that manly force which enchaind the attention of the House, that this warfare is mali exempli, without our even being able to plead, in excuse, that the bad example sprang from a good one. The gentleman, with a liberality which I could not but admire, however little I might be willing to sanction the consciousness of political strength with which he spoke, told us that the joy of the huntsman is in the chase, and that when the game is run down, he calls off the pack, and will not let them mangle the carcass. The gentleman cannot expect me to agree with him that the game is run down, but he will agree with me, that, of the pack which sprang at the throats of this Administration, there were some, whose fangs were already fleshed in other game. And is the law of the chase altered? Will not what has been, again be? Believe me, sir, it will; the fate of Actæon is no fable here: and scarcely will the gentleman's gallant huntsman—(unless some rare felicity of fortune shall elevate him above the lot of his predecessors,) scarcely will he have wound his horn in triumph, when he will find, to his amazement, that he is the game, and some of those who have shared in the triumph of the chase will turn and spring upon him.

Ille fugit per quæ fuerat loca sæpe secutus.

Sir, the gentleman will pardon my allusion, as I, most cheerfully, accepted his. I make it not insidiously, nor with the slightest shade of personality; but in some measure in consideration of the well-known composition of the two great parties, and still more on the immutable principles of our nature, by which it follows, of stern necessity, that —in these cases,

We still have judgment here, that we but teach
Bloody instructions, which, being taught, return
To plague the inventor: This even-handed justice
Commends the ingredients of our poisoned chalice
To our own lips.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose, and said: I cannot make the promise which the gentleman who has just taken his seat, made at the outset of his address—but I will make a promise of a different nature, and one which, I trust, it will be in my power to perform—I shall not say with more good faith than the gentleman from Massachusetts—but more to the letter—aye, sir, and more to the spirit too. I shall not, as the gentleman said he would do, act in mere self-defence. I shall carry the war into Africa. I shall not be content with merely parrying—no, sir—if I can, so help me God, I will thrust also—because my right arm is nerved by the cause of the people and of my country. I listened to the gentleman with pleasure—I mean to the general course of his remarks. But for some of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, in allusion to newspaper publications, I should have begun in at least as low a key and as temperate a mood as he did. To that key I will now pitch my voice. I have been absent from the House for several days. I requested my colleague (Mr. ALEXANDER) to state the cause of that absence, which he did. Yet even this could not be reported correctly. As this may be the last act of public duty which I shall be able to perform—at least, during the present session—and as I have given up myself a sacrifice to its performance, I respectfully ask the House to give their attention to what I have now to say. I understand that, during my absence, I have been replied to by various gentlemen, (some of whom I have not the honor to know by person,) on different sides of the House, in a manner which I do not doubt was perfectly satisfactory—at least, to the speakers themselves. I certainly do not wish to disturb their self-complacency, de minimis non curat, whether of persons or of things. The gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. VANCE,) with that blunt plainness and candor which, I am told, belongs to him, and which I admire in proportion as they are rare qualities in these days—I like him the better for his surly honesty—I hope he will take no offence at the term, for I can assure him that none is intended—charged me, in my absence, (so my friends have informed me,) with what I believe he would not hesitate to have charged to my face, and to which I have no objection, except to the authority on which he relied; but I protest against any gentleman's producing, as proof of what I have, at any time, said, a newspaper, or any thing purporting to be a Register of Debates, unless I endorse it, and more particularly remarks drawn from the debates of another body, which, in regard to me, are particularly unfaithful. I shall show to the House, not such matter as the gentleman from Massachusetts stirred, to the injury of every moral sense, of every moral being. I shall refer to a matter of recent notoriety: that will test the correctness of these reports. In the debate on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) respecting a picture of the battle of New Orleans, I did state, as distinctly as I could articulate, that I had seen a monument erected to the memory of Andre, the British Spy, in Westminster Abbey; that it was mutilated—the head of General Washington, and arm (I think) of Andre, having been broken off. The General's, most probably, by some Tory boy from the neighboring school of Westminster, and that of Andre, probably, by some Whig boy, in retaliation. The name of Hamilton did not escape my lips. I thought, indeed, of Hamilton, but it was of a living Hamilton—the gentleman from South Carolina—but, then, parliamentary usage does not permit us to speak of one another by name. Now, sir, I can show you, on the same authority which was relied on by the gentleman from Ohio—though I acknowledge that the reports of that paper, so far, at least, as I am concerned, have generally been more accurate this year, than I have for a long time known them to be before—that I am represented as saying, that the monuments in Westminster Abbey were mutilated in the same manner as the tombs of Hamilton and Washington had been mutilated here. The word tomb never escaped my lips on that occasion. Sir, this would have been a palpable falsehood. Where is the tomb of Washington? There is no such thing in this country, nor have I ever heard that a tomb has been erected to the memory of Hamilton; but I suppose that the next thing we shall hear will be, that the Quarterly, or some other Review, comes out, and observes with a sneer, that, as Roger Sherman said the vote was the monument, so a gentleman from Virginia had, by a speech in Congress, built up a tomb for Washington—a “constructive” tomb, that existed nowhere but in his eccentric imagination. Sir, the tombs of Washington and of Hamilton might stand anywhere in this country unenclosed—they might indeed be liable to injury from the beasts of the field, or from some invidious foreigner, but the hand of no American would ever mutilate them. Sir, in the course of another debate, it seems that I rendered to a gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) the homage which his abilities deserved—and God forbid that the time should ever arrive when I refuse to do justice to an adversary—when I shall disparage any merit, because it is found in the person of an opponent. When that time shall arrive, may I never receive mercy from that fountain of it to which alone we all must look, if we hope for forgiveness hereafter. I said that I would not, like him, pronounce a palinodia, neither am I now going to pronounce a palinodia in respect to the gentleman from New York. I shall not take back one jot of praise bestowed upon him. With whatever views he introduced it, the doctrine has always been mine—the strict subordination of the military to the civil authority—scripture is scripture, by whom, or for whatever purpose it may be quoted. I know nothing of the private habits of that gentleman, (Mr. STORRS,) but I know that he has too much good taste not to agree with me, that time may be much better spent than in reading the Documents piled up here. Yet, in the report of that debate, I was represented as saying, that, like the gentleman from New York, I did not—what? pronounce a palinodia? No, sir, not at all—but, that, like him, I did not read the Documents. Sir, nobody reads the Documents, for this plain reason, that no man can read them—and if he could, he could hardly be worse employed. Sir, with a few exceptions, the Documents are printed that they may be printed, not that they may be read.

And now, sir, comes another charge, about the miserable oppressed inhabitants of Ireland. This subject has been mentioned to me, by no gentleman on the other side, except a member from Maryland—from the eastern shore of Maryland, (Mr. KERR,) who is, not only by the courtesy of this House, but is in fact, a gentleman. He, in Committee on the Rules and Orders of the House, expressed to me his astonishment that what I said on that occasion

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

could have been so much misunderstood and misrepresented—that he heard me most distinctly. I now call on any member who understood me differently, at the time, to rise in his place and say so. [Here Mr. R. paused for reply. None being given, and some friends having said across the seats, that no member could or would say, that he had understood Mr. R. as he had been misrepresented, Mr. R. went on.] Without meaning to plead to—that is, without meaning to admit, the jurisdiction of the press, in the extent which it arrogates to itself, I am perfectly sensible that no man is above public opinion. God forbid that any man in this country shall ever be able to brave it—and I regret that any one should have supposed me capable of uttering such sentiments. So far from it, I have been the steady, firm, constant, and strenuous advocate, to the best of my poor ability, of the oppressed people of Ireland. And why? For the reason I stated on a former occasion. They fought our battles, sir. I have known and esteemed many of them. Some of them have been—they are dead; and others are living, among my warmest friends and best neighbors. In the course of a not uneventful life, I have seen many things, but I have yet to see that rara avis in terris—I have seen a black swan—an Irish Tory. I have known Tories of every description. Yes, sir, and some even in Virginia—even we had a few of them during the revolution, but too few to give us any trouble or alarm—but I never have yet seen an Irish Tory, or the man who had seen one. Sir, I don't read the newspapers—I don't read gentlemen's speeches, and then come here to answer them. But I am extremely pleased, nay, flattered, in the highest degree, at being told by my friends, that the gentleman from Ohio attributed, in his speech, so much to my efforts in bringing the Administration to its present lank and lean condition. The gentleman could not have pleased me better—I only fear that, with all his bluntness and frankness, the gentleman was not quite sincere, and was only adorning me with fillets and garlands, like the priests of the sacrifice of yore, previous to knocking me, and with me, the party whom he strives to wound, through my sides, on the head. He was pleased to place me at the head, of what has been denominated the Opposition party in this House; but at its head, or that of any other party in this House, he will never find me, for reasons which I could state, but which are wholly unnecessary. Times are indeed changed with the gentleman and his friends, when they hold this language concerning me. But a little while ago, and the friends of the Administration, nay, the members of the Administration, affected to consider me as one of their firmest props. They could not, indeed, vote for me—they were men too nice in their principle for that: but, considering the great benefit which they derived from my opposition, they could not (except for the honor of the country) regret my re-election. Amiable and excellent men! But they now sing to a very different gamut. If any gentleman will bring against me, any allegation, from a clean and respectable source, I will do one of two things—I will either deny it, or admit it, and defend it upon my views and principles. Sir, it seems I committed a great offence in not voting for the admission of the new States into the Union, and especially of Ohio. Yet, sir, if the thing were to do over again, I should act precisely in the same manner, and past experience would teach me I was right. What were the new States? Vast deserts of woods, inhabited by the aborigines, to whom, if we come to the question of right, they did of right belong; and it was a question whether sound policy would dictate that we ought, by creating these States, to encourage sparse settlements, and thereby to weaken our frontier. I thought this was bad policy. Not that I am in favor of a very dense population. I am against the rabble of your great cities, but I am equally opposed to having a land without inhabitants. But, sir, I had other reasons—graviora manent—Does the gentleman from Ohio, with all his laudable prejudice and partiality towards his own State, think that I, as a Virginian, feeling at least equal prejudice and partiality to my native land with that which he feels for his State, would lend my sanction to an act on the part of Virginia, which beggars every instance of fatuity and folly extant in the history of nations? Why, sir, the knight of La Mancha himself, or poor old Lear in the play, never was guilty of a grosser act of fatuity than was the State of Virginia, when she committed that suicidal deed—the surrendering of her immense territory beyond the River Ohio, upon the express condition of excluding her own citizens from its benefit, when the country (yielded for the common good of the Confederacy) should come to be settled. Yes, sir, it was an act of suicide—of political suicide—the effects of which she has felt, and will continue to feel, so long as she has any political existence at all. Sir, this was one of those amiable and philanthropic acts of legislation, which, however good in point of intention, lead to the most disastrous and ruinous consequences. Can the gentleman from Ohio conceive that I, a Virginian, could further this cut-throat policy? Sir, I thought the Ohio a well-defined natural boundary, and that we ought not to weaken by extending our frontier. The late war verified my foresight. Whom have I injured? The native savages and the trees, or the States that have been drained of their population to fill out Ohio? Sir, I offered no wrong to the people of Ohio: for there were then none to injure. They have gone there, or have been born since. Sir, this was the “head and front of my offending,” and, if the gentleman has his apparatus ready, I am prepared to undergo any form of execution which his humanity will allow him to inflict, or which even his justice may award.

The gentleman from Massachusetts cannot expect that I shall follow him through his elaborate detail of the diplomatic expenses of this Government. The House, however, will permit me to observe, that there was a hiatus—valde defendus, I do not doubt, but certainly not deeply lamented by me—a hiatus which embraces the whole period of the Administration of Mr. Jefferson. I am not going into the question of these expenses; I will stir no such matter. Demands which have dogged the doors of the Treasury so long and so perseveringly as that they have been at length allowed, some from motives of policy, others to get rid of importunate and sturdy beggars—although they were disallowed under Mr. Jefferson's Administration. But, sir, if every claim that gets through this House, or is allowed by this Government, after years of importunity, (some of them of thirty years' standing,) is for that reason considered by the gentleman as a just claim, and fit to be drawn into precedent, my notions of justice, and of sound precedent, differ greatly from his. I, too, sir, am as much opposed as he can be to what is truly called the prodigality of parsimony. The gentleman thinks the salaries of our foreign Ministers are too low, and therefore, that they must be eked out by these allowances from the contingent fund—out of what is called the secret service money. The gentleman is right as to the existence of such a fund. It was appointed, and perhaps properly, for Washington was to be the first who was charged with its disbursement. But, sir, our early Presidents always made it a point of honor to return this fund untouched. They said to the nation, You trusted me with your purse, I have had no occasion to use it, here it is; count the money; there is as much by tale and as much by weight, as I received from you—but was it ever dreant, that such a fund was to be put into the hands of the President of the United States, to furnish him with the means of rewarding his favorites? No, sir; it was to pay those waiters and chambermaids, and evedroppers, and parasites, and panders, that the gentleman told us of on the other side of the water—and there it might be all very right and proper—but not here, sir, because we flatter ourselves, that the state of morals in this country is such as to save us from any such necessity. No gentleman would understand him as speaking of the sums which had been placed at the disposal of different Presidents, to a vast amount, for the purpose of negotiating with the Barbary Powers, &c.; but of that amount set apart, and generally known, as secret service money. Mr. Jefferson used a small portion of this fund one year, to pay some expense in relation to Burr's conspiracy, which was not allowed at the Treasury. Sir, with regard to the old billiard table, which is said to have cost some fifty dollars, it is a subject I should never have mentioned. I consider that game as a healthy, manly, rational mode of exercise, when the weather is such as to confine us within doors. I shall certainly never join in any cant or clamor against it. I look upon it as a suitable piece of furniture in the house of any gentleman who can afford it, where it is allowed by law, as it is here and throughout the State of Maryland; and I should be sorry if we were to proscribe that manly and innocent amusement. If I have any objection to that item, it is that such a pitiful article should have been bought. I would have given him one that cost five hundred dollars, and I would have voted the appropriation with cheerfulness. My objection to such a charge, is, that it is a shabby affair, and looks too much like a sneaking attempt to propitiate, by the cheapness of the thing, popular displeasure. The attempt to keep the thing out of sight, only makes the matter still worse. I do not charge the gentleman from North Carolina with any such intention, but this seems to me to be too small a matter. I would strike at higher game. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that Franklin received a higher compensation than Mr. Adams and other Ministers of these times. He did, sir; and what was the answer which that shrewd and sensible man gave (for Poor Richard had always an eye to the main chance) when his accounts were scrutinized into, and his receipts were deemed exorbitant? It was this, sir: Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. The very answer, sir, that I myself gave in Morrison's Hotel, in Dublin, to a squireen and an agent. For a description of these varieties of the plagues of Ireland, see Miss Edgeworth—delightful, ingenious, charming, sensible, witty, inimitable, though not unlimited, Miss Edgeworth. When describing the misery of the south and west of Ireland, that I had lately travelled over, I was asked, And what would you do, pray, sir, for the relief of Ireland? with an air that none but Miss Edgeworth can describe, and that no one that has not been in Ireland can conceive. My reply was, I would unmuzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn; and I had like to have got myself into a sad scrape by it, as any one who has been in Ireland will readily understand. Yes, sir, I was disposed to give to the houseless, naked, shivering, half-starved Irish laborer, something like a fair portion of the product of his toil, of the produce of the land on which he breathes, but does not live, to put victuals into his stomach, clothes upon his back, and something like a house over his head, instead of the wretched pig-sty, that is now his only habitation—shelter it is none; and this was just the last remedy that an Irish agent or middle man, or tythe-proctor, or absentee, would prescribe or submit to.

But, sir, to return. "These salaries are too small." I cannot agree with the gentleman. There is one touchstone of such a question—it is the avidity with which those situations are sought—I will not say by members of this House—we are hardly deemed of sufficient rank to fill them. Sir, so long as these foreign missions are sought with avidity—so long as members of Congress, and not of this House only, or chiefly, will bow, and cringe, and duck, and fawn, and get out of the way at a pinching vote, or lend a helping hand at a pinching vote, to obtain these places, I never will consent to enlarge the salary attached to them. Small as the gentleman tells us these salaries are, I will take it on me to say, that they are three times as great as the net proceeds of his estate, made by any planter on the Roanoke. But, then, we are told that they live at St. Petersburg and London, and that living there is very expensive. Well, sir, who sent them there? Who pressed them to go there? Were they impressed, sir? Were they taken by a press gang, on Tower Hill, knocked down, handcuffed, chucked on board of a tender, and told that they must take the pay and rations which his Majesty was pleased to allow? No such thing, sir. I will now quit this subject, and say only this, that our Minister (Mr. ADAMS) was paid for a constructive journey—that, I think, is the phrase—which means neither more nor less than a journey which was never performed.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

[Here Mr. EVERETT made a gesture of dissent.]

The gentleman shakes his head. Sir, we shall see more of this hereafter, but I will reason only hypothetically. If the gentleman in question, while he remained at St. Petersburg, could make the journey imputed to him, it beats the famous journey from Mexico to Tacubaya, as far as some distance, however small, exceeds no distance whatever. Sir, if a gentleman from Washington goes to Georgetown, or to Alexandria, yes, sir, or to Bladensburg, I will acknowledge that he performs, at least in some sense, a sort of journey. But not if he remains in this city, and never stirs out of it. However, I will not now press this matter further—others will do more justice to it—de minimis non curat.

Paulo majora canamus.

There was one remark, which I took down while the gentleman was speaking, and which I cannot pass by. Who that gentleman was, described by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who proposed to him that, if he would move to raise these salaries, that gentleman would join with him and support him, I cannot conjecture or divine. Be he who he may, I will venture to say this much. He is some gentleman who expects to be sent upon some mission himself, and, with great forecast and prudence, he was calculating to throw upon the present Administration, beforehand, all the odium of the increase of the salary which he hoped to finger. I am disposed to be more just to the gentleman and to the Administration, because I believe that he will get full as much as he may deserve, and they have full as much weight as they can carry, without adding to it another feather.

The gentleman, with much gravity, with some dexterity, and with great plausibility, but against certain principles which I have held in this House, ad oco, and which I shall continue to hold, usque ad mala, till I leave the feast, spoke of the headlong commencement of the Opposition, before the Administration could give reasonable cause of discontent. Sir, I have now no palinodia to sing or to chant upon that subject. I drew my conclusions from that fountain which never failed an observing and a sagacious man, and which, even the simple and inexperienced (and I among the rest) may drink at—it is nature and human life. I saw distinctly, from the beginning, that, if we permitted this Administration—if we listened to those who cried to us, "Wait, wait, there is a lion in the path," (and, sir, there always is a lion in the path, to the sluggard, and to the dastard,) and which cry was seconded, no doubt, by many who wished to know how the land lay before they ran for a port—on which side victory would incline, before they sounded their horn of triumph—if we had thus waited, sir, the situation of the country would have been very different from what it is now. Sir, there was a great race to be run—if you will permit me to draw an illustration from a sport to which I have been much addicted—one in which all the gentlemen in Virginia, when we had gentlemen in Virginia, delighted, and of which I am yet very fond—I mean from the turf—and it must be lost, or won, as the greatest race in the country was won—I mean the race on Long Island, which I saw, and that was by running every inch of the ground—by going off at score—by following the policy of Purdy. Purdy, sir, was a man of sound sense, and practical knowledge—a man of common sense, I mean, and worth a thousand of your old and practised statesmen, and "premature" gentlemen, who never arrive at maturity—and who, meaning to side with the next Administration in case of our success, were nevertheless resolved to get all they could, in the mean time, out of this. Sir, to one of these trimming gentry, it is worse than death to force him to take sides before a clear indication of victory, and hence the cry of its being "premature" to stir the question of the next Presidential election. Sir, if we had set off one session later, we should not have had ground enough left to run upon, to overtake, and pass, and beat them, before they would have passed the winning post, and pocketed the stakes. Such would have been the effect, if we had delayed our push, and I know no one that would have enjoyed the result, and chuckled at our folly with more hearty glee, than one of these same old and practised statesmen. [Here something was said which our reporter did not hear, and to which Mr. EVERETT was understood to reply, that he had not stated it as his sentiment, but as a fact.] I beg the gentleman's pardon; I never was misrepresented by him, I never will misrepresent him, unless I misunderstand him. But I wonder it never occurred to the gentleman from Massachusetts what could be the cause why such a hue and cry should be raised against an Administration so very able, (permit me in this, however, to differ from the gentlemen, de quibus non est,) what, I say, could have been the cause why Actæon and all his bounds, or, rather, why the dogs of war were let slip against this wise, and able, and virtuous, and loving Administration; these patterns of political friendship and consistency; and have continued to pursue them, till they lie panting and gasping for breath on the highway—until they realize the beautiful fable of the hare and many friends. The cause of all this is to be found in the manner in which they came into power—the cause of this “premature” opposition lies there, and there mainly. I would defy all the public presses in the world to have brought them to this pass, had there not been a taint of original sin in their body politic, and which cleaves to them even as the sin of our first parents taints our fallen nature, and cleaveth to us all. The gentleman refers to those who compose the party called the Opposition, and says, it is formed of very discordant materials. True, sir; but what are the materials of the party which upholds the Administration? Nay, of the Administration itself? Are they perfectly homogeneous? I know one of them—who has been raised to a higher station than most men in this country—was that because he opposed, or because he espoused the election of the present Chief Magistrate? Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, what could cause the old Republican party in New England—the worthy successors of John Langdon—to be now found acting with us? They know—but perhaps some in this House do not know—they know that the Southern interest is as much their natural ally, in protecting them against an overweening oligarchy at home, as England is the natural ally of Portugal, against the power of Spain and France; and though they left us for a time, yet now, apprehending danger, and seeing through the artifices of their betrayer, they have returned to us, their old, natural, and approved allies. Sir, have not the Administration, as well as the Opposition, ways and means and funds in their hands, to obtain influence and buy success? Have they not the whole of the great mass of patronage in their hands? But the gentleman says that, so far from taking care of their adherents, they have been too liberal in bestowing this upon their enemies: but it is easy to account for this. An ancient apothegm tells us that it is better to judge between two of your enemies than between two of your friends. In the one case you are almost sure, by your decision, to make a friend, and in the other, to lose one. Now, sir, our able and practised statesmen know, that, by giving a loaf and a fish to an enemy, they make a friend, when, by giving them to one of their friends, they might disoblige another, who might think his claims disparaged—and that, sir, is the whole secret of their neglecting their friends.

Permit me, sir, again to ask, how comes it that this Administration are brought into their present very curious and unprecedented predicament? How happens it that they alone, of all the Administrations which have been in this country, find themselves in the minority in each House of Congress, when the very worst of their predecessors kept a majority till midnight on the 3d or the 4th of March, whichever you may please to call it? Why, sir, under the Administration to which I allude, there were none of those compunctious visitings of nature, at the attacks made on private character. We had no chapter of Lamentations then, on the ravaging and desolating war on the fair fame of all the wise, virtuous, and good of our land. The notorious Peter Porcupine, since even better known as William Cobbett, was the especial protégé of that Administration. I heard them say—I do not mean the head of that Administration, but one of its leaders—that he was the greatest man in the world; and I do not know, sir, that, in point of sheer natural endowment, he was so very far wrong. Yes, sir, it was that very Cobbett, who, if the late publications may be trusted, now says that Mr. Adams has fifteen hundred slaves in Virginia. Sir, was there any slander too vile, too base, for that man to fabricate? I remember well the nick-names under which we passed—yes, sir, I can proudly say, we, although the humblest in the ranks. Mr. Gallatin was CITOYON GUILLOTINE, with le petit fenêtré national, at his back. My excellent and able colleague, Mr. Nicholas—one of the purest and most pious of men, who afterwards removed to the State of New York, and was a model of republican virtue and simplicity that might have adorned the best days of Sparta or Rome—he, sir, having the misfortune to lose an eye, was held up to ridicule as POLYPHEMUS. You are shocked at this, sir, but let me tell you that it was only a little innocent, harmless, federal wit—and the author was the especial protégé of “Government” and its adherents. All chuckled over the Porcupine. To that party the present incumbent then belonged—and another member of this pure Administration. My venerable friend from North Carolina, was MONSIEUR MAÇON, with a cadilla under the ç, to mark him the more for a Frenchman. I forget the cognomen of the learned gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON;) I know that he was never spared: I remember well my own; I wish, sir, it was applicable now, for I was then a boy. Every sanctuary was invaded. As to Mr. Jefferson, every epithet of vituperation was exhausted upon him. He was an atheist, a Frenchman: we were all atheists and traitors; our names and cause, associated with the cannibals and cannibalism of the revolutionary tribunal, and all the atrocities, the most atrocious and revolting of which has this day been presented to the House by the imagination of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Yes, sir, then, as now, a group of horrors was pressed upon the public imagination to prop the sinking cause of a desperate Administration. Religion and order were to be subverted; the national debt to be sponged; and the country to be drenched in its best blood by Mr. Jefferson and his Jacobin adherents. Even good men, and not unwise men, were brought to believe this. Mr. Jefferson was elected—and we know what followed. But this, sir, it may be said, was not done by our own people—it was done by foreign hirelings, mercenaries. Sir, it is not only of this description of persons that I speak. It was done in the glorious days of the Sedition Law and the black cockade, when we found in General Shee and his legion, protection against the Prætorian bands of the Administration. These brave fellows were many of them Irish or German, and most of them of Irish or German parentage, chiefly from the Northern Liberties, then the stronghold of republicanism; and, therefore, branded with the opprobrious name of the Fauxbourg St. Antoine, the most Jacobin quarter of Paris.

FEBRUARY, 1838.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, I have much to say, which neither my own weakness, nor my regard to the politeness of this House, will permit me now to say. As I have exonerated the principal in that weighty affair of the billiard table, I also exonerate him and his lieutenant from every charge of collusion—in the first instance; and, if it is in order, I will state the reasons for my opinion. When the alliance was first patched up between the two great leaders of the East and West, neither of the high contracting parties had the promotion of the present incumbent at all in view. Sir, I speak knowingly as to one of these parties, and with the highest degree of moral probability of the other. Can it be necessary that I prove this? The thing proves itself. The object was to bring in one of the parties to the compact, whom the constitution subsequently excluded, and of course to provide for the other. A gentleman, then of this House, was the candidate who, to the last hour, cast many a longing, although not lingering look, with outstretched neck, towards Louisiana—jugulo quæsitæ negatur—to discover whether or not he should be one upon the list. Sir, it is impossible that he could in the first instance have looked to the elevation of another, or have designed to promote the views of any man but in subserviency to his own. Sir, common sense forbids it. But, sir, all these calculations, however skilful, and DEMOIRES could not have made better, utterly failed. Mr. Crawford most obstinately, and unreasonably, I confess, refused to die. It was certainly very disobliging in him. I saw him before I went abroad, and I thought it was a hundred to one that he could not survive the summer: he was then dead to every purpose, public or private. Louisiana refused to vote as obstinately as Mr. Crawford refused to die; and so the gentleman was excluded. It was then that Mr. Adams was first taken up, as a pis aller, which we planters of the South translate, a hand plant.

Sir, there never was a man who had so much cause as General Jackson has had to say, "Save me from my friends, and I will take care of my enemies." Yes, sir, he could take care of his enemies—from them he never feared danger; but not of his friends, at least of some, whose vanity has prompted them to couple their obscure names with his; and it is because he did take care of his enemies, who were his country's enemies, and for other reasons, which I could state, that his cause is now espoused by that grateful country. But General Jackson is no statesman. Sir, I deny that there is any instance on record, in history, of a man not having military capacity, being at the head of any Government, with advantage to that Government, and with credit to himself. Sir, there is a great mistake on this subject. It is not those talents which enable a man to write books and make speeches, that enable him to preside over a Government. The wittiest of poets has told us, that

"All a Rhetorician's Rules Teach only how to name his Tools."

We have seen Professors of Rhetoric, who could no doubt descend fluently upon the use of these said tools; yet sharpen them to so wiry an edge as to cut their own fingers with these implements of their trade. Sir, Thomas à Becket was as brave a man as Henry the Second, and, indeed, a braver man—less infirm of purpose. And who were the Hildebrands, and the rest of the papal freebooters, who achieved victory after victory over the proudest monarchs and States of Europe? These men were brought up in a cloister, perhaps, but they were endowed with the highest of all the gifts of Heaven, the capacity to lead men, whether in the Senate or in the field. Sir, it is one and the same faculty, and its successful display has always received, and ever will receive, the highest honors that man can bestow; and this will be the case, do what you will, cant what you may, about military chieftains and military domination. So long as a man is a man, the victorious defender of his country will and ought to receive, that country's suffrage, for all that the forms of her Government allow her to bestow.

Sir, a friend said to me not long since, "Why, General Jackson can't write"—"admitted." (Pray, sir, can you tell me of any one that can write? for, I protest, I know nobody that can.) Then turning to my friend, I said, It is most true that General Jackson cannot write, (not that he can't write his name, or a letter, &c.,) because he has never been taught. But his competitor cannot write, because he was unteachable: for he has had every advantage of education and study. Sir, the Duke of Marlborough, the greatest captain and negotiator of his age—which was the age of Louis XIV.—and who may rank with the greatest men of any age; whose irresistible manners and address triumphed over every obstacle in council, as his military prowess and conduct did in the field—sir, this great man could not even spell, and was notoriously ignorant of all that an undergraduate must know; but which it is not necessary for a man at the head of affairs to know, at all. Would you have superseded him by some Scotch schoolmaster? Sir, gentlemen forget that it is an able helmsman we want for the ship of State, and not a professor of navigation or astronomy.

Sir, among the vulgar errors that ought to go into Sir Thomas Brown's book, this ought not to be omitted; that learning and wisdom are synonymous, or at all equivalent. Knowledge and wisdom, as one of our most delightful poets sings—

"Knowledge and wisdom, far from being one,
Have oftentimes no connection—knowledge dwells
In heads replete with thoughts of other men;
Wisdom, in minds attentive to their own.
Knowledge is proud that he has learned so much;
Wisdom is humble that he knows no more.
Books are not seldom talismans and spells,
By which the magic art of shrewder wits
Holds the unthinking multitude enchained."

And not books only, sir—speeches are not less deceptive. Sir, I not only consider the want of what is called learning not to be a disqualification for the command in chief in civil or military life, but I do consider the possession of too much learning to be of most mischievous consequence to such a character; who is to draw from the cabinet of his own sagacious mind, and to make the learning of others, or whatever other qualities they may possess, subservient to his more enlarged and vigorous views. Such a man was Cromwell—such a man was Washington. Not learned, but wise. Their understandings were not clouded or cramped, but had fair play. Their errors were the errors of men, not of schoolboys and pedants. Sir, so far from the want of what is called education being a very strong objection to a man at the head of affairs, over-education constitutes a still stronger objection. [In the case of a lady it is fatal. Heaven defend me from an over-educated, accomplished lady. Yes, sir, accomplished indeed, for she is finished for all the duties of a wife, or mother, or mistress of a family.] Sir, we hear much of military usurpation, of military despotism—of the sword of a conqueror—of Cæsar—and Cromwell, and Bonaparte. What little I know of Roman history, has been gathered chiefly from the surviving letters of the great men of that day—of Cicero especially—and I freely confess to you, that, if I had then lived, and been compelled to take sides, I must, though very reluctantly, have sided with Cæsar, rather than take Pompey for my master. Sir, it was the interest of the house of Stuart—and they were long enough in power to do it—to blacken the character of Cromwell—that great, and, I must add, bad man. But, sir, the devil himself is not so black as he is sometimes painted. But who would not rather have obeyed Cromwell, than that self-styled Parliament, which obtained a title too indecent for me to name, but by which it is familiarly known and mentioned in all the historians, from that to this day. Sir, Cromwell fell under a temptation, perhaps too strong for the nature of man to resist—but he was an angel of light to either of the Stuarts—the one whom he brought to the block; or his son, a yet worse man, the blackest and foulest of miscreants that ever polluted a throne. It has been the policy of the house of Stuart and their successors—it is the policy of kings—to vilify and blacken the memory and character of Cromwell. But the cloud is rolling away. We no longer consider Hume as deserving of the slightest credit. Cromwell was "guiltless of his country's blood." His was a bloodless usurpation. To doubt his sincerity at the outset, from his subsequent fall, would be madness—religious fervor was the prevailing temper and fashion of the times. Cromwell was a usurper, 'tis granted; but he had scarcely any choice left him. His sway was every way preferable to that miserable corpse of a Parliament, that he turned out, as a gentleman would turn off a drunken butler and his fellows, or the pensioned tyrant that succeeded him—a dissolute, depraved bigot and hypocrite, who was outwardly a Protestant, and at heart a Papist. He lived and died one, while pretending to be a son of the Church of England, aye, and swore to it, and died a perjured man. Sir, if I must have a master, give me one whom I can respect, rather than a knot of knavish attorneys. Sir, Bonaparte was a bad man; but I would rather have had Bonaparte than such a set of corrupt, intriguing, public plunderers as he turned adrift. The Senate of Rome—the Parliament of England—"the Councils of Elders and of Youngsters"—the Legislature of France—all made themselves first odious and then contemptible; and then comes a usurper: and this is the natural end of a corrupt civil Government.

There is a class of men who possess great learning, combined with inveterate professional habits, and who are (ipso facto, or perhaps I should rather say ipso factis, for I must speak accurately, as I speak before a Professor) disqualified for any but secondary parts anywhere—even in the Cabinet. Cardinal Richelieu was, what! A priest. Yes, sir, but what a priest! Oxenstiern was a chancellor. He it was who sent his son abroad to see—quem parva sapientia regitur mundus—with how little wisdom this world is governed. This Administration seemed to have calculated that even less than that little would do for us. The gentleman called it a strong, an able Cabinet—second to none but Washington's first Cabinet. Sir, I could hardly look at him for blushing. What, sir, is Gallatin at the head of the Treasury—Madison in the Department of State? The mind of an accomplished and an acute dialectician, of an able lawyer, or, if you please, of a great physician, may, by the long continuance of one pursuit—of one train of ideas—have its habits so inveterately fixed, as effectually to disqualify the possessor for the command of the councils of a country. He may, nevertheless, make an admirable chief of a bureau—an excellent man of details—which the chief ought never to be. A man may be capable of making an able and ingenious argument on any subject within the sphere of his knowledge; but, sir, every now and then the master sophist will start, as I have seen him start, at the monstrous conclusions to which his own artificial reason had brought himself. But, this, sir, was a man of more than ordinary natural candor and fairness of mind. Sir, by words and figures you may prove just what you please; but it often and most generally is the fact, that, in proportion as a proposition is locally or mathematically true, it is politically and common-sensically (or rather nonsensically) false. The talent which enables a man to write a book, or make a speech, has no more relation to the leading of an army or Senate, than it has to the dressing of a dinner. The talent which fits a man to head a Government, is the talent for the management of men—a mere dialectician never had, and never will have it: both requires the same degree of courage, though of different kinds. The very highest degree of moral courage is required for the duties of government. I have been amused when I have seen some dialecticians, after assorting their words—"the counters of wise men, the money of fools"—after they had laid down their premises, and drawn, step by step, their deductions, sit down, completely satisfied, as if the conclusions to which they had brought themselves were really the truth—as if it were irrefragably true. But wait until another cause is called, or till another court sits—till the bystanders and jury have had time to forget both argument and conclusion, and they will make you just as good an argument on the opposite side, and arrive, with the same complacency, at a directly opposite conclusion, and triumphantly demand your assent to this new truth. Sir, it is their business—I do not blame them. I only say that such a habit of mind unfits men for action, for decision. They want a client to decide which side to take; and the really great man performs that office for them. This habit unfits them for government in the first degree. The talent for government lies in these two things—agacity to perceive, and decision to act. Genuine statesmen were never made such by mere training; education will form good business men—nascuntur non fiunt. The maxim (nascitur non fit) is as true of statesmen as it is of poets. Sir, let a house be on fire, you will soon see in that confusion who has the talent to command. Let a ship be in danger at sea, and ordinary subordination destroyed, and you will immediately make the same discovery. The ascendancy of mind and of character exists and rises as naturally and as inevitably, where there is free play for it, as material bodies find their level by gravitation. Thus a great diplomatist, like a certain animal, oscillating between the hay on different sides of him, wants some power from without, before he can decide from which bundle to make trial. Who believes that Washington could write as good a book or report as Jefferson, or make as able a speech as Hamilton? Who is there that believes that Cromwell would have made as good a judge as Lord Hale? No, sir; these learned and accomplished men find their proper place under those who are fitted to command, and to command them among the rest. Such a man as Washington will say to a Jefferson, do you become my Secretary of State; to Hamilton, do you take charge of my purse, or that of the nation, which is the same thing; and to Knox, do you be my master of horse. Sir, all history shows this, but great diplomatists and great scholars are, for that very reason, unfit to be rulers. Sir, would Hannibal have crossed the Alps when there were no roads—with elephants—in the face of the warlike and hardy mountaineers—and carried terror to the very gates of Rome, if his youth had been spent in poring over books? Would he have been able to maintain himself on the resources of his own genius for sixteen years in Italy, in spite of the faction and treachery in the Senate of Carthage, if he had been deep in conic sections and fluxions and the different calculus—to say nothing of botany, and mineralogy, and chemistry? "Are you not ashamed," said a philosopher to one who was born to rule, "are you not ashamed to play so well upon the flute?" Sir, it was well put. There is much which it becomes a secondary man to know—much that it is necessary for him to know—that a first-rate man ought to be ashamed to know. No head was ever clear and sound that was stuffed with book-learning. You might as well attempt to fatten and strengthen a man by stuffing him with every variety and the greatest quantity of food. After all, the chief must draw upon his subalterns for much that he does not know, and cannot perform himself. Sir, my friend Wm. R. Johnson has many a groom that can clean and dress a race-horse, and ride him too, better than he can. But what of that? Sir, we are, in the European sense of the term, not a military people. We have no business for an army—it hangs as a dead weight upon the nation—officers and all. Sir, who rescued Braddock when he was fighting, secundum artem, and his men were dropping around him on every side? It was a Virginia militia Major. He asserted in that crisis the place which properly belonged to him, and which he afterwards filled in the manner we all know.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, I may, without any mock modesty, acknowledge what I feel, that I have made an unsuccessful reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. There are some subjects which I could have wished to have touched upon before I sit down now and forever. I had the materials in my possession when I came into this House this morning, but I am dragged down by physical weakness from the most advantageous use of them.

Sir, what shall we say to a gentleman, in this House or out of it, occupying a prominent station, and filling a large space in the eye of his native State, who should, with all the adroitness of a practised advocate, gloss over the acknowledged encroachments of the men in power, upon the fair construction of the constitution, and then present the appalling picture, glaring and flaming, in his deepest colors, of a bloody military tyrant—a raw-head and bloody-bones—so that we cannot sleep in our beds—who should conjure up all the images that can scare children and frighten old women—I mean very old women, sir—and who offers this wretched caricature—this vile daub, where brick dust stands for blood, like Peter Porcupine's BLOODY RUOR, as a reason for his and our support in Virginia, of a man in whom he has no confidence, whom he damns with faint praise—and who, moreover—tell it not in Gath! had zealously, and elaborately, (I cannot say ably,) justified every one of these very atrocious and bloody deeds—yes, sir, on paper—not in the heat of debate, in the transports of a speech, but—as the author of the Richmond Anathema full well knew—and knew that we, too, knew—deliberately and officially. Sir, if we did not know that lawyers never see but one side of a case—that on which they are retained, and that they fondly hope that the jury will see with their eyes—what should we say of such a man? His client having no character, he attacks defendant's character, upon a string of charges, in every one of which (supposing them to be true) his client was self-avowed particeps criminis—having defended, adopted, and made each and every one of them his own. Sir, such a man may be a great lawyer, (although this is but a poor specimen of his skill in that line,) or a great mathematician, or chemist; but of a man guilty of such glaring absurdity, it may be fearlessly pronounced that, in the management of his own concerns, and in the affairs of men, he has not “right good common sense.” And here, sir, we come to that great and all-important distinction, which the profane vulgar—whether they be the great vulgar or the small—too often overlook; and which I have, lamely, I fear, endeavored to press upon the House—I mean the distinction between knowledge and learning, on the one hand, and sense and judgment, on the other. And there, sir, lies the great defect of the gentleman in question. Sir, I have heard it said of him, by those who know and love him well, “that he can argue either side of a question, whether of law, of policy, or of constitutional construction, with great ingenuity and force; but he wants that sagacity in political affairs, which first discerns the proper end, and then adopts the most appropriate means: and he is deficient in that knowledge of mankind, which would enable another (much his inferior) to perceive that his honest disinterestedness is played upon by those who are conscious that he prides himself upon it. It is the lever by which he is on all occasions to be moved. It is his pride, an honest and honorable pride, which makes him delight to throw himself into minorities, because he enjoys more self-gratification from manifesting his independence of popular opinion—than he could derive from any thing in the gift of the people. His late production—the Adams convention manifesto, is the feeblest production of the day. The reason is, his head and heart did not go together.”

Sir, this picture is drawn by the hand of a friend. As we have had billiard tables and chess boards introduced into this debate, I hope I may be allowed to borrow an illustration from this last game. Sir, one of these arguing machines reminds me of the bishop at chess. The black or white bishop (I use the term not in reference to the color of the piece, but of that of the square he stands upon) is a serviceable piece enough in his way; but he labors under this defect: that, moving in the diagonal only, he can never get off his original color. He can scour away all over just one-half of the board; but his adversary may be on the next square, and perfectly safe from his attack. To be safe from the bishop, you have only to move upon any one of the thirty-two squares that are forbidden ground to him. But not so the irregular knight, who, at successive leaps, can cover every square upon the board, to whose check the king can interpose no guard, but must move. Even the poor pawn has a privilege which the bishop has not: for he can elude his mitred adversary by moving from a white square to a black one, or from a black square to a white one, and finally reach the highest honors of the game. So even a poor peasant, of sense, may instruct the philosopher, as the shepherd did, in that beautiful introduction, the finest of Mr. Gay's fables but one, who drew all his notions of men and things from nature. Sir, it is in vain to turn over musty folios, and double down dog's ears: it does very well in its place—in a lawyer's office—or a bureau. I am forced to use the word for want of a better; but it will not supply the place of that which books never gave, and never can give—of judgment and experience. Sir, who would make the better leader, in a period of great public emergency—old Roger Sherman, or a certain very learned gentleman from New York, whom we once had here, who knew every thing in the world for which man has no occasion, and nothing in the world for which man has occasion? Sir, the people, who are always unsophisticated—and though they may occasionally be misled, are always right in their feelings, and always judge correctly in the long run—have taken up this thing. It is a notorious fact, in Virginia, that, in County Courts, where men are admitted to sit as judges, who are not of the legal profession—plain planters, who have no pretensions to be considered as lawyers—the decisions are much seldomer reversed than in those courts where a barrister presides: his reasons may be more plausible, but his decision will be oftener wrong. Yes, sir, the people have decided upon this thing.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, I will suppose a case: I will suppose that the late convulsive struggles of the Administration may so far succeed, as that they will be able to renew their lease for another four years. Now, sir, if a majority of this House can't get along with such a minority hanging on their rear, cutting off supplies, and beating up their quarters, what will be the situation of the Administration then? Sir, what is it now? Did anybody ever hear of a victory obtained by the Executive power, while a decided majority of the Legislature was against it? Sir, I know of no such victory, but one—and that was the parricidal victory of the younger Pitt over the Constitution of England; and he gained that only by the impenetrable obstinacy of the king, which then gave indications of the disease that was lurking in his constitution, and afterwards so unhappily became manifest.

Sir, the king was an honest man, and a much abler man than he ever had credit for. But he was incurably obstinate. He had just lost the colonies. No matter—he would risk the crown of England itself, and retire to his hereditary States in Germany, rather than yield: and, sir, but for a barefaced coalition, he would have so retired, and have supplied a most important defect in the act of settlement—the separation of Hanover from England. But the corrupt bargain of Lord North and Mr. Fox, to share office between them, disgusted the people—they took side even against their own liberties. But here, sir, the coalition is not on the side of the people's rights, but against them. Mr. Pitt (the crown rather) triumphed. Knaves cried Hosanna; and fools repeated the cry. England recovered by the elasticity which belongs to free institutions, and Mr. Pitt attained a degree of power that enabled him to plunge her into the mad vortex of war with revolutionary France. Nine hundred millions of debt; taxes, in amount, in degree, and mode, unheard of; pauperism, misery, in all possible forms of wretchedness—attest the greatness of the heaven-born Minister, who did not weather the storm, but was whelmed beneath it, leaving his country to that Providence whom it pleased to rescue her in her utmost need, by inflicting madness on her great unrelenting enemy, and sending this modern Nebuchadnezzar to grass. Sir, Mr. Pitt is as strong an instance for my purpose, as I could have wanted. He was a rhetorician, a speech-maker; a man of words, and good words too, at will; a dexterous debater—and if he had continued to ride the western circuit, he might have been an eminent wrangler at the bar, and, in due time, a Chief Justice or Lord Chancellor. But, for the sins of England, he was made Prime Minister, and at five and twenty too. Sir, Mr. Pitt no more saw what was ahead of him, than the idiot in the parish workhouse. He no more dreamt, when the war began, to what point he would be able to push his system, if system it may be called, than any clerk in his office. The productive powers of a people like the English, where property is perfectly secure and left free to act, and where the industrious classes are shut out from almost any participation in public affairs, is incredible; is almost without limit. Two individuals discovered two mines, more precious and productive than Guanaxuato or Potosi—that furnished the means for his prodigality, that astonished even Mr. Pitt. These were Sir Richard Arkwright and Mr. Watt—the spinning machine and the steam engine. And this imbecile and blundering Minister has been complimented with what is due to the unrivalled ingenuity and industry of his countrymen. So, sir, in like manner, this young Hercules of America, who, if we can keep him from being strangled by the serpents of corruption, must grow to gigantic strength and stature—every improvement which he makes, in spite of the misrule of his governors, these very modestly arrogate to themselves.

We have been told, officially, that the President wished the great question to have been referred back to the people, if by the forms of the constitution this could be done. Sir, if I were the friend, as I am the undisguised enemy of the Administration, I would say to them, You may be innocent—your intentions may be upright—but you have brought the country to that pass, that you can't carry on the Government. As gentlemen possessing the least self-respect, you ought to retire—leave it—try another venue—you can't carry on the Government without us, any more than we can act, while every thing in the Executive Government is against us. Sir, there are cases in which suspicion is equivalent to proof—and not only equal to it, but more than equal to the most damning proof. There is not a husband here who will not ratify this declaration—there may be suspicion so agonizing, that it makes the wretch cry out for certainty as a relief from the most damning tortures. Such suspicions are entertained with respect to these gentlemen—and though they are making a convulsive effort to roll back the tide of public opinion, they can't allay the feeling—the suspicion rests upon the facts—and, do what they may, facts will not bend at their bidding. Admit it to be suspicion—it is equally fatal, as regards them and the public service, with the reality. Mr. R. would not go in pursuit of the alibi and aliases of the accused—of the tubs, whether with false bottoms or double bottoms, thrown out to amuse the public. The whole conduct of the accused had displayed nothing of the dignity of innocence; but all the restlessness of guilt. Every word of Mr. Clay's late pamphlet might be true, and yet the accused be guilty, notwithstanding.

The gentleman from Massachusetts warned us, that, if the individual we seek to elevate shall succeed, he will, in his turn, become the object of public pursuit, and that the same pack will be unkenelled at his heels, that have run his rival down. It may be so. I have no hesitation to say, that, if his conduct shall deserve it, and if I live, I shall be one of that pack; because, sir, I maintain the interests of stockholders, against presidents, directors, and cashiers. And here, sir, I beg leave to notice an objection urged, as I have heard, against me, by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. VANCE.) He says that I have been opposed to all Administrations. Sir, I deny it to be fact. I did oppose the elder Adams, because he attacked the liberty of the press and of the subject; because his opinions were at war with the genius of our institutions. He avowed them openly, and I liked him the better for his frankness. But, sir, I supported the Administration of his successor. I did for it what I could—little enough, God knows. The first case in which I differed from that Administration, was the case of the Yazoo claims, which I thought a case of flagrant corruption. I do not mean, and I never did believe, that there was corruption in the President, or his two Secretaries; and it did not cause me to separate myself from them. I separated from that Administration three years afterwards, with pain and sorrow, and not without some anger, too; for, sir, I have no idea of that extreme of candor and meekness which denounces the measures of a Government, as Bottom says in the play, "and will roar you as gently as any sucking dove." It is not my nature to do so, and it would be criminal and ridiculous in me, because it would be hypocrisy to affect it. Sir, when the former restrictive system was first commenced, I thought I saw what I now know I did then see—the fatal and ruinous consequences that would then grow out of it. I told Mr. Jefferson, candidly and frankly, that, if he expected support in a certain quarter, and did not find it, he need not blame me. Sir, I will not repeat what he said on that occasion, but he deplored the separation. But, permit me to remind you, sir—for you were then too young to know much of these matters—that, previously, but nearly at the same time of my leaving that Administration, a certain wise man from the East joined it, who soon after went off to Canada, under strong suspicion of felony; and this was soon followed by a certain gentleman's giving his adhesion, who had before been violently opposed to it, and to all its best measures. Sir, I have not the least objection to its being said of me, that I separated myself from Mr. Jefferson, when Barnabas Bidwell and John Quincy Adams joined him.

Some allusion has been made to the discordant materials of the present Opposition. Sir, they are somewhat discordant—at least they have been so. But are they more so than the adherents of the present Administration, or the materials of the Administration itself? Sir, I will remember almost the first propitiation (the first was the writ of habeas corpus) which he who is now the President of the United States made to Mr. Jefferson and his party. It was an attempt to run down the present Chief Justice. The right of John Smith to a seat in the Senate, was made the peg to hang it on. I will tell the gentleman the whole reason why I have opposed the Administration since that time, and may again, if, according to my judgment, they shall not consult the good of the country. It is, sir, simply because I am for the interests of the stockholders—of whom I am one—as opposed to those of the president, directors, and cashiers; and I have the right of speaking my opinion, and shall exercise it, though it happen to be against the greatest and proudest names.

Sir, I am no judge of human motives: that is the attribute of the Name which I will not take in vain—the attribute of Him who rules in heaven, or who becomes incarnate upon earth—mere man can claim no such exemption.

I do not pretend that my own motives do not partake of their full share of the infirmity of our common nature—but of those infirmities, neither avarice nor ambition form one iota in the composition of my present motives. Sir, what can the country do for me? Poor as I am—for I am much poorer than I have been—impoverished by unwise legislation—I still have nearly as much as I know how to use—more, certainly, than I have at all times made a good use of—and, as for power, what charms can it have for one like me? Sir, if power had been my object, I must have been less sagacious than my worst enemies have represented me to be, (unless, indeed, those who would have kindly shut me up in bedlam,) if I had not obtained it. I may appeal to all my friends to say whether "there have not been times when I stood in such favor in the closet, that there must have been something very extravagant and unreasonable in my wishes, if they might not all have been gratified." Was it office? What, sir, to drudge in your laboratories in the Departments, or to be at the tail of the corps diplomatique in Europe? Alas, sir, in my condition, a cup of cold water would be more acceptable. Sir, what can the country give me that I do not possess in the confidence of such constituents as no man ever had before? Sir, I could retire to my own patrimonial trees, where I might see the sun rise and set in peace. Sir, as I was returning, the other evening, from the Capitol, I saw—what has been a rare sight here this winter—the sun

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

dipping his broad disc among the trees behind those Virginia hills, not allaying his glowing axle in the steep Atlantic stream—and I asked myself, if, with this Book of Nature unrolled before me, I was not the most foolish of men to be struggling and scuffling here, in this heated and impure atmosphere, where the play is not worth the candle; but then the truth rushed upon my mind, that I was, vainly, perhaps, but honestly, striving to uphold the liberties of the people who sent me here—yes, sir—for can those liberties co-exist with corruption? At the very worst, the question recurs, which will the more effectually destroy them, collusion, bargain, and corruption here, or a military despotism? When can that be established over us? Never, till the Congress has become odious and contemptible in the eyes of the people—sir, I have learned from the highest of all authority, that the first step towards putting on incorruption is the putting off corruption. That recollection nerves me in the present contest; for I know that, if we succeed, I shall hold over the head of those who succeed the present incumbent, a rod, which they will not dare, even if they had the inclination, to disobey. They will tremble at the punishment of their predecessors. Sir, if we succeed, we shall restore the constitution—we shall redress the injury done to the people—we shall regenerate the country. If the Administration which ensues shall be as bad as the character of the opposing candidate (General Jackson) is represented by his bitterest foes to be, still I had rather it were in the seat of power than the present dynasty, because it will have been fairly elected. The fountain of its authority will not have been poisoned at the source. But, sir, if we perish under the spasmodic efforts of those now in power to restate themselves on the throne, our fate will be a sacred one—and who would wish to survive it?—there will be nothing left in the country worth any man's possession. If, after such an appeal as has been made to the people, and a majority has been brought into this and the other House of Congress, this Administration shall be able to triumph, it will prove that there is a rottenness in our institutions, which ought to render them unworthy of any man's regard—sir, my “churchyard cough” gives me the solemn warning, that, whatever part I shall take in the chase, I may fail of being in at the death—I should think myself the basest and the meanest of men—I care not what the opinion of the world might be—I should know myself to be a scoundrel, and should not care who else knew it, if I could permit any motive, connected with the division of the spoil, to mingle in this matter with my poor, but best exertions for the welfare of my country. If gentlemen suppose I am giving pledges, they are mistaken—I give none—they are entitled to none—and I give none. Sir, I shall retire upon my own resources—I will go back to the bosom of my constituents—to such constituents as man never had before, and never will have again—and I shall receive from them the only reward that I ever looked for, but the highest that man can receive—the universal expression of their approbation—of their thanks. I shall read it in their beaming faces—I shall feel it in their gratulating hands. The very children will climb around my knees to welcome me. And shall I give up them, and this? And for what? For the heartless amusements, and vapid pleasures, and tarnished honors, of this abode of splendid misery, and of shabby splendor? For a clerkship in the War Office, or a Foreign Mission, to dance attendance abroad, instead of at home—or even for a Department itself? Sir, thirty years make sad changes in a man. When I first was honored with their confidence, I was a very young man, and my constituents stood in almost parental relation to me, and I received from them the indulgence of a beloved son. But the old patriarchs of that day have been gathered to their fathers—some adults remain, whom I look upon as my brethren; but the far greater part were children—little children—or have come into the world since my public life began. I know among them grandfathers, and men muster-free, who were boys at school, when I first took my seat in Congress. Time, the mighty reformer and innovator, has silently and slowly, but surely, changed the relation between us; and I now stand to them, in loco parentis, in the place of a father, and receive from them a truly filial reverence and regard. Yea, sir, they are my children—who resent, with the quick love of children, all my wrongs, real or supposed. To them I shall return, if we are defeated, for all of consolation that awaits me on this side of the grave. I feel that I hang to existence but by a single hair—that the sword of Damocles is suspended over me.

If we succeed, we shall have given a new lease to the life of the constitution. But, should we fail, I warn gentlemen not to pour out their regrets on General Jackson. He will be the first to disclaim them. The object of our cause has been, not to raise Andrew Jackson to the Presidency—be his merits what they may—its object has been the signal and condign punishment of those public servants, on whom, if they be not guilty, the very strongest suspicion of guilt must ever justly rest.

SATURDAY, February 2.

Retrenchment.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, with the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. BLAKE, as modified.

Mr. SERGEANT said he should be sorry to have it known how much difficulty he had had to overcome the repugnance he felt to make any demand upon the time and attention of the House in this debate. If known to others, to the extent he had felt it himself, he was afraid it would be deemed an absolute weakness. He had been, for some time, he said, out of the House. Great changes had taken place in its composition during that period. There were many members to whom he was a stranger. It seemed to him also, that there was a change in the kind of demand they made on each other. Nothing appeared to him likely to engage the attention of the House—judging from what he had witnessed—unless it was piquant, highly seasoned, and pointed with individual and personal allusion. For this, he was neither prepared nor qualified. He would take up as little time as possible, and, as far as he could, would avoid all topics that were likely to irritate and inflame. He would not here treat of the great question which agitates the people of this nation, and upon which, as one of the people, he had a decided opinion. If touched at all, it would be incidentally, as the natural consequence of remarks upon the subject before the House, and of the facts he should have to state, and not as a principal point.

It was one thing, he said, to offer a resolution like that under consideration, and another to vote upon it after it had been offered. The gentleman from Kentucky, he hoped, would consider him as speaking with entire respect for his motives and views. But, for himself, he must say, that he (Mr. S.) would not have offered the resolution; yet, being brought forward, he would not vote to lay it upon the table, nor to make any other disposition of it, that would prevent the proposed inquiry from having a full discussion and free course. The reasons for both these conclusions appeared to him to be perfectly satisfactory.

He would not, he said, have proposed such a resolution, because he thought it must be unavailing. It was too extensive for any practical purpose—it aimed at too much. It embraced the whole business of Congress. It was our duty, he said, to take care that the public affairs were carried on, in the most profitable manner for the people, and with the least public burthen. And this was not peculiarly the duty of Congress at any one time, but at all times. It was the great end and object of our labors and our care, and ought to be of daily application by all of us. He thought it too much, to devolve upon a single committee the whole of that which was the common concern and care of Congress.

He thought it unnecessary. Every inquiry proposed by this resolution, was already provided for, in accordance with the duty of the House, by the appointment of committees, to give effect to the great guards of the constitution, within their respective spheres. No money can be drawn from the Treasury, but in pursuance of appropriations made by law. No officer can be appointed, but under the authority of the constitution or the laws. No salary can be affixed to an office but by the same warrant. The Committee of Ways and Means—standing committee of the House—acts upon estimates furnished by every department of the Government. When called upon to report appropriations, they compare these estimates with existing laws and existing exigencies, and report only such as are justified by law. When they report the appropriation bills, each item of them is subject to the revision of every member of this House. The annual appropriation bill brings every thing under review. The House itself is to examine in detail, and see that all is in conformity with the law. Have we not, too, committees on the expenditures of each Department? And a Committee on the Public Expenditures, to make a biennial examination, and see that the moneys have been faithfully applied, according to the appropriations, and fully accounted for? He would not speak at present of the manner in which Congress makes appropriations, nor how they are to be accounted for, particularly the contingent fund of this House, or of any of the Departments. But he would say this—if there be any appointment not authorized by law, or any salary paid, which the law does not authorize, let the specific abuse be pointed out, and traced to its source, so that the offence and the offender may be known. He knew of none such.

There was still another reason why he should not have brought forward such a resolution—he spoke sincerely, and, after listening to this debate, as well as making some examination for himself—there was no basis laid for the resolution, as there ought to be, by showing that there was abuse or extravagant expenditure, or such a state of things as rendered a general inquiry necessary, either for the purpose of immediate correction, or, as had been intimated, to procure materials for a more propitious moment. The structure of this Government was not the work of a day. He did not speak of the constitution, but of the fabric which had been constructed under the constitution, for effectuating its great purposes. It had not been built up at one time, but by successive and continued exertions of successive Legislatures. It was not the work of one party but of all the parties which had existed in the United States. Begun by one, extended and enlarged by another; at one time, perhaps, carried too far, and then somewhat reduced, so as to adapt it to the state of the country. But in such reduction, always following the only course that can lead to any practical result—that of examining it item by item, and piece by piece. It was not now the possession of one set of men, nor of one party, but of the whole people of the United States, by whose immediate Representatives it had thus been constructed. The Legislature was created by the constitution—its pay and expenses are regulated by itself. The Executive too, was established by the constitution. The subordinate officers have been created by Congress, and increased according to the growing wants of this

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

expanding nation. Their pay and emoluments have been fixed by Congress. Even the number of clerks in each Department, and the pay of every clerk, is regulated and ascertained by law. It had, indeed, been remarked by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that the contingent expenses of this House had increased in a much greater ratio than its numbers; that, in twenty years, the numbers of the members had only doubled, and the expenses were nearly quadrupled. This matter is entirely under the regulation of the House. If the expense be too great, let it be checked and controlled, by limiting, if it be possible, those branches of service which occasion the expense. But he did not believe the numerical argument precisely correct, or that, in this case, 2 and 2 would necessarily only make four. When it was considered that this confederation now embraced twenty four States, and three Territories; when we considered the extent of the country, and the space through which information was to be diffused; he thought it would be a great error to suppose the expenses would increase only according to the increase of the number of Representatives. He rather thought, that, like the price of plate, glass, or diamonds, they would increase in somewhat of a geometrical ratio. The greater part of the expense, however, it was obvious was incurred for the purpose of giving information, and this was an object of too much importance to be sacrificed for the purpose of saving expense.

The establishments of the country had been formed in the same way—the Army, the Navy, the foreign intercourse. On what basis do they stand? Each on the footing upon which it has been deliberately placed by Congress, after carefully considering what the public service required, and what they were respectively worth. There may have been error—nothing human is exempt from liability to error. Sometimes, however, it is imputed with unjust severity. But, if there be error, let it be pointed out, examined, and corrected. There let the wisdom of Congress apply the remedy, at the point where the evil exists.

There was an additional reason why he would not have offered such a resolution, and especially at the present moment. He would state it freely. At the same time, he thought it proper to say, that he had no doubt the resolution was fairly and honestly meant, and for the direct purpose for which the mover himself had stated. He (the mover) thought, and some of his constituents thought, that there were points in which reform was necessary, and that they might be embraced by a general inquiry. But his (Mr. S.'s) objection to himself bringing forward such a resolution was this: a general allegation of extravagance and abuse, such as the resolution seems to apply, cannot be accurately and satisfactorily met. It is impossible, whatever may be the fact, to give it a demonstrative refutation, because it presents no specific subject for discussion. It may do harm: it is calculated to spread abroad an opinion that abuse and extravagance exist, and are allowed here, at the seat of Government, under the very eye of Congress. It was calculated to weaken the attachment of the people to the Government—not to the Administration—he did not mean that—not to this set of men in power, or to that set of men—but to the Government itself; and to give point to an inquiry he had seen in a newspaper with great regret—of what advantage or use is this Government to the people?—This is especially the case where the allegation includes ourselves.

There was one part of the resolution to which he had the strongest repugnance as a subject of discussion. He never had discussed it, and he did not think he ever would. He referred to the inquiry about our own pay. The amount of the pay of members of Congress has never been altered but once since the adoption of the constitution. (Mr. RANDOLPH—Twice.) Twice altered the mode of compensation, the amount but once. The per diem now allowed was intended to be about equal in substance (he had no exact calculation) to the per annum allowed by the compensation law. Two dollars a day and no more had been added to the pay fixed at the organization of the Government. This could not be deemed an extravagant or exorbitant addition. He looked back, he said, to the period of that law (compensation law) with great regret. Not that he thought the per annum compensation injurious in principle, or wrong in amount, but he regretted extremely that the public mind should have been agitated as it was by such a question. He would rather have foregone any advantage to himself. No: the advantage was not worth estimating—he would rather have foregone the whole pay for the time, than have been instrumental in furnishing such a cause for regret.

Matters of revenue and expenditure, necessarily sounded in figures. He would not contradict those who seemed to think that even figures might deceive; but he would say that he did not know how such a subject could be understood without resorting to them. It was a matter of calculation after all; and nothing but calculation, however tedious the process, would read to sure results. He did not intend to restrict himself, in this inquiry, to the term of the present Administration. Beginning with the peace, when the nation was liberated from the extraordinary demands of war, he would embrace the whole period of the last Administration, (which one gentleman had said he thought was wasteful and prodigal,) and as much of the time of the present Administration as had already expired, in order to show that there had been, and still continued to be, a wise and economical management of the affairs of the country. What had been accomplished during that period?

From the Treasury report of 1816, it appears

H. OF R.]

Retrenchment.

[FEBRUARY, 1822.]

that the public debt was then estimated (30th September, 1816) at - $119,635,558 46

"Subject," the reports add,
"to considerable changes and additions," estimated at - 7,000,000 00

Making a total of - $126,635,558 46

There were, besides, large floating claims growing out of the war, for which Congress has been obliged, from time to time, to make provision. The public debt, therefore, in January, 1816, was, in round numbers, one hundred and twenty six millions and a half of dollars. What is it now? Nominally, sixty-seven millions. But, of this aggregate, seven millions were the subscription to the Bank of the United States, for which we have the same amount in stock of equal or of greater value. Deduct that sum, and the total debt is but sixty millions. So that, during the period of about twelve years, beginning immediately after the war, there has been an extinguishment of debt to the amount of rather more than sixty-six millions. But this is not all. There has been created, during the same time, a debt of five millions of dollars to purchase Florida—that is, to pay the claims of our own citizens, stipulated by the treaty with Spain to be paid as the price of that purchase. This sum being added, as it ought to be, there is an aggregate of seventy-one millions, or nearly six millions of dollars a year, during the whole of that period, besides paying the interest of the debt, the expenses of the Government, and making liberal provisions for the public service. This is something. But much more had been done. For what he was about to say, he referred to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means in the year 1816. At the head of that committee was a gentleman who could not be remembered without feelings of deep regret at the public loss sustained by his early death. He possessed, in an uncommon degree, the confidence of this House, and he well deserved it. With so much knowledge, and with powers which enabled him to delight and to instruct the House, there was united so much gentleness and kindness, and such real unaffected modesty, that you were already prepared to be subdued before he exerted his commanding powers of argument. He spoke, he said, of the public loss. As to the individual himself, (the late William Lowndes, of South Carolina,) he had lived long enough to acquire the best possible reputation—a reputation earned by a well-spent life. But to return to the immediate subject. It appeared from the report, that, at the period referred to, (1816,) there was a direct tax of more than five millions and a half; there were internal taxes, consisting of licenses to distillers, tax on carriages, licenses to retailers, auction duties, tax on furniture, on manufactures, excise on distilled spirits, and increased postage to the amount of seven millions, making an aggregate of more than twelve millions and a half of dollars. From all this weight of burthen, the people of this country had been relieved. Above twelve millions and a half of revenue had been surrendered. Yet the interest of the public debt, amounting, at the beginning of the period, to more than six millions of dollars per annum, had been duly paid; the claims growing out of the war, of very large amount, had been paid; the Army establishment supported; the Navy maintained and augmented; a system of fortifications established and prosecuted, commensurate with the wants of the country; the claims under the treaty with Spain had been satisfied; the regular operations of the Government carried on; and, besides occasional appropriations by Congress, a permanent provision (a heavy draught on the Treasury but well applied) had been made for adding to the comforts of the declining years of the veterans of the Revolution. Something, not inconsiderable, too, had been done in internal improvement. And, during the same period as he had already stated, seventy millions had been paid off of the principal of the public debt. Of this amount he thought it proper to add, more than sixteen millions (principal of the public debt) had been paid during the present Administration.

A Government which has effected this, he said, would seem to be entitled to the praise of being wise and economical, at least until the contrary appeared by some proof of experience. And what is our position now? There is no internal tax, no direct burthen—the expenses of our Government are entirely defrayed by the indirect taxation of the customs. We are in the full enjoyment of civil, religious, and political liberty, to an extent without example; and last, not least, there is as much abstinence on the part of the Government, in the exercise of its powers over individuals, as can possibly be observed: much greater than any known Government ever did, or now does observe. We enjoy under it ample protection, and yet we never feel its pressure. We know of its existence only by the benefits it confers.

Out of the income and revenue of the country, ten millions a year are irrevocably destined as a sinking fund, to extinguish the public debt. The process is rapidly going on. He would repeat the accurate and satisfactory statement which had been made by his colleague, (Mr. STEWART.) The annual appropriation is more than sufficient to pay off the debts at the period when, by the terms of the several loans, it is redeemable. The whole may be paid off in the year 1835, and a large surplus accumulated in the Treasury. After that period, the present revenue will exceed, by at least ten millions of dollars, the wants of the Government, and may be accordingly reduced. Such is our condition, and such our prospects.

But there is other proof, more precise, and in some respects, more satisfactory, upon this point of wise economy. What are the total expenditures of the Government, the public

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

debt included? Let us take the year 1826. It affords a better basis than the year just ended, because it is all matter of exact knowledge, and no part estimated. The whole expenditure is about twenty-four millions of dollars. The population of the United States at the present moment is not exactly known. But, upon the lowest estimate that can be reasonably formed, this expenditure is less than two dollars for each individual composing it. How then can it be supposed, as it seemed to be by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) that the comparison with other countries would be disadvantageous to us? There is no comparison in the case. Take the Government of England, for example. The taxation there, according to the latest statement I have seen, taking an average of five years, ending in 1823, is no less than fifty-three millions sterling, and the parochial taxes are stated at seven millions more, making a total of sixty millions. This is equal to three pounds sterling a head of the whole population, or at the present rate of exchange, fifteen dollars a head. But he understood the member from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) to say, that we must add the expense of our State Governments and local charges, and, these being added, our Government would appear to be an expensive one. In the State which he (Mr. S.) had the honor in part to represent, there were no taxes for the support of Government. The only State taxes existing, were some which had been recently imposed, for the purpose of carrying on a great system of beneficial improvement, which could not, with any propriety, enter into the calculation. The proper expenses of the State Government did not, according to his recollection—he spoke merely from memory—exceed ten or fifteen cents for each of the people. As to local charges of various kinds, it would be sufficient to say, that, if they were to be added on one side, they must also, for the purpose of comparison, be added on the other. They existed everywhere. If we pay in our cities and towns for paving, lighting and cleansing, are they exempt from similar charges in England? If we pay for water, do not they pay too? These charges are, in fact, only equivalents for comforts we obtain, and which are better and more cheaply obtained by common contribution. No one is exempt from them. He who lives in the country must either forego these things (some of them he cannot dispense with) or procure them at his own expense. He must sink his own well to get water, and it will cost him more. He must go unlighted in the dark, or he must carry his own light. He must make his own path. If he come to a place where he cannot put down his foot, he must himself lay down a log or a stone to step upon. He repeated, therefore, that these charges, local ones, were only equivalents for comforts which could not be too cheaply had in any other way. They were no part of the present calculation. He then said this was far the cheapest Government—it made less exactions of any sort from the citizen. This was a fair ground for presuming that it was not wasteful or extravagant.

Now, sir, said he, let us see how this annual expenditure is distributed. That will be coming nearer to the very point in question, and will afford satisfactory information. The total expenditure, rejecting fractions, was twenty-four millions. Of this amount, nearly one-half, that is, eleven millions, were applied to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt. For the military establishment, including fortifications and military pensions, six millions two hundred thousand dollars. For the navy four millions two hundred thousand dollars. All these are expenditures necessary for carrying into effect laws made upon deliberate consideration, and they will continue to be necessary until Congress, upon the same deliberation, shall think proper to reduce these establishments, or, (which will speedily arrive,) the public debt shall be paid off. When that day comes, the necessary expenditure, and of course the requisite revenue, will be reduced nearly one-half. For the civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenditure of the Government, it appears, therefore, that there is left only about two millions six hundred thousand dollars, or a little more than one-tenth part of the whole expenditure.

This expenditure, of a little more than two millions and a half of dollars, or rather more than one-tenth of the whole expenditure, provides for the following objects: The whole of the Legislature of this Union of twenty-four States, contingent expenses included: the whole of the Executive, including the State, Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; the expenses of the Post Office Department, covering a greater extent of territory, and diffusing a greater amount of accommodation than any other known establishment of that kind: the surveying of the public lands: the Mint establishment of the United States: the Governments of three territories: the whole Judiciary of the United States: the light-house establishment: the whole of the expenses of our foreign intercourse, and some miscellaneous items, which, not belonging properly to any other head, are placed under this.

Is it not rather amazing that a Government, extending over twenty-four States and three Territories, embracing so large a space, and so great a population, and providing adequately for all, should be carried on at so small an expense? In other parts of the world it would scarcely be credited. It does the highest honor to the Government, Congress included. It seems to me to show, most satisfactorily, that the Government, instituted by the people, and for the people, has, up to this moment, been true to its appropriate and characteristic principle, of promoting the public welfare—and that instead of being surrounded, as some have appeared to imagine, by extravagance and abuses, we are still in the pure days of the Republic. If hereafter, abuses should occur; if corruptions should grow up, and our institutions be perverted and overthrown, the patriot—for even then there will be patriots—will look back to our time with mingled admiration and regret, as a portion of the happy and honest period of our history.

He said he had been very much struck with a remark made by a gentleman, whom he was obliged to designate as one of the Opposition—that this was not a favorable time for retrenchment. If retrenchment were necessary he (Mr. S.) thought that there could be no more favorable time. The people could never have higher security than they now have. For we are sure that this Administration will be closely watched, and that no error, however slight, will be left undetected and unexposed. There is the most unceasing vigilance. There has not been, there will not be, a single particular, that will escape the watchful attention of Congress. He did not mean to say that its vigilance ever slumbered. But, assuredly, it can never be more wide awake and active than when stimulated, as it now is, by the feelings which are admitted to exist. There is all the ordinary vigilance and something more. How then can abuse, always obnoxious to the censure of Congress, hope, at this time particularly, to escape examination and exposure? How can it be believed that it has so escaped?

These were some of the reasons why he would not have felt himself bound to offer such a resolution. They were not reasons for opposing it when offered by another, but rather for giving it the fullest and freest course. If, in any quarter of the country, there is an impression of extravagance or abuse, let it be removed. If, said he, any member of this House desires to institute a general inquiry, however unpromising I may think it on account of its aiming at too much, I, for one, will not withhold from him the opportunity, though the mere inquiry seems to imply a censure upon the Government or upon some branch of it. Such an investigation is a very weighty one. It requires a careful examination of the whole structure of the Government, and of all its parts. But I cannot agree with the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from South Carolina, that it requires the cordial co-operation of the Executive, nor any co-operation at all. The gentleman from South Carolina who last addressed the House, (Mr. HAMILTON,) says the keys of the Treasury are in the hands of the Executive, and he speaks of the Executive as occupying a fortress inaccessible to us without his leave. Sir, the keys of the Treasury are in the hands of this House, lodged there by the constitution. The keys of every Department are in the hands of this House. Not an avenue, part, or place in the Government, that is not open to us, when we command it to be open. We have an unlimited power to enter, examine, and inquire. We are not obliged to trust to what any one may tell us, nor to adopt the representation of any Head of a Department. I acknowledge—and if the Administration were to be changed to-morrow, I would make the same acknowledgment—I do acknowledge that one concession ought, in my opinion, to be made—a very humble concession, indeed, to a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and to the elevated character of the men who fill those elevated places—the concession that we may rely upon the truth of what they tell us, in matters of fact. As to opinion, we can form it for ourselves. Less than this cannot be supposed or conceded.

There were other reasons, he said, why he had not voted to lay the resolution upon the table and would not do so. Such a vote might be interpreted into evidence of a disposition to prevent inquiry. But, especially, he could not consent to such a vote, when the motion was accompanied with a remark, often since repeated as the ground of it, that this was not the time for inquiry, retrenchment, or reform. What does this argument amount to? What does it mean? It means, I suppose, what others have said—that it is not a propitious moment; that we cannot expect a “cordial co-operation” on the part of the Executive; it is pointed, therefore, directly at the present Executive; it is a charge of a serious nature, calculated to prejudice the Executive in the estimation of the people, and to bear upon the pending election of President, to the injury of one of the candidates. He could not give it his sanction, because he knew nothing to warrant it. If reform and retrenchment were proper and necessary, he believed the present Executive would give us his aid as cheerfully and as effectually as any we could have.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) has very frankly given another version to the suggestion that this is not the time. He would be willing now to collect materials for reform and retrenchment, but he would not be willing now to make reform or retrenchment. And why? Because he did not wish to give the merit of such a work to the present Administration, but to reserve it for a future Administration. This is candid, undoubtedly, but it is unsound doctrine. The gentleman from South Carolina will be obliged, upon reflection, to abandon it. Is it consistent with the duty we owe to the people, to postpone the reform of abuses, if we really believe it necessary, in order that we may strip one Administration of the merit, and bestow the grace of it upon another? Is it not our first duty to do what is required for promoting the public welfare, and to do it at the time when it is required? Can we justify ourselves in delaying it for any consideration whatever, much less for such a one as that which had been stated? He thought not. It would be entirely at variance with every notion he had of the proper functions of Congress. He would therefore say, that, so far as the motion to lay upon the table was calculated to do injury to the present Administration, he was opposed to it on that

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

ground. And with this declaration he was sure the gentleman from South Carolina was too candid to find any fault. So far as such a motion was calculated to prevent or to retard inquiry or reform, or had the appearance of being so calculated, he was opposed to it, because he would not willingly place any obstruction in the way.

He said he was not going to enter into the contest of crimination and recrimination which had been carried on here. He felt himself entirely unfit for it. Some topics, however, had been introduced, having something of a specific shape, upon which he would trouble the House with a few observations. The diplomatic intercourse of the country has been charged with extravagance and mismanagement; and with what may perhaps be termed want of taste in its style. He understood a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) to contend, that the whole character of our foreign intercourse ought to be changed. If the allowance to our Ministers was too low, he (Mr. FLOYD) would agree to raise it; but they should come home when the business was done. There should be no permanent missions in other countries—no Ministers remaining abroad. This, said Mr. S., would be an entire change of the system acted upon by the Government ever since its foundation. It ought not to be adopted without being thoroughly considered. He would appeal, then, to the House whether, in the present state of the world, any civilized nation was at liberty to withhold, or refuse the ordinary and established duties of courtesy and hospitality? If she claim to be of the family of civilized nations, and wish to maintain the relations of peace and commerce, is it in her power to withdraw herself from associating with them, upon the terms, and in the manner, which the common convenience has settled? An individual may shut himself up in his house—may refuse to visit—may determine that he will neither give nor receive invitations: if he do, it will not only be at the expense of much innocent gratification to himself, and at the expense, too, of many great advantages to himself, but it will be a positive injury and wrong to society; for, as far as his example goes, it must, if adopted, cut up society by the roots. It is the same with nations. No one can shut herself up. It has been the policy of this nation, from the beginning, to perform her part in this system of mutual and friendly intercourse. Ay, sir, said he, and let it be remembered, that one of the first and highest gratifications this country ever received, was the reception of her Minister at the Court of France—an act which publicly owned her as one of the family of independent nations, and increased her moral power both at home and abroad. If the system is to be changed, Congress must do it. As long as it continues, the duty of the Executive is to give it effect; and no blame can attach to the Administration for executing the provisions of the constitution and the laws.

It was true, he said, that, within a few years past, our diplomatic intercourse had been extended, and its expenses increased. The family of nations had been enlarged by the interesting addition of the new States of this hemisphere. It was, in every view, particularly interesting to us. They were new, near, and valuable neighbors, with whom we must have relations, and with whom there could be no doubt it was desirable that these should be the relations of peace, of friendship, and mutual good understanding. Upon this point, the people of the United States were in advance of Congress—he did not speak hastily—the public sentiment was in advance of Congress, and Congress was in advance of the Executive. The missions were not instituted, until this House, by a resolution, passed with almost unexampled unanimity—(but one member voted against it, a gentleman from Virginia, not now a member,)—until this House, stimulating the Executive to open the intercourse, pledged itself to support him in the measure, and offered a liberal provision for the expense. There has been no expression since of a wish to abandon or to limit that intercourse. Whatever may be the expense of those missions to the new States, all who read the newspapers, and know any thing of the nature of our commercial intercourse with them—all who know how they are solicited, courted, and caressed, by the European powers, and the struggle that is carried on for their favor—to say nothing of other and more general considerations—will see the importance of cultivating good feelings and maintaining a good correspondence with them; and that we cannot neglect these things, without risking the loss of valuable advantages. His own clear opinion was, that we ought to admit no fair exertions to preserve them, and that the missions ought to be maintained. He thought them of the greatest consequence. Remarks had been made upon the style of our foreign Ministers, their dress particularly. Why, said the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) not let him appear with the simplicity of Franklin and Livingston? The House would excuse a word in reply. He (Mr. S.) knew nothing of the simplicity of Mr. Livingston. That gentleman was not near to the time Franklin. He was appointed to France soon after Mr. Jefferson became President, he believed in 1801. But this he did know, from the best information, that he was a gentleman of large fortune, and liberal disposition, accustomed everywhere to a liberal way of life, and that the liberality of his style of living in France, was such as most materially, as he had understood, to encroach upon, and reduce his private fortune. In what dress he appeared at Court he could not say; but he took it for granted he accommodated himself in that respect to the fashion of the Court. As to Franklin, he said, consider the circumstances under which he appeared in France. The Representative of a young republic, just come into existence, and in its very cradle exhibiting Herculean strength, by maintaining, single-handed, a contest for its independence with one of the strongest nations that existed; attracting the earnest attention of the whole civilized world, and especially engaging the attention and the good wishes of France, because the contest was with her habitual enemy, and promised to diminish his power. When a nation, so circumstanced, shall have a Franklin for her envoy, I do not believe it will be very material to inquire what dress he wears. To that state we shall never return. And, I may be allowed to add, we have not Franklins to send. He carried with him the fruits of more than seventy years, devoted, with the aid of extraordinary natural genius, and especially of the most uncommon sagacity, to the acquisition of knowledge, and with the great reputation he had justly acquired, by diffusing the treasures of his wisdom and observation. He was known for his examination before the House of Commons: he was known for the fierce and virulent obloquy that had been heaped upon him (for he, too, was visited with obloquy) by Wedderburne, afterwards Lord Loughborough, before the Privy Council; he was known as a man of letters, as a scientific philosopher, and, what is more, as a practical philosopher, too; and he was known as a statesman and as a patriot. His fame had gone before him—it shed a lustre upon his country, wherever there were men who could appreciate his merit, and that lustre is still undiminished. I do not exactly know what coat he wore. It is somewhere recorded, that, in French society, his straight-combed, venerable locks, and simple dress, were admired by the ladies, who then gave the tone to society. It was something strange, out of the common way, and if it had been even uncouth, it might have attracted still more attention. How he appeared at Court,* as to dress, I do not remember to have seen particularly stated. He was a long time in France before he was received. His public reception was not till about the time of the treaty.

This livery, however, as it had been reproachfully called—I cannot say I have worn it—but I know what it is—and have heard something of his history. Our Ministers abroad are very poorly paid. They cannot bear the expense of Court dresses. If borne by the Treasury, as a contingent expense, it is so much money thrown away. If borne by Ministers, it makes an unreasonable charge upon their allowance. The salaries of our Ministers abroad were higher, by above twenty-six hundred dollars in the time of Franklin, than they are now, though the expenses of living were then probably not more than half of what they are at this time. The present rate of allowance, was fixed as long ago as the year 1784, by an act of the old Congress. How then does the matter stand? The House will recollect, from a statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that our distinguished fellow-citizen, the late President of the United States, (Mr. Monroe,) was engaged in four missions in the course of little more than a year. Claims growing out of that employment have lately been allowed by Congress. He was led in rapid succession to different Courts, and probably obliged at each to conform to the mode established by etiquette. The expense would be for a single occasion. There are instances of charges allowed by the Government, for the dresses of Ministers for particular occasions. When Mr. Madison was President, and Mr. Monroe Secretary of State, the present plan was adopted as a relief. It is not obligatory upon the Minister. He may dispense with it if he think fit. It is no expense to the Treasury, for the Minister must pay for it himself. But he has the sanction of his country to wear it. As long as it lasts he need make no change. Wherever he goes he is in the dress of his own country, and stands upon his own ground, instead of being obliged to conform to foreign fashions. It has been spoken of as costing seven hundred and fifty dollars. That is too high. It costs something more than half that sum; but the Minister pays for it, not the Treasury. Why call it reproachfully, livery? It is no more of a livery than the coat of an officer of the Army or the Navy—it is probably not finer than the coat of a general officer. If it be a livery, is there any disgrace in wearing it? We are all servants of the people—they are our masters—the livery worn by their servants is one which no man need be ashamed to wear. It is the livery of the people of the United States. This is understood to be the history of the coat. If any one within the sound of my voice should hereafter be appointed a Minister—my advice may be of little value—but I recommend him to put on the livery of his country.

Of that mission, he said, which had also been alluded to, in which he had the honor to have a part, the mission to Panama, he should always have difficulty in speaking, for very obvious reasons. At this time, it was impossible he should enter into the subject, because the mission was still pending, in the hands of our Minister at Mexico. He would say, however, in reply to the allegations which had been made against it, that the mission had the clear sanction of all the branches of the Government. What has since occurred, could neither make it right or wrong: it stood upon the same footing as at first. If it was right then, it cannot be wrong now. But he would say—and he said it with the utmost sincerity, it was but the humble opinion of an individual—he would say, from all that he had seen, and all that he had heard, that, if the Congress should assemble at Tacubaya, or elsewhere, it was of the greatest importance to the interests of the United States that we should be represented in it. He was not about to debate the matter. He merely

* It is believed, upon good authority, that he appeared in a full court dress. The character of this eminent man would lead us to believe, that he would, in this respect, conform to the usages of the Court.—Note by Mr. S.

FEBRUARY, 1838.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

gave this as his own single, humble, perhaps valueless opinion.

[The House adjourned to Monday.]

MONDAY, February 4.

Retrenchment.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, as proposed to be amended by Mr. BLAKE, and Mr. HAMILTON.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, perhaps it would be vain to inquire by whom this debate was introduced. It is certain that we have now got into it, and no gentleman can predict when it will close. I cannot agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) that the Opposition are justly chargeable with its introduction in the party form which it has assumed, nor for its protracted character. My friend from Kentucky, (Mr. LETCHER,) has truly stated what would have been the probable course of the resolutions, had it not been for the interference of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. BARNEY.) The mover of them, who is a young member of the House, would have made a speech in favor of their passage, and they would have then rested quietly with the numberless resolutions which have gone before them. The gentleman from Maryland, however, opposed their passage, upon the ground that no cause existed even to suspect the present Administration of any abuses. From that moment the debate assumed a party complexion.

This debate would have ended on Thursday last, after the solemn appeal for that purpose, which was made to the House by the venerable gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) had not the gentleman from Massachusetts himself prevented it, by moving an adjournment. That gentleman ought to know, that he can never throw himself into any debate without giving it fresh vigor and importance.

It is true that a single straggler from the ranks of the Opposition introduced these resolutions, but without the least intention of bringing on a general engagement. When he was attacked, he defended himself in gallant style, and we were obliged both by duty and by policy to sustain him. It is for that purpose I have risen. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) and my friend and colleague from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SEGEANT,) have entirely changed the character of the debate, and have gone into an elaborate vindication of the present Administration. It is my purpose to reply to their arguments.

Liberty, sir, is a precious gift, which can never long be enjoyed by any people without the most watchful jealousy. It is Hesperian fruit, which the ever-wakeful jealousy of the people can alone preserve. The very possession of power has a strong—a natural tendency, to corrupt the heart. The lust of dominion grows with its possession; and the man who, in humble life, was pure, and innocent, and just, has often been transformed, by the long possession of power, into a monster. In the Sacred Book, which contains lessons of wisdom for the politician as well as for the Christian, we find a happy illustration of the corrupting influence of power upon the human heart. When Hazael came to consult Elisha, whether his master, the King of Syria, would recover from a dangerous illness, the prophet, looking through the vista of futurity, saw the crimes of which the messenger who stood before him would be guilty, and he wept. Hazael asked, "Why weepeth my Lord?" The prophet then recounted to him the murders and the cruelties of which he should be guilty, towards the children of Israel. Hazael, in the spirit of virtuous indignation, replied—"Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" "And Elisha answered, the Lord hath shewed me, that thou shalt be king over Syria." This man afterwards became king, by the murder of his master, and was guilty of enormities, the bare recital of which would make us shudder.

The nature of man is the same under Republics and under Monarchies. The history of the human race proves, that liberty can never long be preserved, without popular jealousy. It is the condition of its enjoyment. Our rulers must be narrowly watched. When my colleague advanced the position which he did, he could not have foreseen the consequences to which his doctrine would lead. I know that he never could have intended that it should reach thus far; but yet my inference is perfectly fair when I declare that it is a doctrine which only suits the calm of despotism. It is the maxim of despots, that the people should never inquire into the concerns of Government. Those who have enslaved mankind, from Cæsar to Bonaparte, have always endeavored, by presenting them with amusements, and by every other means in their power, to attract the attention of the people from the conduct of their rulers. I therefore differ, totò celo, from my colleague upon this point. If the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CHILTON,) shall have the effect of more earnestly and more closely directing the attention of the people to the concerns of the Government, the result will be most fortunate. If the Government has been administered upon correct principles, an intelligent people will do justice to their rulers; if not, they will take care that every abuse shall be corrected.

My colleague used an argument, for the purpose of sustaining the present Administration, which I should not have expected from that quarter. He has stated that, since the year 1816 the national debt had been reduced, from 126 to 66 millions of dollars. This is very true; and from the argument of the gentleman, one who was ignorant of the subject might be induced to believe, that a large portion of this reduction may be fairly attributed to the present Administration. He evidently endeavored to make this impression upon the House.

I would ask the gentleman what agency had the present Administration—nay, what agency could they possibly have had, in the reduction of the public debt? Are they entitled to the least credit upon that account? Certainly not. It was a subject over which they had no control. The laws which brought the revenue into the Treasury, out of which the debt was paid, existed long before they came into existence. Commerce wafted into our ports wealth from all nations, and the duties which were collected on the importation of foreign merchandise, they were bound to apply to the extinguishment of the demands which existed against the country. The Administration only did that, which they could not have avoided doing. The money flowed into the Treasury without their agency, and they applied that portion of it which they were bound by law to apply, to the extinguishment of the public debt. I have hitherto admitted, that they applied it fairly. The ancient British monarch, who, to show his people the impotence of human power, commanded the tides of the ocean not to flow, had no more authority over the laws of nature, than the present Administration could have had, in preventing the tide of wealth, out of which the public debt has been reduced, from flowing into the country. Men can never be entitled to credit for doing that which they could not have avoided. The praise, therefore, which the gentleman wishes to bestow upon the present Administration, for paying the national debt, is certainly not their due.

It is true that, in times like the present, the Republic is always most in danger. When the clouds of adversity are lowering over the country, and when direct taxation becomes necessary for the support of the Government, the people are watchful and jealous, and will then attend strictly to their own concerns. It is in the halcyon days of peace and prosperity, when the jealousy of the people slumbers, that abuses are most likely to steal into the administration of your Government. I charge not the present Administration with corruption; but I do most solemnly believe, that several of their measures have had a strong tendency towards it. I thank Heaven that, in these days, a "Military Chieftain" has arisen, whose name is familiar to the lips of even the most humble citizen of this country, because his services live in their hearts, who will be able, by the suffrages of the people, to wrest the power of this Government from the hands of its present possessors. No one else could, at this time, have successfully opposed the immense patronage and power of the Administration.

I think I have shown, that the present Administration have not the least claim to merit, for the payment of the public debt. It is a claim which has no foundation upon which to rest. It is one of the splendid generalities to which my colleague has resorted, which, when you come to examine minutely, vanishes from the touch.

I shall now leave my colleague from Pennsylvania, but with the intention of returning to him, after I shall have disposed of some of the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) Before, however, I commence my reply to that gentleman, I beg leave to make a few observations upon the last Presidential election. I shall purposely pass over every charge which has been made, that it was accomplished by bargain and sale, or by actual corruption. If that were the case, I have no knowledge of the fact; and shall therefore say nothing about it. I shall argue this question as though no such charges had ever been made. So far as it regards the conduct which the people of the United States ought to pursue, at the approaching election, I agree entirely with the eloquent gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) (I cannot with propriety call him my friend,) that it can make no difference whether a bargain existed or not. Nay, in some aspects in which the subject may be viewed, the danger to the people would be the greater, if no corruption had existed. It is true, that this circumstance ought greatly to influence our individual opinions of the men who now wield the destinies of the Republic; but yet the precedent would be at least equally dangerous, in the one case, as in the other. If flagrant and gross corruption had existed, every honest man would start from it with instinctive horror, and the people would indignantly hurl those men from the seats of power, who had thus betrayed their dearest interests. If the election were pure, there is, therefore, the greater danger in the precedent. I believe, in my soul, that the precedent, which was established at the last Presidential election, ought to be reversed by the people, and this is one of my principal reasons for opposing the re-election of the present Chief Magistrate.

Let us examine this subject more closely. General Jackson was returned by the people of this country to the House of Representatives, with a plurality of electoral votes. The distinguished individual who is now the Secretary of State, was then the Speaker of this House. It is perfectly well known, that, without his vote and influence, Mr. Adams could not have been elected President. After the election, we beheld that distinguished individual, and no man in the United States witnessed the spectacle with more regret than I did, descending,—yes, sir, I say descending—from the elevated station which you now occupy, into the cabinet of the President whom he had elected.

"Quantum mutatus ab illo."

In the midnight of danger, during the darkest period of the late war, "his thrilling trump had cheered the land." Although among the great men of that day there was no acknowledged leader upon this floor, yet I have been informed, upon the best authority, that he was "primus inter pares." I did wish, at a future time, to see him elevated still higher. I am

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

one of the last men in the country who could triumph over his fallen fortunes. Should he ever return to what I believe to be correct political principles, I shall willingly fight in the same ranks with him as a companion—nay, after a short probation, I should willingly acknowledge him as a leader. What brilliant prospects has that man not sacrificed!

This precedent, should it be confirmed by the people at the next election, will be one of most dangerous character to the Republic. The election of President must, I fear, often devolve upon this House. We have but little reason to expect, that any amendment, in relation to this subject, will be made to the constitution in our day. There are so many conflicting interests to reconcile, so many powers to balance, that, when we consider the large majority in each branch of Congress, and the still larger majority of States, required to amend the constitution, the prospect of any change is almost hopeless. I believe it will long remain just as it is. What an example, then, will this precedent, in the pure age of the Republic, present to future times! The people owe it to themselves, if the election must devolve upon this House, never to sanction the principle that one of its members may accept from the person whom he has elected, any high office, much less the highest in his gift. Such a principle, if once established, must, in the end, destroy the purity of this House, and convert it into a corrupt electoral conclave. If the individual to whom I have alluded, could elect a President, and receive from him the office of Secretary of State, from the purest motives, other men may, and hereafter will, pursue the same policy, from the most corrupt. "If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" This precedent will become a cover, under which future bargains and corrupt combinations will be sanctioned; under which the spirit of the constitution will be sacrificed to its letter.

I shall now, Mr. Speaker, enter upon a more particular reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) I wish I were able to follow the example of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) and to take the general and comprehensive views of political subjects, which he recommended. As I cannot pursue that course, I must enter into detail, and make such a speech as he would attribute to a lawyer.

What was the first important act of the present Administration? No, not the first, but the first after that message which certainly partook much more of the spirit of the "Statesman of 40 years," who had been bred in foreign courts, than that of the plain simple American Republican. The President claimed the power, and mere courtesy prevented him from exercising it, of commissioning Ministers to attend the Congress of Panama, without "the advice and consent of the Senate." My friend from North Carolina, (Mr. CARSON,) was, in my opinion, correct, when he declared that one of the first important acts of the President had been, to claim a power in direct violation of the constitution. That instrument declares that the President "shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." This is a clear, plain provision. Upon what authority, then, did the President claim the right to send Ministers to this Congress without the consent of the Senate? The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERETT) has answered the question, and has sustained this claim of power, by a most novel argument. He has read to us the act of Congress of July 1, 1790, which provides "that the President of the United States shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to draw from the Treasury of the United States, a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, annually, to be paid out of the moneys arising from the duties on imports and tonnage, for the support of such persons as he shall commission to serve the United States in foreign parts, and for the expense incident to the business in which they may be employed." How commission! Without the advice and consent of the Senate! Certainly not; unless you can suppose that the very first Congress under the constitution, deliberately intended to destroy the power which the constitution had wisely conferred upon the Senate. The language of the act of Congress is perfectly consistent with the power of the Senate; because the President does, in fact, always commission public Ministers and other officers of the Government, after the Senate have advised and consented to their appointment. This phraseology was continued, in the several acts providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, until the year 1800, when the act of the 19th of March, 1798, the last in which it had been used, was suffered to expire. Since that time, no such expression has ever been introduced into any of the subsequent acts. And yet this phrase, which had been employed in acts that have long ceased to exist, was laid hold of by the President to justify this extraordinary claim of power. Whilst it affords no ground for its justification, it shows how desirous men in power are to lay hold of every pretext, no matter how trifling, to extend their authority. This is a law of nature, which can never be abolished by any law of man. It proves, conclusively, the wisdom and the necessity of watching over our rulers, with a jealous eye.

I shall now proceed to assail another position of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) He argued against including in the resolutions before the House the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. The gentleman shakes his head. He certainly did say, that it looked like trenching upon the prerogatives of the Executive. The gentleman believes that the expenditure of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse, is a prominent point before the House. I think so too.

The application of this entire fund is left to the sound discretion of the Executive, and is to be accounted for at the Treasury, in a twofold manner. It is his duty to account specially, and produce regular vouchers, "in all instances, where the expenditure thereof may, in his judgment, be made public." When that is not the case, he settles the account, "by making a certificate of the amount of such expenditures as he may think it advisable not to specify." This last is called the secret service money. This is the distinction between the two portions of the fund. It is necessary for the good of the people, that the manner in which the secret service money is expended, should not be made public. If the names of those persons to whom it is given were not kept secret, the Government, in times of peril, might be prevented from getting important information, which they could otherwise obtain. But, Mr. Speaker, give me the Administration which requires but little secret service money, especially in time of peace. Indeed, I am inclined to believe, that none is then necessary. A Republican Government ought to be open in its conduct, and have as few secrets as possible. Upon one occasion, Jefferson returned the entire contingent fund, which had been appropriated for foreign intercourse, untouched. I am just informed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that Washington did the same. These are examples well worthy of imitation in our day.

I do not wish to know the manner in which the present Administration have applied the secret service money. I shall never knowingly invade a single right which belongs to the Executive. These resolutions contain no such principle; but one great reason why they have found any favor in my eyes, is, that I wish to ascertain the aggregate amount, not the items, of the secret service money which has been expended since the present Administration came into power, and I wish to have a special account laid before this House, of the manner in which the residue of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse has been expended. This will be an invasion of no prerogative which belongs to the President.

I now approach the main argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) and in the commencement, I shall lay down a position broadly, which I believe I shall be able to prove conclusively—that the President of the United States did receive an outfit of $9,000, whilst he was a Minister abroad, in direct and palpable violation of a law of the United States; and that at this day he retains in his pocket one-half of that sum, in opposition to the declared opinion of the Congress of the United States. If I shall not establish this proposition, I have never been more mistaken in my life.

In relation to outfits to be granted to public Ministers, all the acts of Congress which preceded that of the 1st May, 1810, spoke the same language. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERETT) gave us an historical sketch of these laws; but, as they are all the same in regard to the question I am now about to argue, I shall only refer to the act of the 10th May, 1800. It was that act, which ascertained the compensation of public Ministers, from its date, until it was repealed by the act of 1st May, 1810. I shall read its first section.

"Be it enacted, &c. That exclusive of an outfit, which shall, in no case, exceed the amount of one year's salary to any Minister Plenipotentiary, or Chargé des Affaires, to whom the same may be allowed, the President of the United States shall not allow to any Minister Plenipotentiary a greater sum than at the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum, as a compensation for all his services and expenses: nor a greater sum for the same, than four thousand five hundred dollars per annum to a Chargé des Affaires; nor a greater sum for the same than one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars per annum to the Secretary of any Minister Plenipotentiary."

From the origin of the Government, until the year 1810, the President clearly had the right to allow an outfit to a Minister, whom he might think proper to transfer from one European Court to another. The language of the act of 1800, and of the previous acts is general and indefinite. Whether they would have justified him in making such an allowance, to a Minister whom he might have employed upon a new mission, the functions of which were to be exercised at the court where he resided, is a question upon which I shall express no opinion.

The act of 1810 limited the general language of that of 1800, and confined the discretion of the President, in the allowance of outfits, to the case of a Minister "on going from the United States to any foreign country." The first section of that act, after fixing the annual compensation of foreign Ministers, Chargés, and Secretaries of Legation, contains the following enactment: "Provided, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to allow to a Minister Plenipotentiary, or Chargé des Affaires, on going from the United States to any foreign country, an outfit, which shall in no case exceed one year's full salary of such Minister, or Chargé des Affaires." This act, in express terms, limits the general expressions of former laws. It authorizes the President to allow an outfit to every public Minister, upon his first appointment, for the purpose of establishing him abroad. After he has received one outfit, and has gone from the United States to the Government to which he has been sent, in case he should be transferred from it to another Government, the President, since the act of 1810, has not had the power of allowing him a second outfit.

I am glad that the gentleman from Mass-

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. or R.]

chusetts (Mr. EVERETT) cited the cases which he has done, of the allowance of outfits to Ministers, by the Executive, upon transferring them from one European court to another. If the gentleman had not done so, we might have been at a loss to account for the change of phraseology in the act of 1810, and the difference between it and all former acts upon the same subject. The case of the outfit to Mr. Monroe, from his transfer from England to France, and all the other cases brought into the view of the House by the gentleman, were determined, under former laws which clearly gave to the President power over the question. These cases are authorities against the gentleman; because they exclusively show the reason which guided the Legislature, in 1810, in changing the law, and in limiting the power of the President, in the allowance of outfits to the case of Ministers, on their departure from the United States to a foreign country.

I may be asked, did Congress mean to declare, that no outfit should ever be allowed upon the transfer of a Minister from one Court to another? I answer, by no means. They intended to reserve to themselves the power of deciding, in each particular case, whether any new outfit ought to be allowed, and, if so, what should be its amount. If a Minister should be transferred from one extremity of Europe to another — from Lisbon to St. Petersburg, a new outfit of $9,000 might be necessary. But, in the case of a transfer from Lisbon to Madrid, there might be no occasion for any new outfit; and, if there were, the one-half of a full outfit, or even less, would probably be sufficient. The present Administration, in the estimates which they submitted to this House, at the last session of Congress, asked a second outfit of $9,000 for our Minister at Mexico, because they intended to transfer him from the City of Mexico to Tacubaya, a distance of only eight or nine miles. Although I did not think it proper to allow a full outfit, in such a case, yet I was glad that the request had been made; because it showed that the Executive were returning to a correct construction of the law, in relation to this subject. It showed that the President was unwilling to follow the precedents which existed heretofore, upon the transfer of a Minister from one court to another; or otherwise he would have allowed him an outfit, without consulting Congress.

In my judgment, the act of 1810 is so plain, that he who runs may read. It is a universal rule of construction, that when a law delegates a special power to an individual, and confines its exercise to a particular cause, that it necessarily excludes him from the exercise of general power over all other cases. The act of Congress gave to the President the special power of allowing an outfit to a Minister, when he was leaving the United States and going to a foreign country; but yet, that act has received such a construction, that the Executive have claimed and exercised the power of allowing outfits, in all cases, without limitation, and without restraint. For this purpose, the contingent fund is used, in violation of the law.

It will not only be curious, but instructive, to mark the gradual progress of the Executive, until at length they repealed the act of 1810. In the month of April, 1818, the present President, then being our resident Minister at Russia, was appointed one of the Envoys Extraordinary, under the joint commission, to treat with England. As this commission owed its origin to the mediation of the Emperor of Russia, the seat of the negotiation was to be at St. Petersburg. A short time after the appointment, Mr. Monroe, then Secretary of State, transmitted to Mr. Adams, $9,000, a full outfit; although, at the time, it was not contemplated that Mr. Adams should change his residence. The House will, therefore, observe, that this was not even the case of a transfer from one court to another; but it was the allowance of a full outfit to the same Minister, while he continued at the same court. The then President, when he directed the money to be sent, no doubt expected that Congress would sanction his conduct. Accordingly, we find that an appropriation was asked to cover this outfit. The question was then brought before the Congress of the United States, for their determination, and was deliberately decided. A legislative construction was given in August, 1816, to the act of 1810, against this outfit; but Congress, exercising a liberal discretion, allowed Mr. Adams $4,500 instead of $9,000.

Some time after this determination of the question, (too long perhaps,) on the 23d June, 1814, Mr. Monroe wrote to Mr. Adams, in the following words: "It is necessary to apprise you, that, although a full outfit was transmitted to you by the Neptune, and intended to be allowed you by the Executive, as a member of the extra mission at St. Petersburg, yet the Legislature, on a reference of the subject to them, for an appropriation, decided the principle by the amount appropriated, and the discussion which took place at the time, that half an outfit only could be allowed to a Minister, under circumstances applicable to your case. In your drafts on the bankers, and in your future accounts, you will be pleased to keep this deduction in view." After the present President had thus discovered that the money was sent to him by mistake, did he submit to the decision of Congress? No, sir. Although, within the period of eight years, before his return to this country, he had received $115,000 from this "penurious Government;" yet he still continued to persist in retaining the whole outfit in his pocket. Congress gave a construction to their own law. They believed it had been violated, when an outfit of $9,000 was sent by the President to Mr. Adams; yet they liberally allowed him $4,500. Instead of accepting that sum with gratitude, he made a complaint against this "penurious Government," and denied the right of the Legislature of the Union to interfere.

He declared "that the principle which Congress would settle, by an ultimate refusal to allow the appropriation, could be no other than a principle to confiscate, without any alleged offence."

The next year, however, conveyed him good tidings from this country. On the 19th November, 1815, Mr. Monroe wrote a letter to Mr. Adams, marked "private," from which the following is an extract: "It was doubted whether the inhibition of a greater sum than one year's salary as an outfit, contained in the terms on going from the United States, might not be construed, as precluding an allowance by way of outfit, to any Minister who did not go from the United States. Mr. Irving's appointment to Spain involved the same question. It was wished to reserve the point for more deliberate consideration, than could be bestowed on it, when the letter of March 15th was written to you. I have now the satisfaction to inform you, that the subject has been maturely weighed, and that the result has been in favor of the outfit, on the principle that those restrictive terms, if applicable to Ministers already in Europe, are no further so, than to confine the allowance to them within the same limit." This letter communicated to him that construction of the Executive Department, which, since it was made, has entirely repealed in practice the limitation upon the allowance of outfits, contained in the act of 1810, and secured to him his full outfit, in opposition to the will of the Legislature, which had been clearly expressed in 1813. From 1810 till November, 1815, this act was obeyed both in its letter and in its spirit. Then, and not till then, did it sink under Executive construction.

The accounts of Mr. Adams continued unsettled at the Treasury, a balance appearing against him, until after the passage of the general appropriation bill, in April, 1822. That act provided "that no money appropriated by the said act shall be paid to any person for his compensation, who is in arrears to the United States, until such person shall have accounted for, and paid into the Treasury, all sums for which he may be liable." In consequence of the existence of this salutary provision, the Comptroller of the Treasury refused to pay Mr. Adams his salary as Secretary of State, until his account, as a Foreign Minister, should be liquidated. He appealed from this decision to Mr. Monroe, the then President, and, in support of his appeal, cited the private letter which Mr. Monroe, when Secretary of State, had written to him in November, 1815, as conclusive of the question. In this appeal, he says, "that the President was authorized, by the first section of the act of Congress, of 1st May, 1810, to make this allowance, cannot be questioned, under the construction which has uniformly been given to it, a construction applied upon full deliberation and advisement, and which has been admitted in other cases upon the settlement of accounts at the Treasury. For this construction, I refer to the copy of your letter of the 19th November, 1815, herewith submitted."

This subject was referred, by the President, to the Attorney-General of the United States, and the construction which had been placed upon the act of Congress, by the Administration, in 1815, was fully sustained, in the broadest terms, by that officer. In his opinion, dated June 5th, 1822, he declares, that the question of outfit is given to the President, exclusively, and without limit, save only he is not to exceed a whole year's salary." And thus, sir, you perceive in what manner a law, which, in express terms, limited the exercise of the discretion of the President, in the allowance of outfits to Ministers "on going from the United States to a foreign country," has become unlimited; and how the exclusive power over the question of outfit has been conferred upon the President. Notwithstanding this high authority, however, I think I have maintained my proposition, and established, conclusively, that Mr. Adams now retains in his pocket $4,500, in violation of the act of 1810, and in violation of the solemn legislative construction which it received in 1813.

But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) even if there were any thing wrong in the settlement of the accounts of Mr. Adams, he is not to blame. He did not interfere—he left all these matters to the accounting officers of the Treasury. Is this the fact? Did he not receive the money, and does he not still retain it? Did he refuse to refund it, when it was demanded by the Comptroller? Did he not appeal from the decision of that officer to the President of the United States? And was not his refusal to comply with the decision of Congress the cause why the act of 1810 has received that construction, which has given to the President "exclusively, and without limit," the power over outfits?

There is one matter of fact which I wish to put right, before I proceed further. Mr. Adams, in his account, on the 30th June, 1814, charged the sum of $886 86, the expenses of a journey from St. Petersburg to Ghent. It is but just to him to say, that he had left his family behind him, at St. Petersburg. He never did return from Ghent to St. Petersburg; but, yet, there was allowed to him the sum of $886 86, for his expenses in returning to that capital. This is what has been so often called his constructive journey. The construction, however, did not end here. After this allowance had been made, it was discovered that the travelling expenses of Mr. Bayard and Mr. Gallatin, from St. Petersburg to London, and from thence to Ghent, amounted, for each, to the sum of $1,556 54. Their journey was accomplished chiefly by land. In the final settlement of the account of Mr. Adams, instead of $886 86, which had been at first allowed to him for the expense of a journey which he never made, he was allowed the sum of $1,556 54. The reason for this change which is spread upon the face of

FEBRUARY, 1838.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

the account itself, is, that he was at first allowed but $886 86 "under an impression that the same sum, charged by him for the journey from St. Petersburg to Ghent, would be equal to the expenses of his return, but which now appears, would not have been the case, as that journey was made chiefly by water, but his return must have been by land, and by the same route as that taken by Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard, and equally expensive."

These are the facts. I shall not argue this point, but will leave it to my colleague and friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGHAM,) and the gentleman from Rhode Island. I do not say that some allowance ought not to have been made to Mr. Adams, under the peculiar circumstances of the case. One thing, however, is certain; that he did receive $1,556 54, for the expenses of a journey which he never made; because he never did return from Ghent to St. Petersburg.

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH asked Mr. BUCHANAN to define what was a constructive journey.]

Mr. B. said, I cannot comply with the request of the gentleman from Virginia. If he cannot define it himself, no man in this House can.

But, it has been urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) that precedents sanction the allowance of the outfit to Mr. Adams. I admit there have been precedents in abundance since 1815; but it is against this very doctrine of "safe precedents," that I am now contending. On the fourth of March next, it will be seven and twenty years since the inauguration of Mr. Jefferson. What has been our history ever since? Each President has nominated his successor as regularly as though the constitution conferred upon him that power. During this period, each President has been called upon to sanction that which he had done as Secretary of State. The line of "safe precedents" has been unbroken, and the first office in the world has passed as regularly to each succeeding Secretary of State, as the imperial crown ever descended from father to son. How is it possible that abuses can ever be corrected, under such circumstances? A trifling departure from the law to-day becomes a precedent for a greater violation to-morrow; and whilst power continues to flow in one unbroken line abuses must still continue increasing. There is no remedy for the people, but by breaking this line of safe precedents. It is this regular course of succession, which in the lapse of time destroys monarchies. The abuses which the father introduces, are sanctioned and extended by the son, until at length, after a few generations, the whole Government becomes tainted with corruption, and there is nothing left for the people, but the dreadful remedy of a revolution. It is the principle against which I am now contending, without a special reference to any particular Administration. The people of the United States have at length determined to break this line of Cabinet succession, and to reverse the doctrine of safe precedents; and I trust and believe they will accomplish their purpose. Rotation in office—that salutary principle in a Republican Government, which purifies the political atmosphere, and causes the successor to view with a jealous and scrutinizing eye, the acts of those who have gone before him—has had no real existence, in the Federal Government, since the days of Thomas Jefferson. There has been a regular succession ever since. Is an abuse now pointed out? We are at once told, it is sanctioned by a precedent; the Monroes and the Gallatins have done the same thing, and why shall we not do so too? I answer, when the law forbids it, precedents ought to be disregarded. All the precedents which have existed since 1815, although they have violated can never repeal the act of 1810.

I now come to that part of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) which relates to the billiard table. I should not have said one word upon this subject, did I not differ entirely in relation to it, from the gentlemen from Virginia and South Carolina, (Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. HAMILTON.) I admit that the expenditure of fifty dollars is a very little matter and this has ever been the opinion of my friend from North Carolina, (Mr. CARSON,) who has been so often introduced into the debate. If there be any gentleman in the House, who regards fifty dollars less than he does, I do not know the man. The question worthy of our consideration, is, not whether the price of the billiard table was paid out of the public Treasury, or out of the private purse of the President; but whether the billiard table ought to be set up, as an article of furniture, in the House of the President of the United States? I am free to say, I think it ought not. In the State of Virginia billiard tables are prohibited even in the mansions of private gentlemen under very severe penalties. The gentleman from Virginia therefore cannot indulge in this game at home: for I know him too well to believe that he would violate the laws of his own State. This shows the moral sense of the people of that ancient and respectable Commonwealth in relation to the game of billiards. To use a familiar expression of their own, they do not go against either the exercise or the amusement of the play; but they know the temptation which it presents to gambling, and the consequent ruin which must follow in its train. It has a direct tendency to corrupt the morals of our youth. Indeed, I doubt whether there be a single State in the Union which has not prohibited the game of billiards. The people of the United States are generally a moral and religious people; a proper regard, therefore, for public opinion, for the scruples of the pious, ought to have prevented the first Magistrate of the Union from setting such an example. [Here Mr. RANDOLPH observed there was no law in the District of Columbia against playing billiards.] Mr. BUCHANAN then said the President of the United States is not only the President of the District of Columbia but of the whole American people; and they condemn this and every other species of gambling. Ought, then, the man who has been elevated to the most exalted station upon earth, and whose example must have a most powerful and extensive influence upon the morals of the youth of our country, to set up a billiard table as an article of furniture, in the house which belongs to the American people? He certainly ought not to keep such an article of furniture in that house, nor ought he there to play at the game. I should never have invaded his domestic retirement for the purpose of discovering whether he kept a billiard table or not. I should never have been the first to bring this matter, either before the House, or the country. It has been brought here by others, and I felt it to be my duty to express my opinion upon the subject.

I shall now approach another branch of my colleague's argument. I fully assent to his general proposition, that it is both our duty and our interest to cultivate friendly relations with every civilized nation; and for that purpose we should interchange with them Ministers and diplomatic agents. Our Ministers, when sent to a foreign court, should remain there, and not return home at the end of the year. The question upon which I would say, I should join issue with the gentleman, did this expression not "smell of the shop," is in what manner ought our Ministers to appear abroad? Ours is the only pure Republican Government upon the earth. All our habits and our manners ought to be congenial to the simplicity and dignity of our institutions. Among men of sense abroad, our Ministers attired in the style of country gentlemen, would be more respectable, and more respected, than if they were bedizened in all the colors of the rainbow. In every attempt to ape the splendor of the representatives of monarchical Governments, we must fail. The veriest menial of the most contemptible court in Europe who appears abroad in the character of a foreign Minister, will be able to eclipse in dress and finery, the representatives of the American people.

What was the example of the ancient Romans? In the days of their purity and their greatness did they ever attempt to vie with the splendor of the Asiatic despots whom they subdued? Did they send ambassadors to the East, clothed in gorgeous apparel? No, they went in the simple dignity of Roman citizens, clothed with the majesty and power of the Roman people: and they carried respect for the Roman name, wherever they went. It was upon this model that Dr. Franklin acted, when he appeared as our Minister at the court of France, in the plain dress of a country gentleman. He would have deserved immortality for this act alone. He set an example from which his successors ought never to have departed.

What is now the case? The last Administration have prescribed a uniform to be worn by our foreign Ministers. It consists of a military coat, covered, and glittering with gold lace, the cost of which is not less than 500 dollars, and a chapeau and small sword, corresponding with it in splendor! And this dress is what my colleague has called the livery of the American people, which our Ministers ought to be proud to wear! I protest against this dress being called the livery of the American people. It is not so. It is the livery of the last, and the present Administration. No gentleman who valued his standing with the people of this country, would ever appear before them in such a garb. The people of the United States do not even know that such a dress has been prescribed for their Ministers abroad. In many instances it must make us appear ridiculous in the eyes of foreign nations. Imagine to yourself a grave and venerable statesman who never attended a militia training in his life, but who has been elevated to the station of a foreign Minister, in consequence of his civil attainments, appearing at court, arrayed in this military coat, with a chapeau under his arm and a small sword dangling at his side! Is not such a man compelled, by conforming to this regulation, to render himself ridiculous? "A military chieftain," who, in early life, had received his education at West Point, not the old "citizen soldier" who resides upon his farm, might sport a dress of this kind with some degree of grace; but what a ridiculous spectacle would a grave lawyer or judge, of sixty years of age, present, arrayed in such a costume? If the salary of our foreign Ministers be not sufficient to enable them to exercise that liberal, but plain hospitality, which belongs to the character of their country, I say again, let it be increased; but let them never forget in their dress, or in their manners, the simple grandeur which belongs to the character of Republicans. I trust, that, ere long, the days of Franklin will again return.

The gentleman has informed us, that it is his opinion we ought to be represented at the Congress of Tacubaya, should it ever assemble. Whatever I may have thought of the Mission, I most heartily approved of the selection of the Minister. For one, I shall never sanction any improper allusions made upon this floor to that gentleman, in relation to this Mission. There is no man in the ranks of the Administration, whom I should rather see promoted, nor is there any man among them more deserving of promotion. If he should ever again go to Tacubaya, I should regret to see him in any dress, but in that of an American gentleman. In that costume, he will infinitely better represent his own character, and that of the American people, than if he were decked out in all the splendid uniform prescribed by the Administration. He will then set an example of plainness and simplicity, which may be useful to the Republics of the South.

The gentleman has awarded the laurel crown, to deck the brow of the Military Chieftain;

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

but has decreed the civic wreath to the statesman ripened by the experience of 40 years. He has informed us he was no prophet; and I believe the fates will never confirm his decree. I trust and believe, that the people of the United States will elevate the "citizen soldier" to the supreme magistracy of the Union. In that event, and after he shall have been tried by them, I venture to predict, that their award will entwine the civic wreath with the laurel crown; and that Jackson will live in the history of his country, as the man, of the present age, who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." I believe that the annals of the human race will furnish but few examples of men, who were endowed by nature with rare and distinguished military talents, without, at the same time, possessing the capacity for civil command. It would be easy to quote a splendid catalogue of names, in proof of this assertion; but I shall only mention those of Pericles, Cincinnatus, Charlemagne, Alfred, Henry the IVth of France, Napoleon—and, above all, our own unequalled Washington.

TUESDAY, February 5.

The House again took up the resolution on Retrenchment.

Mr. RIVES said, that, in embarking upon the wide ocean of debate which lay before him, he hardly knew from what point to take his departure, or in what direction to steer his course. But, as some chart was indispensably necessary, on so extensive a voyage, he would endeavor to take the resolutions upon the table for his guide, with no other deviations than the stress of antecedent debate should unavoidably force him into. In pursuing this course of discussion, he should very much regret if any thing he might say should excite a single unpleasant sensation in the bosom of any member of the House, or be considered, in any degree, indecorous or disrespectful towards any member of the Government. I may truly affirm, said Mr. R., that I entertain none other than the kindest feelings for every gentleman with whom I have the honor to be associated upon this floor; and towards the members of the Administration, however much I may be politically opposed to them, I have never harbored the slightest sentiment of ill-will or personal antipathy. But, as guardians of the public weal, and sentinels of the public liberty, it sometimes becomes our duty here to speak unpalatable truths. In doing so, I have always endeavored to separate the private from the public characters of persons in office; and while I reserve to myself, at all times, every legitimate freedom of remark upon their official conduct, I hope I shall never say any thing which would be a just cause of personal offence to them or their friends.

In this spirit, I proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions upon the table. There are two features common to all the propositions. They all contemplate an inquiry into the expediency of retrenching the future expenses of the Government, and an examination into its past disbursements. Sir, I am decidedly friendly to both of these objects. But as a means of effecting them, I prefer the resolution recently submitted by my friend from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) because it is more specific and practical in its character, and because it proposes to employ the instrumentality of a special, instead of a Standing Committee. Sir, I am persuaded, from the extent and magnitude of the inquiry, that it cannot be satisfactorily conducted by any of the Standing Committees, already burthened with pre-existing duties. I hope, therefore, that the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, will receive the support of every one who has the cause of retrenchment really at heart.

Though it is rather old-fashioned doctrine, Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who have the cause of retrenchment really at heart. I believe there is great occasion for it. It is now twenty-five years since there has been any systematic reformation in the organization and expenses of the several Departments of the Government. The reformation I allude to, was at the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, when it was thorough and complete. Considering the tendency of all Governments to abuse, to the accumulation of unnecessary expenses, and the incumbrance of useless offices, I cannot doubt that there has arisen much since that period which requires correction. The tree of Executive patronage is continually throwing out new shoots and branches, which as constantly call for the application of the pruning-knife.

While the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERETT) assented to the general tendency of all Governments to abuse, he said that the abuse to which this Government was most prone, was the abuse of parsimony. Sir, this idea is contradicted by the whole history of the operations of the Government; and a little reflection will, I think, satisfy the gentleman himself that his notion is fallacious. How are the expenses of this Government supplied? By direct impositions upon the great body of the people? No, sir, if this were the case, it would be some check upon the extravagance of the Government. In the State Governments, whenever a new expenditure is authorized, the means of meeting that expenditure must be provided by direct taxation upon the people. The tax-gatherer goes annually to the citizen, and exacts from him his share of the public contributions. If he finds that share greater than it was the year before, he knows by whose act it is so; he demands of his Representative the reason for it; and unless that reason is satisfactory, he dismisses him, and chooses another. It is this direct and undisguised operation of the system of public revenue, under the State Governments, which renders the Representative practically and constantly responsible to his constituents, and this responsibility is a sufficient security against prodigality in the Government.

But, in this Government, the revenue which supplies the public expenditures, is not drawn into the Treasury directly from the pockets of the people, although they ultimately pay it. They pay it, however, in the shape of an increased price for the commodities they consume; and instead of tracing that increase of price to an act of the Government, they generally look no farther than the merchant with whom they deal. In this way, the imposition is disguised, and the Representative is screened from responsibility. Hence it is, that we vote millions of dollars here, with not so much hesitation or compunction as we vote thousands in the State Legislatures. It is for this reason, that the tendency of this Government, so long as the national revenue is derived principally from external duties, will be to profusion and extravagance; and not, as the gentleman from Massachusetts supposes, to parsimony.

These general considerations sufficiently indicate, to my mind, the necessity of some revision of the expenses of the Government, with a view to retrenchment. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) said, that some basis ought to be laid for the inquiry. What, sir! does the gentleman require actual proof of the existence of abuses? This proof cannot be had without inquiry. If, then, we can take no initiatory measure, for the correction of abuses, without previous proof of their existence; as that proof cannot be had without inquiry, and as, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, no inquiry on the subject ought to be made without proof, abuses must ever remain without ever being corrected. The effect of the doctrine is to shelter the abuses of Government with an inviolable sanctuary.

But, sir, the honorable gentleman suggested another reason against this inquiry, which surprises me no less. He said he would not move such an inquiry, because it was calculated to weaken the affections of the people for the Government, (not the Executive Department merely, but the whole Government,) by giving sanction to the idea that there are abuses here. Sir, I would respectfully submit it to that gentleman, whether the affections and confidence of the people will be most weakened by the suppression of inquiry, and thereby producing upon the public mind the impression that we are disposed to connive at, and acquiesce in, abuses, or by pursuing inquiry to show a determination either to purify the Government from abuses, if they exist, or to clear it of the odium, and suspicion of them, if they do not exist.

But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania took still bolder ground. He not only said that there was no sufficient proof of abuses calling for reform, but he attempted to show, that, in fact, there are no abuses, and that the administration of the Government is distinguished by extraordinary economy. Sir, how did he make this out? By reviewing the fiscal operations of the Government for the last twelve years, from 1815 to 1827, and exhibiting their accumulated results. He told us that, within that period, seventy millions of the public debt had been paid off, besides maintaining the Army, the Navy, the Civil list, and all the other branches of the public service; and seemed to rely upon this as a conclusive proof of the economical administration of our finances. Sir, the first remark which occurs upon this statement is, that, admitting its sufficiency as evidence of economy, it does not prove, what is the only matter with which we have any concern, that the administration of the Government is, at the present time, an economical one. It could prove only, that, in times past, there has been economy!

But, sir, I waive this objection, and will go back with the honorable gentleman in his retrospect. Is it not a little singular, that, while the gentleman was telling us of the amount of debt which had been paid off, and the expenses which had been met by the Government, as evidence of its economy, it did not occur to him that he ought to have told us something of the means which had been put at its disposal, for the accomplishment of these objects? Economy, sir, is a relative thing; it depends on the proportion between the results which have been accomplished, and the resources which have been furnished for accomplishing them.

Now, sir, what were the resources of the Government during those twelve years, from which the honorable gentleman has collected the results he so fondly displayed to the admiration of the House? Why, sir, more than 800 millions of dollars. During several years of the period included in the honorable gentleman's retrospect, we had direct taxes, and a system of internal revenue; and from those sources, added to the customs, the sales of public lands, and the bank bonus and dividends, the whole revenue which flowed into the public Treasury, from 1815 to 1827, considerably exceeded 800 millions of dollars! Now, sir, with such a fund as this at its disposal, is it proof, either of extraordinary frugality, or of consummate financial skill in the Government, to have paid off 70 millions of the debt, and defrayed its current expenses?

The average annual receipts of the Government, during this period, amounted to more than 25 millions. We will suppose that about 10 millions were annually applied to the principal and interest of the public debt. The ordinary current expenses of the Government may have amounted to about another sum of 10 millions annually; and there then remained a sum of 5 millions to be expended ad libitum. How the honorable gentleman can deduce, from these facts, an evidence of the economy of the Government, I cannot conceive.

But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

exhibited another view of this subject, for the purpose of showing us how lightly we are taxed for the support of our institutions. He told us that the whole expenditure of the Government, for the year 1826, was 24 millions of dollars, which, assessed upon our twelve millions of population, produces a charge of only two dollars a head, while, according to a statement he made, the taxation of the British people amounts to fifteen dollars a head. Observing, (in passing merely,) that the gentleman has stated the amount of public burthens in Great Britain, enormous as they certainly are, at a higher rate than I have ever seen any authority for, I think I shall be able to satisfy him, that he has put our own much too low. His statement pretermits several important items, which undoubtedly enter largely into our complicated system of public burthens.

He seemed to assume the amount of duties paid to the Government, as the full measures of American taxation. But, sir, this is not so. It is true that the proceeds of the duties are all which the Government receives, but they are not all that the people pay. The merchant, who pays the duties to the Government in advance, must have his profit upon that advance included in the price of the goods; and this profit, repeated and multiplied through a series of exchanges, amounts, at last, to a heavy tax upon the consumer, over and above the amount of duties paid to the Government. The ordinary amount of duties is twenty-odd millions, and the usual mercantile profit, of from 33 $\frac{1}{3}$, to 50 per cent. upon that sum, would raise the whole charge, imposed by the General Government, to about thirty millions of dollars. But to ascertain the full amount of public burthens sustained by the people of this country, you must also take into the account the taxes imposed by the State Governments, with all their subordinate local jurisdictions, comprehending, besides the general revenue of the State, the county levies, the parish rates, and numerous other public exactions of one sort or another, which have been estimated by a most able statish, as well as statesman, (Col. BENTON, of the Senate,) at a round sum of twenty millions of dollars more.

We have thus a grand total of fifty millions of dollars, instead of twenty-odd millions, for the amount of public contributions levied upon the people of this country, which, deducting from our population, two millions for slaves, who pay nothing, makes a charge upon the residue, of five, instead of two dollars a head. Now, sir, this does appear to me to be an enormous load of taxation, even for a much older people than we are; and, accordingly, one of the most profound politicians of the old world, the celebrated Talleyrand, (as has been stated elsewhere by the gentleman to whom I have already alluded,) in graduating the actual taxation of different countries, has placed us upon the scale in a middle position between Great Britain, the most heavily taxed, and France, the next most heavily taxed country, (but for the exception he makes of us,) in the world.

But, sir, the comparison which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made between this country and Great Britain, for the purpose of showing the relative moderation of our public burthens, is obviously unfair, in many respects. The British Government is now nearly eight centuries old, and during that time has been engaged in a long succession of wars, foreign or domestic, which have accumulated upon it an immense mass of public debt. To pay the interest of this debt, and whatever portion of its principal it may, and at the same time to support the cumbrous and expensive establishments which results from its political organization, it must impose upon its subjects a weight of taxation equal to their utmost capacity to bear. But our situation is altogether different. Our national existence hardly extends beyond half a century, and the simplicity of our republican institutions neither requires nor tolerates the costly appendages which belong to other Governments. The public debt of Great Britain amounts, at this moment, to between three and four thousand millions of dollars; an amount more than fifty times greater than our national debt. Now, as the burthens imposed by every Government, must be in proportion to the charges existing upon it, I would ask, with what propriety a comparison can be made between Great Britain and this country, under these widely different circumstances, with a view to test the economy of our Government?

But, sir, I protest altogether against comparisons with foreign Governments. Our institutions, our situation, moral and physical, the genius and habits of our people, are all peculiar. They are sui generis. In having the freest Government in the world, we are entitled, by the favor of Providence, to the greatest share of public blessings; and among them, that we should not be subjected to a relentless taxation which takes "from the mouth of labor, the bread it has earned." In what consists the value of a free Government, if it is not that, by the constant influence and control of the will of the people over their rulers, the Government is restrained from oppression, pecuniary as well as personal? Sir, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania did not tell us to what a situation the people of Great Britain had been reduced by their public burthens—the number of their paupers and starvelings—that two-fifths of the whole population of that country were kept alive by being billeted upon the constrained charity of the remaining three-fifths.

Would the worthy gentleman have us esteem ourselves happy, and without any cause to complain of governmental exactions, as long as we can keep within the limit of this extremity of wretchedness? I hope not, sir. I have long thought, Mr. Speaker, if I may venture to express such an opinion, that there is too great a disposition among some of our distinguished Statesmen to bring our affairs, our policy and our principles, to the standard of foreign Governments. A prominent feature in the celebrated first message of the present Chief Magistrate to Congress, was its perpetual fond recurrence to the proceedings of Foreign Governments, as the lesson of our political duties, and the measure of our political powers. He told us what France, what Russia, what Great Britain had done, and gave us to understand that we should go and do likewise. Now, sir, to all this I object, as anti-American—as anti-Republican. Our circumstances and our institutions are peculiar, and so too should be our policy.

But, sir, to return to the subject of our public expenditures. I would say to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the true mode of testing the economy of our Government, at any given period, is not to compare its expenses with those of a foreign Government, but with its own at some antecedent period. Now, sir, if we do this we shall find that, during Mr. Jefferson's Administration, in 1802, for example, the whole expenditures of the Government, exclusive of the payments of the public debt, amounted to $3,737,907; while the same class of expenditures during the year 1826, according to the last Treasury report, amounted to $13,062,316. Here, then, we have an increase of expenditure equal to 350 per cent. in less than 25 years, which, after making every allowance for the growth of the country, and the expansion of its institutions, does seem to me to be disproportionate and extravagant.

Sir, I have dwelt the longer upon these views, because I have a deep and settled conviction, that economy is a cardinal virtue in every Republican Government. It is not merely for the pecuniary saving, and the consequent relief to the industry and resources of the people, which it brings with it, that I esteem it. It is still more for its political effects. It is not only the close ally, but the surest guarantee of the public liberty. It is the great instrument for restraining that dangerous principle of Executive influence, which is perpetually undermining and assailing the fabric of free Government everywhere, and of our own not less than others. This influence exerts and enlarges itself through the disbursements of public money, ultimately under one shape or another. Diminish the public expenditure, then, and you at the same time diminish Executive influence.

Sir, I may have fears upon this subject, which firmer minds can and do repel; but it has long been my opinion, that there is a decided tendency in our Government to a dangerous and disproportionate accumulation of power in the Executive branch, and that Monarchy is the euthanasia of our political system. Gentlemen who treat these fears as altogether visionary, and those especially, who, like the distinguished member from Pennsylvania, consider patronage a disadvantage, rather than an aid to an Administration, have not, I am persuaded, explored the full extent and range of this powerful engine, in the magnitude which it has, at present, attained. Having been led, by particular circumstances, during the last session of Congress to look into this subject, I will repeat here the result of an investigation then very carefully made. Many persons have hastily supposed that the patronage of the Executive consisted exclusively in appointments to office. But an equally, if not more important branch of patronage, consists in the disposition of public moneys through the medium of contracts made under the direction of the Executive. Both of these branches were included in an estimate of the amount of Executive patronage, made by Mr. Gallatin, in '99, and I took the list of items, enumerated by him, as the basis of my calculation.

In doing this, I found that the "annual pay of the officers in the several Departments of the Treasury, State, War, and Navy, and their dependencies; of the Attorney-General, and Postmaster General, Judges, Marshals, and District Attorneys, Officers of the Customs, Postmasters; of Diplomatic characters, Commercial Agents, (exclusive of Consuls,) Commissioners under Treaties, Territorial Officers, Indian Agents, Surveyors, Registers, Receivers, &c.;" in fine, the pay of all Civil Officers, whose appointments depend upon the Executive, added to the commissioned officers of the Army and Navy amounted to about $3,500,000; and that the amount of moneys disposed of by contracts made under the direction of the Executive, including Fortifications, Docks, Navy Yards, Internal Improvements, Lighthouses, transportation of the Mail, supplying the provisions, clothing, guns, cannon, &c., for the Army, building ships and furnishing supplies necessary for the Navy, was about $4,500,000; making an aggregate of eight millions annually: four times the amount of Executive patronage, as estimated by Mr. Gallatin in '99.

Now, sir, when the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania comes to survey this immense field, so productive in rich rewards, he can no longer, I am sure, consider its possession a disadvantage to those who enjoy it. He will see that, although the hopes of an expectant may be sometimes disappointed, in relation to a particular office, yet that, in the multiplicity of other boons and favors to be disposed of, ample means are afforded to retain his fidelity, and to console and indemnify him for his first disappointment.

Believing this immense force of Executive patronage to be dangerous to the public liberty, and as the disbursements of public money must necessarily be made by the Executive branch of the Government, that every increase of expenditure tends directly to increase the influence of that Department, I am for embracing every fit occasion to reduce the public expenditure to the real demands of the public service. It is with reference to this great political object, that I attach so much importance to a wise

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

economy in the administration of our public affairs. When Mr. Burke proposed his great scheme of economical reform, he did not look merely to the saving of money, though that was something to a people groaning beneath the weight of their public burthens—but he looked beyond, to the higher object of diminishing, through the instrumentality of pecuniary retrenchment, the dangerous and growing influence of the crown. When, in the same memorable year, Mr. Dunning submitted his celebrated resolution, affirming that the “influence of the Crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished,” he submitted by the side of it another resolution, affirming it to be the right and the duty of the House of Commons to examine into, and correct abuses, in the expenditure of the public revenue, and declared that both propositions stood upon one great principle. Sir, there was a period in the history of our own country, when these doctrines were not only avowed, but practised. I allude, sir, to the Presidency of Mr. Jefferson, which I have ever looked back to as the purest era of our Government—as the era of sound principles and correct practices. As I hope the doctrines of that day will once again, at no very remote period, come into favor, and as they are particularly applicable to the subject of our present deliberations, I must beg permission to read a beautiful development of them in the words of their great teacher.

In his first official communication to Congress, he held the following language :

“ These views are formed on the expectation that a sensible, and, at the same time, a salutary reduction, may take place in our habitual expenditures. For this purpose, those of the Civil Government, the Army, and Navy, will need revival. When we consider that this Government is charged with the external and mutual relations only of these States; that the States themselves have the principal care of our persons, our property, and our reputation, constituting the great field of human concerns, we may well doubt whether our organization is not too complicated, too expensive—whether offices and officers have not been multiplied unnecessarily, and sometimes injuriously to the service they were meant to promote. I will cause to be laid before you an essay towards a statement of those who, under the public employment of various kinds, draw money from the Treasury, or from our citizens. Time has not permitted a perfect enumeration, the ramifications of office being too multiplied and too remote to be completely traced in a first trial. Among those who are dependent on Executive discretion, I have begun the reduction of what was deemed unnecessary. The expenses of diplomatic agency have been considerably diminished. The inspectors of internal revenue, who were found to obstruct the accountability of the institution, have been discontinued. Several agencies, created by the Executive authority, on salaries fixed by that also, have been suppressed, and should suggest the expediency of regulating that power by law, so as to subject its exercise to the legislative inspection and sanction. Other reformations of the same kind will be pursued, with that caution which is requisite, in removing useless things, not to injure what is retained. But the great mass of public offices is established by law, and, therefore, by law alone can be abolished. Should the Legislature think it expedient to pass this roll in review, and to try all its parts by the test of public utility, they may be assured of every aid and light which Executive information can yield. Considering the general tendency to multiply officers and dependencies, and to increase expense to the ultimate term of burthen which the citizen can bear, it behooves us to avail ourselves of every occasion which presents itself for taking off the surcharge; that it never may be seen here, that, after leaving to labor the smallest portion of its earnings, on which it can subsist, Government shall itself consume the residue of what it was instituted to guard. In our case, too, of the public contributions entrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money; and by bringing back to a single department, all accountabilities for money, where the examination may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform.”

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I had always regarded the Administration of Mr. Jefferson as the purest and brightest era of our Government. Is not the pregnant extract, which I have just read from his first message to Congress, sufficient evidence, in itself, of the justness of this praise? Is it possible to conceive a nobler spectacle than he presented on that occasion? The Chief Magistrate of a nation voluntarily divesting himself, by his own act, where it was competent for him to do so, of every attribute of his power, which, however advantageous to himself, he deemed to be inconsistent with the public interest; and in cases where it was not competent for him to apply the remedy, calling upon the legislative authority to do so, by reducing his patronage, circumscribing his discretion, and defining his powers! Sir, the spectacle is rare as it was noble. If it was not presumption in me, I would venture to recommend it to the imitation of the distinguished individuals who now preside over the administration of our public affairs. They might find it, perhaps, the most effectual means of acquiring present popularity, as it certainly would be of earning true glory for the future. But they seem to have taken a different view of what became their situation.

Their whole course has been in striking contrast with the self-denying republicanism of Mr. Jefferson. Instead of renouncing the exercise of power which the laws and the constitution had given them, we have seen them laying claim to powers which are sanctioned by neither; instead of the suppression of unnecessary offices, and the curtailment of Executive patronage, we have seen them rapidly multiplied and increased, under their auspices; instead of recommending the limitation of Executive discretion over the public disbursements, we have seen them asking for large grants of public money, to be expended at their mere will and pleasure. To descend a little more into detail—let me ask if “the expenses of diplomatic agency have been considerably diminished?” It is notorious that they have increased, and I shall presently attempt to give some idea of the extent of that increase. Have “any agencies, created by Executive authority, on salaries fixed by that also, been suppressed?” Let the secret history of the Executive Departments give the answer.

What respect has been paid by the present Administration to those great maxims of fiscal responsibility, inculcated by Mr. Jefferson? Have they been willing to acquiesce in the doctrine of “appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition?” For an answer, I refer to an estimate of one of the Departments; in which, to effect a survey of roads and canals of national importance, which may surely be defined, if any thing be susceptible of definition, we are asked to appropriate a sum of $50,000—it was $30,000 last year—for the survey of such routes as the President may think proper to denominate national. Have they shown more respect for another of those maxims, that which enjoins a “disallowance of all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount?” There is now a communication upon our tables from the head of another of the Departments, seeking to be emancipated from this restraint, and asking for the privilege of transferring appropriations from one object of expenditure to another. Has there been a disposition manifested in the estimates of any of the Departments, to “reduce the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribe discretionary powers over money?” Sir, it will be found that this “field of contingencies,” instead of being reduced by the present Administration, has been greatly extended, and that “the discretionary powers of the Executive over the public money,” have been proportionately enlarged. Some of the items in this increase of “contingencies,” I shall have occasion to bring more particularly to the notice of the House.

As I have thus ventured, Mr. Speaker, to present myself in the unfashionable, if not invidious character, of an economist, I must be permitted to state, somewhat more in detail, what are my notions upon this subject. Though the advocate of economy, I am not, sir, the advocate of a niggardly parsimony. I would do away with all sinecure places; all supernumerary offices, which serve no other purpose than to be snug receptacles for court favorites, and channels of Executive influence. But, in relation to officers who are really necessary to the public service, I would give them liberal compensations. I know not, at this moment, a solitary officer, whose salary I would reduce.

I would touch the salary only through the office; and by one and the same act, wherever I found a sinecure, or a mere nominal employment, I would sweep both the salary and the office. In regard to those great public establishments essential to the security of the country, I would maintain them all in a state of salutary vigor and efficiency; but as the best means of doing that, I would endeavor to free them from incumbrance, and to purge them from abuse in every branch of their administration. This, sir, is my idea of public economy.

Sir, I have been very much surprised that this proposition of retrenchment has been so promptly met as an attack upon the present Administration. Are they not friends of economy? The President has given us the amplest professions upon this subject—even of a “strict” and “vigilant” economy. Do his friends distrust his sincerity, or does their sensibility, on the present occasion, arise from the proposed inquiry into the disbursements of the Government? Sir, this is made our duty annually, by the standing rules and orders of the House. It is a duty imposed upon us by a still higher authority—that of the constitution itself; which requires that “a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money, shall be published from time to time.” Now, sir, to make this published statement of the expenditures of public money what it was designed to be, a check on extravagance and abuse, it must, sometimes at least, embrace particulars and details which can be elicited only by special inquiry.

But an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERETT) seemed to think that we had no rightful authority to inquire into the expenditure of one of the funds embraced by the proposed inquiry—the fund for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. He seemed to think that this fund was put into the hands of the President as the constitutional organ of our intercourse with foreign nations, and that as such he had a right to dispose of it in any manner he pleased, without disclosing the particulars of its expenditure to any one, and that, by the proposed inquiry, we should invade a high prerogative of the Presidential office. Sir, I will first remark that this objection proceeds from a misapprehension in point of fact. None of the resolutions call for the particulars of the expenditures out of this fund. They only ask for the respective amounts of what has been expended out of this fund and settled at the Treasury, without any specification of the nature of the expenditure, and of what has been expended and settled in the usual way, upon specific vouchers. The law authorizes the President to cause the expenditures out of this fund to be settled at the Treasury, “by specially accounting for the same, in all instances wherein the expenditure may, in his judgment, be made public;” and in other instances by merely making a certificate

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

of the amount of such expenditure as he may think it advisable not to specify." Now, sir, the resolutions under consideration ask only for the aggregates of these two classes of expenditures; and do not seek a disclosure of the particular items of either. There is, therefore, no foundation, in point of fact, for considering these resolutions as invading any prerogative of the President, even if the doctrine of the gentleman from Massachusetts were correct.

But, sir, as I consider that doctrine altogether erroneous, and of dangerous consequence to the legitimate functions of this House, I beg leave here to protest against it. It was once contended in England, that the House of Commons had no right to inquire into the expenditure of the civil list revenue, because that was to be regarded in the nature of a private and personal grant to the King, subject exclusively to his own discretion. There was a plausible ground for that claim in England, inasmuch as the civil list revenue is always settled upon the King, at his accession, for life. But even there, it has been long since repudiated, and abandoned by Ministers themselves, and the civil list revenue, as well as every other branch of the public revenue, is held to be a trust, in the hands of the sovereign, subject, at all times, to examination and control by the Representatives of the people. If this be the acknowledged doctrine in England, in relation to a monarch holding his power independently of any express act of consent on the part of the people, how much more applicable is it to a Government like ours, where the Chief Magistrate is the immediate creature and servant of the public will and responsible for all his acts?

This idea of the responsibility of the President, in regard to the disbursements of what is commonly called "the secret service" fund, is founded upon a total misconception of the act of Congress, to which I have already referred. That act of Congress, properly considered, does not vest any right in the President. It only conveys an authority to the accounting officers of the Treasury, and empowers them to credit disbursements of public money, in certain cases, without specific vouchers, which, otherwise, they would not have been authorized to credit. Hence, the concluding declaration of the law, that, in cases of secret service, the mere "certificate of the President shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum or sums therein expressed to have been expended." The true purpose and effect of the law, is to protect the President from disclosing the nature of his expenditures out of this fund, to the accounting officers of the Treasury, and not from communicating them to the Representatives of the people, in their high official character, as the grand inquest of the nation, if they deem it expedient to call for them. This power of Congress is an inherent and fundamental right of the people, and can never be abandoned in principle, without betraying the interests and privileges of our constituents. How far it may be safe and prudent to exercise it, is another question—one of mere discretion, which must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case, as it shall arise.

Believing it to be the right and the duty of this House, at all times, to institute any inquiries it may deem necessary into the disbursements of public money, I should vote for the present inquiry upon general principles alone. But I confess, sir, I have a further reason for giving my assent to the proposed investigation, in the present instance. I find that much larger sums have been furnished to the present Administration, on account of all the funds embraced in the scope of this inquiry, than were furnished to the Administration which preceded it; and hence it seems to me to be particularly proper, that we should inquire what has created the necessity for these increased supplies, and in what manner they have been disposed of. For the purpose of exhibiting this difference more distinctly to the House, I have compiled from our appropriation laws, a comparative statement, showing the sums appropriated for the contingent expenses of the several Departments, and the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, during the three last years of the last Administration, to wit, 1822, 1823, and 1824; and the sums appropriated for the same objects during the three years of the present Administration, to wit, 1825, 1826, and 1827. (Here Mr. R. exhibited a table.)

	1822.	1823.	1824.	Total.
Contingent exp. State Dep.	24,492	18,800	27,950	70,642
" " Tr'y Dep.	26,000	20,200	26,150	92,450
" " War Dep.	6,000	6,000	7,000	19,000
" " Navy Dep.	6,068	5,768	6,450	19,286
" " For. Inter.	40,000	40,000
" " Missions.	10,000	10,000	20,000	40,000
	92,560	70,868	126,950	290,378
Aggregate expenses of } Foreign Intercourse	188,000	82,000	198,500	468,500
Contingent ex. Dep. and } ex. For. Intercourse.	265,560	152,868	320,450	738,878

	1825.	1826.	1827.	Total.
Contingent exp. State Dep.	23,550	23,093	23,050	81,093
" " Tr'y Dep.	20,150	26,950	26,750	108,850
" " War Dep.	7,000	2,910	11,650	27,940
" " Navy Dep.	5,950	5,950	6,950	18,850
" " For. Inter.	40,000	40,000	80,000	110,000
" " Missions.	20,000	20,000	20,000	70,000
	129,650	150,903	182,800	411,344
Aggregate expenses of } Foreign Intercourse	217,500	231,500	185,000	634,000
Contingent ex. Dep. and } ex. For. Intercourse.	334,150	382,403	317,800	1,045,444

From this exhibit, it will be seen, that the total amount of appropriations for each of the contingent funds in question, for the three years of the present Administration, has greatly exceeded the total amount of the appropriations for the same funds, during the last three years of the preceding Administration; presenting, in the aggregate, an increase of little less than 50 per cent. To this table, I have subjoined a statement of the appropriations for the whole expenses of foreign intercourse, both regular and contingent, for the same periods, exhibiting an increase of corresponding extent, in that branch of the public service, under the present Administration. I have included the appropriation for foreign intercourse generally, because that is a subject particularly referred by the constitution and the practice of the Government, to the discretion of the Executive; and for the regulation of its expenses, therefore, the Executive is particularly responsible.

Some gentlemen may, upon the first blush, account for the great difference in the appropriation for this branch of the public service, under the present and late Administrations, by referring it to the opening of our diplomatic intercourse with the South American States. But it so happens, that that intercourse was opened several years before the commencement of the present Administration; and that, in the very first year embraced by the statement, to wit, in 1822, a sum of one hundred thousand dollars was appropriated, by a separate law, for defraying the expense of missions to the independent nations of South America. The comparison, then, is altogether fair, embracing two equal periods of time, when the circumstances of the country, in its foreign relations, were as similar as they well could be. The other subjects of comparison in the foregoing table, are confined to contingent appropriations, because, in the disbursement of them, the Executive and its officers have an unlimited discretion, and must, therefore, be held exclusively responsible for excessive or improper expenditures.

Before I take my leave of this table, I will call the attention of the House to a fact disclosed by it, in connection with a vaunting remark made by a friend of the Administration, (Mr. PEARCE,) a few days ago. He claimed great credit for the Administration, that they asked no appropriation for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, during the present year; and either he or some other gentleman gave us to understand that such a thing had not happened before, since the origin of the Government. Certain it is that I have seen this statement made in a tone of great confidence and self-applause, in several leading journals devoted to the support of the Administration. Now, sir, we are not under the necessity of travelling very far back for a refutation of this assertion; for it so happens, that, in two out of three years of the last Administration, embraced by the statement I have exhibited, there was no such appropriation. The years 1822 and 1823, it will be seen, present perfect blanks as to this appropriation. If we go further back, we shall find long tracts of time, during which there was no such appropriation. For four or five successive years of Mr. Jefferson's Administration there was none.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that the large increase in the supplies granted by Congress to the present Administration, for these objects, rendered it particularly proper that we should inquire into their disbursement. I do not mean to say (because I have no knowledge upon the subject) that there has been any thing wrong in that disbursement; nor do I mean to say, that the actual expenditure has been equal to the appropriations. But as we all know that the appropriations made by Congress are founded upon estimates, furnished by the several Departments of what they will require for their respective operations, the appropriations made must be regarded as a fair criterion for approximating, at least, the actual expenditures of the Government. If the increase of expenditure, in the several branches of the public service, embraced by the statement I have exhibited, has not kept equal pace with the increase of appropriations, I have seen enough to satisfy me that that increase has, at least, been very considerable, under the present Administration.

The aggregate expenditures of the Government have notoriously increased. I here speak of its ordinary current expenditures, by which I mean all expenditures, except payments on account of the public debt, and demands arising from treaties with foreign nations. Those expenditures, in 1822, were $9,827,642; in 1823, $9,784,152; in 1824, $10,448,779, making a total sum, during the three last years of the last Administration, of $30,060,573. In 1825, the same class of expenditures amounted to $11,416,582; in 1826, to $13,062,316; 1827, to $12,285,530; making a total sum during the three years of the present Administration, of $36,764,428. The increase of the ordinary expenditures of the Government, under the present Administration, compared with a corresponding period of the last Administration, has amounted, then, to an annual sum of $2,234,618.

Now, sir, I do not mean to hold the Executive responsible for the whole of this increase of the public expenditures; but as their friends are ever ready to claim for them the credit of whatever good has been done since they came into power, it is but fair that they should bear a portion of the blame for the evil which may have been committed. We are perpetually told of the sixteen millions of the principal of the public debt, which have been extinguished under the present Administration, as an evidence of their good management, and as if the merit belonged personally and exclusively to them. If they are to have the whole credit of this operation, they must submit to bear a portion, at least, of the blame which may be imputed for not doing more. The statement which I have just made, shows that if the expenditures of the Government under the present Administration, had been kept within the limit assigned to them by the last Administration, a further sum of near seven millions of dollars might have been applied to the extinguishment of the public debt; and, instead of sixteen millions, twenty-three millions of it might have been discharged, since the present Administration came into office. Considering "the deep solicitude" which the President himself informs us, "is felt by every class of our citizens for the total discharge of the public debt," and the earnest desires professed by himself upon the subject, it was justly to have been expected that he would use all his influence and all his vigilance to hasten a "consummation so devoutly to be wished."

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Now, sir, with such facts as these before our eyes, is it very surprising that some of us should entertain and venture to express the opinion, that, whatever other merits the present Administration may possess, an exemplary frugality is not one of them? There are many persons in this country who have not regarded the last Administration as a model of public economy. If they were obnoxious to the charge of extravagance, what must be said of the present Administration? And yet the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, in his pathetic summary of the wrongs and persecutions of the present Administration, specially complained of the charge of extravagance. He seemed to think it a very hard case that those, whom he considered such good stewards of the public resources, should be regarded by others as rather deficient in some of the attributes of that character. He complained, too, that the members of the cabinet, whom he eulogized for their distinguished talents, their wisdom, their virtues, their public services, had been viewed and spoken of with less admiration by others; and set all this down to the account of a persecuting spirit.

WEDNESDAY, February 6.

The House took up the resolution on Retrenchment.

Mr. DRAYTON said, from the tenor of the resolutions moved by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CHILTON,) and of the amendments to them, offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) it appears, that their objects are to inquire into the expenditures of this Administration, and to ascertain whether they cannot be diminished. To one of these expenditures, that relating to what has been termed "the secret service fund," the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DORSEY,) exclusively applies, and is amendatory of an amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, upon the same subject. No other exception, then, could be urged against the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, than that it was superfluous, being embraced within the scope of the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina. Admitting this to be the case, it is not worth an argument, or rather the time which the argument would consume, to show that the amendment is superfluous; because its reception will not interfere with, or embarrass the proceedings of any committee, to which the pending resolutions may be referred. But, if the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is calculated to render more full and perfect the information sought for by my colleague, then, of course, it ought to be adopted; that it is calculated to produce that effect, seems to me to be manifest. The mere specification of the amount of moneys disbursed by the present Executive, out of the secret service fund, unconnected with the knowledge of what has been expended, out of the same fund, by his predecessors, would be useless. Without comparing together the amounts thus disbursed by the President and by his predecessors, and taking into consideration the times, and the situation of the country, in its internal and external relations, we can arrive at no conclusion approaching to satisfaction. These comparisons are impossible, unless the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland be acted upon, and, therefore, it ought to be adopted. With all possible official lights, we shall still be at a loss to form an opinion upon the propriety or impropriety of disbursements, regulated by Executive discretion, often exercised upon delicate transactions, which both policy and good faith require to be kept secret. It has been suggested, that the committee without this amendment would make the investigation it calls for; but they might not. By the tenor of the resolution, relating to the secret service fund, they would not be, necessarily, lent to that extended investigation, as the language of the resolution limits the inquiry to the disbursements by the President in office. To guard against any omission, and to obtain the facts required, we therefore give to our committee the instructions we think proper for its guidance. Committees are the organs of this House; and 'tis the right, and the duty of the House to give them such directions as it thinks best calculated to attain its objects, and leave to inference, what may be rendered definite and certain. 'Tis also desirable, whenever an inquiry is instituted into the conduct of a public officer, that every semblance of prejudice, or party spirit, should be avoided. In moving his amendment, my friend and colleague was influenced by fair and honorable motives; but if an amendment, the effect of which is to throw light upon the conduct of this President, by comparing it with that of other Presidents under similar circumstances, should be rejected; then the inference might be drawn, that the resolution of my colleague was framed with the view of excluding necessary and important information, and a character be thus given to it at variance with what he intended. In conducting an inquiry into the conduct of a public officer, we ought not only to have all the evidence before us, which we think is calculated to enlighten our judgments, but which the friends of that officer, upon this floor, may deem necessary for his justification, unless what is required should be plainly indative. Whether the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland be important or unimportant, may admit of a difference of opinion: that it is not indative,

H. or R.]

Retrenchment.

[FEBRUARY, 1828]

will be conceded by every one. For these reasons, I am in favor of the amendment which has been proposed by the gentleman from Maryland.

The yeas and nays being taken, were—yeas 178, nays 2.

The question was put to agree to the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, as amended, and was determined in the affirmative unanimously.

So the resolutions passed in the following form :

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire and report to this House, if any, and what, retrenchment can be made, with safety to the public interest, in the number of the officers of the Government of the United States, and in the amount of salaries which they may respectively receive ; more especially, to report specifically on the following heads :

" 1st. What reductions of expense can be made in the State Department, in the number and salaries of the officers and clerks attached to this Department, in the expenses regulating the foreign intercourse, and in the printing and distribution of the public laws of the United States.

" 2d. What reductions in the Treasury Department, and whether an effective system of accountability, and for the collection of the public dues, is there established.

" 3d. What reductions of expense can be made in the Navy Department, in the clerks and officers now acting subordinately to the Secretary of the Navy.

" 4th. What reductions of expense can be made in the Department of War, in the Indian Department, and in the clerks and officers now acting subordinately to the Secretary of War.

" 5th. What reductions of expense can be made in the number of officers, and the amount of compensation which they may receive, in the Postmaster General's Department.

" And that the committee be further instructed to examine the several contingent funds of each of these Departments, and to report the amount and objects for which disbursements have been made, from these funds ; and that they report the amounts, vouched and unvouched, which have been paid from the secret service fund, since the first day of July, 1790, or the fund regulating the contingencies of foreign intercourse, and of the fund for the expenses of the intercourse with the Barbary Powers.

" And that they further report whether the compensation of members of Congress should be reduced ; and whether the fixed salaries of the officers of this House and its contingent expenses, can, with propriety, be diminished.

" And further, that they inquire whether any modification of the sinking fund act can be made, with a view of producing a more speedy extinguishment of the public debt."

Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. INGHAM, Mr. SEBRIGHT, Mr. RIVES, Mr. EVERETT, Mr. WICKLIFFE, and Mr. WRIGHT, of New York, were appointed the committee.

INDEX TO VOL. IX.

A.

A. B. Plot, The.—See Index, vol. 8, Edwards, Nintan, Address of.

ADAMS, JOHN QUINCY, Message at 2d session of 19th Congress, 266. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 4, 6, 8.

ADDAMS, WILLIAM, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

Addresses of the Senate and House in answer to Presidents' Messages.—See Index, vols. 1, 2.

Adjournment.—See Index, vol. 7.

Admirals in the Navy.—See Index, vol. 2.

Admonition and exhortation to order, 697.

Africans captured.—In the House, facts relative to, stated, 477; bill ordered to be engrossed, 478; the case of the Antelope considered, 690.

A bill to cancel the bond of — Wilde to transport certain Africans beyond the limits of the United States, 641; motion to recommit, no evidence of the amount, to whom it was given, or the precise terms of the condition, 642; a question whether their bringing into this country had been lawful or not, 643; right which these persons may have to the Africans, 643; act of 1806, 643; facts of the case, 643; the House should receive a report of the facts, 643; shall we leave these free persons here, in a land of freedom, or shall we compel the petitioner to re-export them to the Irons of the West Indies? 643; facts inquired for, 643; facts of the case, 643; resolution amended, 644; on what ground is it assumed that this Government has a right over the private property of one of its citizens, 644; the court has decided that these slaves belong to a foreign claimant, 644; it was the people of Georgia who were to say whether these Africans should remain within their territory, 644; the amendment affirms as a fact what the petition and decree of the court deny, 645; they were taken according to the laws and usages of Africa, and the nations to which they belong, 645; the man has a hard heart who would justify slavery in the abstract, 645; a spirit of neglecting our own affairs for the purpose of regulating those of our neighbor, 645; if this amendment is adopted, it goes to touch the legal right to every slave in this country previously imported, 646; bill recommitted, 646.

Resolution of inquiry respecting regulations upon which private property shall be taken for public use, 656; occasion of the resolution, 657; a similar resolution formerly introduced into the House, 657; fifth amendment to the constitution, 657.

African Slaves and Slavery.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, and Index, vol. 6, Slavery.

VOL. IX.—48

Agriculture, Committee on.—See Index, vol. 8.

ALEXANDER, MARK, Representative from Virginia, 609. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.

Algerine War.—See Index, vol. 1.

Allegiance, Foreign.—See Index, vol. 1; also Index, vols. 2, 5, 6, Expatriation.

ALLEN, ROBERT, Representative from Virginia, 609. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.

ALLEN, SAMUEL C., Representative from Massachusetts, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Anterive, 667. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.

ALSTON, WILLIE, Representative from North Carolina, 610. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 4, 5, 8.

Amelia Island.—See Index, vol. 6.

Amendment of the Constitution.—In the House a resolution for the amendment of the constitution considered, 3; unconstitutional to make the amendments, 4; contradictory to experience, 4; security provided against amendments, from light and trivial causes, by the mode of making them, 4; proviso of the fifth article of the constitution, 4; powers of the President deemed not to be the proper object of much jealousy, 4; the fathers of the revolution thought differently, 4; a few of his constitutional attributes examined, 4; the powers of the President, although great, are necessary for the safety of the Republic, 4; before any amendment is adopted its adaptability to the spirit and genius of our government ought to be ascertained, 5; the framers of the constitution well knew that the States were the best guardians of State rights, 5; whenever the State legislatures have appointed the electors instead of designating the mode of their election, they have violated the constitution, 5; reference to the Federalist, 5; what has been the operation of the constitution? 6; the adoption of the district system, and a direct vote in districts for President and Vice-President, would cure the most alarming of these evils, 6; intention of the constitution in interposing the electoral colleges, 6; the voting directly and immediately for the man of their choice would be productive of lively satisfaction on the part of the people, 7; the freehold et cetera et cetera suffrage of Virginia, 7; this amendment does not interfere with State rights, 7; the power of the House as exercised in this election is the only purely federative feature that now remains, 7; if the deformed features of corruption have been here manifested, is there no mode of expelling the monster but by digging up the foundations of the constitutional edifice? 8.

A question of vast interest to the people of this country, 8; a question of sovereignty involved, 8; in practice how does the sovereignty of the people operate in the election of the Chief Magistrate of the nation? 8; it is said that it never was intended by the framers that the people should exercise this important function of electing the President, 8; view taken of the question by various speakers, 8; was it never intended that the people should elect the President? 9; what is the language of the preamble to the constitution? 9; evidences drawn from the constitution, 9; are these evidences? 9; opinions of Madison, Hamilton, Jay, 9; No. 68 of the Federalist, 9; what were the opinions entertained in the convention of Virginia to which this constitution was submitted? 9; remarks of Monroe, 9; will any one hazard the opinion that hereafter this election will but seldom devolve on Congress? 10; two propositions considered, 10; the constitution should be so amended that the election of President and Vice-President shall, in no event, devolve upon the respective Houses of Congress, 10; defects of the constitution, 10; why this election should, in no event, devolve on Congress? 10; it may happen that a minority may elect a President, 11; is there no danger that even the Representatives of freemen may, in an evil hour, be tempted to depart from the path of duty? 12; is immaculate purity to be found within these walls, and in no other corner of the earth? 13; it is said that for the honor of this House a suspicion should not be indulged that its members could be corrupted, 13; if this election shall frequently devolve on Congress, a door will be opened to corruption, intrigue, and to office hunters, through which the evil-doer may some day sap the foundations of the Republic, 13; when the election comes to this House it is calculated to interfere with and impede the ordinary business of legislation, 13.

The proposition that each State in the Union shall be divided into as many districts as there are Senators and Representatives in Congress from such State, 13; object of the proposition, 13; do the people in every section of the Union, in fact, possess and exercise their equal relative weight in the election? 13; a bare majority of the people of the six larger States might elect a President, 14; the dilemma, 14; will the smaller States object to that part of the resolution which excludes the election from Congress? 14; will the larger States object? 14; a minority in one of the larger States, whose voice is entirely suppressed, may be five times as large as a majority in one of the smaller States, 15; Delaware and New York, 15; an occurrence in one of the districts of Maryland, 15; the people require no such agency as the electors, 16; it is said that when we approach this constitution we stand on holy ground, 16; the amendment does not propose to disturb the principle, but leaves it where the constitution placed it, 16; the subject of slavery, 17; it is said, that in all elections the minority have no rights, and must submit, 17; it is thought the general ticket system would most effectually crush the caucus at the centre of the State, 17; it is objected that the amendment interferes with State rights and tends to consolidation of the Union, 17; by this plan it is proposed to take from Congress the contingent power of electing the President and Vice-President, and to give it to the people of the States, 18; is this producing consolidation? 18; does this plan take from the large States any of their rights? 18; it is said that any attempt to propose amendments to the constitution was unconstitutional, 18; we are admonished that we should be cautious in touching this charter of our liberties, 18; the contest between Burr and Jefferson, 19.

A question of great importance to the small States, 19; the twenty-one propositions that have been submitted, 19; existing circumstances and the present time do not justify any amendments whatever, 20; it was not intended that the constitution should be affected by every wind, 20; no call from the people that ought to be heeded in relation to the propositions now under discussion, 20; the amendment made in 1804, 20; that amendment took from the small States an influence in the primary election, which they might have exercised, and which they cannot now exercise, 21; extract from the speech of Gov. Griswold of Connecticut, 21; proceedings of the Convention which formed the constitution on this point, 22; an election by the House was not, to the framers of the constitution, by any means, an unexpected event, 22; the different modes of appointing electors examined, 22; Madison's opinion that the State Legislatures could appoint electors, 22; the exercise of this power in some cases may be justified from necessity and policy, 23; reasons against taking the power from State Legislatures, 23; the election by districts might in many cases restrain the power of large States, and lessen their force and influence, 23; the plurality mode of electing members of Congress, 24.

The proposition to remove the election from the House, and the loss which the small States will sustain, 24; extract from the letter of Washington, 24; if the constitution was formed in the true spirit of compromise it may not be improper to inquire into the relative loss and gain between the large and small States, 24; the unrepresented fractions of small States, 25; the effect of this fraction, considering the usages, as well as many of the established rules of the Government, 25; the influence and political power of some of the larger States have increased beyond the calculations of the framers of the constitution, 25; shall one portion enjoy all the benefits of the constitution, while another portion of the States are deprived of what it was intended they should enjoy? 26; the peculiar population of the Southern States, 26; a Representative of the nation ought to be considered as safe an agent as a member of a State Legislature, 27; the member from New York cannot support the Administration, 27; while some have contended that the removal of the election from the House is necessary to prevent the operation of the central power, others have contended that it is necessary to restore regular nominations, 27; impropriety of the proposed alterations, and importance of that feature in the federative system to small States which it is proposed to take from them, 28; Rhode Island not behind her sister States in the late struggle, 28.

Question involved in some obscurity by not distinguishing clearly between the objects of the General and State Governments, 29; history of our Government, 29; why were the powers of sovereignty divided between the two Governments? 29; the people of each State shall appoint electors in such manner as they in their corporate capacity shall see fit, 30; the power to regulate the mode to appoint electors in each State is a State right, 30; the resolutions propose to take from the States all manner of control over the election of President, in-eligible or final, to destroy its federal character, and make it national, 30; the extension of the powers of the General Government to any subject evidently within the cognizance of the States, removes one barrier against the inroads of that Government upon the sovereignty and independence of the States, 31; it is said that the election by the House violates the maxim which inhibits the division of power between the Executive and Legislative departments, 31; it is said the election by the House exposes the members to be diverted from their duty, 32; the principles that constitute the foundation of free States, 32, 33.

Objections to the resolutions considered, 34; not a proper time to act on the amendments, 84; the number of the resolutions, and variety of the plans proposed, 84; the propriety and essential right of a State to vote according to the general ticket plan, 85; what advantage can the mode of electing by general ticket be to any State? 86; it is said that when the general ticket system is adopted by one, it acts as a kind of moral coercion upon all to adopt it, 86; the proposition to dispense with electors altogether, and permit the people to vote directly for President and Vice-President, 86; the proposition to amend the constitution in such manner as to prevent the election from devolving on Congress, 86; has Congress abused this power? 87; extract from the Rights of Man, 87; attempt to divert our attention from the defects of the constitution by expressing reverence for its framers, 87; the constitution proved defective in one very important particular, 88; it secures to us the right of amendment, 88; it makes no certain provision for the election of President as it stands, 88; circumstances connected with the late Presidential election, 89.

The plan proposed more liable to abuse than the present system, and essentially impracticable, 89; the present organization of the electoral system is essentially calculated to concentrate public opinion on those who deserve public confidence, 89; artfully contended the people would have more power in the election, 89; impracticability of the plan proposed, 40; the design of the constitution evidently was that the President should be chosen by the people of the States in their collective capacity, as distinct independent communities, 40; the inevitable result of the proposed change is not only to multiply candidates, but to bring forward candidates of a different class or order, 41; what has been the operation of the present system? 42; error from the political view taken of the people of this country, 42; the constitution prescribes that this power should be exercised by the States, 42; we have no right to amend by destroying a great radical power of the States, 42.

This question one of the greatest consequence to the people of the United States, 43; it is said we must not attempt to improve by experience in the march of time, 44; the Executive has already as much power given him as any friend of his country would wish him to have, 44; the framers of the constitution were not possessed of inspiration, 44; when you are in pursuit of the federative principle you must look to the Senate branch of the National Legislature, 45; it is said, the little States will never agree to any such amendment, it will be taking from them their sovereign equality without giving an equivalent, 45; it is said the district system will tend to a consolidation of the States, 45; it is said the argument requires the free voters in all the States to be put on a footing of equality, 45; a caucus is the creature of faction, 46; it is said a caucus is necessary for collecting and uniting the public will, 46; the difference between a caucus at this place and elsewhere, 46; the incorruptibility of this House not to be believed, 46; the people ought to vote for President without the interposition of electors, 47.

Look at the result of the general ticket system, 47; notification to Mr. Adams of his election, 48; how even his friends oppose the resolution, 48.

Amendment offered, 77; it has been said that this amendment owes its birth to disappointed ambition, 77; it is said that so far as the choice of a Chief Magistrate depended on uniformity, we are without any constitutional rule whatever, 77; want of uniformity is by no means the most serious mischief that impends the present system, 78; history of the States in this matter, 78; course of Virginia, 78; it is said no failure has occurred in the operations of the existing system, 79; tendency of the proposition to trench on the power of the States, 79; uniformity of any kind in the operations of this Government must encroach upon the power of action in the States, yet uniformity is said to be greatly wished, 79.

Reflections on the claim of power for the State Legislatures, 80; the material action of the States in the federal plan, 80; distribution of electoral power presented a complicated question, 80; whenever an executive comes into office by an appointment of this House, dangerous consequences inevitably result, 80; the resolutions as first introduced, 81; the successful operation of our Government thus far should not lead us to believe it so settled and permanent that we may venture safely to test it with all sorts of schemes, 81.

Character of the argument in opposition, 82; it is said to be unconstitutional to amend the constitution, 82; "Facts and Inferences," 82; avowed principles of Mr. Adams while a candidate, 82; change of opinion on this subject by the President and his friends, 82; origin of the district system proposition, 82; it is said that by the district system you increase the caucus evil by multiplying the number of caucuses, 82; examination of the objections urged to the district system by its supposed tendency to interfere with the essential rights of the States, and to lead to consolidation, 82; it has been called a crucible in which the States were to be amalgamated, 84; how can it be said we violate the principles of the constitution by making those principles more effective? 84; it is urged as an argument against taking the election from the House that we are compelled to choose one of the three highest, and it is of little importance which we choose, 84; reference to the history of our country, 85; remark of Mr. Crawford, 85; reply to an objection of inconsistency, 85; law of the Locrians, 86; admitted on all hands that the States, in adopting the district system, would have to surrender some portion of their power over the election, 86; the great objection against the present mode of election is the improper use that may be made of power and patronage to corrupt the members and control their votes, 86; impropriety of giving the election in the last resort to the State Legislatures, 87; the people are the safest depository of every power which it is practicable for them to wield, 87; committee rise, 87; amendments offered in the House, 87; vote on the resolutions, 88; further resolutions, 81. See Index, vol. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8.

Amendment of Journal of the House.—See Index, vol. 6. ANDERSON, JOHN, Representative from Me., 609. See Index, vol. 8.

ANDERSON, JOHN, the case of. See Index, vol. 6. Bribery. ANDERSON, SAMUEL, Representative from Penn., 609; on the relief of revolutionary officers, 228; on retrenchment, 606.

Appointments, Executive.—See Index, vol. 5.

Appropriations.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8.

ANCHER, WILLIAM B., Representative from Va., 609; on the Panama Mission, 308; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 887; on Meade's claim, 447. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.

Arkansas Territory.—See Index, vol. 6. Territories.

Arkansas Western Boundary.—See Index, vol. 7, 8.

Armory, Western.—See Index, vol. 8.

ARMSTRONG, WILLIAM, Representative from Va., 609. See Index, vol. 8.

Army.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7.

Army desertion, prevention of.—See Index, vol. 8.

ASHMUT, DR., account of the capture of a Spanish vessel at Monrovia, 804; do. destruction of a slave factory, 805.

B

Bahama Banks, &c.—In the House resolutions relative to

- considered, 252; cession of part of the island of Abaco for a light-house, 252; advantages of these measures, 252; has any progress been made to obtain a cession? 252; the Double Headed Shot Keys, 252; resolutions agreed to, 253.
- BAILEY, JOHN, Representative from Massachusetts, 609. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BALDWIN, JOHN, Representative from Connecticut, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- Bank of the United States.—In the House, a resolution relative to the sale of a portion of the stock in, &c., considered, 611; profit to the government from its sale, at the present premium, 611; reasons of the resolution, 611; intimated that the resolution is a measure of the opposition, 611; all such motives disclaimed, 612; at some times, an attempt to sell this stock might produce depression in the market, 612; payment of the public debt, 612; has any violent shock been produced by this? 612; panic produced, 612; the stock valueless, as a means of remittance to Great Britain, until this question is decided, 613; the question should be decided on its merits, 613; the presence of Government in the market produces a great effect, 614; refined arithmetical calculations not a proper data, in all cases, to legislate upon, 614; do we enable ourselves to pay off any portion of the debt? 614.
- Will this scheme be of pecuniary advantage to the United States? 614; the mere pecuniary calculation of profit and loss does not constitute the strongest objection to the measure, 615; this motion connected with deeper and ulterior purposes and views of a political kind, 615; more of a political than a financial aspect, in the present measure, 615; the present dividend, made by the bank, do not constitute the only element of the present price of its stock, 615; object to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt, 617; what is the situation of the public debt? 617; reduction of the sinking fund suggested, 617; what was the condition of the national currency when the bank went into operation? 618; rise of the stock of the old bank, 618; implied that the decision of this question has a connection with the inquiry relative to a renewal of the charter of the bank, 619; belief that the charter will be renewed, 619; protest against the influences employed from abroad, for begetting an extraordinary sensitiveness in this House, that any allusion to the bank, and the connection of the Government with it, was a derangement of the financial condition of the country, 619; let us be uncommitted as to the future, 620; the sale is not expedient, 620; resolution rejected, 621. See Index, vol. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.
- Bank Notes in Payment of Duties.—See Index, vol. 7.
- Bankrupt Act.—See Index, vol. 2, 3, 7.
- Banks of Deposit.—See Index, vol. 7.
- BARBER, NOYES, Representative from Connecticut, 609. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BARBOUR, JOHN S., Representative from Virginia, 609; on an amendment to the constitution, 77. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BARBOUR, PHILIP P., Representative from Virginia, 609; on the Bank of the United States, 611-621; on the case of captured Africans, 620; relative to captured Africans, 641. See Index, vol. 5, 6, 7, 8.
- BARKER, DAVID, JR., Representative from New Hampshire, 609.
- BARLOW, STEPHEN, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609.
- BARNARD, ISAAC D., Senator from Pennsylvania, 467; on the payment of interest to States, 572.
- BARNARD, DANIEL D., Representative from New York, 609.
- BARNET, JOHN, Representative from Maryland, 609; on slavery in the District of Columbia, 415; on the Bank of the United States, 613; on retrenchment, 670, 693. See Index, vol. 8.
- Barracks at New Orleans.—In the Senate, a bill to purchase a site for, considered, 540; the force required at New Orleans, 540; needless for Congress to interfere in the details of the Department, 540; the unhealthiness of the climate at New Orleans an additional argument in favor of this bill, 541; bill ordered to be engrossed, 541.
- BARRINGER, DANIEL L., Representative from North Carolina, 610.
- BARTLETT, ISRAHOB, Representative from New Hampshire, 609; on an amendment to the constitution, 81; on the Panama mission, 210; on internal improvements, 361; on the New Creek Treaty, 268; on a Navy Yard at Philadelphia, 369; on Deaf and Dumb Asylums, 404-406; on the relations of the United States and Georgia, 413; on a painting of the battle of New Orleans, 632. See Index, vol. 7.
- BARTLEY, MORDECAI, Representative from Ohio, 610. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BARTON, DAVID, Senator from Missouri, 467; on the sale of reserved lead mines, 281; on the relief of sufferers at Alexandria, 286; on school lands in Indiana, 473; on the powers of the Vice President, 510; on a grant of land to Kenyon College, 560. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BASSETT, BURWELL, Representative from Virginia, 609. See Index, vol. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.
- BAYMAN, EPHRAIM, Senator from New Jersey, 467.
- BATES, EDWARD, Representative from Missouri, 610.
- BATES, ISAAC C., Representative from Massachusetts, 609.
- Batture at New Orleans.—See Index, vol. 4. Do. at St. Louis.—See Index, vol. 6.
- BAYLY, MOUNTJOY, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, 474.
- Beaumarchais, Claims of.—See Index, vol. 3, 5, 6, 7, 8.
- BEECHER, PHILEMON, Representative from Ohio, 610. See Index, vol. 6, 7, 8.
- BELDEN, GEORGE O., Representative from New York, 609.
- BELL, JOHN, Representative from Tennessee, 610.
- BELL, SAMUEL, Senator from New Hampshire, 469; on the powers of the Vice President, 511. On surviving Revolutionary officers, 541; on a Western armory, 623; on militia courts martial, 653; on retrenchment, 708. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BENTON, THOMAS H.—On the road in Arkansas Territory, 279, Note 279; on the sale of reserved lead mines, 250; on the road in Michigan, 288; on the relief of sufferers at Alexandria, 287; reports relative to the Creek Indians, 344; Senator from Missouri, 467; on indemnification to foreigners, 474; on the powers of the Vice-President, 506; on the public debt, 529; on the office of Major-General, 529; relative to the barracks at New Orleans, 541; on a grant of land to Kenyon College, 559; on the graduation of the price of public lands, 575; on repairs of the Cumberland road, 589; on the duty on molasses, 589-599; on the duty on vermicelli, 590; on the duty on lead, 590; on the duty on indigo, 598-599-596; on the duty on raw wool, 599; on the duty on woollen blankets, 601; on the duty on silks, 602. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BERRIEN, JOHN M.—On the message relative to the Creek Indians, 909; on the Colonization Society, 307; on payment of deported slaves, 309; on the Ohio turnpike road, 345; Senator from Georgia, 467; on captured Africans, 477; on the powers of the Vice-President, 516; on the bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, 555; on the survivors of the Revolution, 582. See Index, vol. 8.
- Bills, Money. See Index, vol. 1.
- BLAIR, JOHN, Representative from Tennessee, 610; on the appointment of Charges, 371; on the Tacubaya mission, 498. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BLAKE, THOMAS H., Representative from Indiana, 610; on retrenchment, 693.

- Blank Ballots, shall they be counted?*—See Index, vol. 4.
- Blue Lights, as Signals to the Enemy.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- BOULIGNY, DOMINIQUE, Senator from Louisiana, 467.
- Bounty for Fishing Vessels.*—See Index, vol. 5, Duties.
- BRADLEY, WILLIAM C., on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 558; on a Naval Academy, 456. See Index, vols. 5, 7, 8.
- BRANCH, JOHN, Senator from North Carolina, 467; on the salary of the Postmaster-General, 294, 295; on the duty on salt, 295-298; on the French colonial trade, 564. See Index, vols. 7, 8.
- Breach of Privilege.*—See Index, vols. 2, 4.
- Breakwater on the Delaware.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- BRENT, WILLIAM L., on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 554, 556; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 835; on the Tacubaya mission, 433-435; Representative from Louisiana, 610.
- Brevet Rank.*—In the Senate, a bill to abolish considered, 604; reasons for the measure desired, 604; effects, 604; laid on the table, 604; to abolish the office of Major-General also considered and lost, 604.
- Brudery.*—See Index, vol. 6.
- British Aggressions on Commerce.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- British Colonial Trade.*—In the House, an amendment to the bill considered, 451; object to confine the operation of the bill to navigation by sea, without interfering with the navigation on the lakes, 451; whenever the British interdicted a trade in our vessels, we should interdict the corresponding trade in their vessels, 451; not a safe policy to invite Great Britain to new restrictions, 451; we place our West India interests on precisely the same footing they were on under the act of 1820, 452; shall we adhere to the policy of 1820, or bring a new point into the controversy? 452; Canadian exports, 452.
- Substance of the bill, 456; result of its passage, 456; the 30th September the best period for the prohibition of the bill to take effect, 456; the measure cannot be justly offensive to Great Britain, 457; difference between the bill of the Senate and that reported by the Committee of Commerce, 457; not material which of the two propositions the House should accept, 458; better to have no bill at all than take that of the Senate, 459; inconsistency into which the House would be betrayed by adopting the amendment, 459; amendment agreed to, 459.
- Disagreement of the Senate announced, 461; motion that the House insist, 461; the bill had better fail altogether than pass without the amendment, 461; material difference between the two propositions, 461; action of the Committee of Commerce defended, 462; erroneous impression as to the supposed inefficiency of the bill; 463; our refusal to meet the legislative tender of Great Britain, 463; regarded as a disrespectful tampering with their dignity by Great Britain, 463; adherence carried, 464.
- British Minister, conduct of.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- British Intrigues.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- British West India Trade.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- BROWN, MAJOR-GENERAL JACOB.—In the Senate, his decease announced, 526; a bad precedent to go into mourning for other than a member, 526.
- Bill for relief of the widow considered, 553; situation of the affairs of the deceased, 554; entitled to a full pension, 554; public opinion in advance of the Legislature, 554: the delicacy of the case, 554; when people talk of economy they ought to practise it here, 555; further debate, 555; bill ordered to be engrossed, 556.
- BROWN, TITUS, Representative from N. H., 607. See Index, vol. 8.
- BRYAN, JOHN H., Representative from N. C., 610; on the British Colonial Trade, 459. See Index, vol. 8.
- BUCHANAN, JAMES, on South American relations, 50, 68; on the Panama Mission, 187; on the relief of revolutionary officers, 295; on the appointment of Charges, 373; on the Polar expedition, 414; on the British Colonial Trade, 462; on duties on wool and woollens, 594; Representative from Penn., 609; on the repair of the Cumberland road, 656; on retrenchment, 672. See Index, vols. 7, 8.
- BUCK, DANIEL A., Representative from Vt., 609. See Index, vols. 7, 8.
- BUCKNER, RICHARD A., on the Panama Mission, 115; Representative from Kentucky, 610; on retrenchment, 697. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- BUNNER, GUDOLPH, Representative from New York, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Auvergne, 643.
- BURGESS, TRISTRAM, Representative from Rhode Island, 609; on the surviving officers of the revolution, 367; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 834; on the Tacubaya mission, 433; on militia courts martial, 668. See Index, vol. 8.
- Burning of the Library of Congress.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- BUTMAN, SAMUEL, Representative from Maine, 609.
- C
- Catawba Navigation Company.*—In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 478; ordered to be engrossed, 478.
- CALHOUN, JOHN C., presides in the Senate, 366; letter to Senate relative to an investigation of his conduct as Secretary at War, 375; memorial of, to the House, 363; presides in the Senate, 467; report on the memorial of, 416; paper accompanying the report, 418. See Index, vols. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.
- CAMBERLUNG, C. C., on the Panama mission, 314; on duties on wool, 381; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 839; on duties on wool and woollens, 399; Representative from New York, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- Canadian Refugees.*—See Index, vols. 2, 5.
- Canal around Muscle shoals.*—In the House, a resolution relative to, considered, 438; importance of the measure, 438.
- Canal in Illinois.*—In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 460; moved to recommit and inquire into the expediency of the United States subscribing for the stock, 460; reasons, 460; motion lost, 460; bill passed, 461.
- Captured Africans.*—In the Senate, bill considered, 477.
- Caracas, Relief of.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- CARSON, SAMUEL P., on the Panama mission, 109; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 836; on the Tacubaya mission, 432-434; Representative from North Carolina, 610; on retrenchment, 698. See Index, vol. 8.
- CARTER, JOHN, Representative from South Carolina, 610; on the Panama mission, 167. See Index, vol. 8.
- Caucus, Congressional.*—See Index, vol. 5, and Index, vol. 7.
- Amendments to the Constitution.*
- CHAMBERS, EZEKIEL, Senator from Maryland, 467. See Index, vol. 8.
- CHAMBERS, HENRY, Senator from Alabama, 467; on the Colonization Society, 307-308; on the Colonization Society, 313; on the payment of interest to States, 570. See Index, vol. 8.
- CHANDLER, JOHN, on the sale of reserved lead mines, 282; on the road in Michigan, 292-293; on the relief of sufferers at Alexandria, 286; on repealing the duty on salt, 298; on the gradual improvement of the navy, 329; on the Ohio turnpike road, 343; Senator from Maine, 467; on the surviving officers of the Revolution, 496; on the office of Major-General, 527; on the claims of South Carolina, 539; on the bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, 554; on the survivors of the Revolution, 563; on the survivors of the Revolution, 564. See Index, vol. 8.

- Charges des Affaires, Appointment of.*—In the House, a resolution relative to, considered, 871; object of the resolution, 871; usual practice of the Government, 871; diplomatic appointments are not regulated by statute, 873; the charge made, 873; origin of a minister in the law of nations, 873; recognized by the Constitution, 873; whenever there is a suggestion of an abuse of power by the Executive, it is a duty to sustain inquiry, 873.
- Charitable Objects.*—See Index, vol. 1.
- CHASE, DUDLEY, Senator from Vermont, 487. See Index, vol. 8.
- CHASE, SAMUEL, Representative from New York, 609.
- CHASE, JUDOK, Official conduct and trial of.—See Index, vol. 2.
- Chesapeake Frigate, Attack on.*—See Index, vol. 3.
- Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.*—In the Senate, a bill to authorize subscription to the stock of, considered, 604; not a western measure, 604; emanated from the Legislature of Virginia, 604; the Constitution dead and gone, 604; this bill a partnership concern, 604; decided in the affirmative, 605. See Index, vol. 8.
- Choctaw Lands, Encroachments on.*—In the House, a resolution relative to, considered, 847; amendment moved, 847; the Government should interfere, to protect the Indians from farther encroachment, 847; these things have had their influence on the Indians, 847; object of the amendment, 848; resolution adopted, 848.
- Choctaw Indians.*—Debate relative to removal of, 369.
- CLAIBORNE, NATHANIEL H., Representative from Virginia, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- CLARK, JAMES, Representative from Kentucky, 610; on retrenchment, 698. See Index, vol. 8.
- CLARK, JOHN C., Representative from New York, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Autorive, 681; on retrenchment, 695.
- CLARK, MATTHEW ST. CLAIR, Clerk of the House, 845; chosen Clerk of the House, 610. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- Coast Survey.*—In the House, a resolution relative to making provision for, considered, 640; object of the resolution, 640; a favorite measure of Mr. Jefferson's, 640; commencement of, 641; resolution agreed, 641. See Index, vol. 8.
- COBB, THOMAS W., Senator from Georgia, 467; on internal improvement, 547; on the payment of interest to States, 571; on the duty on salt, 573; on the survivors of the revolution, 584; on the Miami canal, 607. See Index, vol. 6, 7.
- COCKE, JOHN, on relief to the Florida Indians, 137; on the New Creek Treaty, 359; on the Quapaw Indians, 346; on a Western Army, 381; on the memorial of Calhoun, 368; on the removal of the Choctaw Indians, 870; on preservation of live oak timber, 877.
- Cod Fisheries.*—See Index, vol. 1, 2, and Duties on Imports, vol. 5.
- Coins and Mint.*—See Index, vol. 6, 7.
- Collection Districts, Western.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- Colonization Society.*—In the Senate a memorial of, presented, 808; reference to a special committee moved, 808; protest against the right of the Federal government to appropriate the money of the people for the purpose of establishing colonies abroad, or of transporting any portion of the inhabitants to the coast of Africa, 806; propositions of the Society, 806; agents of the Society on the coast are engaged in warlike enterprises, 804; account of Dr. Ashmun, 804, 805; other expeditions, 805; other points, 806; letter of the Secretary of the Navy, 807; is it proper for the Senate to refer to a committee or even retain, for a moment, such a petition? 807; no signatures attached, 807; the petition of a body of persons who have legally no real existence, 807; no rule of the Senate ought to exclude any citizen or body of citizens from presenting their wishes to the Senate, 808; it is before the Senate without any solid form, 806; papers withdrawn, 808.
- Memorial signed by the President of the Society, 812; the Society indulges in no views hostile to the tenure by which citizens of the Southern States hold their property, 812; this is denounced as a visionary and chimerical project, 812; the conduct of the agent arraigned, 812; destruction of the Spanish factory, 812; destruction of the French factory, 812; destruction of Trade Town, 814; how does this affect the question before the Senate, 814; the constitutional objections, 815; said to be too late in the session to mature any measure out of this memorial, 815; is the Senate prepared to unite with the Senator in denouncing a system thus recommended? 816.
- Resolution of the Society, 817; object of the Society to induce Congress to establish a colony on the coast of Africa, or to appropriate money for that object, 817; extract from the memorial, 818; Mr. Jefferson's name has been quoted, as if he had sanctioned this Society, 818; look at the object expressly avowed in this petition, 819; if this policy is ever adopted by this Government, they will go directly into the market as the purchasers of our slaves for the purpose of emancipation, 819; the dangerous tendency of the measure, 819; the means by which this object is to be attained, 820; what are we to say to this as a remedy for such an evil? 820; results of tables, 821; petition laid on the table, 822.
- In the House, a resolution relative to, considered, 437; these resolutions private papers, 437; referred, 438; respect due a sovereign State demands its resolution should be heard, 438; further debate, 438; further debate, 444.
- Columbia River, occupation of.*—See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- Commerces of the United States.*—See Index, vol. 1, 8.
- Compensation of President and Vice President.*—See Index, vol. 1, 2.
- Compensation of Members.*—See Index, vol. 5. Pay of Members.
- CONDICT, LEWIS, Representative from N. J., 609. See Index, vol. 4, 5, 7, 8.
- CORNER, HENRY W., Representative from N. C., 610.
- Contested Election.*—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 5, 7.
- Contingent Expenses.*—See Index, vol. 2, 3.
- Contracts, Government.*—See Index, vol. 3.
- Controversies between States.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- Convey System.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- COWLEY, HENRY W., on non-residents' land in Arkansas, 254; on the Quapaw Indians, 346; on encroachments on Choctaw lands, 348; on Indian land titles in Arkansas, 378; on Deaf and Dumb Asylums, 402-404; relative to the duties of Governor of Arkansas, 438. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- COOK, DANIEL P., on the South American relations, 50-73; an amendment to the Constitution, 81-87; on the New Creek Treaty, 361; on the Tacubaya mission, 430; on the Liberia Agency, 441. See Index, vol. 8.
- Cordage, drawback on.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- Costs of suit by Patentees.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- COULTER, RICHARD, Representative from Penn., 603.
- Creek Indian Negotiation.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- CREIGHTON, WILLIAM J., Representative from Ohio, 610.
- Crimes against the United States.*—See Index, vol. 8. Penal laws of the United States.
- CROWNSHIELD, D. W., Representative from Mass., 609; reports on invitations to Panama, 48. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- CROCKETT, DAVID, Representative from Tenn., 610.
- Cuba, its importance to the United States.*—See Panama Mission.
- Cuba, emigrants from.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- Cuba, non-alienation to a European power,* 118.

CULPEPER, JOHN, Representative from N. C., 610; on militia courts martial, 659. See Index, vols. 2, 4, 5 & 7, 8.

Cumberland Road.—In the Senate, a bill for the preservation and repair of, considered, 588; bad state of repair of some sections, 588; three courses might be taken, 588; the Senate has no power to originate a bill for laying taxes, 589; late period at which the bill has been taken up, 589; is the Senate competent to frame an act on a bill of this kind, 589; a Constitutional point, 589; question submitted to the Senate, 589; bill laid on the table, 589. See Appropriations, vols. 7, 8, and Index, vols. 2, 4, 5.

Cumberland River.—See Index, vol. 8.

D

DANIEL, HENRY, Representative from Kentucky, 610; on retrenchment, 694.

DAVERPORT, JOHN, Representative from Ohio, 610.

DAVERPORT, THOMAS, Representative from Virginia, 610. See Index, vol. 8.

DAVE, JOHN, Representative from Massachusetts, 610; on the Massachusetts Militia Claims, 51; on duties on wool and woollens, 398. See Index, vol. 8.

DAVE, WARREN K., Representative from South Carolina, 610.

Deaf and Dumb Asylum in Kentucky.—In the Senate, a bill to provide for the location of certain grants of land considered, 379; object of the bill, 379; moved to strike out, &c., 379; shall the Senate, because an error has thrown the institution into their power, take back their bounty? 379; bill ordered to third reading, 379.

In the House, a bill for the benefit of the New York and Pennsylvania institutions considered, 401; amendment that the land granted should be sold, 401; the situation of these institutions would induce them to a speedy sale, 401; if withheld from market it will injure the territory, 401; no reason why these states should have a preference in the matter, 402; on what authority can Congress make grants of money or land? 402; do great injustice to Florida, 402; the lands should not be sold within five years, 402; amendment to extend the bill to other states, 402; objections, 402; precedent, 404; Connecticut and Kentucky have received grants, 404; no grant called for from other states, 404; appeal made in behalf of the poor, 405; plan of the institutions, 405; will the House do any thing for the deaf and dumb, 405; on what principle are these grants wrong? 405; private means have proved insufficient, 405; motion to recommit the bill carried, 406; further amendment, 406. See Index, vols. 6, 8.

Debates, reporting of.—See Index, vol. 2.

Debates, Register of, resolution to subscribe to, carried, 444.

Decatur, Mrs., the case of.—In the House, a bill to compensate considered, 238; provisions of the bill, 238; compensation to the officers and crew of the schooner Intrepid, 238; hundred thousand dollars moved, 238; the frigate Philadelphia could have been removed after her recapture, had not the peremptory orders of Commodore Preble prevented the attempt, 238; as a prize they would have been entitled to nearly three hundred thousand dollars, 239; precedents for the bill, 239; effect of this capture on the Barbary powers, 240; definition of the word glory, 240; these captors are entitled to remuneration from the extraordinary gallantry of their achievement, 241; what effect is the passage or rejection of this bill calculated to have on the highest interests of the navy, 241; blank filled with one hundred thousand, 242; debate on the principle of the bill, 242; no legal claim vested for prize money because the prize law requires that the vessel should be condemned as a lawful prize, 242; the claim should have been presented long ago, 242. See Philadelphia Frigate.

DE GRAFF, JOHN J., Representative from New York, 609.

Delaware and Chesapeake Canal.—See Index, vol. 8.

Delegates from Territories.—See Index, vol. 1.

Denny Penelope, case of.—See Index, vol. 8.

Defensive measures against Great Britain under John Adams.—See Index, vol. 2.

Deserters, bounty to.—See Index, vol. 5.

Desertion, prevention of.—In the Senate a bill relative to, considered and ordered to be engrossed, 545, 546.

DEHA, ROBERT, Representative from Tennessee, 610.

DICKERSON, MAHLON, Senator from New Jersey, 467; on the decease of Joseph McIlvaine, 266; on the distribution of revenue, 268; on the powers of the Vice President, 505; on the graduation of the price of public lands, 581; on the duty on molasses, 589; on the duty on vermicelli, 590; on the duty on furs, 593; on the duty on indigo, 595, 597, 598; on the duty on silk, 602. See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7, 8.

DICKINSON, JOHN D., Representative from New York, 609.

Diplomatic Addresses.—In the House a resolution calling for, &c., considered, 89; such addresses unusual, 89; a full view of our relations with Spain desirable, 89; occasions when Ministers present addresses, 89; no bearing in the papers asked for, upon any subject likely to come before the House, 89.

Diplomatic Intercourse.—See Index, vol. 2.

Disbursements of the Public Money.—See Index, vol. 7.

Distal Swamp Canal.—In the House an engrossed bill to authorize subscriptions to the stock of, 19; yeas and nays called, 19; ordered, 19; call of the House moved and negatived, 19; bill passed, 19. See Index, vol. 8.

Distribution of the Revenue.—Bill to provide for, considered, 238.

District of Columbia.—See Index, vols. 2, 3, 6, 7.

Divorces in the District of Columbia.—See Index, vols. 2, 4, 7.

Domestic Manufactures.—See Index, vol. 5.

DORSEY, CLEMENT, Representative from Maryland, 609; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 255, 258; on slavery in the District of Columbia, 416; on retrenchment, 705. See Index, vol. 8.

Drawbacks.—See Index, vol. 1. Duties on Imports.

DRAYTON, WILLIAM, Representative from South Carolina, 610; on South American relations, 65; on the relief of Revolutionary officers, 228; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 292; on report relative to the United States and Georgia, 465; on the bank of the United States, 614; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 646; on retrenchment, 751. See Index, vol. 8.

Duelling.—See Index, vol. 6.

DUNCAN, JOSEPH, Representative from Illinois, 610.

Duties Discriminating.—See Index, vol. 8.

Duties on Imports, Salt, &c.—In the Senate a bill to repeal a part of the duty on salt considered, 289; it will destroy the bounty now given to fishermen, 289; note, 289; important to retain the bounty, 289; repeal asked in order to remove the frauds said to have been committed on the duty on salt, 290; manufacture in Massachusetts, 290; it has been said we could very well dispense with the duty on salt, 291; not a time to reduce the income, 291; bill not intended to injure the fisheries, 291; it will aid the fisherman in common with all the consumers of salt, 291; time when the tax was imposed, 291; has been deemed a mere war tax, 292; it began in England in the same way, 292; its manufacture in this country, 292; duty imposed by New York on her salt manufactures, 293; this point no bearing on the question, 294; reason of the duty in New York, 294; the agriculturists do not generally want assistance, 295; bill ordered to be engrossed, 595; condition of the finances, 596; ought any of our resources to be cut off under their present condition, 596; salutary occurrence for the finances of the country to get occasionally into difficulty, 596; the duty was imposed under circumstances that did not afford a sanction for its continuance until this period, 596; the fisheries and manufactures, 596; the state of the country requires rather an increase than a decrease of revenue, 597; not equitable to remove the protection now given without some previous notice, 597; the present deficiency, 598; it was never intended this tax should remain after the occasion ceased, 598; this bill has a claim founded on justice and the equal rights of the citizens, 598; the treasury was overflowing at the opening of the session, 598; appropriate thousands for foreign objects, but it is difficult to obtain assistance for the laboring community at home, 598; bill passed, 599.

A bill to reduce the duty on salt considered, 578; indefinite postponement moved, 578; a tax on a necessary of life is in utter hostility to the principles of our government, 578; a heavy tax on agriculture, 578; it may be asked how such a tax could ever have been laid, 574; why should not the duty be reduced, 574; the principle of protection has been carried too far, 574.

Molasses.—Moved to strike out ten and insert seven and a half cents per gallon, 589; the duty an odious tax on a necessary article, 589; lead to the production of the article in this country, 589; an indirect encouragement to the farming interest, 589; a death to the West India trade, 590; extends to the West its share of protection, 590; motion lost, 590; an additional duty of six cents per gallon moved, 599; the first proposition to impose a duty on molasses was considered a duty on sugar, 599; both treated as duties on sugar, one in its granular and the other in its fluid state, 600; New England rum treated as the antagonist of western whiskey, 600; molasses used as sugar, 600; effect on the revenue, 600; on the equal distribution of taxes, 600; it is said the increased duty on molasses was put into the bill for the purpose of poisoning it, 601; motion lost, 601.

Vermicelli.—Moved to insert "on vermicelli 50 per cent." 590; large quantities exported from New Jersey, 590; a story, 590; amendment rejected, 590.

Lead.—Moved to lay a certain duty, 590; an article of domestic production, 590; reasons for granting this increased duty, 591; mineral district of Missouri at present languishing, 591; the tariff objectionable as a system of bounties, 591; in vain that it is called the American system, 592; remarks on the American system, 592; amendment adopted, 592.

Furs.—Moved to lay a duty of 83½ per cent., 598; extent of the trade, 598; amendments offered, 598; motion lost, 598.

Indigo.—Duty of 25 per cent. moved, 598; first production of indigo, 598; its history, 598; reasons for encouraging the home production, 598; unanimous vote expected, 594; wealth has fled from the south and settled north of the Potomac, 594; effect of federal legislation, 594; moved to divide the question, 595; the addition to the duty too rapid, 595; qualities of the article, 595; extraordinary that this proposition should be opposed, 596; the amendment in strict conformity with the principles of the bill, 596; the attention of the country is now directed to the subject, 597; an additional tax on the manufacturer without benefit to anybody, 597; capacity of the southern country to produce all required, 597; object of the mover of the amendment, 597; various amendments offered, 597; little benefit to the planter but a heavy tax on the manufacturer, 598; the American system depends upon the British government for its existence, 598; amendment lost, 593.

Cordage.—Moved to lay an additional duty of five cents, 598; a bounty to the foreign manufactured article, 599; statement of a few facts, 599; motion rejected, 599.

Raw Wool.—A progressive duty moved, 599; idle to go on with the debate at present, 599; motion lost, 599.

Woollen Blankets.—Moved to strike out the duty on, 601; an article of necessity required by everybody, 601; the manufacture is not competent to supply the consumption, 601; manufacture not increased since 1834, 601; a beneficial effect produced by the duty, 601; amendment lost, 601.

Silks.—Moved to amend the duty on silks, 602; adds five per cent. to the duty on silks from the other side of Cape of Good Hope, 602; object appears to be to increase discrimination, 602; our interest to be on the best terms with France, 602; benefit of an increase of duty, 602; rejected, 603.

Miscellaneous articles.—Moved to strike out the duty on steel, lead, leaden shot, litharge, &c., 603; lost, 603; duty on oranges and lemons moved, 603; lost, 603; duty on imported spirits moved and lost, 603; bill ordered to a third reading, 603; passed, 603.

Wines.—Bill to reduce the duty on, 605; alterations produced by the bill, 605; its effect on the revenue, 605; ordered to be engrossed, 606.

In the House a bill to alter the acts imposing a duty on imports considered, 879; forty millions invested in woollen manufacture, 879; value of the agricultural interest, 879; amount involved in the question of protecting woollens, 879; interest of other branches of agriculture besides those engaged in sheep raising, 880; foreign exports of flour, 880; the features of the bill, 880; first minimum placed at forty cents, 880; other minimums, 881; motion that the committee rise, 881; reasons for the motion, 881; not a time to tamper with our tariff when the revenue was declining, 882; motion carried, 882.

The protective bill of 1834, 894; this bill, if it becomes a law, will effectually prohibit the importation of nearly all the woollen goods in common use, whose value at the place of exportation shall not exceed three and a half dollars, 894; it embraces peculiarly articles worn by the poor and middle classes of society, 894; the question is whether our decision on the proposed increase of duty on woollens ought not to be postponed, 895; have we any information as to its operation on the revenue? 895; did not the tariff of 1834 shake the Union to its centre? 895; the only object of the bill was to give to manufacturers of woollens the protection that was intended for them by the act of 1834, but which they had failed to receive by its evasions, 895; the motion to discharge the committee was submitted with the single view to ascertain whether the House were prepared to discuss, at this session, "the principles and the policy of the tariff," 896; do gentlemen believe a subject of this character will be permitted to pass without a full and free discussion? 896; object of the memorialists, 897; some better understanding can be made between the friends and opponents of the bill, 897; reasons against discharging the committee, 897; grounds upon which the present consideration of the bill is resisted, 898; object of the committee on manufactures to apply a remedy to the frauds at the custom houses, 898; it is due to the memorialists to inquire whether the statements they have made are true, 898; what subject of greater moment is on the table? 899; if this debate goes on one week, speculations will take place in woollen goods to the amount of millions of dollars, 899; it is said the committee were imposed upon, 899; grounds upon which the bill was founded, 899; precipi-tancy of the measure, 400; no such opposition or alarm against the measure exists as has been attempted to be shown, 400; no one conceived that this measure would be seriously agitated at this session, 400; amount of business before the House unacted on, 400; the friends of the bill unnecessarily protracting the debate, 401; the bill presents two principles which, if adopted, will completely alter our internal and external policy, 401; bill passed, 414. See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

Duties on Tonnage.—See Index, vol. 1.

DWIGHT, HENRY W., Representative from Mass., 609; on the Massachusetts militia claims, 119; on the new Creek Treaty, 358, 365; on duties on wool and woollens, 399; on the Tacubaya mission, 435; on Meade's claim, 445; on a painting of the Battle of New Orleans, 639; relative to captured Africans, 643. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

E

EARLE, JONAS, Jr., Representative from New York, 609.

EATON, JOHN H., Senator from Tenn., 467; on the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in Kentucky, 379; on indemnification to foreigners, 474. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.

EDWARDS, NATHAN, address of, to the House. See Index, vol. 8.

Election of President.—See Index, vol. 1, and Index, vol. 8, Presidential Election.

Eligibility of a resident of Washington to a seat in the House from Massachusetts.—See Index, vol. 7.

ELLIS, POWHATAN, Senator from Miss., 467. See Index, vol. 8.

Embargo.—See Index, vols. 3, 4, 5, and Index, vol. 1, Great Britain.

Enlistments, encouragement of.—See Index, vol. 5.

EVERETT, EDWARD, Representative from Mass., 609; on amendment to the constitution, 85; on the relief of revolutionary officers, 232; on the appointment of Charges, 371; on the Polar expedition, 414; on Meade's claim, 449; on a painting of the battle of New Orleans, 638; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 666; on retrenchment, 709. See Index, vol. 8.

Exchange of Stocks.—See Index, vol. 7.

Excises on Liquors.—See Index, vols. 1, 5.

Executive Departments.—See Index, vol. 1.

Executive Powers.—See Index, vol. 8.

Expatriation.—See Index, vols. 2, 5, 6.

Expedition against Porto Rico.—See Index, vol. 7.

Expenditures, reduction of.—See Index, vol. 7.

Expunging the Journal of the Senate.—See Index, vol. 8.

F

Federal Judges.—See Index, vols. 2, 3, amendments to the constitution, and Index, vols. 4, 5.

FINDLAY, JAMES, Representative from Ohio, 610. See Index, vol. 8.

Flag of the United States.—See Index, vol. 1.

Florida, affairs in.—See Index, vol. 7. Canal.—See Index, vol. 8. Government of.—See Index, vol. 6. Spanish Treaty; occupation of.—See Index, vol. 4. Purchase of.—See Index, vol. 8. Wreckers.—See Index, vol. 8.

FLOYD, JOHN, Representative from Va., 610; on the Panama mission, 215; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 358; on the memorial of Calhoun, 362; makes minority report on the Vice-President's appeal, 423; on removal of the Indians, 624; on militia courts martial, 662; on retrenchment, 692. See Index, vols. 6, 7.

FLOYD, JOHN, Representative from Georgia, 610.

FOOT, SAMUEL A., Senator from Conn., 467; relative to the powers of the Vice-President, 505; on the survivors of the revolution, 533.

FORT, TOMLINSON, Representative from Georgia, 610; on the Bank of the United States, 617; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 627.

Foreign Ministers, abuse of Privilege.—See Index, vol. 3. Foreign Relations.—See Index, vols. 4, 5.

Foreigners, petitions from.—See Index, vol. 8.

FORSTYTH, JOHN, on South American relations, 49, 74, 75; on the Panama mission, 90; on the Panama mission, 172; on the Creek Treaty, 243, 248, 255; relative to the Bahama banks, 256; on Georgia militia claims, 348; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 358; on the appointment of Charges, 371; on grants to the Quapaw Indians, 406; relative to the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians, 408; on the relations of the United States and Georgia, 411, 412; on commercial intercourse with Sweden, 423, 429; on the Tacubaya mission, 429, 430; on claims under the Florida Treaty, 444, 443, 450; on the British Colonial Trade, 451, 457, 461; on the Liberia Agency, 440. See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7, 8.

FORWARD, CHAUNCEY, Representative from Penn., 609.

France, relations with.—See Index, vols. 2, 5.

Franking Privilege.—See Index, vol. 1, 2.

Free blacks in District of Columbia, bill relative to, 375.

Freedom of conscience.—See Index, vol. 1.

French Colonial Trade.—In the Senate, a bill relative to, considered, 563; explanation of the origin and operation of the bill, 563; cause of the delay in reciprocating the French ordinance, 563; the ordinance a temporary act, revocable at the pleasure of the French Government, 563; the publication of the decree, 563; why has this new tariff of duties on the trade of Guadeloupe and Martinique been withheld from the American Congress? 564; will not the bill in its present shape repeal the construction which the Executive has given to the law regulating the commercial intercourse between this country and France? 564; amendment moved, 564; France should be conciliated, 565; the bill is solely applicable to the regulation of the colonial trade, 565; construction by our Government, 565; it goes a little further than fully reciprocating all that was granted by the French decrees, 565; the amendment is unnecessary, 566; manner in which the direct trade is regulated, 566; amendment withdrawn, 566; have not the duties on American produce to these islands been reduced? 566; at this very moment the ordinance is probably repealed, 567; history of the transaction, 567; bill ordered to be engrossed and passed, 567.

French Refugees.—See Index, vol. 1.

French Spoillations.—See Index, vols. 2, 3, 7.

French Decrees.—See Index, vol. 5.

FREY, JOSEPH, Jr., Representative from Pennsylvania, 609.

Frontiers, Protection of.—See Index, vol. 1.

Fugitive Slaves.—See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7. Slaves.

Fugitives from Justice.—See Index, vol. 1.

Fur Trade of the West.—See Index, vol. 7.

G

GALE, LEVIN, Representative from Maryland, 609.

Gales & Sonson elected printers.—See Index, vols. 6, 7.

GARNETT, DANIEL G., on the Panama Mission, 199; Representative from New York, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

GARROW, NATHANIEL, Representative from New York, 609. General Welfare.—See Index, vol. 1.

Georgia Land Claims.—See Index, vol. 2.

Georgia Militia Claims.—In the House, motion to discharge the Committee, 348; properly have no cognizance of these claims, 348; debate, 348; motion lost, 349; amendment moved, 433. See Index, vols. 3, 6, 7, 8.

German Language, Laws in.—See Index, vol. 2.

GILMER, GEORGE E., Representative from Georgia, 610; rela- tive to captured Africans, 644; on the Georgia boundary line, 674.

- GORHAM, BENJAMIN, Representative from Massachusetts, 609; on the Bank of the United States, 615. See Index, vol. 7.
- GOVAN, ANDREW R., on Deaf and Dumb Asylums, 408. See Index, vol. 7.
- Great Britain, retaliatory measures on.*—See Index, vol. 1.
- Greeks, aid to the.—See Index, vol. 7.
- Greeks, suffering, relief to.—In the House, a resolution making an appropriation, &c., considered, 868; the distress, 868; precedents, 864; a general picture of horror and desolation in Greece, 864; effect which this measure would have on the relations of this country with the belligerent powers, 864; this would be a direct violation of our neutrality under the law of nations, 864; it is a supply to the necessities in the nation at large, and not a subsidy voluntarily offered, 865; provisions are not contraband of war except when going to a besieged place, 865; is not this a distinction without a difference? 865; resolution laid on the table, 866.
- GREEN, INNES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 608.
- Guatemala, Mission to.—See Index, vol. 8.
- Gunboats.—See Index, vol. 1.
- GURLEY, HENRY H., Representative from Louisiana, 610.—See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- H
- Habeas Corpus, Suspension of.*—See Index, vol. 8, 8.
- HAILE, — on encroachments on Choctaw lands, 847; on the removal of the Choctaw Indians, 870; on duties on wool and woollens, 400; on the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians, 411; on the relations of the United States and Georgia, 413; on removal of the Indians, 624; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 667.
- HALE, WILLIAM, Representative from Mississippi, 610.
- HALL, THOMAS, Representative from North Carolina, 610; relative to captured Africans, 637.—See Index, vol. 6, 7.
- HALLOCK, JOHN, JR., Representative from New York, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- Hamilton, Alexander, report of, as Secretary of the Treasury.—See Index, vol. 1. Treasury.
- HAMILTON, JAMES, JR., on Massachusetts Militia Claims, 51; on South American relations, 64, 65; on the Panama Mission, 128; on removal of the remains of Commodore Perry, 258; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 358; on the suffering Greeks, 865; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 889; on duties on wool and woollens, 894; on the Liberian Agency, 449; on the Bank of the United States, 618; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 629; on a painting of the Battle of New Orleans, 637; on the old sedition law, 631-634. See Index, vol. 9.
- Harmony in Indiana, Society of. See Index, vol. 8.
- HARRISON, WILLIAM H., on the relief of sufferers at Alexandria, 285; on payment of deported slaves, 613; on a naval academy, 387; Senator from Ohio, 467; on reporters to the Senate, 478; on the decease of Major General Brown, 528; on the office of Major General, 537; on the claims of South Carolina, 539; relative to the barracks at New Orleans, 540; on the prevention of desertion, 548; on the bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, 558; on the duty on salt, 578; on the survivors of the Revolution, 584, 585; on brevet rank, 604.
- HARVEY, JONATHAN, Representative from New Hampshire, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- HAYNE, ROBERT Y., on the lottery for the sale of Jefferson's estate, 287; on the Colonization Society, 308-317; on the gradual improvement of the Navy, 824-832; on a naval academy, 838-843; Senator from South Carolina, 467; on indemnification to foreigners, 474; on the captors of the Philadelphia, 499; on the powers of the Vice-President, 510; on the office of Major General, 538; on the claims of South Carolina, 539; on a grant of land to Kanyon College, 560; on the French Colonial trade, 566; on the payment of interest to States, 573; on the duty on Indigo, 596; on the suppression of the Slave trade, 606, 607.
- HAYNES, CHARLES E., Representative from Georgia, 610.
- HEALRY, JOSEPH, Representative from New Hampshire, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- Heathen, propagating the Gospel among.—See Index, vol. 1.
- Hemp, American.—See Index, vol. 7.
- HEMPHILL, JOSEPH, on the relief of Revolutionary officers, 218; on the Panama mission, 158. See Index, vol. 6, 7, 8.
- HENDERSON, FRANCIS, JR., The case of.—See Index, vol. 7.
- HENDRICKS, WILLIAM, on the road in Michigan, 238; on the road in Arkansas, 388; on the Ohio turnpike road, 348; Senator from Indiana, 467; on public lands, 476; on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, 604. See Index, vol. 8.
- HENRY, ROBERT F., decease of, 849.
- HERRICK, EBERNEZER, on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 884.
- HOBBS, SELAH R., Representative from New York, 608.
- HODGES, —, Representative from Massachusetts, 609.
- HODGSON, EBERNICA, Petition of.—See Index, vol. 5.
- HOFFMAN, MICHAEL, on the New Creek Treaty, 365; on a Naval Academy, 455; on Deaf and Dumb Asylums, 406; Representative from New York, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- HOLCOMBE, GEORGE, on the case of Mrs. Decatur, 228; Representative from New Jersey, 609; decease of, 663.
- HOLMES, GABRIEL, on the salary of the Postmaster-General, 284; on the sale of reserved lead mines, 261; on the duty on salt, 389; on the message respecting the Creek Indians, 303; on payment of deported slaves, 308-311; Representative from North Carolina, 610. See Index, vol. 8.
- Home Department.—See Index, vol. 1. Executive Department, and Index, vol. 5.
- Home Manufactures worn in the House.—See Index, vol. 8.
- Honors to the Brave.—See Index, vol. 6.
- Horses lost in the Seminole War.—See Index, vol. 7.
- HOUSTON, SAMUEL, on the Massachusetts militia claims, 57. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- Houses adjourns at close of first session of 19th Congress, 265; convenes at second session of 19th Congress, 345; adjourns at close of second session of 19th Congress, 486; convenes at first session of 20th Congress, 609; adjourns at close of first session of 20th Congress, 732.
- HUMPHREY, CHARLES, on the relief of Revolutionary officers, 226. See Index, vol. 8.
- HUNT, JONATHAN, Representative from Vermont, 608.
- I
- Illinois, Admission of.—See Index, vol. 8.
- Impeachment.—See Index, vol. 2.
- Imports.—See Duties on Imports.
- Imprisonment for Debt.—In the Senate, leave asked to bring in a bill to abolish, 274; no doubt of the principle, or expediency of the measure, 274; imprisonment for debt, horrible as the Spanish Inquisition, 274; a violation of the Declaration of Independence, and of the constitution, 274; the barbarous custom had its origin in usurped power, 274; appeal to the wisdom and patriotism of the Senate, to aid in abolishing a disgraceful feature of the laws, 275; leave granted, and bill introduced, 275. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- Indemnification of Foreigners.—In the Senate, a petition relative to, presented, 474; the question can be settled otherwise than by reference, 474; a case out of the scope of the general rule, 474; the petition from a British subject should be presented officially to Congress, 474; citizens of other countries have no right to petition Congress for the adjustment of their claims, 474; petition laid on the table, 475.

Indemnity for Spoliations.—See Index, vol. 1, Great Britain.

Indiana, admission of.—See Index, vol. 5.

Indiana Canal.—In the House, a bill to authorize Indiana to locate a canal considered and ordered to be engrossed, 454.

Indiana Affairs.—See Index, vol. 4.

Indiana Factory System.—See Index, vol. 7.

Indiana Department.—See Index, vol. 7.

Indian Lands within a State, rights over.—See Index, vol. 1.

Indian title west of the Rocky Mountains.—See Index, vol. 8.

Indian Tribes.—See Index, vol. 8.

Indiana, Chickasaw and Choctaw.—In the House, a resolution considered, 407; no necessity for passing such a resolution, 407; why call for the instructions given in this case alone? 407; exceptions taken to the proceedings of the Commissioners, 407; were they in fact true? 407; it is said that the Commissioners addressed the Indians in the language of threats and coercion, 406; extract from the address of the Commissioners, 406; is this the language of coercion? 406; objectionable parts of the resolutions, 409; Indian treaties of late years, 409; an attempt to carry into effect a policy with the Indians, which should meet the reprobation of the House, 409; it is said that the resolution is unusual and extraordinary in its character, 410; the information called for can be of no service when obtained, 410; the efforts of the Commissioners have been unsuccessful, 410; particulars, 410; the policy the Commissioners have endeavored to promote has been successively recommended by Monroe, Calhoun, and Barbour, 411; resolution laid on the table, 411.

Resolution relative to the removal of the Choctaws, &c., considered, 628; bill, 630.

Indiana, Florida, Relief of.—In the House, a bill considered, 137; part of the Indians in a state of starvation, 137; circumstances of the case, 137; the question of colonizing the Indians in the western country yet to be decided, 138; amended by inserting a sufficient sum to relieve the present exigency, 138; Congress has no power to make the Treasury a charity box, 138; ordered to a third reading, 138; the bill, 146; read a third time, and passed, 146.

Removal of.—In the House, a resolution relative to, considered, 366; negotiation with the Indian tribes, for the cession of their land, a mere farce, 366; the United States have, by statute, disfranchised every nation of Indians within their boundaries, 366; it has been asked, what brought these people to their present abject condition? 366; the Indians expected to be removed, 367; the injuries and losses, by the continuance of these Indians in their present abode, 367.

Indiana, Quapaw.—In the House, bill relative to considered, 406; motion to lay on the table, 406; article of the treaty with the Indians, 406; a question relative to conveying the lands in fee, 406; motion carried, 406.

INNESMOLL, RALPH L., on the British Colonial Trade, 451; Representative from Connecticut, 609; on a painting of the Battle of New Orleans, 638. See Index, vol. 8.

INGHAM, SAMUEL D., on the Panama mission, 190; on preservation of live oak timber, 377; on the Tacubaya mission, 481; Representative from Pennsylvania, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Anterive, 653; on retrenchment, 700. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.

Intercourse, Commercial; do., Foreign; do., Non. See Index, vol. 4.

Internal Improvement.—In the House, a resolution to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the appropriation for surveys, &c., and substituting specific appropriations, 860; the propriety of transferring to the Executive this large discretion over the public money, has never received separate consideration, 860; internal improvements, legitimately, are confined to objects of a national character, 860; important to call the attention of the House to the manner in which appropriations are made, 861; amendment offered, 861; resolution laid on the table, 862.

In the Senate, a bill to grant certain unappropriated lands in Alabama to the State for purposes of Internal Improvement, considered, 546; ordered to be engrossed, 547. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

Invalid Corps.—See Index, vol. 5.

ISAACKS, JACOB C., on an amendment to the constitution, 84; on South American relations, 89; Representative from Tennessee, 610. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

Isthmus of Panama, a resolution relative to establishing communication with, considered, 859.

J

Jails of States.—See Index, vol. 6.

Jefferson's Lottery Bill, action in the House on, 414.

JENNINGS, JONATHAN, Representative from Indiana, 610.

See Index, vols. 4, 5, 7, 8.

JOHN, KENNEY, JR., Representative from Delaware, 609.

JOHNSON, FRANCIS, on the Panama Mission, 157; on South American relations, 70-72; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 885-891. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

JOHNSON, JAMES, offers a resolution on a Western Army, 47; on the Panama Mission, 306; decease of, 850. See Index, vol. 8.

JOHNSON, JEROMUS, Representative from New York, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

JOHNSON, RICHARD M., on imprisonment for debt, 274; on the sale of reserved Lead Mines, 333; on the salary of the Postmaster General, 284; Senator from Kentucky, 467; on reporters to the Senate, 475; on the graduation in the price of the public lands, 567; on repairs of the Cumberland road, 588. See Index, vols. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

JOHNSON, JOSIAH S., on the duty on salt, 298; on payment of deported slaves, 306-312; Senator from Louisiana, 667; on the powers of the Vice President, 516; on the public debt, 534; relative to the barracks at New Orleans, 540, 541. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

Journal of the Federal Convention.—See Index, vol. 7.

Journal of the Old Congress.—See Index, vol. 6.

Judges, Federal, removal of.—See Index, vols. 3, 4.

Judiciary, The.—In the Senate, a bill to establish judicial process in the States admitted into the Union since 1789, 518; the bill in its present shape will destroy all equity process in many of the old States, 518; execution laws of Kentucky, 518; defended, 519; Kentuckians a brave and chivalrous people, 519; the inordinate issue of bank paper, 520; effect of unwise measures of the Bank of the United States, 520; is Kentucky the only State that attempted during the war to suit her code to her condition? 520; the Circuit Judge declared the replevin law to be unconstitutional, 521; what constitutes a despotism, 521; how much more becoming in the Judges to have surrendered their judgment to that of the people, until Congress could have passed on the subject, 522; the power to enact remedial laws must exist somewhere, 523; it is said the judiciary is the most important department in our Government, 523; whenever the most vigilant scrutiny of the people's representatives shall be withdrawn from that department, the liberties of the people will be endangered, 524; the judicial character is only valuable when it does its duty, 524; a portentous

Indifference displayed by the States in relation to the violation of the great principles upon which their rights depend, 525; motion to reconsider carried, 525.
Judiciary System.—See Index, vols. 2, 3.

K

KANE, ELIAS K., on the Yazoo purchase, 276; Senator from Illinois, 467; on the powers of the Vice-President, 515; on a grant of land to Kenyon College, 556. See Index, vol. 8.

Kenyon College.—In the Senate a bill to grant a township of land to, considered, 556; amendments offered, 556; object of the bill, 556; persons connected with the institution, 557; their activity in its behalf, 557; institutions indebted to private donations, 559; it may be considered the proposition before the Senate was of little consequence, 559; objection to clogging the bill with a new provision when it was ripe for action, 559; every bill should be left to its own merits, 559; the bill should embrace other objects beside this particular institution, 560; we cannot make this grant to Ohio and refuse it to other States, 560; Ohio has no claim to this donation, 560; it involves one of the most important principles which could possibly be submitted to our consideration, 560; are gentlemen unwilling to have exposed to view the magnitude of the question involved, 560; shall the Federal Government take the subject of education into its own hands, is the question involved, 560; protest against the extension of the jurisdiction and an appropriation of the funds of the Federal Government to purposes of education within the States, 561; our duty to exert a vigilant control over every department of the government, and to resist every temptation to overleap the bounds of our authority, 561; this government has already gone too far in assuming jurisdiction over objects which do not belong to them at all, or which they could exercise only limitations, 561; under the constitution you have nothing to do with this subject, 562; if you begin with this institution where will you end? 562; bill ordered to be engrossed and passed, 562.

KEMER, RICHARD, Representative from New York, 609.

KERR, JOHN LEONE, Representative from Maryland, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 664. See Index, vol. 8.

KING, WILLIAM R., on the deaf and dumb asylum in Kentucky, 379; on deported slaves, 308; Senator from Alabama, 467; relative to the powers of the Vice-President, 504-508; on the suppression of the slave trade, 606; on the suppression of the slave trade, 607. See Index, vols. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

KING, ADAM, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609.

KITTERA, —, on deaf and dumb asylums, 405; on Meade's claim, 450.

KNIGHT, NENEHIAH R., Senator from Rhode Island, 467; on the payment of interest to States, 572; on the duty on indigo, 597. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

KREMER, GEORGE, on the Tacubaya mission, 436; on the Liberia agency, 443; Representative from Pennsylvania, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 629. See Index, vol. 8.

KREMAN, —, on retrenchment, 671.

L

Lafayette, gratitude to.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 7, 8.

Lake Superior Copper Mines.—See Index, vols. 2, 7, 8.

Land Claims in Ohio, details respecting certain, 373; bill for their relinquishment considered in the House, 373; debated, 373, 374.

Land Titles in Louisiana, do. Missouri.—See Index, vol. 7.

Lands for Education.—See Index, vol. 7.

Lands, Western.—See Index, vols. 1, 3, 4, 6, 7. Public Lands.

LAWRENCE, JOSEPH, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

LEA, PRYOR, Representative from Tennessee, 610.

Lead Mines, reserved sale of.—In the Senate, the bill reported, considered, 280; indefinite postponement moved, 280; the bill had once received the favorable decision of the Senate upon it, 280; the extent of the reservations, 280; provisions of the bill, 280; recurrence to first principles, 281; not expedient to authorize the sale at present, 281; objections to the bill, 281; reports made on the subject of mining, 281; Congress should let the President know what he had to sell before it bestowed the authority upon him, 281; a plan and proper drawings should be made, 282; this not necessary, 282; bill laid on the table, 282. See Index, vol. 7.

Liberia Agency.—In the House, an appropriation for, considered, 439; items examined, 440; the first negotiations, 440; according to the statement of the agent, having by a little address and management connected ourselves with this society, we must now send out a military and naval force to defend the colonists, 440; on what principle are we going to send out certain Africans? 441; an appropriation to carry an existing law into effect, 441; whose voice was first raised in this house against the slave trade? 442; amendment explained, 442; will not colonizing the coast of Africa be the best plan to stop the slave trade? 443; further debate, 443. See Index, vol. 8.

LECOMPT, JOSEPH, on an amendment to the constitution, 88; Representative from Kentucky, 610.

LEFFLER, ISAAC, Representative from Virginia, 610.

LETCHER, ROBERT P., on South American relations, 66; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 354; Representative from Kentucky, 610; on retrenchment, 707. See Index, vol. 7.

Live Oak Timber.—In the House, a resolution relative to considered, 376; an important subject, 376; most valuable ship timber, 377; growth extremely rapid, 377; amendment, 377; passed, 378. See Index, vol. 7.

Library of Congress.—See Index, vol. 2.

Library of Mr. Jefferson.—See Index, vol. 5.

Lieutenant-General.—See Index, vol. 5.

Lieutenants in the Navy, bill to increase pay of, 478.

Light House Duties.—See Index, vol. 3.

Limitations, Statutes of.—See Index, vols. 2, 4.

LITTLE, PETER, Representative from Maryland, 609; on the Colonization Society, 438. See Index, vols. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

LIVINGSTON, EDWARD, on South American relations, 76; on the Panama mission, 146; on the accounts of Monroe, 250; relative to the Bahama Banks, 252; on the suffering Greeks, 363, 364; on land claims in Ohio, 374; Representative from Louisiana, 610; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 625, 631. See Index, vols. 1, 2, 4, 8.

Loan Bill.—See Index, vol. 5.

LOCKE, JOHN, Representative from Massachusetts, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

LEVY, JOHN, Representative from North Carolina, 610. See Index, vol. 7, 8.

Lots, Public, in Washington.—See Index, vol. 7.

Louisiana, Purchase of.—See Index, vols. 2, 3. Treaty; See Index, vol. 2. Territory; See Index, vols. 2, 4. State; See Index, vol. 6.

LOWRIE, WALTER, chosen Secretary of the Senate, 474. See Index, vol. 8.

LUMPKIN, WILSON, Representative from Georgia, 610.

LYON, CRITTENDEN, Representative from Kentucky, 610.

M

MACON, NATHANIEL, elected President pro tem. of the Senate, 375; on a naval academy, 341; on the Ohio Turnpike bill, 348; Senator from North Carolina, 467; on the surviving officers of the Revolution, 496; on the powers of the Vice President, 505; on the office of Major-General, 523; on a grant of land to Kenyon College, 563; on the payment of interest to States, 573; on the duty on salt, 574; on the graduation of price of the public lands, 583; on the survivors of the Revolution, 583; on repairs of the Cumberland road, 589; on the duty on indigo, 595; on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, 604; elected President pro tem. of the Senate, 604. See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

Mackerel Fishery, bill relative to, 443.

MAGEE, JOHN, Representative from New York, 609.

Mail Theft.—See Index, vol. 7.

Maine, admission of.—See Index, vol. 8.

Maison Rouge Claim.—See Index, vol. 8.

MALLARY, ROLLIN C., on South American relations, 62-75; on duties on wool, 379; on the British Colonial Trade, 454; Representative from Vermont, 609. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

MARABLE, JOHN H., Representative from Tennessee, 610. See Index, vol. 8.

Mariigny D'Austerlee, case of.—In the House, a bill providing for remunerating the claimant for the lost time of a slave impressed into the service of the United States considered, 625; principle assumed that the United States is not bound in any case to pay for slaves injured or lost, because they are not considered as property, 626; a principle of most serious importance, 626; if not property, they are free, 626; amendment allowing for the injury done the slave and medical attendance on him, 626; a question that should be decided on its own merits, without sectional feeling, 626; has the Government in a single case paid for a slave lost in service? 626; right of the Government to impress slaves denied, and therein the interest of the master is protected, 626; the constitution makes no distinction, but embraces all private property, 627; the principle has been acted upon in numerous cases, 627; a delicate subject, 627; action of the House in 1816, 627; is the question to be raised here whether this class of people is property? 628; it is said there is no authority to impress a slave, 658; if Government impressed the slave it must pay for his loss of time, 629; history of the law relative to slave property, 629; intentment of previous Legislatures, 629; the great question is, shall slave property be placed without the reach of the arm of the military Government or not? 629; Congress has no power to settle the question of property, 629; state of the case, 629; the right to take and employ a slave for the public service arises out of the imminent necessity of a state of war, 630; case in point, 630.

Is the ghost of the Missouri question again to be marched, with solemn and terrific aspect, through these halls, 631; the question has long since been settled, 631; the constitution has recognized slaves as an effective portion of our population, 632; the constitution views slaves in the same light as did the slave-holding States at the time of its adoption, 632; it is no new doctrine, 633; slaves regarded in the mixed character of persons, both humanity and religion sanctions this declaration, 633; a novel doctrine, that no property can be rightfully impressed, 633; it is said, no precedent can be set up against the constitution, 633; legislation furnishes no instance of remuneration, 633; why was it that Government claimed indemnity of Great Britain? 633; a question the United States Government has nothing to do with, 633; the Missouri question never has been settled, 634; under the Roman law was a slave any less property, because he was a person? 634; no right to make our humanity and religion the rule of other men's actions within the sphere of neither, 634; no compromise about this description of persons further than the whole constitution was a compromise, 634; let no man deign ever to discuss this question, 635; this slave was taken precisely in the same manner as the horse and cart, 635.

The constitution has nothing to do with this matter, 635; what is the case before us? 636; on what principle can we be held bound to indemnify, when the officer clearly transcended his duties? 636; the same case in principle as to allow the impressment of an infant, apprentice, or servant, in the Northern States, 636.

The necessity of discussing the question has occurred, 646; is the Southern citizen alone to be deprived of that which is enjoyed by every citizen? 647; do the inhabitants of the South hold their property at the will of the United States? 647; slavery in the abstract, 647; two great divisions of property in respect to their nature, separated from each other by a line as clear and marked as light and darkness, 648; it is an evil of which the constitution has made them the only judges, as by its nature they ought to be, 648; do gentlemen of the South think we can sanction an attack upon their rights, which must in its principle endanger their own, 649; grounds upon which the amendment is resisted, 649; the principle recognized by former reports, 650; claims upon which reports have been made, 650; this the first case of the kind, 650; force of the constitution, 650; it has been said, that the excitement has been unnecessarily raised by those who had introduced and supported the amendment, 651; the facts are settled and the amount of damages ascertained; the only question is, shall we pay the demand? 651; to defend our country is too honorable employment to be divided with slaves, 651; the first time this question was stirred, 652; amendment withdrawn and renewed, 652; reasons for it, 652; an attempt has been made to liken the case of slaves to that of apprentices and minors, 653; mistake to suppose this slave was taken as a part of the military force of the country, 653; clause of the constitution relative to private property, 653; right of property in an apprentice and a slave identical, 654; committee rise, 654.

Amendment moved, 664; it is contended that slaves are not to be considered as property when taken, or lost, or injured in the public service, 664; a question which an attempt has been made to stir, 665; it is said the report gives color to the denial of property in slaves, 665; if slaves are property, why shall they not be considered as such, 665; why slaves are property, 665; reasons for making compensation for the slave, 666; what is shown by the papers, 666; ground upon which the claim is founded, 666; one forcible objection to admitting the claim, 666; quality of the act of impressment not in discussion here, 666; precedents, 667; argument from analogy, 667; right of the master in his slaves, 667; only question whether the officer under the exigencies of a state of war may not impress the private property of the citizen? 668.

MARKELL, HENRY, Representative from New York, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

MARKS, WILLIAM, Senator from Penn., 467; on repairs of the Cumberland road, 588. See Index, vol. 8.

MARTIN, WILLIAM D., Representative from South Carolina 610.

MARTINDALE, HENRY C., Representative from New York 609. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

MARVIN, DUDLEY, on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 393; on Deaf and Dumb Asylums, 405; Representative from New York, 609. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

Maryland Memorial, on the state of National Affairs.—See Index, vol. 5.

Massachusetts Memorial on the War of 1812.—See Index, vol. 5.

Massachusetts Militia Claims.—In the House, the bill to compensate Massachusetts for certain militia services during the late war, 51; provisions of the report of the military committee, 51; services of the Massachusetts militia, 51; views of the committee, 51; history of the transactions connected with the question, 51; difference of opinion between the Executive of the State and of the United States, 52; the question which arises is whether the United States can draw the militia of a State into public service without its officers, 52; the constitution points out the course, 52; reason given, that they were to be distributed on the seacoast for garrison duty, 52; is this a sufficient reason? 52; no constitutional emergency existed at the time of the call which justified it, 52; if a declaration of war justified the calling out of the militia, it would be in the power of the United States to convert the militia at once into a standing army, 52; what did the Executive of the State do? 52; how far were the United States affected by the decision of the Executive, 52; what the Executive did do, 52; the claim asks reimbursement for money advanced by the State to pay for spontaneous services, or those performed under the authority of the State, 54; why has it not been adjusted? 54; a constitutional difficulty, 54; objections, 54; replies, 54; facts connected with the transactions of 1814, 55; authority for the demand of General Dearborn, 55; it is said that the course pursued by the Executive impaired the physical force of the United States, 56; effect of the opinions and acts of the Governor, 56; where is the authority by which a State is made responsible for the opinions of its officers? 57; who is it that demands reimbursement? 57.

The services upon which the claim is founded were not performed under the Constitution of the United States, 57; where was the necessity for the detail of a Major-General? 58; the militia of Massachusetts were called out to defend their own frontier, 58; example of yielding the etiquette of military rank, 58; it is said, all the regular troops of Massachusetts were marched to the northern frontier, 59; it is asked, where is the power of the Governor to thrust himself between the physical power of the State and that of the General Government? 59; an excuse could be found for the Governor if he had acted unknowingly, 59; assurances given to the Governor, 59; if Massachusetts had acted as the exigencies of the case demanded of her, the remuneration would have been freely voted, 60; what was our situation when Massachusetts thought fit to resist the authority of the General Government, 60; the speech of Governor Strong to the Legislature of Massachusetts, 61; even the committee, with all the facts staring them in the face, say that Massachusetts is entitled to the allowance of this claim, 61; shall we pay claims because Massachusetts will be dutiful hereafter? 61; the Hartford Convention, 61; it is said, that the good people ought not to be mulcted for the conduct of their officers, 61; let Massachusetts hereafter make common cause in the defence of our republican institutions, and no difficulties can arise in the payment of her troops, 62.

The claim results from the reciprocal rights and duties conceded to the States, and guaranteed by the General Government at the time of the adoption of the constitution, 119; construction of the powers of the Government over the militia, who are in effect the people of the States, 119; before any actual invasion the Government of Massachusetts had practically abandoned the offensive constitutional doctrines, 119; documents examined, 120, 121; details of the proceedings in Massachusetts, 121; provisions of the bill under consideration, 122; this claim should be allowed because it is just in itself, and because similar claims have been allowed, 122; the bill is founded on these principles and these precedents, 122; what are the objections urged against it? 122; by passing the bill you undoubtedly approve of the militia services for which it makes payment, 122; proceedings of the Executive of Massachusetts, 122; it is to be remembered that by the constitution the President has no power to call forth the militia in any event whatever, 124; the power of Congress to provide for calling forth the militia is a complete power, 124; it is said that no officer of the militia is to be commanded by an inferior officer of the army of the United States, 124; Massachusetts was compelled to defend herself, 125; but one instance in which any want of promptitude in repelling the enemy has been found in the conduct of Massachusetts, 125; there was concert and arrangement between the officers of the General and State Governments in their exertions to defend the soil, 125; action of the Government of Massachusetts since the war in renouncing those erroneous doctrines, 126; the principles of this bill are most safe for the national treasury, 126; all the errors of Massachusetts have been portrayed in sombre colors, while her merits have been passed in silence, 126; Maine has been the firm and undeviating supporter of the country, 126. See Index, vol. 8.

MAXWELL, LEWIS, Representative from Virginia, 610.

MAYNARD, JOHN, Representative from New York, 609.

MCCOY, WILLIAM, on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 393; on Deaf and Dumb Asylums, 402; on the Tacubaya mission, 421; Representative from Virginia, 610; on Revolutionary Land Warrants, 622; on the case of Marigny D'Antevie, 627. See Index, vols. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

MCDUFFIE, GEORGE, on South American relations, 72; relative to an amendment to the constitution, 77, 81; on the Panama mission, 218; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 236; on the suffering Greeks, 244; on slavery in the District of Columbia, 415; on the British Colonial Trade, 422; Representative from South Carolina, 610; on the Bank of the United States, 612; on retrenchment, 626. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

MCHATTON, ROBERT, on decease of James Johnson, 242; on a Western armory, 250; Representative from Kentucky, 610.

MCLVAIN, JOSEPH, decease of, 205. See Index, vol. 1, 2.

MCINTIRE, RUFUS, Representative from Me., 609.

MCKEE, JOHN, Representative from Alabama, 610. See Index, vol. 8.

MCLEAN, SAMUEL, Representative from Penn. 609. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

McKINLEY, —, on the powers of the Vice President, 509; on internal improvement, 546; on the graduation of the price of public land, 548.

McLANE, LOUIS, reports an appropriation for the Panama mission, 43; on the Panama mission, 91; on the Creek Treaty, 242; on duties on wool and woolsens, 297; on the Colonization Society, 428; on Meade's claim, 429; Senator from Delaware, 467; on the powers of the Vice President, 507; on the claims of South Carolina, 540; on a grant of land to Kenyon College, 560; on the French Colonial trade, 565. See Index, vols. 4, 7, 8.

McLEAN, WILLIAM, on the emigration of Indians, 345; on the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians, 410; Representative from Ohio, 610; reports a bill relative to the removal of the Indians, 620. See Index, vol. 8.

Meade's Claim under the Florida Treaty.—In the House,

- a bill making provision for the payment of sundry claims, considered, 444; amendment moved, 444; object to create a tribunal for such claims as arose in consequence of the non-fulfilment of the treaty with Spain in 1619, 444; the House ought not, at the close of the session, to be called upon to legislate upon this class of claims, 445; this claim of a sacred character, 445; included in the provisions of the treaty of cession, 445; facts respecting the claim, 445; is this Government liable to make good claims on Spain, out of other funds than the five millions embraced in the treaty? 446; the equivalent for these claims has already been received, 446; course pursued by Meade on the conclusion of the treaty, 446; the objection of the Commissioners vested in points wholly distinct from the testimony, 446; it is a claim that had been presented prior to the date of the treaty, and allowed by the officers of the Spanish Government, 447; reasons why we are bound to pay this claim, 448; the circumstances of the case are most extraordinary, 448; facts, 448; if the Government owes this money, it ought to be paid, 449; reasons in favor of the amendment, 449; circumstances of the case, 449; the delay attending the claims of public creditors, 450; the claim is embraced in the treaty, 450; if the fund is distributed, to the exclusion of Mr. Meade, shall he lose his debt? 450; amendment appointing three auditors of the Treasury to examine the evidence, adopted, 450; the unfitness of Congress to become a judge in the case of private claims, 450; bill ordered to be engrossed, 451.
- Mediterranean Trade.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- Members of Congress, appointments of.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- Memorial of Vice President Calhoun*, 362.
- MERCER, CHARLES F.*, on the New Creek Treaty, 262; on land claims in Ohio, 374; on the Liberia agency, 441; Representative from Virginia, 610; relative to captured Africans, 643. See Index, vol. 8.
- MERRIN, ORANGE*, Representative from Connecticut, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- Message on the New Creek Treaty*, 226; at second session of 19th Congress, 266; with a letter from the Creek Indians, 299; at the first session of the 20th Congress, 467; relative to the Georgia boundary line, 678.
- METCALFE, THOMAS*, on decease of Robert P. Henry, 349; Representative from Kentucky, 610. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.
- Michigan, Canal in the territory of.*—Resolution relative to, considered, 625.
- Military Academy and Academies.*—See Index, vols. 2, 5, 7.
- Military Roads.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- Militia Courts Martial.*—In the House, an amendment to a resolution moved, 657; object of the resolution, why call for the copy of a paper which never did exist? 657; object of the call, 657; impossible to disguise the tendency of this movement, 658; latitude of remark it gives the Secretary, upon what may be found on record in the department, 658; implication of Madison, 658; nothing but the truth wanted, 659; object to obtain information respecting the detachment of militia, of which the six militiamen, executed at Mobile, were a part, 659; the House ought not to act in this matter at all, 659; manner of reasoning in the House, 660; a subject of such importance ought not to be smothered, or nipped in the bud, 661; the part of the resolution proposed to be stricken out, 662; the whole information and correspondence wanted, 662; shall this information be laid before the House, and the public be enabled to know the truth as it is? 663; the question whether the execution of the militiamen was legal or not, is one on which much anxiety prevails, 663; the resolutions, 663; adopted, 662.
- MILLER, DANIEL H.*, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- MILLER, WILLIAM H.*, on the Yazoo purchase, 279. See Index, vol. 8.
- MINER, CHARLES*, on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 354; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 357; on a canal in Illinois, 460; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 388; Representative from Pennsylvania, 609.
- Mint, Establishment of.*—See Index, vols. 1, 2.
- Miranda's Expedition.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- Mississippi River, free navigation of.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- Mississippi State.*—See Index, vol. 5. Territory.—See Index, vol. 4. Territories.
- Missouri.*—See Index, vols. 4, 5, 6, 7.
- MITCHELL, JAMES C.*, on an amendment to the constitution, 48; Representative from Tennessee, 610; on retrenchment, 680-695. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- MITCHELL, JOHN*, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- MITCHELL, THOMAS R.*, on an amendment to the constitution, 99; on duties on wool and woollens, 401; Representative from South Carolina, 610; on the coast transportation of slaves, 624; on the case of Marigny D'Auvergne, 628. See Index, vol. 8.
- Monroe Doctrine.*—United States and South America, relations between.—In the House, a resolution instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire and report on what authority our minister to Mexico stated that the United States have pledged themselves, &c., considered, 48; explanation of the resolution, 48; statement of the American minister at Mexico, 49; it is said this declaration is an assurance of the Cabinet here, 49; if so, it should be known, 49; the only known authority is the assertion of President Monroe, 49; the committee unable to give any information, 49; declarations made in obedience to instructions of the Government, 49; the authority is the President of the United States, 49; this would be the result of the inquiry, 49.
- The motion of an extraordinary character, 49; occasion of the remarks of the Minister, 49; is the object of the resolution to find out if such instructions had been given? 49; the object is to direct the attention of Congress and of the people to the question whether any such pledge had been authorized by our Government, 50; the avowal of the pledge to the Mexican Government is well calculated to alarm the fears and jealousy of the people, 50; under what circumstances was the pledge avowed, and what was the relative situation of the two countries? 50; if Mexico grants no privileges in consequence of this declaration should we not be bound in honor and good faith to carry it into effect? 50; this knowledge all-important, 50; the pledge can mean nothing more than the declaration of the Monroe doctrine, 50.
- Amendment offered, 62; accepted, 62; highly expedient that the facts of this case should be known, 62; nothing so very alarming unless it be considered as preparing the way for a future war, 62; it might be a serious question of inquiry how far we ought to take the ground intimated by Mr. Monroe, if all the European Governments should invade the South American States, 63; amendment offered to call upon the President for the information, 63; important to know whether the country does or does not stand pledged in this manner, 63; what information will a call on the President give? 63; object is to ask whether the Minister had authority for the language he used, 63; better to go to the pith of the thing, 64; amendment to the last amendment offered, 64; it defeats the end in view, 64; the reply of the Secretary of State to the Minister in Mexico may not answer our inquiry, 64; let both propositions stand, 65; Mr. Polk would not have used such language without the authority of the Government, 65; extract from a letter of Mr. Clay, 65; remarks upon it, 65; evident no such pledge has been given as many suppose, 66; circumstances at the time the declaration of Mr. Monroe was made, 66; what will the people of the United States say to the language of the allied sovereigns, 66; the President is the proper source for the information sought, 67.

Aspect of the question before the House, 67; import of the language used by Mr. Polinsett, 67; refers to the message of President Monroe, 67; object of the call, 67; the present motion regretted, as it may imply a censure on an officer of the Government abroad where no censure was intended, 68; substance of the declaration of Monroe, 68; the Executive must, on proper occasions, express the views and wishes of the Government, 68; the belief of authority on the part of our Minister to make that declaration rests upon the uniform policy of the Executive branch of this Government for several months past, 69; course of Mr. Polinsett, 69; letter of the Secretary Important, 69; evidence in the documents before us that our Minister was not mistaken in the policy of the Government, 69; letter of Mr. Salazar, 69; the great danger of the mission to Panama is that our Government will pursue this policy, 69; this country has had sufficient experience of the danger of entangling alliances, 70; too late to make objections to the declarations of Monroe, 70; time when the declaration was made, 70; no pledge to any Government or to any nation, 71; why is this said to be the policy of the last three months instead of the last three years? 71; Mr. Polinsett has given no such pledge as is stated, 71; what can the President do? 71; the inquiry should cover the whole ground, 73; amendment modified, 73; the declaration does not pledge us to anybody, but it was made under a sense of our rights and that others should remember them, 73; the pledge of Mr. Monroe should be recognized and adhered to, 73; the question is, whether the inquiry shall go to the Committee of the House or to the President, 73; where is the power on the part of the Executive to give any such pledge? 73; say to these Governments that beyond a declaration the Executive has no right to go, 73; it may be a very proper occasion for this House to express its views on the posture of the country in relation to both continents, 73; if any such pledge has been given by the present Executive, it is contrary to his very last act in relation to the South American Republics, 74; why go to the President? 74; the Secretary of State uses the same language, 74; how often have we been told that the mere report of a branch of the Executive Department bound this House? 74.

The real point of inquiry was by what authority our Minister had made this declaration, 75; the committee have no report to make, 75; the only constitutional way to give a pledge is by treaty, 76; we ask if a constitutional pledge has been given, and the only answer is, No! 76; the resolution as amended, 76; adopted, 76. See Panama Mission, and see Index, vol. 8.

MONROE, JAMES, accounts of.—In the House, the bill for the relief of James Monroe, considered, 250; objections to items of the bill, 250; interest struck out, 250; motion to strike out the sum appropriated, 250; services of Monroe, 250; state of the negotiation with France on his arrival there, 250; mode of application to the First Consul, 250; result of this application, 251; the acquisition of Louisiana, 251; motion to strike out lost, 251; amendment of the Senate disagreed to, 255. See Index, vol. 8.

MOORE, THOMAS V., an amendment to the constitution, 87; on the canal round Muscle Shoals, 438; Representative from Kentucky, 610. See Index, vol. 7.

MOORE, GABRIEL P., Representative from Alabama, 610. See Index, vol. 7.

Mother of Commodore Perry.—See Index, vol. 7.
Mounted Troops.—See Index, vol. 4.

N

National Observatory.—See Index, vol. 2, 5.

Naturalisation Laws.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 4.

Naval Establishment, gradual improvement of.—In the Senate, a bill to provide for the gradual increase of the Navy, considered, 324; policy of setting apart a fund for the improvement of the Navy has been established for eleven years, 324; the amount of appropriation has varied but the principle has been held sacred, 324; early views respecting the Navy, 324; opinions at the commencement of the late war, 325; shown that a navy was the cheapest and safest defence of the country, 325; subject of Dry Docks, 326; expense of construction, 326; the contemplated improvements at Navy Yards, 326.

Naval Academy.—Advantages of education, 327; some doubt if naval men require these advantages, 327; effect of elevating the characters and improving the minds of officers, 327; examples of Perry, Decatur, and the crew of the Adonia, 327; object of the Naval Academy, 328; plan of instruction, 328; details of the appropriation, 328; is it expedient for the United States to establish a Naval Academy? 329; it may be said that the Navy is a naval school, 329; the day is coming when the United States will be obliged to dispute for the supremacy of the ocean, 330; resemblance of the bill to the Alkoran, 330; this is not sufficiently understood, 330; source of injury in heaving vessels down, 331; able and careful manner in which the bill has been drawn, 331; reasons for passing the bill as it is, 331; an academy as much required to be attached to the Navy as to the Army, 331; our statesmen have come back to the naval policy of John Adams, 332; the portion relating to an academy should be struck out, 332; not a new proposition, 332; probable cost of the establishment, 332; not supposed the school would be expensive, 333.

Moved to strike out the sections relating to a naval academy, 333; most insuperable objections to this project, founded not only on theoretical speculations, but upon practical experience, 333; views relative to the Military Academy at West Point, 333; to what but experience and facts can the question be referred? 334; names of distinguished men not learned in a military academy, 334; who goes to this institution? 334; who from them goes into the army? 334; why carry military education beyond the necessity for its application, unless it was intended to make our citizens all soldiers? 335; England has never established a naval academy, 335; where were our eminent officers educated? 335; the establishment would be filled by sons of rich men, 336; no man could be made a good seaman at an academy, 336; the endeavor to establish a naval academy likely to jeopardize the safety of the essential principles upon which the Navy is founded, 337; it is asked if the events of the late war do not show a military academy to be useless, 337; it is said that the sons of rich men alone went to the military academy, 337; error in remarks relative to certain naval officers, 338; does it follow that education is of no utility because some men have raised themselves by the force of natural genius, 338; the bill prescribes who shall go to the naval school, 339; if the institution is governed like that at West Point it will be no place of amusement, 339; answer to replies to objections, 340; is this academy wanted at this time? 341; have our naval officers ever shown a want of science in the knowledge of their profession? 341; anecdote of Mrs. Tryon, 341; example of England, 341; further debate, 342; it was a deficiency of officers that suggested the idea of a Naval Academy, 452.

In the House, motion to strike out the naval fund, carried, 455; bill passed, 461. See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.

Naval Exploits.—See Index, vol. 7.

Naval Pension Fund.—See Index, vol. 7.

Naval School.—See Naval Establishment, and Index, vol. 8.

Navigation Laws.—See Index, vol. 4.

Navy Yard at Philadelphia, debate relative to, 369.

Negroes Free, exportation of to Liberia, resolution considered, 370.

Negroes Free in the District of Columbia.—In the House, a resolution of inquiry relative to the imprisonment and sale of free persons of color, considered, 353; the case of Gilbert Horton, 352; an old law of Maryland, 352; unconstitutional, 352; its continuance in this District impolitic, 352; it is unjust, 353; why urge an inquiry on a subject of this peculiar character, which would lead only to irritating, painful, and useless discussion? 352; an extraordinary doctrine that the Governor of one State may rightfully be called on to protect citizens of that State when in other States, 353; no sort of necessity for reference to a committee, 354; motion to lay on the table lost, 354; the law probably in force in the District, 354; amendment moved, 355; law for the sale of runaways for prison fees, 355; its history, 355; course proposed by the resolution is usual and proper, 355; the resolution merely one of inquiry, 355; no opposition to the resolution, 356; objection to the resolution, 356; the proposed inquiry ought to be instituted on principles of the most obvious justice, 356; we have the same control here that the States have within their jurisdiction, 357; the Federal prisons and their keepers are extensively used for carrying on the domestic slave trade, 357; resolution of Mr. Randolph in 1816, 357; such statements may lead to erroneous impressions elsewhere, 358; the form of the resolution and the accompanying remarks calculated to produce excitement, 358; if such a law is in operation, every one would agree that it ought to be repealed, 359; resolution carried, 359; report of committee, with a bill, 375.

Negroes, kidnapping of.—See Index, vol. 2.

Neutral Relations.—See Index, vols. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.

New Mexico and Missouri, inland trade between.—See Index, vol. 8.

New Orleans, defence of.—See Index, vol. 5.

NEWTON, THOMAS, Representative from Virginia, 698; administers the oath to the Speaker, 610. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

Niagara Sufferers.—See Index, vols. 5-8.

NOBLE, JAMES, on the road in Michigan, 283; on the gradual improvement of the Navy, 332; Senator from Indiana, 467; on school lands in Indiana, 476; on the decease of Major General Brown, 528; on the appropriation for the visitors at West Point, 538; on internal improvement, 547; on the bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, 555. See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7, 8.

Non-Exportation in foreign bottoms.—See Index, vol. 4.

Non-Importation.—See Index, vols. 3, 4.

Non-Intercourse.—See Intercourse.

Non-Residents' Land in Arkansas.—In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 254; this law will derange the whole revenue system of Arkansas, 254; and consume the whole tax on non-residents' lands, 254; the law of Arkansas, 254; features of this bill, 254; other objections, 255; postponement moved and lost, 255; bill ordered to a third reading, 255.

Northern Boundary under the Treaty of Ghent.—See Index, vol. 8.

North-West Coast, exploration of.—See Index, vols. 7, 8.

NUCKOLIA, WILLIAM T., Representative from South Carolina, 610.

O

OAKLEY, THOMAS J., Representative from New York, 609.

Oaths.—See Index, vol. 1.

O'BRIEN, JEREMIAH, Representative from Maine, 609.

Office, a certain, inquiry respecting.—See Index, vol. 5.

Occupying Claimant Laws.—See Index, vol. 8.

Officers of the Customs.—See Index, vol. 7.

Officers of the Revolution, debate on relief to, 367.

Officers, removal of.—See Index, vol. 1.

Officers, plurality of.—See Index, vol. 3.

Ohio State Government.—See Index, vol. 2.

Ordinance of 1787.—See Index, vols. 3, 4, and Index, vol. 6, Missouri.

Orleans Territory.—See Index, vol. 4, Territories.

ORR, ROBERT, JR., Representative from Pennsylvania, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

OWEN, GEORGE W., on the emigration of Indians, 345; on Deaf and Dumb Asylums, 408; on the Colonization Society, 437; Representative from Alabama, 610; on the case of Marigny D'Anterive, 623. See Index, vol. 8.

P

Paintings of the principal events of the Revolution.—See Index, vol. 5.

Paintings, Historical.—In the House, a resolution relative to a historical painting of the Battle of New Orleans, considered, 636; the policy of embellishing the national building, 637; the Battle of New Orleans forms a beautiful chef-d'œuvre in the science of war, 637; Mr. Alston designated, 637; no reason why Trumbull should be excluded, 638; amendment made, 638; a representation of the Hartford Convention in full session should be placed by the side of this painting, 638; remarks relative to the artist, 638; our naval victories entitled to some notice, 639; amendment moved, 639; other victories and exploits should also be commemorated, 639; motion to embrace naval victories lost, 640; other amendments lost, 640; resolution lost, 640.

Panama Mission.—In the House, a bill reported making an appropriation to carry into effect the mission to Panama, 48; report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, 48; resolution that it is inexpedient to appropriate the funds necessary, 48.

Resolution that it is inexpedient to appropriate, considered, 90; amendments proposed, 90; debate, 91; the measure to which the resolution relates is wholly novel and unprecedented, 91; a subject on which the House cannot be left too free in its deliberations, 92; the time has arrived in which this House is called upon to express an opinion upon some of the topics connected with this mission, 92; it will not do to treat this message as designed to throw the moral weight of the opinion of this nation into the cause of these governments, 92; the resistance implied in that threat is now to be a matter of formal and public discussion, 93; the Congress at Panama, 93; the settled policy of this country has been not only pacific and neutral, but to avoid, as far as possible, all participation in the concerns of other powers, all political connections and entangling alliances, 93.

The effect of this amendment is to give instructions by this House to a foreign minister, 94; the House is not called on to act beyond making the appropriation, 94; if the House was of opinion that a wrong course had been given to our foreign relations it ought to say so, 94; this resolution is taking the proper responsibility from the Executive, 95; when a diplomatic mission has been recommended by the President, and has received the sanction of the Senate, it ought to be an extreme case that would warrant or justify the House, in refusing means to carry the mission into effect, 95; if the United States acted on selfish and interested motives exclusively, our policy would have been to perpetuate the moral and political degradation of Spanish America, 95; we stood foremost in recognizing them, 95; are we prepared to admit that this act was the result of transient feeling? 95; it may be said topics are to be discussed at Panama which may compromise the high interests of this nation, 96; is not this mission demanded by high and important considerations bearing directly on the special interests of the nation? 96; there can be but one sentiment on this subject in this Union, 96; is not the mission absolutely demanded by a due regard to our safety and interests? 96; deficiency of the message on this topic, 97; the committee is called upon to give an expression of its opinion as to the expediency of this mission, 98; duty of this House upon all fit occasions to pronounce the judgment of the people upon measures perfected or contemplated, touching the foreign relations of the United States, 98; the adoption of the amendment would go to change the whole course of our diplomacy, and particularly the policy of the United States with regard to Cuba; not a member on this floor is bold enough to wish these subjects to be discussed, considered, and the alliance formed, 98; it is said that it is unconstitutional for this House to interfere in this form, with the executive powers of the government, 99; to the final and permanent success of the revolution in the Spanish Colonies, this Congress of belligerent nations was necessary, 99; whatever may be our notions of this memorable pledge, the Spanish American States understand and believe us committed on the subject, leave the government of the United States free to act, 99; suppose the casus fœderis had occurred, would gentlemen now declare war in defence of South American liberty? 100; the political condition of Hayti is to form the subject of discussion, and is to be settled, 100; objects of this Congress given officially by the government of Colombia, 100; the principle of colonization, 100; what is the resolution now before us but instructions or semi-instructions for our ministers that are to go to the Congress at Panama? 101; if the House have the right to instruct, they have the right to impeach for disobedience of instructions, 101; the House has not any participation in the treaty-making power, 101; construction given to the constitution, 101; this resolution ought not to be coupled with constitutions which we have no conditions to impose, 102; it is said to be important that we should be represented at Panama as regards our political and commercial interests, 102; the plenipotentiaries can enter into no negotiation on behalf of their different governments as regards their relations with foreign powers, 103; article of the treaty between Colombia and Chili, 103; what objects are to be attained by sending ministers to Panama? 103; in what capacity and with what powers are they to attend? 103; where are we to look for the powers they are to possess? 103; the treaties are their charter, 104; it is said we are to send our Ministers to advise and consult, 104.

Amendment offered, 104; the condition of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico to be discussed, is a most important subject to us, 105; suppose the independence of Cuba to be effected without an attempt of a part of its population to attain the ascendancy, would not that part of its population be declared free, as in the South American republics? 105; not a voice from the South ought to be raised against this mission, 105; views in the Message relative to Cuba, 105; the real motives which govern in this case, 106; the measure proposed is an acknowledged departure from the uniform and settled policy pursued by this Government in times past, 106; it becomes us to weigh this measure well before we give it the irrevocable sanction of our votes, 106; in deciding the question before us, we must look exclusively to the intrinsic merits of the measure itself, or, in other words, to the character of the objects to be accomplished, 107; if Ministers are sent to the Congress at Panama, our Government is committed to take part in its deliberations relative to objects kept in the background, 107; the terms of the invitation sent to us, and the terms of its acceptance, 108; these subjects, however they may have been kept out of sight recently, are the principal if not the only subjects in which our participation was desired by the States who invited our attendance at Panama, 108; the result of our participation in these subjects at the Congress will be the adoption of measures endangering the future peace of the country, 109; the principle of resistance by force is already agreed upon, 109; in our diplomatic intercourse with the Spanish American States the Secretary of State has treated and held out to them certain vague and oracular expressions in a message of the late President, as a pledge on the part of the United States, not to permit any interference of the European powers in the war between them and the mother country, 109; statement of our Minister to Mexico to that Government, 109; what will probably be the nature and effect of these stipulations with regard to the United States, 110; what are the views of our own Government? 110; what the President suggests, in reference to the subject of interference from abroad with the affairs of Spanish America, 110; it may be said there is no reason to apprehend the interference which it is proposed to denounce to the world, 111; it may be said the President does not express a positive opinion that these measures ought or will be adopted by the Congress at Panama, 111; a quietus is found for all our apprehensions, in the assurances of the President that "no alliances will be contracted," and in general "nothing will be done incompatible with our neutrality," 111; turn to the advice of Washington, 111; one would think that language so plain, so clear, so unequivocal, could not, by any ingenuity of construction, be tortured into a recommendation or approval of "political connections with foreign nations;" the very thing against which it warned us, 112; another argument urged in favor of this political connection with Spanish America is, that we owe it to the cause of liberty, 112; that by doing so we will secure their good will, which is highly important to us, both in a commercial and political view, 112; the result of our past efforts to conciliate the good will and affection of these new States affords but little ground to hope for success in the experiment now proposed, 114; can the elements of discrepancy be mitigated or harmonized by any system of political connection? 114.

The amendments are nothing more nor less than restrictions attempted to be imposed upon the constitutional power of the President, 115; it is unwise that we should, by an interference in the form of advice, diminish that responsibility which the constitution has placed on the Executive, and on the Senate, his advisers, 115; if it be proper for us to express our opinions on the details of this mission, have we not a right to demand all the information upon which the President himself has acted, 115; consider the nature of the invitation we have received from the republics of South America to be represented in this Congress, 116; the risk of being drawn into entangling alliances, 116; however unlimited the powers of the Ministers who compose this Congress, they have no terrors for us, 116; it has been insisted that if we send Ministers we are committed to take part in the deliberations of the Congress concerning an alliance, 117; proof that those Governments have no right to hope for an offensive and defensive alliance, 117; those Republics will have no cause of complaint against us, 117; the objection to such a course of agreement is that it would be departing from the policy which Washington recommended, and to which we have strictly adhered from the very commencement of the Government, 117; is there one who would have said less than Mr. Monroe in 1823, or who would now say less? 118; the condition of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, 118.

Narrative of the circumstances incident to this measure from the moment the invitation was tendered to this Government to send Ministers to Panama down to the period when the President thought fit to transmit his message to this House, 128; the President attempts to prove that our uniting in the deliberations of this Congress does not import an alliance with the powers there to be assembled, 129; it now appears that we are to go to Panama for the purpose of making a declaration that "in application to our own territory, we will permit no colonization on the part of any foreign power," 130; remarks of the President relative to the slave trade, 130; to Hayti, 131; probability that by our counsels peace and tranquillity may be secured in Cuba and Porto Rico, 132; this Administration has abandoned all right and pretext for interference, 133; the danger is not sufficient to authorize our going to war to prevent any European nation but Spain holding Cuba, 133; we had better stay away, and act independently of the Congress of Panama, 134; has the President been mindful of the advice of Washington? 134; this advice and the declaration of Monroe, 135; this whole scheme of quitting our own to stand on foreign ground is opposed to the settled policy of the country, 135.

This House is morally bound to vote the salaries of Ministers who have been constitutionally created by the President and Senate, unless in extreme cases, 137; the constitutional obligation to provide for a Minister is equally strong as that to carry into effect a treaty, 137; a historical view of our relations with the Southern Republics, 138; the documents show sufficient reasons for the adoption of the amendments, 139; the President has thought it better this country should incur the danger of becoming eventually a party to this alliance than stand alone, 140; he deems it within the constitutional competence of the Executive to send Ministers to Panama, 140; he put the seal of confidence upon the proceedings of the Senate, 141; he states one object of accepting the invitation was to induce the Southern nations to change their religion and introduce toleration, 141; it is said that these amendments imply a want of confidence in the Executive, 141; the vast importance of Cuba to the United States may not be generally known, 141; it is still more important in a political than a commercial view, 142; the spectacle that Cuba would present if Colombia and Mexico should attempt to revolutionize it, 142; the question of slavery, 143; it is said the objects of this Congress are imperfectly known, and its powers indistinctly defined, 143; no greater danger of an alliance being formed through the medium of this mission than through the medium of our Ministers in South America, 143; the Monroe doctrine, 144; the fate of the island of Cuba as connected with this question, 144; its ultimate destiny is of vast importance to us, 145; who first connected Cuba with this mission? 145.

The first question is the constitutional power of this House to grant or refuse the appropriation, 146; the present case is not one of a demand on us for the execution of a treaty, nor is it precisely that of an ordinary appropriation for the payment of the salaries of pre-existent officers, 147; it will cause the cultivation of a spirit of amity and good feeling between us and neighbors with whom we must necessarily be on good or bad terms, 147; he who does not feel with patriotic exultation the proud, the dignified place that we shall occupy on this occasion, can never be convinced by argument, 147; who are they who have given us this invitation? 147; the advantage to the world from the discussion of liberal principles of international law, 148; the object of general nature to be discussed at this meeting is the protection of private property on the ocean, 148; the discussions on the declarations of Mr. Monroe, 148; the acknowledgment of France and Great Britain respecting our declarations, 149; the subject of the most vital importance of all is the condition of Cuba.

The main question presented for the deliberation of the committee is, shall we make the appropriation to defray the expense of a mission to Panama? 150; the amendments proposed are hostile to the spirit of the constitution, and at variance with the uniform usage of the House, 150; some embarrassment has been felt from the manner in which the subject has been presented to us, 150; the report and resolution of the committee, 150; the money shall be appropriated provided it is expedient, and it is expedient provided the amendments are adopted, 151; character of the mission, 151; its objects, 152; some object on account of the novelty of the mission, 152; others complain that it is a departure from former usage, 152; the message and documents, 153; the subjects of discussion, 153; what is their plain meaning? 154; the resisting of interference from abroad, 154; the principle of colonization, 154; other subjects of discussion, 155; in adopting a system of southern politics we should observe the most profound caution, 155; the warnings of Washington, 156; are the people of this country willing to enter into alliances with the republics of South America on those two points, 156; what ground is there for these fears of entangling alliances? 157; why should they desire an alliance offensive and defensive with us? 157; they need no alliance with us, 157; it is alleged that one language has been held on the other side of the water, and another on this side, in regard to Cuba, 158; the views presented to Russia, 158; points upon which negotiations for peace have been conducted, 158; it is our interest that Cuba should remain as it is, 159.

Only two questions for our decision; first, whether this House will assume the responsibility of withholding the ordinary appropriation for carrying into effect an executive measure which the Executive Department has constitutionally instituted; second, whether, if it will not withhold the appropriation, it will yet take the responsibility of interposing with its own opinions, directions, or instructions, as to the manner in which this particular executive measure shall be conducted, 159; by voting the salaries in the ordinary way we assume no responsibility whatever, 160; if we withhold the ordinary means do we not incur a heavy responsibility? 160; it is useless labor to discuss the kind of power which the House holds in these cases, 160; it is our fortune to be called upon to act our part at a most interesting era in human affairs, 160; this is a mighty revolution, 160; in many respects the European and American nations are alike, 161; it is said, that the topic of South American independence is worn out and threadbare, 161; a lingering and hopeless war is kept up against these States by Spain, 161; it is asked, if it is not a breach of neutrality for us to send Ministers to a Congress composed wholly of belligerents, 162; the Representatives of the South American States, as between themselves, will possess diplomatic powers, 162; the declaration of the President in 1823, 162; the important political events that led to that declaration, or accompanied it, 162; it has been said to have been a loose and vague declaration, 163; the sentiment which it inspired was not confined to ourselves, 163; it must be considered as founded on our rights, and to spring mainly from a regard to their preservation, 164; that message formed a bright page in our history, 164; how does it happen that there should now be such a new fear on the subject of this declaration? 164; remarks on the subject of Cuba, 164; it is said, that if Spain should make a voluntary transfer of this island to another power, we should have no right to interfere, 164; the ground of exception is self-preservation, 165; the President is charged with inconsistency, and in order to make this out public despatches are read, which militate, it is said, with each other, 165; what are the facts? 165; pains have been taken to prove that the measure now in consideration, and indeed, the whole policy of the Government respecting South America, is the unhappy result of the influence of a gentleman formerly filling the chair of this House, 166; we are told that the country is deluded and deceived by cabalistic words, 166; these States are called to meet difficulties such as neither we nor our fathers encountered, 167; a day of solemn retribution now visits the once proud monarchy of Spain, 167.

To the Executive has the constitution confided the sole and exclusive superintendence of our foreign relations, 167; great diversity of opinion as to the objects of this Congress, 167; it is said, the mere act of sending representatives cannot commit the neutrality of the country, 168; Congresses of independent powers, meeting in times of profound peace to concert political measures, have lately come into fashion, 169; are we to follow the example of the powers of Europe? 169; we have Ministers already residing at most of the Courts whose Governments are to be represented at Panama, 169; the charge extended to those who have sufficient independence to think for themselves, of being a factious opposition, 170; the wise and prudent caution which was to have been looked for from Mr. Adams, 171; the subject is surrounded by illusions which render it difficult to decide correctly, 172; a more dangerous illusion, as it is flattering to our self-love, is that of supposing that all the movements of our Government in favor of the South Americans have been prudently regulated with a view to promote the establishment of free Governments and liberal institutions, 172; the first resolution on the subject of Spanish America, was proposed, while all Spanish America, except Buenos Ayres, yet owned at least nominal obedience to Spain, 173; circumstances under which the second resolution was proposed, 173; course of our Government during the contest with Spain, 174; in the recognition of Spanish America we did not move in obedience to the love of liberty, or with a view to promote the extension of Representative Governments, 174; let us see what the President proposes on the other great subject with which the principle is remotely connected, the great subject of European interference with the domestic concerns of American Governments, 174; it is alleged that our Minister's language in Mexico was used without instructions, 175; it is asserted that his language referred alone to a pledge to ourselves and to posterity, 175; if we have given any pledge it has been given to power or powers who have a right to hold it until redeemed by ourselves, 175; what was originally the Message of Mr. Monroe? 176; what has it become under the hands of this Administration? 177; an acknowledgment of the right of the allied sovereigns to do all that has been done by them in Europe, and the assertion of the right of any American alliance to do what it pleases on this continent, 177; we must not forget that the language of the President does not exclude the idea of forming a treaty on this, as well as on the other basis of the American system—colonization, 177; on this subject of the form of the Governments on this side of the Atlantic no error more fatal to the future prosperity of this people could be committed than that of believing that our interests require us to act on different principles than those which have usually regulated our Government, 178; the destiny of Cuba and Porto Rico is also to be fixed at the Isthmus, 179; what shall we do? 180; give these States to understand that we will not suffer the scenes of St. Domingo to be enacted in Cuba, 180; assertions of the President, 181; the Executive must look at this Assembly as the organ of a great confederation, 181; if successful in acquiring a complete ascendancy, of wielding at will the whole moral and physical power of the North and South Americans, what advantage have we to gain by it? 182; how far may this House constitutionally interfere in the foreign diplomatic affairs of the country? 182; from what fountain of the constitution do gentlemen propose to draw this power of instruction and confer it on this House? 182; the amendment contains instructions to the President in what manner he shall conduct the negotiations at Panama, 183; the right to command and the obligation to obey are correlative, 183; if the House has the authority to prescribe to the President instructions he is to give to foreign Ministers, it must have some power to enforce obedience to its mandates on this head, 183; the propositions now under consideration descend to particulars and are connected with this mission and make part of it, 184; it is said the President has asked the House for its opinion as to the policy of this measure, 184; he has no power by the constitution to require or demand of this House, its opinions on any of its measures before they are carried into effect, 184; features of the amendment, 185; have we been always so punctilious in relation to our neutrality? 185; it is said forms are nothing, it is the substance we are to regard, 185; the constitutional forms of this Government are every thing, 185; what necessity is there for adopting the amendment? 186; something has been said on the subject of Executive confidence, 186; the powers of the Congress of Panama, 187; our commercial connection with the South American States, 187; by the emancipation of the South American States, and the consequent demolition of the Spanish colonial system, we have a ready and convenient market opened for all our manufactures and the products of our agriculture, 187; what was the condition of the world when the declaration of Monroe was made? 188; the call of this House for the treaty of 1796, 189; this nation calls loudly for a speedy appropriation, 190; generations to come will approve our acts, 190.

It is said, that by adopting this amendment we assume an unconstitutional exercise of power, inasmuch as the treaty-making power is vested in another body, and hence we have no right to instruct the President, 190; few occasions will be likely to arise, wherein it would be expedient or necessary for this House to declare its opinion on such subjects, 191; the law of the third of March, 1815, 191; our object is to declare our opinion on a great measure of national policy, not in the form of official instructions, but with a view to making known that opinion as well to the other branches of the Government as to the world, 192; is this House without "power to compel the President"? 192; a case supposed, 192; whenever the constitution has given us the power, without qualification to do any act, we must be vested with a discretionary power to determine upon its expediency, 198; it will not be pretended that every nation that has established free institutions will always act with justice in its disputes, 194; if the majority of this House should negative this resolution, would not the nation think this House was in favor of compromising the future neutrality of the country? 194; why is it proposed to stipulate with the South American Governments that we will not permit colonization on our territory? 195; the President sends a proposition inviting our free determination upon it, and we are told by his confidential friends that we must not look into the details, 195; is this free determination? 195; principles are every thing in politics, 196; can any one doubt that a political connection is contemplated with the confederated Governments of South America different from the connection we have with any other Government? 196; what can be said in defence of the pledge at Panama? 197; do gentlemen perceive what nets are spread for us? 197; we have been forbidden to look into the documents on our table for evidence of the facts in relation to this subject, 198; extract from an official newspaper, 198; comments at Washington, 199; source of the article, 199; terms of the correspondence relating to this Congress, 200; the President thinks he has rendered the measure harmless, and promises not to "commit our neutrality," 200; the material question to be decided is whether we will approve of the purposes avowedly intended to be effected at Panama at the hazard of an entanglement of which no one can see the end, 201; the doctrines assented to defeat this amendment are the same identical doctrines which prevailed in and were the cause of the reign of terror, 201; is it not true that some gentlemen are looking for a revival of the principles which predominated in that day? 201; an incident never to be forgotten, 203.

What does the President allege as the primary inducement to the deputation of the mission? 203; the slave trade and the island of Hayti, 204; Cuba and Porto Rico, 204; our policy should vary according to circumstances, 204; the transfer of the islands, 204; we stand uncommitted on all sides, 204; this mission will be worse than useless, 205; we have a Congress of our own, let us attend to that, and we shall have enough to do, 206; a decent excuse against the acceptance of this invitation would have satisfied those powers who made it, 206; objections to the mission, 206; ostensible object of the Holy Alliance, 207; this declaration ought not to have been viewed as a pledge, 207; the Mexican Government cannot view it in that light after the explanation, 208; for what do we come to this place? 209; object of the declaration of Monroe, 209; will this House assume to give instructions to our foreign Ministers? 210; will any one pretend to the right of annexing conditions to appropriations for the support of Ministers? 210; what should be our course were France or any other great nation of Europe to attempt to subjugate and plant its power either in Mexico, Cuba or Porto Rico? 211; circumstances under which they would be placed, 211; would not such an attempt justify us in taking decided measures to prevent it? 212; the declaration which it is proposed to consider, 212; it is our interest that the island of Cuba should be owned by a weak nation or remain a colony, 213; the Holy Alliance, 213; the circumstances attending our invitation to send Ministers to Panama disclose on our part a want of delicacy, 213; the destiny of Cuba, 214; the pledge of Monroe, 214, 215; you commit an act of war against Spain the moment your Ministers join in the discussions of that Congress, 216; in what attitude does this Panama mission place us? 216; this measure ought to be avoided if possible, 216; Great Britain will be compelled to wage a war against us, 217; resolution of the committee lost, 217; bill passed, 218.

In the Senate, nomination of Poinsett in place of Anderson, deceased, 222; resolution that it is inexpedient to appoint, lost, 222; appointment confirmed, 223. See Index, vol. 8.

PARRIS, ALBION K., Senator from Maine, 467; on the surviving officers of the Revolution, 478-489; on a grant of land to Kenyon College, 558; on the duty on molasses, 590; on the duty on cordage, 599.

Pay of Ministers.—See Index, vol. 5, 6.

Payment of Interest to States.—In the Senate, bill for the payment of interest on money expended in the late war by the States, considered, 570; moved to make the payments heretofore made applicable in the first instance to extinguish the interest, 571; history of the claims preferred by the States, 571; motion carried, 571; motion to fix the rate of interest, 571; carried, 571; principle upon which the Government has hitherto refused to pay interest on advances, 571; time when interest should commence, 572; the uniform custom of the Government, 572; error, 572; cause of the delay in settling the accounts, 572; other causes, 573; bill ordered to be engrossed, 573.

PEARCE, DUTCH J., on an amendment to the constitution, 19; on retrenchment, 701. See Index, vol. 8.

Penal Code of the United States.—See Index, vol. 8.

Penitentiary in the District, bill relative to, 90. See Index, vol. 8.

Pennsylvania Insurgents.—See Index, vol. 1.

Pension Bill, Revolutionary.—See Index, vol. 7.

Pensions to wounded Officers of the War of 1812.—See Index, vol. 6.

Perry, Commodore.—In the House, a resolution relative to the removal of the remains of, considered, 253; letter from the widow, 253; within the competency of the Secretary of the Navy to order a vessel to touch at Trinidad, 253; object not to have the removal done in secrecy, 253; that the grave of Perry may become one of the shrines of the country, 254; resolution agreed to, 254.

PETER, GEORGE, on removal of the remains of Commodore Perry, 253. See Index, vol. 8.

Petitions, reception of.—See Index, vol. 2, and Index, vols. 1 and 6. Slavery.

PHILPS, ELSHA, Representative from Connecticut, 609. See Index, vol. 7, 8.

Philadelphia Frigate, capture of.—In the Senate, a bill for the relief of Susan Decatur and others, considered, 499; a statement of the facts and of the grounds upon which the committee proceeded, 499; extract of a letter from Commodore Stewart, 499; do. of Capt. Spence, 500; do. of Commodore Chauncy, 500; do. of Capt. Corane and Ridgeley, 500; Decatur originated the daring scheme, 500; further facts, 501; consequences of this victory, 501; statement of Doctor Ridgeley, 501; statement of the American Consul at Tunis, 502; is any pecuniary reward now due to the captors of the Philadelphia? 502; the amount which ought to be granted, 503; motion to fill the blank, carried, 504; bill passed, 504.

PIERSON, ISAAC, Representative from New Jersey, 609.

Piracy in the West Indies.—See Index, vol. 7, 8.

PLANT, DAVID, Representative from Connecticut, 609.

Polar Expedition, memorial relative to, 373; debate relative to, in the House, 412.

POLK, JAMES K., on the amendment to the constitution, 8; relative to the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians, 407; Representative from Tennessee, 610; on militia courts martial, 659. See Index, vol. 8.

Portugal, commerce with.—See Index, vol. 7.

Postage of Newspapers.—See Index, vol. 8.

Postmaster General, salary of.—In the Senate, a bill to increase, considered, 284; duties and responsibilities of the Postmaster equally responsible with those of the Head of any other Department, 284; this officer, in the arrangement of salaries, has been left behind his class, 284; this bill is an innovation, 284; exceptionable in the mode of bringing forward, 284; it places his salary above that of the Vice President and Chief Justice, 285; bill passed, 285; Proceedings in the House, 461. See Index, vol. 8.

Post-Office.—See Index, vol. 1.

Post-Office Patronage.—See Index, vol. 5.

Potomac River Bridge.—See Index, vol. 8.

POWELL, ALFRED H., on South American relations, 63, 64, 72; on the Panama Mission, 95; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 856; on the appointment of Charges, 873; reports on free blacks in the District of Columbia, 875; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 888; on Slavery in the District of Columbia, 415. See Index, vol. 8.

Pre-emption, the Right of.—See Index, vol. 7.

Present to Ministers.—See Index, vol. 2.

Presidency, vacancy in.—See Index, vol. 1.

Presidential Election in the House.—See Index, vol. 8.

Previous Question.—See Index, vol. 1, 4, 5.

Private Losses in service.—See Index, vol. 5.

Privateers.—See Index, vol. 4, 5.

Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen.—See Index, vol. 7.

Protective Duties.—See Index, vol. 1, and Index, vol. 5, 6. Duties on Imports.

Public Buildings.—See Index, vol. 5, 7.

Public Defaulters.—See Index, vol. 7.

Public Documents, suppression of.—See Index, vol. 7.

Public Debt.—In the Senate, a resolution relative to, considered, 529; question of error in the construction of the Sinking Fund, 529; note, 530; nature and amount of unexpended balances, 530; the proposal to repeal the reservation of two millions, 531; the authority given to the Commissioners by the 5th section of the Sinking Fund, 531; shall this accumulation of money go to the bank for nothing, or be lavished upon unknown and unknowable objects, or be applied to the reduction of the public debt? 531; who object to conferring authority upon the Commissioners? 532; on the probable time in which the debt will be paid, 533.

No error in the act of March 8, 1517, either in principle or construction, 534; reason why two millions was directed to be reserved, 534; further debate, 535; are these objects of more pressing importance than the payment of this additional two millions to the public debt? 536; balance in the bank, 536; further remarks, 537; resolution agreed to, 537.

Public Land, Graduation in the price of.—In the Senate, the bill relative to, considered, 548; interest felt by the people of Alabama, in the bill, 548; rights acquired by the United States, by conquest, 548; the conveyance of Virginia, 548; all the States entitled to their waste land at the close of the war, 549; a new era occurred before any new States were admitted, 549; could any States, by compact, confer their sovereignty upon the United States, 550; the principles of the law of nations, 551; attempt on the part of the Executive, through the Secretary, to prevent emigration to the new States, 551; it is said the graduating principle of the bill will produce a rapid depreciation in the price of the public land, 552; the friends of the present land system are the last that ought to say any thing about speculation, 552; it is said to be dangerous and immoral, to encourage a system of speculation among our citizens, 553.

A measure calculated to give every man a home, should find an advocate in every patriot and philanthropist, 557; eight States and Territories have memorialized

Congress on this subject, 557; different systems adopted by Congress for the disposal of its domain, 558; degree of graduation proposed, 558; amount of land offered for sale, 558; the population willing to cultivate these lands, 558; the most inflexible virtue found among the most penurious of our citizens, 559; the population west of the Alleghanies, 559; objected that the measure will induce emigration from the older States, 559; it is said a reduction of price will encourage speculation, 570; effect upon the finances of the country, 570; the provision it proposes to make in favor of the actual settler, 570.

Objects of the bill, 575; amount of land held by the Government, 575; nature of the provisions of the bill, 575; their practical effect, 576; objections to the bill, 576; the price of all the land held by individuals, will be sunk to the scale of prices fixed in the bill, 577; no one will buy until the lands fall to the lowest price, 577; apprehension of speculators, 578; the Federal Government will not get the value of its lands, 578; the donation clause, 578; extract from the British Quarterly Review, 579; its libellous character, 579; the cession clause, 580; further debate, 581; bill rejected, 582; motion to reconsider laid on the table, 582. See Index, vol. 8.

Public Land.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7.

Q

Quakers, memorial of.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 8.

Quartermaster's Department.—See Index, vol. 4.

R

RAMSAY, WILLIAM, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609.

RANDOLPH, JOHN, on the salary of the Postmaster-General, 284; Representative from Virginia, 609; on the case of Margery D'Auterive, 688-692; relative to captured Africans, 645; on the amendment of the rules, 654; on militia courts martial, 659; on retrenchment, 675-688-715. See Index, vol. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

RANKIN, CHRISTOPHER, decease of, 34. See Index, vol. 6, 7.

Ransom, prohibition of.—See Index, vol. 5.

Real Estate and Slaves, valuation of.—See Index, vol. 5.

REED, JOHN, on South American relations, 73; on the Panama Mission, 150; Representative from Massachusetts, 609. See Index, vol. 5, 7, 8.

Reporters to the Senate, ordered, 475.

Representation, ratio of.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 4.

Representatives, qualification of.—See Index, vol. 6.

Resignation, does it cause a vacancy?—See Index, vol. 1.

Resolution relative to the decease of Christopher Rankin, 34; relative to a western armory, 47; relative to relations of the United States with South American States, 48-59; calling for information relative to South American relations, 76; relative to a national Southern road, 77; relative to cargoes of slave vessels, 91; relative to amendment of the constitution, 91; on the appropriation for the Panama Mission, 90, 91; relative to the non-allentation of Cuba, 113; relative to the remains of Com. Perry, 258; on decease of Nicholas Van Dyke, 266; on decease of Joseph McIlvaine, 266; on appointment of committees in the Senate, 273; relative to the emigration of Indians, 345-346; relative to encroachment on the Choctaw lands, 347; on decease of Robert P. Henry, 349; on decease of James Johnson, 350; on decease of Henry P. Wilson, 350; on a western armory, 350; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 352; relative to the Isthmus of Panama, 359; on internal improvement, 360-361; relative to the suffering Greeks, 366; relative to the Florida Indians, 366; relative to a Navy Yard at Philadelphia, 369; on removal of Choctaw Indians, 869; on exportation of free people of color, 870; on the appointment of Chargés des Affaires, 871; relative to Revolutionary pensioners, 875; relative to preservation of live oak timber, 876; relative to land titles in Arkansas, 878; on the sedition law, 882; relative to sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 888; relative to deaf and dumb asylums, 406; relative to Georgia and the Creek Indians, 416; relative to a canal round Muscle shoals, 488; relative to territorial Governors, 489; of thanks to the Speaker, 464; on subscription to a Register of Debates, 464; relative to Georgia and the United States, 464-465; relative to reporters for the Senate, 475; relative to public lands, 476; relative to surviving officers of the Revolution, 478; on the decease of Major-General Brown, 526; relative to the public debt, 529; relative to adjournment, 583; relative to the Bank of the United States, 611; relative to land warrants, 623; relative to a western armory, 628; relative to removal of the Indians, 628; relative to the coast transportation of slaves, 694; relative to a canal in Michigan, 625; relative to a painting of the battle of New Orleans, 687; relative to the coast survey, 640; relative to captured Africans, 656; relative to militia courts martial, 668; relative to the decease of George Holcombe, 668; relative to retrenchment, 669.

Retrenchment.—In the House, resolutions considered, 669; they contemplate the establishment of a grand national truth—that a national debt is a national curse, and should be discharged with convenient despatch, 669; other propositions, 669; the unnecessary number of officers, 669; salaries to be reduced, 670; unnecessary expenditures of public money, 670; printing is the first item in the list of extravagances, 670; it is said, salaries should be reduced, 671; unemployed military officers, 671; our own compensation, 671; can any evil result from ordering this inquiry? 672; all the public expenditures should be subjected to a most rigid examination, 672; this resolution cannot accomplish the reform, 672; duties of fifth auditor, 672; the subject of our own pay, 673.

This reform, a case which ought to begin at home, 675; particulars in which the expenses of the Government are too high, 676; whenever money is plenty, and every thing is at the highest price, that price forms a good reason why salaries must be raised, 677; that is a good government which takes from the people nothing that it can spare, 678; object to abolish useless offices, reduce extravagant salaries, and apply the savings to the payment of the debt, 679; occasion when the army was reduced, 679; fashionable to say, we are discharging the national debt rapidly, 679; extinguishment of the debt has been rapidly advancing, 680; only one bill passed this session, and that to provide pay for the members, 680; the gentleman from Kentucky speaks the honest opinion of seven-eighths of the voters of the country, 680; it is said the particular mischief should be pointed out, which it was intended to remedy, 681; the adoption of this measure would do good, 682; let us begin by reducing our own compensation, 682; amendment moved, 682; not result in any thing beneficial, 682; object to ascertain if abuses exist in the public expenditures, 682; if abuses exist, where is the fault? 683; the question is, whether the present administration is a prodigal and wasteful one, or not, 683; if it is so, let the fact be made to appear, and be reported to us, and let every member tremble for the consequences that will await him from an indignant public, 684; West Point Academy, 684; previous proposition presented, 684; recommended by the President, 685; a prospect of doing something, 685; desire to do the public business, and return home, 686; no extravagance or abuse has been specified, 686; amendment to the amendment of fered, 686; not consistent with the dignity of this House to entertain jurisdiction of any question, which is either intended or calculated to have a political bearing on either political party, 686; incompatible with the interests of the country to carry on this discussion, 687; two Departments of the Government well organized, 687; how were these improvements effected, 687; in vain to attempt beneficial reforms, unless proper men are at the head of Departments, 687; the House appears to deem the inquiry necessary and proper, 688; Administration responsible for the application of the various contingent funds placed at their disposal, 688.

This House is converted into an electioneering arena, 688; the amendment and the peculiar state of things in which we are, 688; no man should be trusted to try his own case; for this reason, the amendment should not pass, 689; the public mind in a state of excitement such as must ever exist on the eve of a political battle, 689; never but one Administration which was seriously disposed to give up its patronage, 690; we are asked why do you not specify? 691; the public printing, 691; other abuses, 692; this inquiry will end in smoke, 692; "masterly inactivity," 692; note, 692; duty of the Committee on Public Expenditures, 693; necessity of the resolution precluded, 693; object of the discussion, 693; West Point, 693; the present, an honest Administration, ably administered, 693; supernumeraries at West Point, 693; strange course of argument, 694; let us see if the Administration is as pure as they would have us believe, 694; abuses, 694; a prospect of the excitement being allayed by means of the resolution, 695; this is a question which does not characterize party in this House, 695; manner in which cadets were introduced at West Point, 695; benefits of the Military Academy are given to the well-born, 695; who are in this academy? 696; the supposed prodigality and extravagance of the Government has afforded a rich theme for declamation, 696; uncharitable to make this charge without better information, 696; this Military Academy should not be abolished, 697; it is complained that there are now several supernumerary cadets, 697; admonition to order, 697.

What was the original resolution? 698; the introduction of the resolution not censurable, 698; a President not receiving the greatest number of votes, 698; what declarations have been made? 699; the Administration fear no inquiry or scrutiny, 699; a word in regard to West Point, 699; amount of the sums placed at the discretionary disposal of the President, 700; object of the first proposition of the amendment, 700; the next inquiry, 700; West Point more creditable to this Government than any other institution in it, 701; for whom it should be made a school, 701; further remarks relative to West Point, 702; note, 702; Washington adduced as the founder of West Point, 702; the contingent fund of the Government, 703; a well-timed proposition for retrenchment not objectionable, 703; consequences of bringing the Presidential canvass into this House, to be deprecated, 704; subjects brought under discussion, 704; the Administration of Washington and party spirit, 705; Administration of Jefferson, 705; objects of bringing these facts forward, 706; the structure of our institutions attacked, 706; what profit will be derived from this debate, 707; every one, almost without exception, seems to yield assent to these resolutions, 707; the people will attend to the election of President themselves if permitted so to do, 707; most formidable preparations for continuing the debate, 708; too much vigilance cannot exist on the part of the authorities, in watching the public expenditures, 708; cannot expect the victorious party to select their adversaries in the distribution of patronage, 709.

The prominent point of inquiry has now become the foreign service of the country, and the expenditure of the funds appropriated for defraying its expense, 710; an important topic, 710; how ordered by the constitution, 710; the law relative thereto, 711; the law of February, 1793, 711; subsequent acts, 711, 712; the allowances to the President were the acts of other Administrations, 712; Mr. Adams had nothing to do with settling his own accounts, 712; no foreign Minister has received less than he, 718; his services, 718; the allowance, 718, 714; charges upon his friends, 714; carrying the war into Africa, 715; a matter of recent notoriety, 716; charges, 717; diplomatic expenses of the Government, 718; small salaries, 718; "wait, wait, there is a lion in the path," 719; parody, 719; what could cause the old Republican party of New England to be now acting with us? 720; Peter Porcupine, 720; Monsieur Macon, 720; alliance between two great leaders, East and West, 721; Gen. Jackson's talents, 721; vulgar error that learning and wisdom are synonymous, 722; Cromwell, 722; Washington, 722; the present Cabinet, 722; peculiarities of talent, 723; further remarks, 724-727.

One thing to offer a resolution like the present and another thing to vote on it, 728; reason why the resolution should not have been brought forward, 728; points of the resolution considered, 729; payment on the debt, 730; how is the annual expenditure distributed, 731; if retrenchment were necessary there could not be a more favorable time, 732; reasons for not voting to lay the resolution on the table, 732; the diplomatic intercourse of the country has been charged with mismanagement and extravagance, 733; this point considered, 733, 734; Liberty is a precious gift, 735; the nature of man is the same under Republics and Monarchies, 735; the Republic is always in most danger in times like the present, 736; the present Administration have not the least claim to merit for paying the public debt, 736; observations on the last Presidential election, 736; the precedent of the last election, if confirmed by the people, will be most dangerous, 737; what was the first important act of the present Administration, 737; the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, 737, 738; did Congress ever mean the outfit should be allowed upon the transfer of a Minister from one court to another, 739; accounts of Mr. Adams, 739, 740; constructive journey, 741; billiard table in the President's House, 741; in what manner ought our Ministers to appear abroad, 742; example of the Romans, 742.

Two features common to all the propositions, 743; reasons for a revision of the expenses, 744; it is said the Administration is distinguished for extraordinary economy, 744; examined, 744; amount of contributions levied on the people, 745; true mode of testing the economy of the Government, 746; extract from Jefferson's Message, 747; what respect has been paid by the Administration to those great maxims of fiscal responsibility inculcated by Jefferson, 748; why is the proposition of retrenchment met as an attack on the Administration 749; sums furnished the present Administration, 749; increase in the aggregate expenditures, 750; Executive responsible, 750; further debate, 751; resolutions adopted, 752.

Revenue Cutters.—See Index, vol. 4.

Revenue, Collection of.—See Index, vol. 5.

Revenue, Bill for the distribution of, 288.

Revolution, Surviving Officers of.—In the House, a bill for the relief of, considered, 218; the officers of the army independent of their military occupations, had, in common with their fellow-citizens, to bear losses, 218; letter of Washington, 219; manner in which the officers were paid, 219; proceedings in relation to the officers subsequent to 1783, 220; after the lapse of so many years, the difficulty in settling the claims of the officers on any accurate principle, 220; the course pursued, 221; the right of the claimants is founded upon a solemn contract deliberately entered into between the officers and their Government, 221; circumstances which preceded and led to its adoption, 222; what engagement more obligatory? what contract could create a clearer right or impose a stronger obligation? 222; has the Government performed its part of the contract? 222; the obligation of a contract can only be dissolved by the same power that created it, 223; what is the cause of their continued poverty and distress? 223; the Commutation Act of 1783, 223; its operation, 223; shall we set up time in bar of their claim, and say we hold you to the strictest letter of the contract, 224; did they ever refuse to march and meet the enemy because they were not paid as the Government promised? 224; not more than one thousand claimants under this act of every description, 225; the claim of these officers does not rest upon gratitude alone, 225; the history of this claim, 225; action of Congress in 1779, 225; the half-pay resolution, 226; how was this contract performed? 226; how did the officers act? 226; did the Government ever perform its second stipulation to the officers? 226; the memorialists ask for the equitable performance of a contract, 226; what were the terms of the contract between the Government and the memorialists? 226; it is almost needless to say that the opinions of Gen. Washington on this subject are entitled to implicit confidence, 227; action of Congress, 227; how was the contract performed on the part of the Government? 227; offer to the officers, 227; no performance of this new contract, 228; they abandoned the power of compelling a redress of their individual grievances, 228.

The object of the bill is to provide a compensation for a loss the surviving officers of the Revolution have sustained in consequence of their not receiving what they were entitled to, 228; what were they entitled to? 228; statement, 229; the government is bound to make good any loss that occurred in consequence of not fulfilling its contract, 229; the soldiers of the Revolution, 230; their wages 230; independently of the depreciation of the paper we have never paid the full amount of the paper or certificates which we compelled the soldier to receive, 230; the soldier had a right to demand money of us, and that, too, at a time when he was in the utmost need of it, 230; claims which these soldiers might present upon us, 231; distress of the army, 231; grounds upon which injustice has been done to the soldiers, 231; who are the men whom we have thus grievously wronged? 232; statements of the Newburg letters, 232; it is said the claim of the officers is one not of justice but of gratitude, 233; how was this account paid which it is wished to consider as closed? 233; it is said that other classes suffered as much as those for whom relief is now sought, 233; it is said that the relief which this bill provides is a premium on old age, 234; the standing debt, 235; now is the time for the performance of this act if it is ever to be made, 236.

In the Senate, a bill to provide for, considered, 473; object to provide both for the officers and soldiers, 479; if any discrimination, it should be in favor of the soldiers, 479; importance and delicacy of the subject, 479; difficulties which attend a satisfactory determination, 479; the cause in which they were engaged, 480; the promise made by Congress, 480; results submitted by the chairman of the committee, 480; further facts, 481; arguments advanced by the opponents, 482; system pursued to the purchasers of public lands, 483; not been the practice of the government to act the part of Shylock with its citizens, 488; the petitioners complained that their personal rights were not made to depend on their individual consent, 483; it is said the receiving of the commutation certificates must be presumed to be an assent to their being considered a full satisfaction of their demands, 484; it is said this commutation excited no dissatisfaction at the time, 494; was the act of commutation just in its execution? 485; objections to the act of commutation, 485; imposing character of the argument in favor of the soldier, 486; cause of apprehension from this bill arising as a precedent, 486; the strongest objection against the passage of the bill, 487; what are the grounds on which pensions have been granted, 488; asked if General Washington, whilst at the head of the government, ever recommended this to the notice of Congress, 489.

Number of claimants, 489; families of deceased officers have as strong claims as the survivors, 490; the promise made in 1781, 490; our gratitude has been invoked on this occasion, 491; an error that the independence of this country was achieved solely by the regular army, 491; devotion of the officers, 491; Marion and Sumter, 492; sufferings of citizens of South Carolina, 492; the first check to British arms, 493; it has been said that the regular army defended the Southern States, 493; it is said, that in establishing the funding system Congress had done injustice by deferring a portion of the interest for ten years, 494; the officers of the Revolutionary army have been more liberally provided for than any other class of men, 494; further debate, 495-498.

The surviving officers of the Revolutionary army claim the performance of a promise of half-pay for life, 541; the direct evidence of a voluntary acceptance of the commutation by the officers, is of the most conclusive character, 542; satisfactory beyond a reasonable doubt, 542; the motive of Congress, 543; claim advocated on common law principles, also on principles most liberal and equitable, 543; annuity tables, 544; the invalid pension roll, 544; further debate, 545; bill laid on the table, 545.

In the Senate, a bill to provide for, considered, 592; some of them wealthy, 592; no pledge given that the claim should not be further urged, 592; it is said this bill will swell the pension list, 592; their number, 593; their pride revolts at the idea of being placed as pensioners, 593; no danger of frauds, 598; no difficulty in ascertaining the individuals entitled to the benefits of the bill, 598; to whom the bill applies, 598; an approach towards the payment of a debt, 598; never was a time when the distresses of the people were greater, 598; peculiar nature of the claims of these officers, 594; object of the bill, 594; further remarks, 594; will the Senate adopt a principle which has never been acknowledged, in favor of these officers? 595; these persons, in some respects, peculiarly unfortunate, 595; it is said the pension system has already been carried too far, 595; what are the objections against this bill, 595; it is said, it will involve us in a charge of unknown extent, 595; is it well founded, 596; it is said the operation of the bill will be unequal, 596; that the present time is not auspicious, 596; that it ought not to pass because those who have spoken in its favor have placed it on different grounds, 596; the bill has been before the Senate under peculiar circumstances, 597; these claims cannot be established in a court of equity, 597; if it was an equitable claim, the legal representatives had an equal right to claim the provision as the surviving officers, 597; laid on the table and be printed, 598; engrossed for a third reading, 598.

Revolutionary Bounty Lands.—See Index, vol. 8.

Revolutionary Land Warrants.—In the House, a resolution of inquiry relative to the number issued, considered, 622.

Revolutionary Pension System.—See Index, vol. 8.

Rhode Island, admission of.—See Index, vol. 1.

RICHARDSON, JOSEPH, Representative from Mass., 609.

RIDGELY, HENRY M., on repealing the duty on salt, 295-298; Senator from Delaware, 467.

RIPLEY, JAMES W., Representative from Maine, 609.

RIVER, WILLIAM C., on the Panama Mission, 104; on internal improvement, 380-383; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria; 391; Representative from Virginia, 609; on retrenchment, 743. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

Roads and Canals, surveys for.—See Index, vol. 7.

Roads, Post.—See Index, vols. 8, 7.

Roads, Post, repair of, in Mississippi.—See Index, vol. 8.

Road from Detroit to Chicago. Road from Pensacola to St. Augustine. Road from Georgia to New Orleans.—See Index, vol. 8.

Road in the Territory of Arkansas.—In the Senate, a bill to authorize the President to construct a road from Fort Smith in Arkansas to Natchitoches in Louisiana, considered, 279; amount appropriated, 279; the lands through which it runs are, almost exclusively, the property of the United States, 279; motion to order the bill to be engrossed, lost, 279; note, 279; reconsidered, 283; passed, 289; note, 289.

In the Territory of Michigan.—In the Senate, a bill to provide for laying out, considered, 283; the improvements of most vital importance, 282; importance of the road for military purposes, 282; the principle well established, 288; facts relative to its importance, 288; people of the West pay more than any others of equal number for the support of the Treasury, 283; a new objection to the road, that it runs through one of the States of the Union, 283; bill laid on the table, 283; note, 283.

Road in States or Territories, difference between. Note, 279, 283, 289.

ROANE, JOHN, Representative from Virginia, 609. See Index, vol. 5.

ROBBINS, ASHER, on the Yazoo purchase, 275; on the gradual improvement of the Navy, 329; Senator from Rhode Island, 467; on the surviving officers of the Revolution, 495; on the duty on molasses, 589. See Index, vol. 8.

ROGERS, JAMES A., letter to Gov. Troup on Creek Indians, 303.

ROWAN, JOHN, Senator from Kentucky, 467; on the powers of the Vice President, 512; on the bill relative to the judicial process, 518; on the duty on lead, 591; on the duty on cordage, 599. See Index, vol. 8.

RUGGLES, BENJAMIN, on the road in Michigan, 283; on the duty on salt, 297; Senator from Ohio, 467; on a grant of land to Kenyon College, 554. See Index, vol. 8.

Rules and Orders.—In the House, remarks upon, 658.

RUSSELL, WILLIAM, Representative from Ohio, 610.

S

Salt Duty and Fishing Bounty.—See Index, vol. 5. Duties on Imports.

SANTFORD, NATHAN, on the duty on salt, 290; Senator from New York, 467. See Index, vols. 5, 6, 8.

SAUNDERS, ROMULUS M., on the accounts of Monroe, 250.

Savannah, relief of.—See Index, vol. 2.

SAWYER, LEMUEL, on the Panama Mission, 205; on a naval academy, 455; Representative from North Carolina, 601. See Index, vols. 3, 4, 6, 7, 8.

School Lands in Indiana.—In the Senate, a bill relative to, considered and ordered to be engrossed, 475.

Seamen, protection of.—See Index, vols. 3, 4.

Seamen, Foreign Merchant.—See Index, vol. 6.

Seat of Government.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 5.

- Secret Proceedings, publication of.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- Sedition Law.*—In the House, resolutions relative to, 322; a preamble and resolution relative to, submitted, 321; no object to make the past subservient to any purpose of contemporary excitement, 321; a question purely of abstract justice and constitutional law, 321; laid on the table, 321.
- Sedition Law of 1793.*—See Index, vols. 4, 6, and Index, vol. 2.—Defensive Measures and Seditious Practices.
- Seminole War.*—See Index, vol. 6.
- Senate* convenes at second session of 19th Congress, 266; adjourns at close of second session of 19th Congress, 344; convenes at first session of 20th Congress, 467; adjourns at close of first session of 20th Congress, 608.
- SEBASTIAN, JOHN*, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609; on retrenchment, 737. See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7, 8.
- SEYMOUR, HORATIO*, Senator from Vermont, 467. See Index, vols. 7, 8.
- SHEPHERD, A. H.*, Representative from North Carolina, 610.
- SILL, THOMAS H.*, Representative from Pennsylvania, 59.
- SILLSBEE, NATHANIEL*, on payment of deported slaves, 309; Senator from Massachusetts, 467; on the French Colonial Trade, 563-565. See Index, vols. 6, 7.
- Slave Trade, African.*—See Index, vols. 2, 6, 7.
- Slave Vessels*, resolution relative to cargoes of, 90.
- Slaves, action of Indiana.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- Slaves Deported.*—In the Senate, the bill to provide for the settlement of claims under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, considered, 308; various objections offered, 309; the bill enforces upon the United States the alternative of either taking the money and giving four per cent. interest, or of investing it in four per cent. stock, 309; why not let the Commissioners give the interest and profit on this sum due the claimants to them? 309; two plans suggested, one to deposit in the Treasury and employ it as well as possible, and the other, to invest it in some productive stock, 309; further objections to the tenth section, 309, 310; amendments moved, 311; ordered to a third reading, 312; re-committed, 312. See Index, vol. 6. Do., fugitive.—See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7. Do., importation of.—See Index, vol. 6, and Index, vol. 3, duties on imports. Do., indemnity for.—See Index, vol. 6. Do., migration of.—See Index, vol. 6. Do., petitions.—See Index, vols. 1, 3, 4, 5.
- Slaves, coast transportation of*, considered, 624.
- Slave Trade, suppression of the.*—In the Senate, a bill considered, 606; object of the large appropriation, 606; any report on former expenditures, 607; protest against the manner in which it is brought before the Senate, 607. See Index, vol. 2, 7.
- Slavery in the District of Columbia.*—In the House, a memorial, that all children hereafter born in the District, of slave parents, shall be free, considered, 415; we are representatives of the people of the District, 415; they have no voice, 415; they have not petitioned, 415; printing opposed, 415; motives of the petitioners, 415; the paper should not be promulgated by an order of this House, 416; laid on the table, 416. See Index, vol. 5.
- Slavery, resolutions relative to, in new State.*—See Index, vols. 3, 6, and Index, vol. 2, Territories.
- Slavery, Negro, in South America.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- BLOANE, JOHN*, Representative from Ohio, 610.
- Sloop of War.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- SMITH, JOHN*, the case of.—See Index, vol. 3.
- Small Armed Vessels.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- SMITH, SAMUEL*, on the relief of revolutionary officers, 221; on the road in Michigan, 232; on the relief of sufferers at Alexandria, 236; on the duty on salt, 239-246; on payment of deported slaves, 309; on the gradual improvement of the Navy, 331; Senator from Maryland, 467; on indemnification to foreigners, 474; on the powers of the Vice President, 507; on the public debt, 534; on the French Colonial trade, 564; on the duty on salt, 573; on the survivors of the Revolution, 583; on repairs of the Cumberland road, 589; on the duty on vermicelli, 590; on the duty on indigo, 595, 596, 597; on the duty on woollen blankets, 601; on the duty on silks, 602.—See Index, vols. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.
- SMITH, WILLIAM*, on the duty on salt, 222; on the Colonization Society, 306; on the payment for deported slaves, 309; on the gradual improvement of the Navy, 332, 333; on the Ohio Turnpike bill, 343; Senator from South Carolina, 467; on the surviving officers of the Revolution, 489; on the powers of the Vice President, 507-514; on the office of Major-General, 527; on the survivors of the Revolution, 532; on the duty on raw wools, 599.
- SMITH, OLIVER H.*, Representative from Indiana, 610.
- SMYTH, ALEXANDER*, Representative from Virginia, 610. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.
- Soldiers of the Revolution.*—See Index, vols. 3, 6.
- South American States.*—See Index, vols. 6, 7.
- South Carolina, claim of.*—In the Senate, a bill for the adjustment of the claims of South Carolina against the United States, considered, 538.
- Spain, ratification of the Treaty of 1812.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- Specie Payments.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- Specie, transportation of, in public armed vessels.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- SPRAGUE, PILEG*, on the Massachusetts militia claims, 122; on the relief of revolutionary officers, 222; Representative from Maine, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- SPRING, MICHAEL C.*, Representative from Maryland, 609.
- STANBERRY, WILLIAM*, Representative from Ohio, 612.
- Standing Committees of the Senate.*—The mode of their appointment discussed, 273.
- State Balances.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- St. Domingo.*—See Index, vols. 2, 7.
- Stenographers*, in the House debate relative to, 635.
- STEPHENSON, JAMES S.*, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609; on the Creek Treaty, 247; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 386. See Index, vol. 8.
- STEVENSON, ANDREW*, on duties on wool and woollens, 236; remarks on a vote of thanks, 465; elected Speaker, 609; remarks, 609; Representative from Virginia, 610. See Index, vol. 8.
- STERIGER, JOHN B.*, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609.
- STEWART, ANDREW*, on relief to the Florida Indians, 136, 146; Representative from Pennsylvania, 609; on the Bank of the United States, 610; on retrenchment, 632. See Index, vol. 8.
- Stock, Five Millions New.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- STORES, HENRY R.*, on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 386; on the Polar expedition, 413; on the British Colonial Trade, 453; on live oak timber, 454; Representative from New York, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 635; on a painting of the battle of New Orleans, 639. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.
- BROWN, JOHN G.*, Representative from New York, 609.
- STRONG, JAMES*, on grants to the Quapaw Indians, 406; Representative from New York, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 629.
- Sufferers at Alexandria, relief of the.*—In the Senate, leave asked and obtained to bring in a bill for the relief of the indigent sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 235; a subject on which it would be improper and inexpedient to legislate, 236; these people under the care of the United States, 236; similar relief given by Congress, 236; cannot put our hands into the pockets of our constituents who had suffered equally by the same devouring element, 236; bill, 237; in the House a resolution to appropriate a sum for the relief of, considered, 333; better to withdraw the resolution till the extent of the injury can be known, 883; question of reference discussed, 883; bill reported, 884; extent of the fire, 884; moved to fill the blank with $20,000, 884; preamble offered to the bill, 884; case of Isaac Poal, 885; Congress possesses no power to vote away the public money, except for public purposes, 885; when was it contended before that Congress had not the power embraced in the bill, 885; precedents, 885; authority pretended to be derived from the clause giving exclusive jurisdiction over the District, 885; act giving relief to Caraccas read, 886; the power which must be sustained by this House before this bill could pass is one of gigantic and alarming extent, 886; after witnessing the scene of distress it is impossible to refuse assent to this bill, 886; powers of the General and State Governments, 887; precedents of no authority, 887; we are a Legislature for the District as well as for the Union, 887; we have power to take the money of the people of this District by tax, and is the power denied us to return them the whole or any portion of it? 887; where is the supreme legislative power over this district, and in whom? 888; various acts of Congress relating to the District, 888; we hold no share of the money in the Treasury as the money of the States, and another in our character as the legislature of the District, 888; what were the circumstances? 889; the authority for the exclusive legislation could fairly embrace all the exercise of power necessary for the measure, 889; constitutional objections do not apply, 889; the power of appropriating public money in this district inseparable to exclusive legislation, 890; it is an ordinary function of municipal power, 890; could not Congress enact poor laws for the district? 890; no constitutional question involved in the case, 890; constitutional duty of protection and an act of humanity, 891; if the power to give this money does not arise out of the right of exclusive legislation, then it is admitted we have it not, 891; what is this bill? 891; does it contain any thing more than a simple gift? 891; without reference to public uses or public services, 891.

A question respecting the grant of national funds, 892; whence do we derive our power to raise money and apply it? 892; if an application of the public money, like this, can be covered under the power of exclusive legislation for this District, the constitution has, in vain, sought to fix a practical limit to our powers over the public purse, 892; the general and particular powers of Congress, 892; the power is given without limitation, it can therefore only be limited by discretion, 892; bill ordered to a third reading, 893; passed, 894.

Sufferers in War.—See Index, vol. 6.

Sunday Mail.—See Index, vol. 5, 7.

SUTHERLAND, JOEL B., Representative from Pennsylvania, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 666.

Swability of States.—See Index, vol. 2.

SWAN, SAMUEL, Representative from New Jersey, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

Swedish Vessels, debate on discriminating duties on, 869.

Sweden, Commercial Intercourse with.—In the House, a bill to exempt Swedish and Norwegian vessels from discriminating duties, 428; the case does not come within the express provisions of the treaty of 1824, 428; referred to Congress by the President, 429; amendment offered, 429; the navigation law of this country openly disregarded as well as laws imposing discriminating duties, 429; bill ordered to a third reading, 429.

SWIFT, BENJAMIN, Representative from Vermont, 609.

T

Tacubaya Mission.—In the House, an item appropriating $9,000 as outfit to a Minister to the Tacubaya Congress, considered, 429; further appropriation of money unnecessary, 429; the President authorized to determine the amount of outfit, 429; objections to the appropriation considered, 430; not expedient, 430; is it intended to question the right of the heirs of Mr. Anderson to an outfit? 430; the former appropriation expended, 430; a balance remains from the appropriation of last session, 431; the committee must satisfy the House that their calculation is correct, 431; the committee have done their duty, 432; a proposition to give a gentleman $9,000 for travelling nine miles, 432; $100,000 already expended on this abortive mission, 432; it is said the President and Senate have instituted the mission, and we are bound to carry it out, 432; we are not invited to this new Congress, 433; delay occasioned by the opposition, 433; object of the appropriation, 433; this fund already charged with two outfits, 434; correction of statements, 434; object of the committee to support the important diplomatic relations of the country abroad, 435; the unexpended appropriation of last year examined, 435; are we now satisfied that such hardship existed in Mr. Poinsett's case as to justify the indirect repeal of the act of 1810? 436; that appropriation lost, 437; $4,500 carried, 437.

TALLIAFERRO, JOHN, Representative from Virginia, 610. See Index, vols. 2, 4, 8.

TATNALL, EDWARD F., on the Creek Treaty, 246; on the New Creek Treaty, 260. See Index, vol. 7, 8.

Taxes, direct.—See Index, vol. 2, 5, 6. Do., War.—See Index, vol. 6.

TAYLOR, JOHN W., Speaker of the House, 345; Representative from New York, 609; on the case of Marigny D'Auterive, 690; relative to captured Africans, 642; on retrenchment, 679. See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7.

TAKENWELL, L. W., on payment of deported slaves, 310-312; Senator from Virginia, 467; on the powers of the Vice President, 504, 509; on the office of Major-General, 529; on the French Colonial Trade, 564-567. See Index, vol. 8.

Tennessee, Admission of.—See Index, vol. 1.

Territorial Government.—See Index, vol. 4.

Territorial Governors.—In the House, a resolution offered relative to the Governorship of Arkansas, 439.

Territories.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6.

THOMAS, JAMES B., Senator from Illinois, 467. See Index, vol. 7, 8.

THOMPSON, ALEXANDER, of Penn., on the Panama Mission, 152. See Index, vol. 8.

THOMPSON, WILEY, on the New Creek Treaty, 263; on land claims in Ohio, 373, 374; Representative from Georgia, 610. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

THOMPSON, HEDGE, Representative from New Jersey, 609.

Tolls of President.—See Index, vol. 1.

TOMLINSON, GIDEON, on discriminating duties on Swedish vessels, 369; on commercial intercourse with Sweden, 423; on the British Trade, 454-456. See Index, vols. 6, 7, 8.

Torpedo Experiment.—See Index, vol. 7.

Treason and Sedition defined.—See Index, vol. 2.

Treason, Punishment of.—See Index, vol. 5.

Treasury Notes.—See Index, vol. 5.

Treasury.—See Index, vol. 1, 6.

Treaty, New Creek.—In the House, a Message from the President, 236; letter from the Secretary of War, recommending an appropriation, 242; now asked to appropriate money for the execution of a contract whose avowed object is, at an additional expense of near half a million of dollars, to set aside a previous contract made under the authority of the United States, 243; this contract has been approved and ratified by the Senate, the same as the one to be set aside, 243; ground for setting it aside is the refusal of one of the parties to execute it on the allegation that the persons who made it had not competent authority, 243; how stood the question when the first contract was made? 243; Congress appropriated money to extinguish the Creek title to land in Georgia; the negotiation was for all the land occupied by them in Georgia and Alabama, and nearly all in both States was ceded, 243; what exertions have been made to execute a contract thus made? 244; proceedings taken, 244; difference between the two contracts, 245; controversy between Georgia and the Executive of the United States, 245; no serious objection to the passage of the bills if the constitutional difficulty were removed, 246; the State of Georgia was prepared to execute the old treaty, 246; the subject has a bearing on the whole nation, 247; bill ordered to a third reading, 247; protest in behalf of the delegation of Georgia read, 248; the protest, 248; resolution to enter it on the Journal offered, 249; morely a detail of reasons by the minority for their vote on the appropriation bill, 249; resolution adopted, 250.

Report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreement of the two Houses, considered, 255; a stupendous fraud intended, it seems, by the delegation who had formed with the Secretary of War the new contract, 255; the chiefs had combined to put into their pockets and those of a few select friends, three-fourths of the first payment, 255; the facts are perfectly understood at the War Department, 255; the only matter which can bear discussion is, how shall the treachery be punished? 256; statement of the Indian Bureau shows how the claim would stand, 256; the transaction, 256; details, 256; the Chief McIntosh, 257; statements in the report of the Committee, 257; comments on the list of worthies and the price to be paid to each, 258; influence of the Cherokees in the Creek nation, 258.

The House is now substantially debating whether it will carry into effect a treaty constitutionally made by the President, and whether it would or would not invade the limits of the treaty-making power, 258; the stupendous fraud said to have been contemplated, 259; the Secretary of War is not chargeable with any improper conduct, 259; what has been the charge against Georgia? 259; no suppression or concealment has been designed, 260; those who originated the abuse of Georgia, the Administrators of the Federal Government, are about to suffer the recoil, 260; the foulest fraud has been committed by some individuals, 260; further debate, 261, 262; the question now before the House does not involve the question of the treaty or the character of individuals, 263; the Government ought to pursue literally the stipulations of the treaty, 263; the evidence of fraud exhibited in the documents, 264; question on agreeing with the Committee of Conference, carried.—See Creek Indian Negotiation, vol. 8.

Treaty with Great Britain.—See Index, vol. 1.

Treaty with Spain.—See Index, vol. 8.

Treaty of Ghent, Commissioner under.—See Index, vol. 8.

TREKVANT, JAMES, Representative from Virginia, 610. See Index, vol. 8.

TRIMBLE, DAVID, on South American relations, 66; on amendment to the constitution, 86. See Index, vol. 6, 7, 8.

TROUP, G. M., letter relative to the Creek nation, 302.

TRACY, PHINEAS L., Representative from New York, 609.

TUCKER, EBERNEZER, Representative from New Jersey, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

TUCKER, STERLING, Representative from South Carolina, 610. See Index, vol. 6, 7, 8.

TURNER, DANIEL, Representative from North Carolina, 610.

Two-thirds Vote.—See Index, vol. 4.

TYLER, JOHN, Senator from Virginia, 467; on the powers of the Vice President, 517; on a grant of land to Kanyon College, 558; on the payment of interest to States, 571. See Index, vol. 7.

U

Union, Dissolution of.—See Index, vol. 4.

United States and Georgia.—In the Senate, a Message from the President, relative to, 299; moved to refer to the Judiciary Committee, 300; statements of the Message, 300; certain officers of the State of Georgia, acting within the limits of that State and under the authority of its laws, have violated, according to his construction, an act of Congress; he is authorized to arrest those officers and, probably, has done so, 300; does the case stated fall under the provisions of the Act of Congress stated in the Message? 301; is the resort to military force before judicial inquiry is had, an appropriate mode of determining the rights of one of the sovereign States of this Confederacy? 301; has not the State of Georgia an equal right to such inquiry? 301; moved to refer to a select committee, 302; referred, 302; further documents, 302.

In the House, a Message from the President considered, 411; the circumstances now presented in such form as to render a decision between the Executive and the State of Georgia necessary, 411; the State authorities have done nothing in violation of the constitution, 411; no legislation anticipated, 412; nothing to fear if the General Government did not interfere and stimulate the Indians to resistance, 412; two sides to this question, 412; if the Indians have rights which the United States are bound to protect, they will be protected, 412; let the case have a fair investigation, 412; several States have already exercised their rights over the Indians, and others intend to do so, 413; three great questions involved, 413; laid on the table, 413; communications relative to, 459; report, 464.

Unsettled Balances.—See Index, vol. 5.

V

Vaccination.—See Index, vol. 7.

VAN BUREN, MARTIN, on the duty on salt, 298-297; Senator from New York, 467; on the surviving officers of the revolution, 479; on the powers of the Vice President, 505; on the survivors of the Revolution, 563. See Index, vol. 7, 8.

VANCE, JOSEPH, on amendment to the constitution, 87; on Georgia Militia Claims, 348; on roads in Michigan, 360; on Land Claims in Ohio, 375; Representative from Ohio, 610. See Index, vol. 7, 8.

VANDEVENTER, C., his communication to the House, 423.

VAN DYKE, NICHOLAS, deceased, of 266. See Index, vol. 6, 7, 8.

VAN HORNE, EASY, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609. See Index, vol. 8.

VAN RENSSLAER, S., Representative from New York, 608. See Index, vol. 7, 8.

VARNUM, JOHN, Representative from Massachusetts, 608. See Index, vol. 8.

VERPLANCK, GULIAN C., on South American relations, 63-73; Representative from New York, 609; on the coast survey, 640. See Index, vol. 8.

Vessels, Registering and Clearing.—See Index, vol. 1.

Vice President, Powers of the.—In the Senate, the report of the committee to revise the rules, considered, 504; the Vice President has no power to call a Senator to order, for words spoken in debate, 504; he should have this power, or Jefferson's Manual should be followed, 505; if he improperly calls to order, to whom are we to appeal? 505; you clothe him with a dangerous power, 505; could put a member down, 505; must have power to preserve order, 505; the office does not confer the right to call to order, 505; the two Houses have the - right to make their own rules, 506; would be an accumulation of unnecessary power in irresponsible hands, 506; he may abuse this power, and the Senate be without remedy, 506; past scenes, 506; debates in the British Parliament, 506; his duty to decide agreeably to such rules as are made for his guidance, 507; he holds his office independent of the Senate, 507; an appeal is worth nothing, 507; Vice President is not a member of the Senate, 507; power not given him by the constitution, 508; privileges of the Senate, 508; the question, 508; the Senate have the right to give this power, 508; all objections to the amendment have a bearing on the constitutional question, 509; the right of every Senator admitted, but that of the presiding officer denied, 509; has the Vice President any power, by virtue of his office, in relation to questions of order? 510; the only power to make rules of order, 510; how the constitution designates the Vice President, 510; further debate, 511-515; power conferred upon the Vice President, 518; right of appeal granted, 518.

- Vice President's Appeal.*—Report of the minority of the committee, 424.
- Vice and Rear Admirals.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- VINTON, SAMUEL F., on relief to the Florida Indians, 136; on lands for school purposes, 287; on the Quapaw Indians, 346; on land claims in Ohio, 374; on deaf and dumb asylums, 402; Representative from Ohio, 610. See Index, vols. 7, 8.
- Virginia Military Lands.*—See Index, vol. 4, 5.
- Virginia Land Warrants.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- Vote of Approval.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- W
- Wabash and Miami Canal.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- WALSH, GEORGE E., Representative from Vermont, 609. See Index, vol. 8.
- War, Conduct of the.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- War, Declaration of in 1812.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- WARD, AARON, on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 352; Representative from New York, 609.
- Washington City, Capture of.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- WASHINGTON, Equestrian portrait of.—See Index, vol. 8.
- Do. Monument.*—See Index, vol. 5, 6, 7.
- WASHINGTON, adduced as the founder of West Point, 702.
- WEBSTER, DANIEL, relative to an amendment to the constitution, 87; on South American relations, 49, 63, 89; on the Panama mission, 94, 159; on the Creek treaty, 249; on the appointment of Chargés, 373; on land claims in Ohio, 374, 375; on the relations of the United States and Georgia, 412, 413; Senator from Massachusetts, 467; on the payment of interest to States, 571; on the survivors of the Revolution, 585; on the duty on indigo, 598; on the duty on cordage, 599; on the duty on silks, 602; on brevet rank, 604. See Index, vol. 5, 7.
- WELLES, JOHN C., on an amendment to the constitution, 47; on the Panama mission, 170; on the exportation of free people of color, 370; on the Liberian Agency, 442-444; on a Naval Academy, 455; Representative from Maryland, 609; on the Bank of the United States, 620; on militia courts martial, 661.
- West Point Cadets.*—See Index, vol. 6.
- West Point Academy.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- West Point, Visitors to.*—In the Senate, a motion to strike out the appropriation for the expenses of, considered, 587.
- Western Armory.*—In the House, a resolution relative to, considered, 350; this work required in the West, 350; a suitable location at Horse-Shoe Bend on the Licking River, 350; resolution modified, 351; amendment moved, 351; laid on the table, 352. See Index, vol. 7.
- Western Rivers, Navigation of.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- WHITE, HUGH L., on payment of deported slaves, 309-311; on the Florida Indians, 366; on preservation of live oak timber, 376; on deaf and dumb asylums, 402; Senator from Tennessee, 467; on the powers of the Vice President, 518; relative to visitors at West Point, 583. See Index, vol. 8.
- WHITE, JOSEPH M., Delegate from Florida, 610. See Index, vol. 8.
- Whites, their intrusion on Indian Reservation.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- WHIFFLE, THOMAS, JR., Representative from New Hampshire, 609. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- Whitney's Patent Right.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- WHITLESEY, ELISHA, Representative from Ohio. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- WICKLIFFE, CHARLES A., on South American relations, 43, 50, 62, 68; on the Panama mission, 97; on the new Creek treaty, 259; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 354; on the Tacubaya mission, 430; on Meade's claim, 445, 446; Representative from Kentucky, 610; relative to captured Africans, 643; on militia courts martial, 657, 662. See Index, vol. 7, 8.
- Widows and Orphans, Pension to.*—See Index, vol. 6.
- WILLET, CALVIN, Senator from Connecticut, 467. See Index, vol. 8.
- WILLIAMS, WILEY, letter to Gov. Troup respecting the Creek Indians, 302.
- WILLIAMS, THOMAS H., Senator from Mississippi, 467. See Index, vol. 6, 7, 8.
- WILLIAMS, LEWIS, Representative from North Carolina, 610. See Index, vol. 5, 6, 7, 8.
- WILSON, HENRY P., decease of, 350.
- WILSON, EPHRAIM K., Representative from Maryland, 609.
- WILSON, JAMES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609. See Index, vol. 7.
- WING, AUSTIN E., Delegate from Michigan, 610; relative to a canal in Michigan, 625. See Index, vol. 8.
- WINGATE, JOSEPH F., Representative from Maine, 609.
- Witnesses, payment of, in Impeachment Cases.*—See Index, vol. 3.
- WOLF, GEORGE, Representative from Pennsylvania, 609.
- WOOD, SILAS, on an amendment to the constitution, 29; on the Panama Mission, 101; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 390; on Deaf and Dumb Asylums, 404; Representative from New York, 609. See Index, vol. 6, 7, 8.
- WOOD, JOHN, JR., Representative from New York, 609.
- WOODS, JOHN, on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 355; on the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians, 409; Representative from Ohio, 610. See Index, vol. 8.
- WOODBURY, LEVI, on the duty on salt, 291; Senator from New Hampshire, 467; on the powers of the Vice President, 515; on surviving revolutionary officers, 543; on the French Colonial Trade, 563; on the survivors of the Revolution, 582-584; on the duty on silks, 602; on the duty on wines, 605. See Index, vol. 8.
- WOODCOCK, DAVID, Representative from New York, 609.
- WORTHINGTON, JOHN C., on Revolutionary Pensioners, 376; on the Panama Mission, 306; on a Polar Expedition, 373; Representative from Maryland, 609.
- WRIGHT, JOHN C., Representative from Ohio, 610; relative to captured Africans, 641-643; on militia courts martial, 662; on retrenchment, 684. See Index, vol. 8.
- WRIGHT, SILAS, JR., on South American relations, 67-75; on relief to the Florida Indians, 137; on free negroes in the District of Columbia, 355; on land claims in Ohio, 374, 375; reports on the Vice President's Memorial, 416; on the report on the Vice President's Appeal, 423; on the British Colonial Trade, 461; Representative from New York, 609.
- WURTE, JOHN, on the Panama Mission, 148; on a Navy Yard at Philadelphia, 369; on Deaf and Dumb Asylum, 401-408; on Meade's claim, 446; on the British Colonial Trade, 458-462. See Index, vol. 8.

Y

YANCY, JOHN, Representative from Kentucky, 610.

Yazoo Purchase.—In the Senate, a bill for the relief of certain persons, &c., considered, 275; grounds for the favorable report of a majority of the committee, 275; the decision that the title to one-tenth of the land released to the United States was not good, is plainly erroneous, 276; ground of this decision of the Board, 276; Supreme Court decided it to be good, 276; the decision of the Board was made final since the loss of the petitioners, 276; the question not a new one, 276; reported against in 1823, 276; all the claim or title of the purchasers, under the Act of Georgia, to Yazoo lands, must be looked upon as property obtained in consequence of a fraudulent advantage over the laws of the land, 276; the intrinsic justice of the claim, 276; appropriation by Congress, 277; three sets of claims, 277; Commissioners decided in favor of the United States, 277; the claims of the New England Company could be put on no better footing than those of their grantors, 278; voluntary confession of the party, himself, 278. See Index, vols. 8, 9.

Yeas and Nays.—In Senate, relative to the appointment of committees, 278; relative to salary of Postmaster General, 285; on relief of Alexandria sufferers, 287; on the duty on salt, 295-299; relative to the Panama Mission, 322, 323; on lands for a canal in Indiana, 323; on duty on teas, 324; on pay of lieutenants in the navy, 478; on motion to re-commit the bill for the relief of Mrs. Decatur, 504; relative to the powers of the Vice President, 518; relative to internal improvements in Alabama, 548; on the bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, 556; on the payment of interest to States, 578; on the graduation of price of public lands, 592; relative to the survivors of the Revolution, 588; on the Tariff bill, 606; on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, 605; on the duty on wines, 606; on brevet rank, 606; on the Miami Canal, 607.

In the House, on amendment to the constitution, 88; on the Panama Mission, 218; on sufferers by fire in Alexandria, 398; on the duties on woollens, 415; on the appropriation for the Tacubaya Mission, 487; on the British Colonial Trade, 463.

YOUNG, WILLIAM S., decease of, 611. See Index, vol. 8.

